86. Fie on my avaricious self on whose account all the friends, solicitous of my welfare, are, being vanquished (in battle), now experiencing great misery.

87. What person is there, O son of Goutama's daughter, who though capable yet would not destroy my enemies, besides you that are the foremost of those that weild weapons and are equal to Maheswara himself in battle.

88. O Aswathama, be gratified. Destroy my enemies. Neither the celestials nor the Danavas are capable of staying within the range of your weapons.

89. O Drona's son, destroy the Panchalas as well as the Somakas together with all their followers. Protected by you we shall slay the rest.

90. Look, O Brahmana, the Somakas and the renowned Panchalas are ranging furiously amidst my troops like a forest fire.

91. O mighty-armed and most excellent of men, check (the career of) these and also of the Kaikayas, before, they, backed up as they are by Kiriti, destroy (all our forces).

92. Aswathama, O chastiser of foes march (against them) speedily. Earlier or later this task should be accomplished by you, O Brahmana.

93. As, O mighty-armed one, you have sprung into existence in order to slay the Panchalas, you will surely, exerting your utmost, make the earth devoid of the Panchalas.

94. It will surely come to pass as the worshipful sages who have attained (ascetic) success have said this. Therefore O most valiant of men, destroy the Panchalas together with their followers.

95. Not to speak of the sons of Pritha together with the Panchalas, even the very celestials together with their allies cannot stand within the range of your weapon. I speak this truly.

96. I will tell you truly, O hero, that the Pandavas together with the Somakas, are incapable of fighting with you, even though they put forth their (utmost energy.

97. O mighty-armed one, go, go. Do not waste time. Your forces, afflicted with Partha's shafts, are taking to flight.

98. O mighty-armed one, O bestower of honours, you are (no doubt) capable, by virtue of your own celestial energy, of chastising the sons of Pandavas as well as the Panchalas.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-nineth chapter the address of Duryodhona in the Ghatotkacha-Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLX.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus addressed by Duryodhana, the son of Drona, invincible in battle, tried to destroy the enemies like Indra the Daytas.

2. (And) that mighty-armed one said these words to your son. O Kourava of mighty-arms, what you have said is indeed true.

3. The sons of Pandu are always dear to me as well as to my father. Similarly, we too also are dear to them. But this is otherwise in battle.

4. O affectionate one, putting forth our (utmost) strength we engage in fight dauntlessly regardless of our very lives. Myself Karna, Salya, Kripa and the son of Hridika i. e., Kritavarma,

5. Can destroy the army of the Pandavas, O most excellent of kings, in the twinkling of an eye. And O best of the Kurus, O mighty armed one, they too can destroy the army of the Kouravas within the twinkling of an eye, if we are not present in battle. We are fighting with the Pandavas putting forth our utmost prowess and they too are battling with us to the best of their might.

7. (Therefore) one energy encountering the other is neutralising (each other). O Bharata. (We are) incapable of putting down the Pandava's army by force,

8. So long as the sons of Pandu are alive. What I tell you is true. The sons of Pandu are fighting for their own sake and they are very competent also.

9. Why will not they, therefore, destroy your troops, O Bharata? O descendant of Kuru, O king, you are most avaricious, deceitful

10. Self-conceited and suspicious of everybody. It is for this reason that you suspect ourselves too. O king, I deem you are a mean, wicked-souled and sinful person.

11. As you are mean and your thoughts are sinful you suspect ourselves and others. (However) for your sake, regardless of my very life I will do my best.

12. O foremost of Kurus, I am now going to fight for your sake. I will engage with your foes and destroy a large number of your enemies.

13. In order to do what is agreeable to you, O chastiser of foes, I will fight with the Panchalas, the Somakas as well as with the Kaikeyas and the Pandavas, in battle.

14. To-day the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Somakas, scorched with my darts, like cows afflicted by a lion, will fly on all sides.

15. Witnessing my prowess to-day, king (Yudhisthira), the son of Dharma, together with the Somakas, will deem the whole world full of Aswathamas.

16. Beholding the destruction of the Panchalas as well as of the Somakas in battle, Yudhisthira, the lord of Dharma, will experience a great pain.

17. O Bharata, I will destroy all those that will confront me in battle. O hero, afflicted with the prowess of my arms no one shall escape.

18. Having thus addressed your son Duryodhana, that one, possessed of mighy-arms (i.e., Aswathama), distressing all bow men, proceeded to battle.

19. (And) that foremost of those that bear life was desirous of doing what was agreeable to your sons. Then the son of Goutama's daughter said thus to the Panchalas together with the Kaikeyas,

20. "All of you, O mighty car-warriors, strike me in the body and displaying your dexterity in handling weapons engage in battle with calmness."

21. Thus addressed (by Aswathama), all of them, O great monarch, began to discharge showers of weapons upon the son of Drona as clouds pour down showers of rain.

22. Having destroyed those (showers of weapons), the son of Drona, even in the very presence of the sons of Pandu and in that of Dhristadyumna, slew ten (warriors) among them in battle, O lord.

23. Sore oppressed in battle, the Panchalas and the Somakas, abandoning the son of Drona, took to flight in ten directions.

24. Witnessing the flight of those heroes that is, the Panchalas and the Somakas, Dhristadyumna, O great king, rushed against the son of Drona in that battle.

25. Then surrounded by one hundred heroic and unretreating car-warriors riding on cars adorned with gold and the rattle of which resembled the roar of clouds full of rain,

26. That great car-warrior, Dhristadyumna, the son of the king of Panchala, beholding the carnage of his warriors, said these words to the son of Drona.

27. O son of the preceptor, O you that are possessed of wicked understanding, why are you slaughtering the common soldiers? If you are (really) a hero, then fight with me in battle.

28—30. I will (surely) slay you. Now stay (here) and be quiet." The puissant Dhristadyumna, then, struck the son of the preceptor with keen and highly dreadful arrows capable of piercing the vital parts. (And) those thick flights of arrows, moving swiftly, furnished with golden wings, having keen points, and capable of riving all the parts of the body, pierced (through the body of) the son of Drona like maddened black-bees seeking for honey—entering into a flowering tree.

31. The proud and dauntless son of Drona, (thus) deeply pierced (with Dhristadyumna's arrows) became as enraged as a serpent crushed by foot, and (then), arrow in hand, thus said :—

32. O Dhristadyumna, wait a moment quietly before I send "you to the abode of Yama with sharpened darts."

33. Having thus addressed the son of Prishata, the son of Drona, the slayer of hostile heroes, like one endued with great nimbleness of hand, covered him completely with deluges of arrows.

34. Thus covered (with arrows) in that battle by the son of Drona, the son of the Panchala king, invincible in battle, thundered forth these words to the son of Drona.

35. O Brahmana, you are neither aware of my promise nor of my origin. Of wicked understanding as you are, I will slay you after killing Drona.

36. I will not therefore slay you to-day in battle, since Drona is alive. O man of greatly vicious understanding, at the expiration of this night, when the bright dawn will appear,

37. I will (first) slay your father and then send yourself too, in battle, to the abode of the departed spirits. I cherish this (thought) in my mind.

38. Now assuming a quiet attitude show all your hatred towards the sons of Pritha and your devotion towards the Kouravas. You will not escape alive (from me).

39. That twice-born one, who giving up the practices of the Brahmanas, gives himself up to the practices of the Kshaytrias, deserves to be slain by all the Kshaytrias like you, O vilest of men."

40. That foremost of the twice-born ones (i.e. Asvathama), thus addressed in harsh words by the son of Prishata, became terribly excited with wrath and said (to Dhristadyumna) "wait, wait."

41. (And) as if to burn the son of Prishata with his eyes, he gazed at him. Heaving sighs like a snake he covered (Dhristadyumna with arrows) in that battle.

42. (Though) that foremost of car-warriors, the son of Prishata, who was surrounded by all the Panchala troops, was (thus) struck with arrows by the son of Drona in that battle,

43. (Yet) that mighty-armed one did not tremble; (but) resorting to his own prowess discharged at Asvathama numerous arrows.

44. Those two (warriors), who resisted each other, baffled the arrowy showers of each other and could not tolerate each other, were engaged in the game of battle in which the wager was life itself.

45—46. Those two mighty weilders of bow poured down showers of arrows on all sides. Beholding the fight between the son of Drona and that of Prishata which was awe-inspiring and dreadful to look at, the Siddhas, the Charanas and the (other) sky-ranging creatures highly extolled them. Filling the firmament and (all) the directions with a downpour of arrows,

47. And creating a great darkness with the shafts, they fought with one another unobserved (by other combatants). As if dancing in battle, and drawing their bows to circles,

48. And bent on killing each other and filling all the creatures with consternation, those two mighty-armed (heroes) fought admirably and with (great nimbleness and dexterity.

49. (And they) were highly adored by thousands of foremost of warriors in battle. Seeing them engaged in battle like two wild elephants (encountering each other) in the forest,

50. Both the armies experienced a great delight. The sodiers emitted forth roars like lions and blew their conches,

51. And sounded hundreds and thousands of musical instruments. And in that terrific battle enhancing the terror of the coward,

52—53. The encounter (between the sons of Drona and Prishata) seemed to go on equally for a moment only. Then O mighty monarch, the son of Drona, cutting off the bow, the standard, the umbrella, the two Parshni drivers, the charioteer and the four steeds of the high-souled son of Prishata in battle, rushed against him.

54. And that one, of immeasurable soul, began to afflict all those Panchalas in hundreds and thousands with his straight-coursing arrows.

55. Then the army of the Pandavas, beholding that brilliant exploit, resembling that of Vasava, achieved by the son of Drona in battle, became greatly dejected, O the most exalted of the Bharatas.

56. Destroying one hundred mighty car-warriors of the Panchalas with a hundred arrows and slaying three foremost of (their) men with three sharpened arrows

57. In the very presence of Phalguna and of the son of Drupada, the son of Drona slaughtered all those Panchalas who had confronted him.

58. Thus slaughtered in battle, the Panchalas together with the Srinjayas fled from the son of Drona, on their cars with their standards cut down.

59. Having defeated his enemies in battle, that mighty car-warrior, the son of Drona, began to send forth thundering roars like those of the clouds at the end of summer.

60. Having destroyed numerous heroes, Asvathama shone like the fire at the end of a Yuga after having consumed all the creatures.

61. Highly adored by the Kouravas after having vanquished thousands of enemies in battle, the puissant son of Drona shone like the lord of the celestials himself after the destruction of his foes.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixtieth chapter the prowess of Asvathama, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXI.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O great monarch, king Yudhisthira and Bhimasena the son of Pandu hemmed in the son of Drona on all sides.

2. King Duryodhana, then, accompanied by the son Bharadwaj, advanced against the Pandavas in battle. Then commenced a fight,

3. Terrible to look at, highly dreadful and increasing the terror of the cowards. Large numbers of the Ambhastas, the Malavas the Vangas, the Sivis, and the Trigartas,

4—5. Were wrathfully sent by Yudhisthira to the region of Death. Cutting off (into pieces) the Abhisahas, the Surasenas and (other) Kshatrtyas invincible in battle Bhima made the earth muddy with blood. (And) O king the Yaudheyas, the mountaineers, the Madrakas and the Malavas,

6. Were sent by the diadem-decked Shetavahana to the domains of Death. Deeply pierced with straight-coursing arrows,

8. The tuskers dropped (dead) on the ground like mountain peaks, with the chopped off trunks of elephants, still moving to and fro (in convulsions).

8. The earth, being strewn all over, seemed to be full of snakes moving about, with the fallen royal umbrellas decked with gold.

9. The field, being scattered all over looked (beautiful) like the firmament studded with (innumerable) suns, moons and stars at the end of a Yuga. "Slay, strike dauntlessly, pierce and cut to pieces"—

10. These (and similar other) tumultuous uproars arose near the car of Sonasva (i. e. Drona). Getting terribly enraged, Drona also, by means of Vayaveya weapon, in that encounter,

11. Began, like a furious hurricane (chasing away) the clouds, to destroy his enemies. (Thus slaughtered by Drona, the Panchalas fled away from terror, 12. In the very presence of Bhimasena and of the high-souled Partha. (Then) that one who wore a coronet (i. e. Arjuna and Bhimsena, rallying (their troops) all on a sudden,

13. Attacked the large army (of Drona) with a mighty car force. Vivatsu attacking the right and Vrikodara the left flank (of Drona's army)

14. They rained upon the son of Bharadwaj two mighty downpours of arrows. Then the Srinjayas, and those great car-warriors, the Panchalas,

15. And the Matsyas together with the Somakas followed. In like manner, (many) car-warriors, who wore (efficient) smiters on the side of your son,

16. (Followed) by a vast army, O king, proceeded towards the car of Drona. Then that Bharata army slaughtered by Kiriti (i. e. Arjuna who wore a coronet),

17. (Overcome) with sleep and bewildered) by darkness began once more to disperse. In spite of (the endeavours of) Drona and your son himself to prevent (their filght),

18. They were unable to rally the combatants, O mighty monarch. That vast army, slaughtered with arrows by the son of Pandu,

19. Took to flight in all directions when the world was enveloped in darkness. Hundreds of kings, leaving their conveyances, fled away, O great monarch, in terror, on all sides.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-first chapter, the close engagement, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXII

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing Somadatta angrily shake his great bow, Satyaki said to his charioteer "Bear me towards Somadatta.

2. O charioteer, I will not return from battle to-day without killing my enemy —the vilest of the Kurus, the son of Valhika. These my words are true."

3. Thereupon, (his) charioteer drove to the battle those horses of Sindhu breed endowed with great fleetness, having the colour of the conch and capable of bearing all the weapons.

4. Those (steeds), fleet as the mind or the wind, carried Yuyudhana (to the field of battle) as the horses of Indra, O king, had, in days of yore, born him who was preparing to slay the Asuras.

5. Beholding Sattwata quickly proceed against him to battle, Somadatta, O mighty monarch, confronted him undauntedly.

6. Discharging a shower of arrows as the clouds (pour down) torrents of rain, he (i. e. Somadatta) covered the grandson of Sini like the clouds (covering the sun).

7. O best of the Bharatas, the dauntless Satyaki also completely covered that most exalted of the Kurus with arrowy showers in that battle.

8. Somadatta also pierced the descendant of Madhu in the chest with sixty arrows. Satyaki too, O king, pierced him with keen darts.

9. Pierced by each other with each other's arrows, they looked like two blossoming Kinsuka trees in the following season.

10. With their bodies covered all over with blood, those two renowned descendants of Kuru and Vrishni eyed at each other as if (desirous of) consuming each other with their glances.

11. Those two dreadful-looking grinder of foes ranging on their cars coursing in circles, looked like two clouds pouring (torrents of) rain.

12. With their bodies pierced, mangled and wounded with shafts, they looked, O king of kings, like two hedge hogs.

13. Pierced with shafts endued with golden wings, those two (heroes), O monarch, looked as (beautiful) two lords of the forest covered with glow-worms during the rainy season.

14. Their bodies looking resplendent with arrows (they were pierced with) those two great car-warriors appeared in that battle, like two furious elephants with their bodies covered all over with (blazing) meteors.

15. Then, O great monarch, in that encounter, the mighty car-warrior Somadatta cut off with a cresent-shaped arrow the great bow of the descendant of Madhu.

16. (He) then pierced him with twenty five darts and at that time when speed was (urgently) necessary, he again speedily pierced him with ten (more) arrows.

17. Thereupon Satyaki, taking up a very strong bow, speedily pierced Somadatta with five arrows.

18. Then again, O king, Satyaki, as if with a smile in that battle, cut down with another broad-headed shaft the golden standard of the son of Valhika.

19. Seeing his standard cut down Somadatta fearlessly pierced the grandson of Sini with twenty-five arrows.

20. Filled with wrath, Satyaki also, in that engagement, cut off with a keen and razor-faced shaft, the bow of the (great) bowman Somadatta.

21. He then, O great king, pierced him (i. e. Somadatta), who then looked like a snake with its fangs broken, with one hundred straight-coursing arrows furnished with golden wings.

22. Thereupon the greatly puissant Somadatta,—the great car-warrior, taking up another bow, covered Satyaki with downpours of shafts.

23. Satyaki also, getting greatly excited with wrath, pierced Somadatta in that battle. Somadatta, on his part, afflicted Satyaki with showers of arrows.

24. Bhima also, for the sake of Sattata, struck the son of Valhlka with ten arrows. And the dauntless Somadatta also pierced Bhima with sharpened arrows.

25. Thereupon Satyaki, excited with wrath, discharged at the chest of Somadatta, a new, strong and formidable Parigha furnished with a golden handle.

26. (But the descendant of Kuru), as if with a smile, cut off into two parts, in that engagement, that dreadful-looking Parigha as it was advancing against him.

27. Thus severed into two parts, that great Parigha of iron, fell down (on the ground) like the great peak of a mountain riven by thunder.

28. Then, in that engagement, O king, Satyki cut off the bow of Somadatta with one broad-headed arrow and with another five the leathern case that sheathed his fingers.

29. Then with four darts he speedily sent before the lord of the departed spirit the four excellent horses (of Somadatta).

30. And, O Bharata, that foremost of car-warriors, as if with a smile, cut off, with a broad-headed and straight-coursing arrow, the head of his charioteer from the trunk.

31. He then discharged (at Somadatta himself) a highly dreadful arrow, blazing like the fire, furnished with golden wings, bathed in oil and sharpened on stone.

32. Shot with great force by the grandson of Sini that excellent and formidable shaft, darted like a falcon, at the chest of Somadatta.

33. The great car-warrior Somadatta, deeply pierced by the puissant Satwata, fell down (from his car) and died, O great king.

34. Seeing Somadatta slain there, your soldiers proceeded against Yuyudhana with a large number of cars.

35. The Pandavas also, O mighty monarch, accompanied by all the Prabhadrakas, and by a large army, made a rush upon Drona's division.

36. Then, Yudhisthira, filled with rage, began to crush the troops of the son of Bharadwaja with arrows in the very presence of Bharadwaja's son.

37. Seeing his troops put to rout by Yudhisthira, Drona, with eyes, blood-shot in wrath, furiously rushed against him.

38. Then, (Drona) pierced the son of Pritha with seven sharpened darts. Yudhisthira also, inflamed with rage, pierced him in return with five (arrows).

39. That mighty bowman, being (thus) deeply pierced, for a moment licked the corners of his mouth, and (then) cut off the standard and also the bow of Yudhisthira.

40. Deprived of his bow, that excellent king took up another tough and strong bow, with great speed when speed was highly necessary.

41. Then with a thousand shafts, the son of Pandu pierced Drona together with his horses, charioteer, standard and car and this (feat on the part of Yudhisthira) seemed marvellous.

42. In consequence of the strokes of those darts, Drona, the foremost of the Brahmanas, being (greatly) pained, sank unconciously for a moment on the terrace of his car.

43. Then regaining his consciousness, heaving sighs like a snake, and excited with a terrible wrath, he brought into existence the weapon presided over by Vayu.

44. But the dauntless and puissant son of Pritha, in that fight taking up his bow, checked the career of that weapon with one of his own.

45. And the son of Pandu also cut off the large bow of that Brahmana. Drona, the grinder of the Kshatriyas then, having taken up another bow,

46. The best of the Kurus cut off that also with a keen and broad-headed shaft, Then Vasudeva, addressed Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, thus :—

47. "O mighty armed Yudhisthira, hear what I tell you. O foremost of the Bharatas, do not fight with Drona,

48. Drona has been all along trying to capture you in battle. I do not think it proper for you to fight with him.

49. He, that has been created for his destruction, will slay him. Leaving your preceptor go (to the spot) where king Suyodhana is (fighting).

50. Kings ought to fight with kings (only); and they should not desire to fight with those that are not kings. O son of Kunti, surrounded by elephants, horses and cars, go to that spot,

51. Where Dhananjaya and that most valiant of men, Bhima, with myself only to help them are fighting with (all) the Kouravas."

52—53. Hearing these words of Vasudeva, the virtuous king Yudhisthira reflected for a moment and then proceeded towards the spot where the battle was raging hot and furious and where, Bhima, the slayer of his foes, taking up his station, was destroying your warriors like the (grim) Destroyer with gaping mouth.

54. Ringing the surface of the earth with the thundering rattle of his car like the roar of the clouds at the end of summer, that king of kings, Yudhisthira,

55. The son of Pandu, took up his station at the flank of Bhima who was destroying the foes. Drona also began, at that night, to destroy his enemies, the Panchalas.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-second chapter, the slaughter of Somadatta at the nocturnal fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAKTER CLXIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. That terrible and awe-inspiring battle having taken place when the world was enveloped with darkness and dust, O lord of the earth,

2. The warriors, who remained (on the field of battle) could not distinguish one another. It was by conjecture and uttering their names that those foremost of the Kshatriyas fought with one another.

3. When that terrible destruction of men, horses, elephants and foot-soldiers was going on, those heroes viz., Drona, Karna, Kripa, Bhima, the son of Prishata and Satwata,

4. Began, O best of the Bharatas, to afflict each other and the troops. The soldiers, (thus) terribly slaughtered by those great car-warriors,

5. And surrounded by that dense gloom, took to flight in all directions. And with their minds (greatly) agitated (with terror) they ran away on all sides.

6. And, O great king, while flying away in all directions they were (pursued) and killed. In that engagement thousands of great car-warriors slaughtered one another.

7. (And) in that blinding darkness, (the soldiers) lost their senses. (All this is no doubt due to) the evil counsels of your son. And that (dismal) darkness prevailing all around, all the creatures, nay the very foremost of the combatants themselves, O Bharata, were seized with terror and their senses forsook them, O Bharata in that battle.

Dhritarastra said :—

8. When drowned in that blinding darkness you were agitated by the Pandavas and were deprived of your energy, what became the state of your minds ?

9. When the world was thus enveloped with darkness, how, O Sanjaya, their and my armies were disclosed to view again !

Sanjaya said :—

10. Then all the survivors of the slaughtered army (of the Kurus) were, in obedience to the order of their commanders, again drawn up in battle array.

11. And Drona (took his station) at the van, Salya at the rear and the sons of Drona and Suvala (respectively placed themselves) at the right and left flanks (of that array). And king (Duryodhana) himself, O monarch, was, during that night, engaged in protecting all the troops.

12. (And) consoling all the foot-soldiers and also the lords of the earth, Duryodhana said to them "leaving aside your great weapons, take in hand blazing lamps."

13. In obedience to the command of that foremost of kings they gladly took (burning) lamps, in their hands. Large numbers of celestials, sages, Gandharvas and Rishis and hosts of Vidyadharas, Apsaras,

14. Nagas, Yakshas, Uragas and Kinnaras, stationed in the firmament, cheerfully took up lamps. Lamps, filled with perfumed oil, were seen to fall from (the lands of) the regents of the cardinal points.

15. Specially Narada and Parvata sent down for the sake of the foremost of the Kurus many such lamps, dispelling the darkness. On that night, the army (of the Kurus) looked brilliant by virtue of the lusture of these) lamps,

16. The precious ornaments (worn by the combatans) and of the blazing celestial weapons that were hurled (by the Kourava army against their enemies). Five lamps were placed on each car and three on each maddened elephant.

17. Upon each horse (was placed) a huge lamp. It was in this way that the Kuru warriors were illuminated. The lamps, being thus placed in due order, very soon lighted up your army.

18. Nay, all the troops thus disclosed to view by the foot-soldiers carrying oilified lamps in their hands, looked as brilliant as the clouds in the firmament during the night with flashes of lightning (playing amidst them).

19. When the army was thus lighted up, Drona, like the fire, scorching everything around, looked resplendent, O king of kings, with his golden armour on, like the mid-day sun of blazing rays.

20. The lusture of the lamps (falling upon the golden ornaments) the bright cuirasses and bow, and the will-tempered weapons, was reflected from them.

21 The rays (of these lamps) falling upon maces entwined with strings, bright Parighas, cars and darts as they whirled along, created innumerable lamps.

22. O king, umbrellas and yak-tails and scimitars and flaming brands and necklaces of gold as they were being whirled looked exceedingly brilliant.

23. And, O king, that army illuminated by the lusture of the weapons, by the splendour of those lamps and by the brilliancy of the ornaments, looked highly resplendent.

24. Well-tempered and beautiful weapons dyed with blood and wielded by the warriors shed a blazing lusture like flashes of lightning in the firmament at the end of the hot season.

25. The faces, of the combâtants who were trembling by the impetuosity of their speed and rushing furiously against their enemies striking them down, shone at that time like great lotuses shaken by the wind.

26. On that dreadful night that army blazed up (by the light of those lamps) looked as terrible as the splendour of the sun during the progress of the conflagration of a great forest teeming with trees.

27. Seeing our army (thus) lighted up, the sons of Pritha urging all their foot-soldiers through their entire army, acted in the same way (as we did).

28. (And they) placed seven lamps on each elephant, ten on each car, two on the back of every horse and many on the flank and rear and the standards.

29. (Innumerable) blazing lamps were placed on the flanks and the rear and the van of and within and all around the entire army. Thus were the two hosts lighted up.

30. Through the entire army, the infantry became mixed up with throngs of elephants, cars and horses. And like them (i.e. the foot-soldiers) several other persons, also taking flaming brands in their hands, lighted up the army of the son of Pandu.

31. By virtue of (the lusture of) those lamps that army became fiercely blazed up like a blazing fire made fiercely illuminated by the rays of the sun, the maker of day.

32. The splendour of those two (armies) reaching beyond the earth, the firmament and all the cardinal points began to increase. By that light their army as well as yours became crearly disclosed to view.

33. All the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the gods, the Siddhas, and the Apsaras, awakened by that light which reached the skies, appeared on the scene.

34. The field of battle, thronged with the celestials, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Siddhas, the Apsaras and the spirits of the dead combatants about to enter the celestiels regions, appeared like a second heaven.

35. Crowded with cars, horses and elephants lighted up by these lamps and (teeming with) furious warriors and steeds slain or careering madly, that mighty host, consisting of men, horses and elephants drawn up in battle·array, looked like the arrays of the celestials and the Asuras (in days of yore).

36. That nocturnal battle between the god-like combatants raged furiously like a tempest. The rush of arrows formed its fierce winds, the mighty car-warriors and elephants its clouds, the shafts its showers and the blood (of the combatants and the animals) its torrent of rain.

37. In that encounter that foremost of the Brahmanas, the magnanimous (Drona) endued with the energy of a great fire began to afflict the Pandavas like the noon day sun, (scorching everything) at the end of the rainy season.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty-third chapter, the lighting up of the troops, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The field of battle, which had been before buried in darkness and dust, being thus lighted up (by the lusture of those lamps), heroic combatants, desirous of slayingone another, encountered one another (in battle).

2. Taking up their lances, swords and (other) weapons and encountering one another, they looked wrathfully at one another in battle, O king.

3. With thousands of lamps shedding their lusture all around, and placed upon golden steeds adorned with gems and fed with fragrant oil,

4. And with the lamps sent down by the celestials and the Gandharvas which were more lustrous and brilliant, the field of battle, O Bharata, looked as beautiful as the firmament studded with planets and stars.

5. The field of battle, lighted up by hundreds of blazing brands, looked resplendent. Indeed, the earth seemed to be on fire like what happens at the time of universal destruction.

6. All the points illuminated by (the light of) those lamps all around, looked (beautiful) like trees teeming with glow-worms on an evening of the rainy season.

7. Then, O monarch, brave warriors engaged with brave warriors. Elephants encountered elephants, horsemen (encountered) horsemen,

8. And car-warriors joyfully engaged with one another, during the dreadfull night at the command of your son.

9. Terrific, (indeed) was the clash of the two armies, (each) consisting of four (kinds of) forces. Then, O great king, Arjuna, vanquishing all the kings (on your son's side), began quickly to destroy the army of the Kouravas.

Dhritarastra said :—

10. What, (O Sanjaya) became the state of your minds when, filled with rage, the invincinble one (i.e. Arjuna) entered into my son's army ?

11. What did (my) forces do then when that sorcher of foes penetrated into them ? (And) what course, (best) suited to that occasion, did Duryodhana think to adopt ?

12. What chastisers of foes opposed (the career of) that hero ? Who were they that protected Drona when Shetavahana entered (into our army) ?

13. Who were they that protected the right and the left car-wheels of Drona ? Who were those heroes that protected the rear of that hero when he was engaged in fighting ?

14—15. Indeed, when that invincible, puissant and mighty bowman, endued with the valour of a tiger, penetrated into the midst of the Panchalas, dancing as it were along the track of his car, and destroying his enemies in battle, who were they that came to his front ? How did Drona who consumed large troops of cars of the Panchalas,

16. Like a wrathful meteor, meet with his death ? You always describe my enemies as cool, unvanquished,

17. Cheerful and impetuous in battle. But, O Sanjaya, you do not speak so of my warriors. You speak of them as slain, pale and routed and of my car-warriors as (always) made car-less in the battles ?

Sanjaya said :—

18. Aware of the intentions of Drona as desirous of fighting during that night, Duryodhana, O mighty monarch, addressed his obedient brothers,

19. (Namely) Vikarna, Ctitrasena, Suparsa, Duddharsha and Dirghavahu and all their followers saying :—

20. " O powerful (heroes), all of you carefully protect Drona from the rear. Let the son of Hridika (protect) his right car-wheel and Salya the left.

21. Then your son commanded all the survivors of the heroic Trigarta warriors to place themselves in the van (saying),

22. The preceptor is of benevolent dispositon and the Pandavas are trying their utmost (to slay him). United together you will protect him while he will be engaged in destroying his enemies in battle.

23. Drona is powerful in battle, is endued with nimbleness of hand and is puissant. Not to speak of Pandavas united with the Somakas, he is competent to vanquish even the very gods in battle.

24. United tagether and exerting your very best in (this) dreadful engagement, all of you protect Drona from that invincible and mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna.

25. I do not find any one among the warriors of the Pandavas except Dhristadyumna, that is capable of defeating Drona in battle.

25. I therefore think we should apply our whole heart and soul to the protection of the son of Bharadwaja. (If) protected (by us) he will gradually destroy the Somakas as well as the Srinjayas.

27. When all the Srinjayas, (placed) in the van of the (Pandava) army will be destroyed, the son of Drona will undoubtedly slay Dhristadyumna in battle.

28. Similarly the great car-warrior Karna will vanquish Arjuna in battle. (And) I will myself destroy Bhimasena and others clad in mail in battle.

29. The remaining Pandavas, destitute of energy, will be easily subjugated by (my) warriors. My success, then, will last for a long time.

30. Therefore protect (carefully) the mighty car-warrior Drona in battle. " Thus addressing (his soldiers), your son Duryodhana, O foremost of the descendants of Bharata, 31. Then commanded his army (to act in obedience to his orders) during that dreadfully dark night. Then, O most exalted of the Bharatas, took place a battle.

32. Between the two armies, both desirous of victory, O king, Arjuna, (then), began to sorely assail the army of the Kouravas and Arjuna, with numerous (sorts of) weapons. (And) in that engagement the son of Drona began to cover the Panchala king and the son of Bharadwaja, the Srinjayas, with straight arrows. (And) O Bharata, as the armies of the Pandavas and the Panchalas (on one side) and that of the Kouravas (on the other),

35. Fell to destroying one another there arose a dreadful uproar. Neither ourselves nor those who preceded us, had (previously) witnessed such a furious and dreadful battle as took place during that night.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty-fourth chapter the close fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA.—

Continued

Sanjaya said :—

1. When, O lord of the earth, that terrific nocturnal battle, destructive of all the creatures, was raging, Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma,

2. Spoke to the (other) Pandavas and the united Panchalas and Somakas, O monarch, for the destruction of men, cars and elephants.

3. Yudhisthira, the lord of men, addressed his own warriors (thus):—"make a rush upon Drona only in order to slay him."

4. In obedience to the commands of the king, the Panchalas as well as the Somakas O monarch, sending forth thundering roars, rushed against Drona alone.

5. We two, on our part, roaring in return and filled with wrath, rushed against them, in battle, to the full measure of our prowess, enthusiasm and courage.

6. Kritavarman, the son of Hridika, rushed against Yudhisthira as he was advancing against Drona like a mad elephant against its infuriate rival.

7. (Similarly), O king, Bhuri, the crusher (of his foes) in battle who belonged to the Kuru party rushed against the grandson of Cini (as he came forward) scattering showers of arrow on all sides.

8. Again, O king, Karna, the son of Vikartana, checked that mighty car-warrior Shahadeva, the son of Pandu, as he, actuated with the desire of taking Drona, was advancing (against him).

9. Duryodhana himself rushed against Bhimsena, the foremost of car-warriors, in that engagement, who was advancing on his car (against Drona) like the grim Destroyer.

10. Sakuni, the son of Suvala, O king, quickly opposed Nakula, the best of warriors and skilled in every (sort of) battle.

11. Similarly, in that encounter, Kripa, the son of Saradwata, opposed Shikhandi, the foremost of car-warriors, (who was) advancing on his car, O king.

12. In like manner, O great monarch, Dusasana, with utmost exertions, checked Prativindhya, who was resolutely advancing (on his car drawn by) horses, (beautiful) as peacocks.

13. Similarly, O mighty monarch, Asvathama checked the career of the son of Bhimasena, viz the Rakshasa (Ghatotkacha) skilled in a hundred sorts of illusions.

14. In that engagement Vrishasena resisted the highly puissant Drupada, (who) accompanied by his troops and retainers, (advanced forward) with the desire of slaying Drona.

15. O Bharata, O great monarch, the king of Madra, inflamed with rage, opposed Virata who was advancing quickly for slaying Drona.

16. Similarly, in that encounter, Chitrasena, with showers of arrows, checked the impetuous Sataneeka, the son of Nakula, as as he was advancing for the purpose of taking the life of Drona.

17. O great king, Alamvusha, the lord of the Rakshasas, resisted the rapid career of the mighty car-warrior Arjuna, the foremost of warriors.

18. Then Dhristadyumna, the son of the Panchala king, gladly resisted the mighty bowman Drona (who was) destroying his enemies.

19. Similarly, O king, your car-warriors energetically opposed other great car-warriors of the sons of Pandu, who were advancing (against Drona).

20. Hundreds and thousands of warriors, mounted on elephants, speedily encountering riders on elephants in that great engagement, began to fight with and crush one another.

21. O king, at dead of night, horses, rushing furiously against one another, looked like mountains endued with wings.

22. O mighty monarch, taking up lances, darts and swords in their hands and sending forth loud shouts, horsemen closed with horsemen.

23. There (on the field of battle) large numbers of men destroyed one another in heaps, by means of maces, short clubs and several other weapons.

24. Kritavarma, the son of Hridika, inflamed with rage, resisted Yudhisthtra, the son of Dharma, as the place between the high and the low tide-marks (resists) the ocean.

25. Yudhisthira, also piercing the son of Hridika with five darts and again piercing him with twenty (more), said—"wait, wait."

26. O worshipful sire, Kritavarma too, fired with rage, cut off the bow of the Dharmaraja with a broad-headed dart and then pierced him with five (arrows).

27. Then that mighty car-warrior, that is, the son of Dharma, taking up another bow, struck the son of Hridika on the arms and the chest with ten arrows.

28. Pierced in (that) battle by the son of Dharma, O worshipful sire, the descendant of Madhu (i.e. Kritavarma) trembled in ire and (then) afflicted (Yudhisthira) with seven arrows.

29. The son of Pritha (however), cutting off his bow and armlet, shot at him, O king, five keen and broad-headed shafts sharpened on stone.

30. Penetrating through his precious armour ornamented with gold, those fierce shafts entered into the earth like snakes (entering into) ant-hill.

31. Taking up another bow in the twinkling of an eye, he pierced the son of Pandu with six and again with ten arrows.

32. Then that Pandava, of immeasurable soul, placing his mighiy bow on the car, hurled at him (i.e. Kritavarman) a dart (fierce) as a snake.

33. Hurled by the son of Pandu that formidable (dart), ornamented with gold, penetrating through the right arm (of Kritavarma) entered into the bottom of the earth.

34. In the meantime, the son of Pritha, taking up his mighty bow, covered the son of Hridika with straight shafts.

35. Then there (on the field of battle) that hero, that foremost car-warrior among the Vrishnis, within half the time of the twinkling of an eye, deprived Yudhisthira of his horse, driver and car.

36. Then the eldest son of Pandu took up a sword and a shield. But the descendant of Madhu cut off those two with sharpened and broad headed shafts in that battle.

37. Thereupon, taking up a formidable lance furnished with a golden handle, (Yudhisthira) hurled it, quickly in that engagement, against the high-souled son of Hridika.

38. (But) the light-handed son of Hridika, as if with a smile, cut off into two parts, that (formidable lance), as it, hurled by the hand of Yudhisthira careered impetuously along.

39. Then, in that encounter, he covered the son of Dharma with hundreds of shafts; (and then), inflamed with ire he cut off the armour of (Yudhisthira) with showers of arrows.

40. Cut off into a hundred fragmentst with the arrows of the son of Hridika, (the armour of Yudhisthira) ornamented with gold, fell down, scattered in that battle, O monarch (from its body) like a cluster of stars (dropping from) the sky.

41. With his coat of mail cut off, deprived of his car and afflicted with the arrows of Kritavarma, Yudhisthira the son of Dharma, quickly withdrew from (the field of) battle,

42. Having defeated Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, the mighty car-warrior Kritavarma again engaged himself in protecting the car-wheel of Drona.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty-fifth chapter, the retreat of Yudhisthira, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVI.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Bhuri also, O monarch, in (that) engagement, checked the grandson of Sini who was rushing along like an elephant (descending) from a gradually sloping ground.

2. Inflamed with wrath, Satyaki, then, pierced him in the heart with five sharpened arrows. (Thus struck) his blood began to flow.

3. Similarly, the descendant of Kuru (i. e. Bhurij, in (that) engagement, quickly pierced the grandson of Sini invincible in battle, in the chest, with ten darts.

4. (And), O great king, their eyes blood-shot in rage and drawing their bows powerfully, those two (heroes) began to mangle each other.

5. Inflamed with wrath and looking like Death (itself) or the sun, those two (warriors commenced (to shower upon each other) terrible downpours of shafts, O mighty monarch.

6. The battle, O great king, between those two (heroes), who, covering each other (with arrows) stood (face to face) in (that) encounter, went on equally for a moment only.

7. Then, O mighty monarch, the grandson of Sini, fired with rage, cut off, as it were, with a smile, the bow of that high-souled descendant of Kuru, in (that) engagement.

8. Then he quickly pierced that (warrior) whose bow was cut off, in the chest, with nine sharpened arrows and said (to him) "wait, wait."

9. That scorcher of foes, (thus) deeply pierced by his powerful antagonist, took up another bow and pierced Satwata in return.

10. O lord of the earth, having pierced Satwata with three arrows, he cut off his bow, as it were, with a smile, by means of a very keen and broad-headed shaft.

11. O great king, his bow being (thus) cut off, Satyaki, insensible with wrath, hurled an impetuous dart at the broad chest of that (Kuru hero).

12. His body being riven by that dart, he fell down from his excellent car like the blazing Mars (dropping down) from the firmament.

13. The mighty car-warrior Ashwathama witnessing the slaughter of that hero, rushed impetuously, O descendant of Bharata, against the grandson of Sini.

14. O lord of men, saying "wait, wait" to Satyaki, he (i. e. Ashwathama,) covered him with downpours of arrows, like the clouds covering the breast of the (mountain) Meru with (showers of) rain.

15. (Thereupon), the mighty car-warrior Ghatotkacha, sending forth a loud shout, said to him (i. e. Asvathama) who was rushing furiously towards the car of the grandson of Sini.

16. "Wait, wait. O son of Drona, you shall not escape alive. I will presently destroy you as the six-faced (Kartikeya) slew the (Asura) Mahisha (in days of yore):

17. I will to-day put an end to your desire for fight on the field of battle." Saying this, the Rakshasa (Ghatotkacha),—the slayer of hostile warriors—with his eyes red like copper in wrath,

18. And inflamed with rage, rushed against the son of Drona like a lion (rushing against) a lord of elephants. Ghatotkacha (then), began to shower arrows, measuring the Aksha of a car, upon

19—20. The son of Drona, the foremost of car-warriors as the clouds (pour down) showers of rain. The son of Drona, however, in that engagement, quickly baffled that arrowy down pour by means of shafts resembling poisonous snakes. Then with a hundred keen darts, capable of piercing the vital parts, and coursing rapidly,

21. (He) pierced the subduer of foes, that is Ghatotkacha, the lord of the Rakshasas. The Rakshasa, thus pierced with shafts by him on the field of battle,

22. Looked, O great monarch, like the porcupine with its quills standing erect. Thereupon, the puissant son of Bhimasena, excited with rage,

23—26. Lacerated the son of Drona with fierce shafts emitting loud roar like those of the thunder. (And Ghatotkacha) showered (upon Drona's son) numerous sorts of weapons, some having heads like razors, some of the form of the crescent, some long and pointed, some with faces like the frogs, some resembling the bear's ear, some barbed and some of other species. The son of Drona, (however), without his senses being in the least afflicted, frustrated that formidable down pour of weapons emitting loud roar like those of the thunder and which were being unremittingly hurled (upon him),—by means of (his own) dreadful shafts inspired with mantras peculiar to the celestial weapons, as, O mighty monarch, the wind (chases away) mighty masses of clouds. Then it appeared that another encounter was going on in the firmament between the arrows (shot by those two rival heroes),

27. Which (encounter) was of terrible aspect and which, O great king, enhanced the joy of the combatants with the sparks scattering all around generated by the clash of weapons hurled by those two (warriors).

28. The firmament looked (as beautiful) as if adorned with glow-worms during the night. Covering all the directions with innumerable arrows, the son of Drona,

29. In order to do good to your sons, shrouded the Rakshasa (Ghatotkacha). Then, between the son of Drona and the Rakshasa, again took place a battle,

30—32. During that pitchy-dark night, like that (which had taken place) between Sakra and Prahada (in days of yore). Then, in that engagement, Ghatotkacha, inflamed with wrath, struck the son of Drona in the chest with ten arrows resembling the yuga fire. The son of Drona, endued with great strength, (thus) deeply pierced in that encounter by the Rakshasa, became (greatly) afflicted and trembled like a tree shaken by the wind. Leaning against his flag-staff (for support), he fell into a swoon.

33. Thereupon all your forces, O lord of men, set up a loud wail. (And) all your partizans, O lord of the earth, thought him to be dead.

34. Seeing Asvathama in that state, the Panchalas as well as the Srinjyas, in that encounter, sent forth roars like lions.

35. Regaining his consciousness, that grinder of foes, the mighty car-warrior Asvathama, drawing powerfully his bow with the left hand,

36. Shot quickly from his bow, (the string of which was) stretched up to the very ear, an excellent arrow, formidable as the rod of Yama, which was aimed at Ghatotkacha.

37. Riving the heart of the Rakshasa that excellent and formidable arrow, adorned with graceful wings, pentrated, O king, into the earth.

38. O great monarch, the puissant lord of the Rakshasas, pierced home by the son of Drona, proud of (his feats in) battle, sat down on the terrace of his car.

39. Seeing that the son of Hidimva had lost his consciousness, his charioteer, struck with fear, hastily removed him from the field of battle and from the presence of the son of Drona.

40. Having, in that engagement, thus pierced Ghatototkacha, the lord of the Rakshasas, that great car-warrior, the son of Drona sent forth a highly dreadful roar.

41. O Bharata, adored by your sons and all the warriors, his body shone brilliantly like the noon-day sun.

42. King Duryodhana himself pierced with keen arrows Bhimasena who was fighting his way, through your army, towards the car of the son of Bharadwaja.

43. O Bharata, Bhimasena pierced him in return with nine darts. Duryodhana also pierced him with twenty arrows.

44. Those two (heroes), shrouded with arrows on the field of battle, looked like the sun and the moon covered with masses of clouds in the firmament.

45. Then king Duryodhana pierced Bhima, O foremost of the descendants of Bharata, with five arrows, and said (to him) "wait, wait."

46. But Bhima, cutting off his bow and his standard with sharpened arrows, pierced the lord of the Kouravas with nine straight darts.

47—48. Thereupon, O best of the Bharatas, excited with rage, Duryodhana took up another bow of a better quality and began to afflict Bhimasena (stationed) at the front (rank) of that battle with keen darts, in the very sight of all bowmen. Bhima, (however) destroying those arrows shot from Duryodhana's bow,

49—50. Oppressed him with five and twenty short arrows. Duryodhana also, O worshipful sire, inflamed with ire, cut off his bow with razor-shaped dart and then pierced him in return with ten (darts). Thereupon, the highly-powerful Bhimasena, taking up another bow,

51. Pierced quickly the king with seven sharpened arrows. But he (i.e. Duryodhana), displaying great nimbleness of hand, quickly cut off that bow also.

52—53. Similarly, O mighty monarch, he cut off the second, the third, the fourth and the fifth bows taken up by Bhima. And O great king, your son, desirous of success and swelling with pride, cut off another bow as soon as it was taken up by Bhima. His bows being thus again and again cut off (by Duryodhana), he i. e. Bhima.

54—55. In that engagement, hurled a formidable dart, made wholly of iron (at the Kourava king).—The king of the Kurus, (however), cut into three fragments that dart, before it could reach him, that dart blazing like a flame of fire, looking (terrible) like the sister of Death herself, and dividing the firmament with its fire like splendour into two parts like the tresses of a woman parting the hair of her head.—

56-58. In the very presence of all the world and before (the very eyes) of Bhima himself. Thereupon, O great king, Bhima, flourishing his heavy and blazing mace, hurled it with great impetuosity at the car of Duryodhana. Then, in that engagement that heavy mace, all on a sudden, crushed the charioteer, the horses and the car (of the king). O lord of kings, your son, then afraid of Bhima, took to flight,

59. Mounted on another car belonging to the high-souled Naduka. Then Bhima, thinking Suyodhana to be dead amid (the darkness of) that night,

60. Roared furiously like a lion challenging the Kouravas. Your partizans and soldiers also thought that the king was slain.

61. And all of them set up a loud wail all around. Hearing the lamentation of all the combatants struck with terror,

62. And hearing also the yells of the high-souled Bhima, O monarch, king Yudhisthira, also, considered Suyodhona to have been slain,

63. And hastened with all speed to the place where Vrikodara, the son of Pritha was. Then, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the Matsyas as well as the Keykeyas,

64. Desirous of slaying Drona, rushed with all their might (against him). There also took place a highly dreadful encounter between Drona and his enemies. And the combatants, (of both sides) buried in pitchy darkness, began to slaughter one another.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty sixth chapter the retreat of Duryodhana, in the Ghatotkacha Badha of the Drona-Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Karna, the son of Vikartana, O king, checked in battle the great car-warrior Shahadeva who was advancing with the desire of slaying Drona.

2. Shahadeva, also piercing the son of Radha with nine arrows, pierced him again in that encounter with nine straight (shafts).

3. Karna (also) pierced him in return with a hundred straight arrows and then with great light-handedness quickly cut off his stringed bow.

4. Thereupon the puissant son of Madri, taking up another bow, pierced Karna with twenty shafts and this appeared wonderful.

5. (Then) Karna, having destroyed his horses with straight shafts, quickly sent his charioteer, with a broad-headed dart, to the abode of Yama.

6. Made car-less (thus), Shahadeva then took up a scimitar and a shield. But (Karna) cut off those (things) also with a smile.

7. Thereupon the highly-puissant Shahadeva, in that engagement, hurled a heavy and formidable mace, ornamented with gold, at the car of the son of Vikartana.

8. Karna, however, cut off with shafts that mace which, hurled by the Shahadeva, was making for him with great force and caused it to fall on the ground.

9. Seeing that his mace was cut off, Shahadeva, with great haste, hurled a dart at Karna. But that too was cut off with arrows (by Karna).

10. The son of Madri, then, speedily jumping down from his excellent car and burning with indignation, as it were, at the sight of Karna stationed (before him),

11. And taking up a car-wheel, discharged it at the son of Adhiratha. That (wheel), which was careering impetuously (towards him), like the upraised wheel of Death,

12, Was cut off by the charioteer's son with many thousands arrows. The car-wheel being thus cut to pieces, Shahadeva then, O worshipful sire,

13—14. Aiming at Karna, hurled at him the shaft of his car, the harnesses of his steeds, the yokes of cars, the limbs of elephants and horses and also dead human bodies. (But) Karna destroyed all these with shafts. Well aware that he had no weapons (to fight with), the son of Madri, that is,

15. Shahadeva, resisted with arrows (by Karna) withdrew from the battle. The son of Radha, (however), pursuing (and overtaking) him quickly in a moment, O best of the Bharatas,

16. Addressed these very cruel words with a smile, to Shahadeva :—"O hero, do not engage in fight with superior car-warriors.

17. O son of Madri, you ought to fight with your equals (only). Do not mistrust my words." Then touching him with the end of his bow, he said again—

18. "Yonder Arjuna is fighting resolutely with the Kurus, O son of Madri, either go there or return home, which ever you like."

19. Having addressed him thus, Karna, the foremost of car-warriors, advanced smilingly against the troops of the Panchala king.

20. Remembering the words of Kunti, that mighty car-warrior and slayer of foes in battle, firm in truth, did not, O king, slay the son of Madri though he could do so.

21. With his mind ill at ease, afflicted with darts and smitten with the words of Karna (poignant) as darts, Shahadeva lost all love for life.

22. (And) that great car-warrior in that battle, with great haste mounted the car of Janamejaya, the high-souled Panchala.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty-seventh chapter the flight of Sahadeva in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. The king of Madra, with a down-pours of arrow, covered on all sides Virata, who, accompanied by his division, was proceeding quickly for (the slaughter of) Drona.

2. (And) between those two strong bowmen ensued a battle, O king, like that which had taken place between Vali and Vasava in days of yore.

3. The king of Madra, O great monarch, displaying great alacrity, quickly wounded Virata, the chief of a great force, with straight arrows.

4. King (Virata also) pierced him in return with nine sharpened arrows, again with seventy-three and once more with a hundred.

5. The king of Madra, (also) destroying the four horses of his car, cut down with two shafts, in that engagement, the umbrella and the standard (of Virata).

6. That lord of the earth (i.e., Virata) jumping down from his car, the steeds of which were destroyed, stood, drawing his bow and shooting keen darts.

7. Witnessing the destruction of his brother's steeds, Satanika quickly came up (there), in the very sight of all the troops.

8. That lord of the earth, that is, the king of Madra, having with numerous shafts pierced Satanika who was advancing (against him), sent him to the abode of Yama.

9. The heroic (Satanika) being slain, Virata, the chief of a great force, (abandoning his steed-less car, ascended to that (of his brother).

10. Then, his eyes rolling (in ire) and his strength doubled with indignation, (he) quickly covered the car of the king of Madra with arrows.

11. Therefore the king of Madra, inflamed with wrath, struck Virata, the chief of a large force, furiously in the chest with a hundred straight arrows.

12. The mighty car-warrior Virata thus pierced home by the puissant (Salya) sat down on the terrace of his car and soon fainted away.

13. His charioteer then bore him (i. e. Virata) away who was mangled with arrows in battle. Then, O Bharata, during that night, that large army (of Virata) began to take to flight.

14. Slaughtered with hundreds of arrows by Salya, that ornament of battle, witnessing the flight of that army, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya,

15. Came to that spot, O king of kings, where Salya was. Against them both, O king, advanced Alamvusa, the lord of the Rakshasas,

16. Riding on an excellent eight-wheeled car drawn by terrible-looking Pishachas having faces like those of cows.

17. That terrible car was furnished with blood-red banners, adorned with garlands made of black iron, and covered with bear skins.

18. And it was furnished with a tall standard on which sat a fierce vulture of spotted wings, having eyes wide open and shrieking incessantly.

19. That Rakshasa, who, O monarch, looked like a loose heap of antimony, checked the advancing Arjuna as the (mountain Meru (resists) a hurricane,

20. By incessant discharges of arrows, O king, on the head of Arjuna. The battle that commenced between the man (i. e. Arjuna) and the Rakshasa was exceedingly hot and furious,

21. Causing delight to all the lookers on there, O Bharata, and filling the vultures and the crows and the ravens and the owls and the Kankas and the jackals with joy.

22. Arjuna, (then), struck Alamvusa with his arrows and with ten keen darts cut down his standard.

23. (And) with three darts he cut off his charioteer, with three more his Trivenu, with one his bow and with four his horses.

24. (The Rakshasa) took up another stringed bow again but (Arjuna) cut it off in two fragments. Then O foremost of the Bharatas, with four sharpened arrows,

25. The son of Pritha pierced the lord of the Rakshasas, who, thus pierced, took to flight in terror. Having defeated him, Arjuna quickly advanced towards Drona,

26. Discharging numerous arrows, O king, at men, elephants and horses. O mighty monarch, slaughtered by that renowned Pandava,

27. The soldiers fell down like trees levelled (on the ground) by a storm. Thus slaughtered by that renowned Pandava all the soldiers (of your son) ran away like a terror-stricken herd of deer.

Thus ends one hundred and sixty-eighth chapter the defeat of Alamvusa, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIX.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)—

Sanjaya said:—

1. O Bharata, your son Chitrasena withstood Satanika, the son of Nakula, who was consuming your troops with keen arrows.

2. The son of Nakula pierced Chitrasena with five arrows. He (i.e., Chitrasena) also piereed him (i.e., Satanika) in return with ten sharpened arrows.

3. Once again, in that engagement Chitrasena, O mighty monarch, pierced Satanika in the chest with nine keen darts.

4. The son of Nakula, (also), with straight arrows cut off his armour from his body, and this feat seemed marvellous.

5. His armour being cut off, your son O monarch, O lord of kings, looked as beautiful as a snake with its slough cast off in proper time.

6. Then, O great king, the son of Nakula, cut off, with sharpened arrows, the standard and the bow of that one i.e., Chitrasena who was exerting his utmost in that engagement.

7. That mighty car-warrior, deprived of his car and coat of mail and his bow cut off, took up another very strong bow capable of piercing every foe.

8. Then Chitrasena, that great car-warrior among the Bharatas, quickly pierced the son of Nakula, in battle, with straight arrows.

9. The highly powerful Satanika, then inflamed with wrath, destroyed the four horses and also the charioteer of Chitrasena O Bharata.

10. Jumping down from his car, the highly-renowned Chitrasena, possessed of (great) strength, oppressed the son of Nakula with twenty-five arrows.

11. When he (i. e. Chitrasena) was achieving this feat, the son of Nakula, in that engagement, cut off, with a cresent-shaped arrow, his shaft furnished with gold.

12. His bow cut off, and deprived of his car, steeds and charioteer, he (i. e. Chitrasena) quickly mounted on the car of the high-souled son of Hridika.

13. Then, O great king, Vrishasena, covered that great car-warrior Drupada, who, followed by his army, was advancing against Drona.

14. Yajnasena also, O lord, pierced in that battle, that mighty car-warrior, the son of Karna, in the arm and the chest with six arrows.

15. Thereupon inflamed with wrath, Vrishasena soon struck Yajnasena, stationed on his car, in the centre of his chest with numerous arrows.

16. O great king, those two heroes mangled with shafts and their bodies looking prickly with the darts sticking to them, looked beautiful like a couple of hedgehogs with their quills erect on their bodies, in that encounter.

17. Covered all over with blood flowing from the wounds caused by straight arrows furnished with golden wings and keen points, those two warriors in that great engagement, looked beautiful

18. Like a pair of highly graceful and radiant Kalpa trees or a couple of Kinsuka trees rich with their burden of flowers.

19. Vrishasena then, O king, having pierced Drupada with nine arrows, pierced him again with seventy, and once more with another three shafts.

20. Then, discharging thousands o; arrows in that battle, the son of Karnaf O mighty monarch, looked like cloud pouring torrents of rain.

21. Thereupon, Drupada, excited with wrath, cut off the bow of Vrishasena into fragments by means of a sharpened and well-tempered broad-headed arrow.

22. He (then) taking up another new and strong bow, plaited with gold, and taking out of his quiver a shinning, well-tempered, strong, keen and broad-headed dart,

23. And adjusting it to the string and aiming at Drupada, and drawing (his bow-string) up to the very ear, discharged it, striking terror into (the hearts of all the Somakas.

24. (That dart) riving his heart penetrated into the earth. The king (Drupada), thus wounded by Vrishasena, with dart, fell into a swoon.

25. Remembering the duty of (all) charioteers, his driver bore him away. O lord of kings, that great car-warrior among the Panchalas being (thus) defeated,

26. All the warriors (on your side), on that frightful night, rushed against the army of Drupada having their coats of mail cut to pieces with arrows (of the enemy).

27. In virtue of the (lusture of the) lamps abandoned (by the combatants), and which were burning all around, the field shone resplendant like the cloud-less firmament studded with planets and stars.

28. Similarly, O great king, (strewn all over) with the fallen Angadas of the combatants, the field looked beautiful like a (mass of) clouds (enlivened) with flashes of lightning during the rainy season.

29, Then, seized with the fear of the son of Karna, (the Panchala troops) ran away in all directions as the Danavas agitated with the fear of Indra (had fled away) in the battle between the gods and the Asuras.

30. Crushed in that battle by him (i. e. Vrishasena) the Panchalas together with the Somakas, illuminated by lamps, shone resplendent.

31. Having, O Bharata, defeated them in battle, the son of Karna, looked like the sun of scorching rays when he reaches the meridian.

32. Amongst the thousands of kings belonging to your party and that of your enemy, the puissant Vrishasena alone stood (on the field) like the blazing fire.

33. Having vanquished (innumerable) horses as well as those great car-warriors the Somakas, he (i. e. Vrishasena) hastened to the spot where king Yudhisthira was.

34. Your son Dusasana stood against that mighty car-warrior, the advancing Prativindhya, consuming his enemies in battle.

35. O king, the clash between them looked as marvellous as that between Mercury and Venus in the cloudless sky.

36. In (that) battle, Prativindhya, who was achieving frightful feats, was pierced by Dussasana in the fore-head with three arrows.

37. Pierced deeply by that powerful bowman, that is, your son, Prativindhya, O mighty monarch, looked like a mountain furnished with a peak.

38. The great car-warrior Prativindhya (also), in (that) battle, having pierced Dussasana with nine arrows, pierced him again with seven.

39. There, O Bharata, your son performsd a difficult feat in as much as he struck down the steeds of Prativindhya with fierce shafts.

40. (He then), with a broad-headed shaft, O king, struck down the charioteer and the standard and cut off into minute fragments the car of that bowman.

41. (And), inflamed with rage (he) cut off into very small fragments, with straight arrows, the flags, the quivers, the strings and the terraces, O lord, (of Prativindhya,s car,

42. Made car-less, the virtuous-souled (Prativindhya) stood, bow in hand, and fought with your son by discharging many hundreds of shafts.

43. (Your son, then,) with (great) nimbleness of hand cut off his bow with a razor-shaped arrow and then smote that one whose bow was cut off, with ten darts.

44. Witnessing that (sad) plight that their brother was in, his brothers, who were great car-warriors, followed by a large army, rushed furiously to that place.

45. He then mounted the resplendant car of Sutasoma, and O great king, taking up a bow, pierced your son.

46. Thereupon, all your warriors surrounding your son (in order to protect him) and followed by a great force, rushed (against the Pandavas).

47. Then, at that frightful hour of midnight, there commenced an encounter swelling (the population of) Yama's domains between your (army) and theirs.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty-ninth chapter, the fight by Satanika and others in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXX.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

The son of Suvala (i, e. Sakuni), excited with wrath, rushed agrinst Nakula who was slaughtering your troops with (great) impetuousity in battle, and said (to him) "wait, wait."

2. Those two heroes, between whom was excited a bitter enmity, desirous of slaying each other, struck each other with arrows discharged (from their bows) drawn to their fullest stretch.

3. In (that) battle, O king, the son of Suvala displayed as much dexterity in discharging showers of arrows as Nakula (god).

4. With arrows sticking (to their bodies) like prickly thorns, they, O mighty monarch, looked, in (that) engagement, like a couple of porcupines with erect quills.

5. Their coats of mail cut off with shafts having straight points and wings of gold, and themselves covered all over with blood, (those two heroes) looked as beautiful as

6. A fair of beautiful Kalpa trees or a couple of handsome Kinsuka trees laden with flowers, on the field of battle.

7. Then, O great king, both the heroes pierced with shafts (sticking to their bodies) looked beautiful like a couple of Salmali trees (covered) with prickly thorns.

8. O king, looking delightedly at each other with expanded eyes which became red in wrath, they seemed to consume each other (with their fiery glances).

9. Inflamed with wrath, your brother-in-law, pierced, as it were with a smile, the son of Madri in the chest with keen and barbed dart.

10. Beholding his bitter and haughty foe in that (pitiable) plight, Sakuni roared there like the clouds at the end of summer.

12. Then, Nakula, the son of Pandu, recovering his senses, once again rushed against the son of Suvala like Death itself with gaping mouth.

13. He, (then), O best of the Bharatas, wrathfully pierced Sakuni with six (arrows), and again with a hundred long shafts, in the centre of the chest.

14. (He then cut off) his bow with the arrow fixed (on the string) into two fragments, at the point at which it is grasped. (Then), quickly cutting off his standard, (he) caused it to fall from his car to the ground.

15. Nakula, the son of Pandu, (then), having pierced his thigh with a sharpened, will tempered and keen dart,

16. Caused him him to fall down as a hunter (causes) a winged hawk to drop down. O great king, (thus) pierced deeply, he sank down on the terrace of his car,

17. Clasping the flag-staff, like a lustful person (embracing) his lady-love. O sinless one, seeing your brother-in-law lose his senses and drop down

18. His charioteer quickly carried him away on his car from the van of battle. Then sons of Pritha and all those who followed them gave utterance to a loud roar.

19. On the defeat of his foe in battle, Nakula, the scorcher of foes, said to his charioteer "convey me towards Drona's division."

20. Hearing those words of the son of Madri, his charioteer, conveyed him to the spot where, O king, Drona took his stand.

21. Kripa, the son of Saradwata, rushed with great impetuosity and resoluteness, against the highly-powerful Sikhandi who was advancing in order to slay Drona.

22. Sikhandi, the subduer of foes, pierced as it were with a smile the son of Goutama advancing furiously (against him) towards the vicinity of Drona, with nine arrows.

23. The preceptor, devoted to the welfare of your sons, having, O great monarch, pierced him with five shafts, struck him again with twenty (more).

24. (Then), O lord of the earth, the encounter that ensued between them was as as dreadful as that between the (Asura) Samvara and the lord of the immortals in the war between the celestials and the Asuras.

25. Invincible in battle, those two heroic and great car-warriors covered the firmament with arrowy nets like the clouds (covering the sky) at the end of summer.

26. That night which was naturally of a terrible aspect became more dreadful, O best of the Bharatas, to the combatants engaged in battle.

27—28. That awfully-dreadful night, striking terror (into every heart) seemed to be the death-night (of all the combatants). Then, O great monarch, Shikandi cut off the great bow of the son of Goutama with a crescent-shaped (dart) and poured down sharpened arrows (at him). Kripa, then, O monarch, excited with rage, hurled a formidable dart,

29. Furnished with a golden handle, having a keen point and polished by a black-smith. (But) Shikhandin severed it, as it was making for him, with ten darts.

30. That dart, ornamented with gold, dropped down to the ground. Thereupon, the son of Goutama, that best of speakers, taking up a fresh bow,

31. Covered Shikhandin, O great monarch, with sharpened arrows. (Thus) covered (with shafts) by the high-souled son of Goutama in that battle,

32. Shikhandin, the foremost of car-warriors, sank down exhausted on the terrace of his car. Kripa, the son of Saradwata, seeing himself exhausted in that engagement,

33. Struck him with numerous arrows, O Bharata, (actuated) with the desire of slaying him. Witnessing the defeat of that great car-warrior, the son of Jajnasena in battle,

34. The Panchalas as well as the Somakas surrounded him on all sides (for rescuing him). In like manner, your sons also surrounded that excellent Brahmana,

35. With a vast force. Then, there took place a battle again, O king, between car-warriors engaged in striking one another.

36. And O lord of the earth, O Bharata, there arose a tumultuous uproar, like the roar of the clouds, as the horsemen and elephants rushed against

37. And slaughtered one another. The battle, then, O monarch, became terrific. In consequence of the tread of foot-soldiers rushing along, the earth,

38. O great king, began to tremble like an affrighted lady. Ascending their cars, car-warriors rushed furiously against,

39—40. And, O king, attacked numerous (other car-warriors), as crows (attack) winged insects. In the same manner, elephants, with the juice trickling down their bodies, resolutely attacked great elephants (of the opposite side) with juice trickling down their bodies, O Bharata. Horsemen approaching horsemen and foot-soldiers (approaching) foot soldiers,

41—42. In that battle, angrily encountered one another, without getting the better of one another. Terrific indeed was the sound caused by the rush, retreat and return of the combatants at dead of night. (Innumerable) blazing lamps placed upon cars, elephants and horses,

43. Looked, O great king, like large meteors dropping from the firmament. O foremost of the Bharatas, that night blazed up by those lamps,

44. Looked as (bright as) day, O king, on the field of battle. As the sun dispels dense darkness hanging all over,

45. So that pitchy darkness pervading the field of battle was destroyed by those blazing lamps. The firmament, the earth, the cardinal and the minor points,

46. (Hitherto) buried in darkness and dust, again blazed up with the lustre (of those lamps). The lusture of weapons, armours and gems belonging to the high-souled (combatants)

47. Was cast into shade by the light of those blazing (lamps), when, during that night, the battle was raging hot and furious.

48. No one of the combatants could distinguish the men of his party, O Bharata. (And) O best of the Bharatas, in (that) battle, father killed (his) son,

49. Son (his) father, and kinsmen (killed) kinsmen, friends (slew) friends, and maternal uncles (killed) sisters' sons, through ignorance.

50. (And) O Bharata, warriors killed warriors of the same party and enemies killed their own men. O king, in that awful nocturnal engagement (the combatants) lost all regard for one another.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventieth chapter, the hand to hand nocturnal fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXI

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA.—Continued

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O mighty monarch, when the battle raged hot and furious Dhristadyumna rushed against Drona.

2. Wielding his strong bow and twanging its string often and often, he rushed against Drona's chariot decked with golden trappings.

3. And as Dhristadyumna rushed against Drona, O mighty monarch, the Panchalas together with the Pandavas surrounded him, with a view to put an end to Drona's life.

4. Then beholding that foremost of preceptors Drona, thus hemmed in on all sides, your sons, exerting their best, protected Drona in that battle.

5. Then those two sea of troops encountering each other at the dead of night resembled two dreadful seas agitated by the tempest with all the creatures within them dreadfully terrified.

6. Thereafter, O king, the prince of the Panchalas quickly pierced Drona on the breast with five arrows, and then uttered his war-cry.

7. Thereupon, O Bharata, Drona piercing him with twenty-five shafts, cut off his lustrous bow with another broad-headed shaft.

8. Pierced sore by Drona, Dhristadyumna, O foremost of the Bharatas, threw quickly aside the (severed) bow and bit his lips (in anger).

9. Then, O mighty monarch, excited to the highest pitch of fury, the puissant Dhristadyumna grasped another strong bow, desirous of accomplishing Drona's destruction.

10. That handsome warrior, the slayer of his foes, then drawing back the string of that bow to his ears, let go a dreadful shaft capable of achieving Drona's destruction.

11. In that terrible battle that shaft, shot by his strong arm, flooded the Kuru troops with its lustre like the risen sun.

12. Beholding that dreadful shaft, O king, the Gods, the Danavas and the Gandharvas said these words viz "May good betide Drona."

13. Then as that shaft coursed towards the chariot of Drona, O king, Karna like one endued with great lightness of hands, cut it off into twelve fragments.

14. O king, that shaft of Dhristadyumna severed into numerous pieces, quickly fell down on the earth like, O sire, a snake without its poisonous fangs.

15. In that battle, cutting off arrows with his own close-knotted shafts, Karna then began to pierce Dhrishtadyumna with sharp arrows.

16. Drona's son pierced Dhristadyumna with five, Drona himself with five, Salya with nine and Dussasana with three vallas.

17. Duryodhana pierced him with twenty and Sakuni with five arrows. Thus all the mighty car-warriors (of your army) quickly pierced the Panchala prince.

18. Dhristadyumna was then pierced by the seven heroes who strove to protect Drona in battle. He also in his turn, pierced each of them with three shafts.

19. O mighty monarch, with the greatest quickness, Dhristadyumna then pierced Drona, Karna, Drona's son and your son, in that terrible battle.

20. Thus pierced by that bowman, your warriors again unitedly pierced Dhristadyumna in that battle, uttering terrible war-cries.

21. Inflamed with fury, O king, Drumasena then pierced Dhristadyumna with an arrow, and then again quickly piercing the latter with sharp shafts he said—"wait wait."

22. Dhristadyumna pierced him in return with three sharp straight-flying arrows, winged with golden feathers, whetted on stone and capable of destroying life.

23. Next with another broad-headed shaft, he lopped off from Drumasena's trunk, his head graced with glimmering ear-rings of gold.

24. That head with its lips bitten, then fell on the field like a ripe palm-fruit thrown down by a raging tempest.

25. Thereafter the heroic Dhristadyumna piercing his opponent warriors with well-sharpened shafts, cut off with broad-headed arrows, the bow of Radha's son versed in various modes of war-fare.

26. But Karna did not brook that severance of his bow even as a fierce lion does not brook the chopping off of its tail.

27. Taking up another bow, with eyes red in rage and breathing fiercely, he poured a shower of arrows on the highly puissant Dhristadyumna.

28. Then beholding Karna wrought up with rage, the other six heroic foremost car-warriors, quickly surrounded the son the Panchala king with a view to slay him in battle.

29. O lord, the troops then considered Dhristadyumna to be already within the jaws of Death, as he was then confronted by the six foremost car-warriors of your army.

30. At this juncture, Satyaki that scion of the Dasarha race, advanced to the rescue of the puissant Dhristadyumna, shooting numerous arrows (in all directions).

31. Beholding that Satwata warrior indomitable in battle advance, Radha's son pierced him in battle, with ten shafts.

32. Him, O mighty monarch, Satyaki pierced in return with ten shafts before the eyes of all the heroes present and said—'Fly not—stay.'

33. O king, that encounter between the powerful Satyaki and the high-souled Karna looked like the encounter between Vali and Vasava.

34. That foremost of the Kshatriyas Satyaki, then pierced the lotus-eyed Karna, terrifying the Kshatriya warriors with the clatter of his car.

35. On the other hand, O mighty monarch the puissant son of Suta fought on with Satyaki, causing the earth to tremble with the tremendous twang on his bow.

36. Karna then pierced that scion of Sini's race with Vipatkarnis, Narachas, Vatsadantas, Kshuras and hundreds of other kinds of arrows.

37. So also Yuyudhana that foremost of the Vrishni warriors, covered Karna with his shower of arrows. The combat was an equal one (in all respects).

38. Placing Karna in front of them, your sons then, O ruler of men, began to pierce Satyaki simultaneously with sharp arrows.

39. Baffling their as well as Karna's weapons with those of his own, O lord, Satyaki quickly pierced Vrishasena on the centre of his chest.

40. Pierced with the shaft of Satyaki, the highly effulgent and puissant Vrishasena fell down on his car, losing hold of his bow.

41. Thereupon Karna taking Vrishasena the mighty car-warrior to be slain, was afflicted with grief on account of his son's death, and began to afflict Satyaki.

42. The mignty car-warrior Yuyudhana then afflicted sore by Karna, forcibly pierced Karna with numerous shafts over and over again.

43. Piercing Karna with ten and Vrishasena with five shafts, the Satwata hero then cut off their bow as well as their gloves.

44. Thereupon they both having strung another pair of bows dreadful to the foe, began simultaneously to pierce Yuyudhana with sharp arrows.

45. When that dreadful destruction of heroes was progressing, O king, the terrible twang of the Gandiva bow was heard, arising above the din of battle.

46. Having heard the sound of the Gandiva and the clatter of (Arjuna's) car, O king Suta's son addressing Duryodhana said these words :—

47. "This is the tremendous twang of the Gandiva bow, emmitted by Arjuna, as he has slain our entire army, many foremost of men and numerous warriors of the Kurus.

48. The clatter of his chariot is also heard, like the rumble of roaring clouds. Evidently the son of Pandu is achieving feats worthy of himself.

49. O mighty monarch, this son of Pritha will completely crush our mighty host. Many troops are already scattered, and none stays on the field.

50. Our host is being shattered like risen masses of clouds by the raging tempest; encountering Savyasachin in battle, it is being split like a bark on a (rough) sea.

51. Hark, O king, the terrible wails of foremost warriors as they fly or fall in battle in consequence of shafts shot from the Gandiva bow.

52. Hark, O foremost of monarchs, the roar of drums near Arjuna's chariot, resembling the rumble of clouds at the dead of night.

53. Hear also, numerous sounds, cries of woe and alas, and loud war-cries, near the chariot of Arjuna.

54. But here in our middle stays Satyaki the foremost of the Satwatas; if this object of our aim could be smitten down, we might obtain victory over our foes.

55. There the Panchala Prince surrounded on all sides by heroic and foremost of car-warriors, has engaged himself with Drona.

56. If we can slay Satyaki and Prisata's son Dhristadyumna,then,O mighty monarch, undoubtedly victory will be ours.

57. Impaling these two heroic and mighty car-warriors, the descendants of the Vrishni and the Prisata race respectively, like the son of Subhadra, we will, O king strive to slay them.

58. But yonder comes Savyasachin, O Bharata, towards this division of Drona knowing that Satyaki is here encountered by many foremost warriors of the Kurus.

59. Let now a detachment of mighty and foremost car-warriors intercept Pritha's son, so that he may not advance to the rescue of Satyaki now sorrounded by many.

60. Let those mighty heroes be quick in shooting their arrows, so that this scion of Madhu's race may be despatched to the next world."

61. Knowing this to be the opinion o, Karna, your son addressed Suvala's son even as the highly illustrious Indra addressed Vishnu, on the field of battle.

62. "Supported by a host of ten thousand unretreating elephants and also by a detachment of ten thousand car-warriors, do you proceed against Dhananjaya.

63. Dussasana, Durbisaha, Suvahu and Duspradharsana, these supported by numerous bodies of infantry will follow you.

64. O my uncle, slay me those fierce bowmen, the two Krishnas, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, and Nakula, and Sahadeva and Pandu's son Bhimasena.

65. My hopes of victory rest on you as those of the gods rest on their lord Indra. O uncle, slay the sons of Kunti, even as Pabaka's son slew the Asuras."

66. Thus addressed and urged on by your son, he (Suvala's son) covered in mail, proceeded against the sons of Pritha, being himself supported by your sons and a large army.

67. In order to please your son he proceeded to battle, desirous of consuming the sons of Pandu. Then commenced a terrible battle between your warriors and the foe.

68—69. When, O king, Suvala's son had gone against the (main) army of the Pandavas, the son of Suta supported by a mighty force, quickly rushed upon the Satwata hero in battle, shooting many hundreds of shafts. Your troops then gathering together encompassed Satyaki.

70. The son of Bharadwaja also advancing against Dhristadyumna's car commenced at that night, O foremost of Bharatas, a most terrible and wonderful battle with the heroic Dhristadyumna and the Panchalas.

Thus ends the one hnndred and seventy-first chapter, the fierce fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA) —Coutinued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then all those royal warriors of your army, all indomitable in battle, furiously rushed against Yuyudhana's chariot, unable to brook his feats.

2. Those warriors then surrounded on all sides the Satwata hero, with duly-equipped chariots decked with gold and gems, and with horsemen and elephants.

3. Having thus impaled the Satwata hero, all those mighty warriors filled the directions of the compass with the echo of their war-cries.

4. Then those mighty heroes, desirous of achieving the slaughter of that scion of Madhu's race, began to pour showers of sharp arrows on Satyaki of infallible prowess.

5. Beholding then those horoes make towards himself in fury, that slayer of hostile heroes, that mighty-armed grandson of Sini, received them with a copious discharge of arrows.

6. Then that mighty bowman, the heroic Satyaki of indomitable prowess, began to lop off the heads of his foes with fierce shafts of depressed knots.

7. That scion of Madhu's race then severed with his razor-edged arrows, the trunks of elephants, the necks of horses and the arms of warriors decked with bracelets.

8. The earth then over-strewn with shattered yak-tails and white umbrellas, looked, O king, as beautiful as the star-bespangled firmament.

9. Thus when they were being thus slaughtered by Yuyudhana in battle, O Bharata, a tumultuous uproar was heard there like the yell or bewailing of ghosts.

10. With that terrible uproar the earth was filled and the night appeared to be more hedious and more frightful.

11. Beholding the army routed and afflicted by the arrows of Yuyudhana, and hearing in that nightly darkness that tremendous and horripilating uproar,

12. Your son that foremost of car-worrior, O king, addressing his charioteer thus repeatedly spoke :—"Drive, drive the steeds to the spot whence this tumult is proceeding."

13. Then that resolute bowman that indefatigable warrior, king Duryodhana versed in various modes of warfare and endued with great lightness of hands,rushed upon Yuyudhana.

14. Thereupon that scion of Madhu's race pierced Duryodhana with twelve shafts shot from a full-drawn bow and capable of drinking the blood and mangling the skin.

15. Duryodhana then pierced as before with those arrows of Sini's grandson, angrily pierced the latter with ten shafts in return.

16. Meanwhile the battle that was being fought between the Panchalas and your troops, presented a wonderful and charming aspect.

17. O Bharata, then the grandson of Sini, worked up with rage, pierced your mighty son with a group of eighty shafts on the chest.

18. Thereafter that slayer of foes despatched to the abode of Death the horses of Duryodhana and he also felled quickly the charioteer of the latter.

19. O ruler of men, remaining in that steedless car, your son began to discharge sharp arrows towards the car of Sini's grandson.

20. Then like one endued with great lightness of hands, Sini's grandson, O king, cut off the group of fifty arrows shot by your son in that battle.

21. The descendant of Madhu's race then cut off the mighty bow of your son near the grasp, with broad-headed arrows shot with great force.

22. Deprived of his car and his bow, that lord, that ruler of all men, quickly ascended the resplendent car of Kritavarman.

23. When Duryodhana had been compelled to turn his face away from the battle, the grandson of Sini in that night began to crush your troops, O ruler of men.

24. O king, meanwhile Sakuni surrounding Arjuna on all sides with countless cars and thousands of elephants,

25. And an equal number of horses, began furiously to assault him. His troops then began to discharge many celestial weapons against Arjuna.

26—28. Those Kshatriyas then urged on by fate fought on with Arjuna. Arjuna however single-handedly checked those thousands of chariots, elephants and horses and finally compelled them to turn back. Then Suvala's son with eyes coppery in rage and excited to the highest pitch of fury, pierced with twenty shafts that slayer of foes namely the puissant Arjuna. Then again he impeded the course of Arjuna's mighty car with a group of hundred arrows.

29. Him, O Bharata, Arjuna pierced in battle with a set of twenty shafts, and the other mighty bowmen of his division with three shafts each.

30. O monarch, baffling the countless shafts shot by his foes, Dhananjaya slew the warriors of your army with excellent shafts charged with the force of the thunder.

31. The earth then covered over with lopped-off arms and thousands of mangled bodies, appeared beatiful as if covered over with charming flowers.

32—33. Strewn over with heads of Kshatriyas—heads that were decked with diadems and graced with hadsome noses and beautiful ear-rings and nether lips bit in anger and wide open eyes, heads that were graced with collars and crowned with gems and which while life was in them spoke salutary words,—the earth looked beautiful as if strewn with hillocks covered with champaka flowers.

34. Then Vibhatsu of fierce energy having achieved that dreadful feat once more pierced Sakuni with five arrows of depressed knots.

35. He then angrily pierced Uluka in that battle with his arrows. Thus having pierced Uluka even before the very eyes of Suvala's son, Arjuna

36. Uttered a mighty roar that filled the earth with its echo. Thereafter that son of the foremost of celestials, cut off the bow of Sakuni with his arrows,

37. And despatched the latter's four steeds to the kingdom of Death. Thereupon, O foremost of the Bharatas, jumping down from his chariot, the son of Suvala

38. Quickly ascended the car of Uluka. Then those two mighty car-warriors, sire and son, riding on the same chariot,

39. Began to shower arrows on Pritha's son, like two risen clouds showering rain on the mountain-breast. Thereafter, O mighty monarch, Pandu's son piercing them both with shafts,

40. Began to crush your troops by hundreds and thousands. Just as masses of clouds are torn asunder by a violent storm,

41. So, O ruler of men, your troops were then routed and dispersed by Arjuna. O foremost of the Bharatas, then the troops of your army carnaged during that night,

42. Fled in fear in all directions looking at one another; some left behind their horses, others urged them to the top of their speed.

43. They then fled away in great fright in that darkness of night. O foremost of the Bharatas, defeating your troops in battle,

44. Vasudeva and Dhananjaya began to blow their conchs. Meanwhile Dhristadyumna, O king, piercing Drona with three shafts,

45. Quickly cut off the latter's bowstring with a short arrow ; thereupon Drona that crusher of hostile Kshatriyas, throwing that bow down on the ground,

46. Took up another bow of greater force and toughness ; then Drona piercing Dhistadyumna with seven swift-flying arrows,

47. Pierced the latter's charioteer, O foremost of the Bharatas, with five arrows. Then the mighty car-warrior Dhistadyumna checking Drona by means of his arrows,

48. Began to agitate the Kourava host like Indra agitating the Asura host. O sire when the troops of your son were thus being carnaged,

49. A dreadful river of boodly currents began to flow between the two armies, carrying with it slain men horses, and elephants,

50. Like, O monarch, the river Vaitaranee carrying creatures to the abode of Death. Then the puissant Dhristadyumna completely routing that army of your son,

51. Shone resplendent like Sakra in the midst of the celestial hosts. Thereafter Dhristadyumna and Sikhandin blew their mighty conchs;

52. So did also the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), and Yuyudhana, and Pandu's son Vrikodara. Having vanquished thousands of energetic kings of your army,

53. The Pandavas ever attended with victory, uttered dreadful war-cries, even before the eyes of your son, and Karna, and the heroic Drona and the son of Drona, O ruler of men.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-second chapter, the pierce fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Beholding his own army carnaged by high-souled warriors, your son, O ruler of men, was excited to the highest pitch of fury.

2. Then quickly approaching Karna and Drona that foremost of victorious heroes, and burning with rage, he eloquent in speech, spoke these words:—

3. "Beholding the ruler of the Sindhus slain in battle by Savyasachin, you two, filled with rage, caused this battle to go on.

4. Though competent to slay the Pandava troops, still you are beholding the slaughter of my troops by them with great indifference.

5—6. If you now abandon me, you should have told me of it in the beginning. We two shall vanquish the sons of Pandu in battle even these were the words, you said to me, O you givers of honor. Hearing those words of yours, I then allowed these proceedings. Otherwise I would never have provoked these hostilities with the Parthas—hostilities that are so destructive of heroic combatants.

7. If, O foremost of men, I do not deserve to be forsaken by you, then do you fight according to the measure of your prowess, O you that are possessed of great prowess."

8. Thus pierced with the goad of speech by your son, those two heroes once more engaged in battle like two snakes poked with sticks.

9. Then those two foremost of car-warriors, the best of all human bowmen, rushed against the Parthas headed by the grandson of Sini and others.

10. Similarly the Parthas supported by their own troops, rushed upon those two heroes, who were roaring repeatedly.

11. Then the enraged Drona that best of all wielders of weapons, quickly pierced that foremost of the descendants of Sini with ten sharp arrows.

12. Karna pierced him with ten shafts, your son with seven, Vrishasena with ten and Suvala's son with seven arrows.

13. Those hosts of the Kurus together with those warriors, began to shower arrows on the grandson of Sini. Then beholding Drona slaughter the Pandava hosts,

14. The Somakas from all sides began to pierce him with showers of arrows. Then Drona snatched out of the Kshatriyas their lives, O ruler of men,

15. Like the sun dispelling darkness with his rays. O ruler of men, when the Panchalas were being slaughtered by Drona,

16. A dreadful sound was heard as they challenged one another aloud. Some leaving their sons, some their fathers, some their brothers, and some their uncles,

17. Some their nephews, some their companions and their friends, and some their relatives, fled in all quickness, desirous of saving their own lives.

18. Others, on the other hand, were so confounded that they rushed even towards Drona himself. Indeed many warriors of the Pandava host were then despatched to the other world.

19. Thus afflicted by that high-souled warrior, the Pandava army began to fly in all directions in that night, throwing down their blazing flambeaus,

20. Even before the very sight of Bhimasena, Vijaya and Achyuta, and the twins and the virtuous Yudhisthira and the son of Prisata.

21. Then the troops were shrouded in darkness and nothing could be discerned. Only the flight of the foe could be determined through the light that the torches of the Kouravas shed.

22. And as the army of the Pandavas was routed, the mighty warriors Karna, and Drona, O king, pursued them from behind discharging numerous arrows.

23. When the Panchala ranks were broken down and reduced in number, Janarddana cheerless at heart addressed Phalguna saying :—

24. "Let Parsata and Satyaki supported by the Panchala troops rush against the mighty Drona and Karna, shooting as they proceed numerous arrows.

25. This mighty army of ours has been broken and routed by the showers of the enemies' shafts ; and though checked in their flight, they could not again be sufficiently rallied."

26. Beholding their troops fly away Kesava and Arjuna then addressed them thus :—' Do you not flight from fear ! Discard all your fears, O Pandavas.

27. Supported by all the troops and disposing them of in perfect order, we two with weapons upraised are even now dashing against Drona and Suta's son with a view to fight with them."

28. Then Janardana seeing Vrikodora advance, once more addressed Pandu's son Arjuna in these words as if for cheering him the while.

29. "Yonder does the proud Bhima supported by the Somakas and Pandavas rush furiously against Drona and Karna, those two fierce bow-men.

30. Supported by these and by the mighty car-warriors of the Panchalas, do you proceed to the fight for re-assuring your troops, O delighter of Pandu."

31. Thereafter those two foremost of men, the son of Pandu and the scion of Madhu's race, encountering Drona and Karna, took up their station in the van of their army.

Sainjaya Said :—

32. Thereupon the mighty army of king Yudhisthira once more returned to the spot where Drona and Karna where crushing their enemies.

33. A tremendous clash was then produce on that part of the field, like to that, O monarch, which takes place when two oceans swelling under the influence of the moon dash against each other.

34. Then your soldiers throwing aside the flambeaus, with both their hands fought furiously with the Pandavas, like so many mad people.

35. When the field was thus covered with nocturnal darkness and dust, the combatants fought during that dreadful battle, guided only by the names they uttered (in their challenge.

36. The names of contending kings as they challenged one another were then heard there, O king, like to what takes places during a Sayamvara.

37. Sometimes an awful silence reigned over the field ; next moment there was heard a tremendous din caused by enraged contending warriors and by the victorious and the vanquished.

38. Whereever the flambeaus were seen to blaze, thither the combatants rushed, like so many insects rushing upon a flame of light.

39. Thus when the Kouravas and the Pandavas were fighting with one another the dreadful night deepened into deadness, O Bharata.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-third chapter, the fierce fight, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drana Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then that slayer of foes viz. Karna beholding Prisata's son in battle, pierced the him on the breast with ten arrows capable of penetrating to the vitals.

2. In return Dhristadyumna quickly pierced, in that battle, Karna with five arrows, and challenged him saying 'stay stay.'

3. In that dreadful battle, they both covering each other with their arrowy showers, pierced each other with shafts shot from fully-stretched bows.

4. Thereafter Karna despatched the four steeds and charioteer of Dhristadyumna that foremost of the Panchalas, to the dreary abode of Death.

5. He cut off with sharp arrows the latter's excellent bow, and then with a valla felled his charioteer from his niche on the car.

6. The puissant Dhristadyumna deprived of the use of his car, and having his charioteer and his horses slain, quickly jumped down on the ground armed with a terrible mace.

7. Then though mangled with arrows of depressed knots shot by Karna, he still approached the former's chariot and slew the steeds thereof with the strokes of his mace.

8. Then quickly wheeling back, that slayer of hostile heroes viz, Prisata's son, that foremost of all car-warriors, ascended the chariot of Dhananjaya.

9—10. Then though desirous of encountering Karna once more, he was prevented from doing so by the son of Dharma. Then the highly puissant Karna created a loud din by means of his bow, which became mingled with his war-cries. He then blew his conch furiously. Beholding Prisata's son vanquished in battle, those mighty car-warriors,

11. The Panchalas and the Somakas influenced by wrath, grasped their weapons with a view to compass the death of Suta's son.

12. They then rushed against Karna, making death their final goal. Meanwhile Karna's charioteer had yoked fresh steeds to his car—

13. Steeds that were of the hue of conch shells, endued with great fleetnes, of the Sindhu breed and well-broken. Then the son of Radha getting the mighty warriors of the Panchalas within his range,

14. Began to afflict them with his arrowy showers, like masses of clouds afflicting the mountain breast with torrents of rain. Afflicted sore by Karna, the division of the Panchalas,

15—17. Panic-struck, began to break and fly away like a herd of deer attacked by a lion. O ruler of earth, then warriors were seen to fall down on the ground from their steeds, or elephants, or chariots, on all sides. In that fierce battle Karna cut off with razor-headed arrows the arms and heads decked with ear-ring of warriors that were flying away. O ruler of men, he cut off the thighs of other warriors riding on elephants,

18. Or on the backs of steeds, or of those standing on the ground. O sire, many mighty car-warriors in the confusion of their flight perceived not

19. Their own limbs cut off, or the injuries of their animals. The Panchalas and the Srinjayas then slaughtered with dreadful arrows,

20—21. Took even the motion of a straw for Karna. Greatly confounded; the combatants mistook their flying friends for Karna and then fled from them in great fright. Then, O Bharata, as those broken and routed divisions were flying away,

22. Karna pursued them from behind shooting his arrows in all directions. Those warriors as they were madly flying, were carnaged by thousands, in that battle.

23. Afflicted by that illustrious warrior Karna, they could not then stay on the field. O king, the Panchalas then mangled with excellent shafts by Karna,

24. As also by Drona, looked vacantly at the different quarters and then fled away. Thereupon king Yudhisthira, beholding his own army routed,

25. And considering a retreat to be advisable, addressed Arjuna thus;—'Behold the mighty car-warrior Karna standing yonder armed with his bow,

26—29. Like a burning sun shining even during the hedious hour of night. The yells of your own partizans helplessly mangled by the shafts of Karna are being incessantly heard. Karna does shoot his arrows so skilfully that no interval can be noticed between his fixing the arrow on the string and letting it off. He will surely fighting thus, extirpate all our friends. Do that now, O Dhananjaya, for compassing the slaughter of Karna, which according to your judgment should be done, and for which the hour may have come." Being thus spoken to, Arjuna addressing Krishna said :—

30—31. "The royal son Dharma has been frightened to-day at the prowess of Karna. As Karna's division is repeatedly worsting that of our own, do your quickly make some arrangement that will cope with the present dangerous situation. Behold, yonder are our troops flying away. O slayer of Madhu, broken and mangled with the shafts of Drona,

32. And frightened by Karna, they have no stay or support. I see that Karna is careering dauntlessly on the field,

33. Crushing numerous illustrious car-warriors and covering them with his sharp shafts I cannot brook the sight of him careering in the thick of the fight,

34. Under my very nose, O foremost of the Vrishnis, even as a snake cannot bear the tread of human feet. So, do you take me there where the mighty Karna is fighting. O slayer of Madhu, either I will slay him, or he shall slay me.

Vasudeva said :—

35. I see, O son of Kunti, that foremost of men, of super-human prowess, viz Karna, careering at the head of battle like the king of the celestials himself.

36. O Dhananjaya, there is none, save yourself and the Rakshasa Ghatot-kacha, who can encounter him in battle, O foremost of men.

37. O sinless one, I do not think that the hour has come when, O mighty armed one, you should meet the son of Suta in battle.

38. The resplendent Sakti, resembling a mighty meteor, obtained by him from vasava is still in his possession, O mighty armed one, kept carefully to be used against yourself by this son of Suta.

39. He preserves that Sakti; and therefore he has now assumed a terrible aspect. Ghatotkacha, is ever attached to your interests and is anxious for your welfare.

40. Therefore let the mighty Ghatotkacha charge the son of Radha. That one of prowess resembling that of an immortal, was begotten by Bhima,

41. And he is conversant with numerous celestial, Asuri and Rakshasa-weapons. I am sure, he will conquer Karna in battle."

Sanjaya said :—

42. Thus spoken to the mighty-armed Partha possessed of eyes resembling lotus petals, summoned the Rakshasa. Thereupon the Rakshasa appeared before him,

43. Cased in armour, and armed with bows arrows and a sword, O ruler of men. Then doing obeisance to Krishna and Pandu's son Dhananjaya,

44. He proudly said :—"Here am I, order me." Thereupon the descendant of the Dasarha race Krishna, addressing Hidimva's son of the complexion of clouds, of effulgent countenance and fiery eyes smilingly said these words.

Vasudeva said :—

45. Take my blessings, O Ghatotkacha, hear attentively what I now say to you. The hour for the display of your prowess and of no one else has now arrived.

46. Do you become the raft in this battle to the sinking Pandavas. You possess weapons of various kinds and the potent Rakshasi illusion.

47. Behold, O son of Hidimva, the hosts of the Pandavas afflicted by Karna in battle like a herd of kine belaboured by the keeper.

48. Yonder does the mighty bowman Karna of great intelligence and resolute prowess, burn the foremost of the Kshatriyas of the Pandava host.

49. Scorched with his fiery arrows the Pandava warriors can not stand before that resolute bowman who is shooting numerous arrows.

50. Afflicted at the dead of night with showers of arrows shot by the son of Suta, yonder are the Panchalas flying away like a flock of deer attacked by the lion.

51. Save yourself, O you of dreadfu prowess, no one else is none who can confront Suta's son in battle thus engaged.

52. Therefore, O mighty-armed one, do you now perform what will be worthy of yourself, your maternal uncles, your sires and the measure of your energy and might.

53. It is for saving them from difficulties, that men desire to have sons ; O son of Hidimva, do you therefore, rescue your fathers and friends.

54. O Ghototkacha, fathers desire to have sons, for furthering their own interests. And good sons save their fathers here and hereafter.

55. You are generous and your strength in battle is indeed terrible and matchless. While engaged in battle, there is none else equal to you.

56. O afflicter of your foes, do you become the raft for the Pandavas when they are being routed in this hour of night by the shafts of Karna and when they are sinking in the ocean identified with the Dhartarashtra troops.

57. Moreover, at night the Rakshasas become possessed of immeasurable prowess ; the Rakshasas are by nature powerful, indomitable, heroic and energetic in battle.

58. With the help of your illusions do you kill the fierce bowman Karna in this nocturnal fight. The sons of Pritha headed by Dhristadyumna will slay Drona in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

59. Hearing the words of Kesava, Vibhatsu also addressing that Rakshasa, that slayer of foes viz Ghatotkacha said, O foremost of the Kurus, these words.

60. O Ghatotkacha, yourself, the long-armed Satyaki, and the Pandava Bhimasena, these, according to my opinion, are the foremost among all our troops.

61. In this nocturnal fight do you therefore challenge Karna to a duel. The mighty car-warrior Satyaki will become your protect or from behind.

62. Supported by the Satwata hero, do you slay the heroic Karna in battle, even as Indra supported by Skanda slew Taraka in days gone by."

Ghatotkacha said :—

63. I am capable of encountering Karna and Drona, O Bharata, and I am a match for all the other high-souled Kshatriyas accompliished in the use of weapons.

64. This night I shall fight such a fierce battle with the son of Suta, of which men will talk as long as the earth will exist.

65. Following the Rakshasa mode, I shall not spare this time any body, either the brave or the coward, or those that will with folded palms, solicit mercy. I shall slay all.

Sanjaya said :—

66. Having thus spoken, that slayer of hostile heroes namely the mighty-armed son of Hidimva, dashed against Karna, in that fierce fight, frightening your troops.

67. Then that foremost of men that son of Suta smilingly received Ghototkacha of blazing countenance and burning locks, as the latter was furiously falling upon him.

68. Then the battle between those two roaring heroes, viz., Karna and that Rakshasa, commenced resembling O foremost of kings that between Sakra and Pralhada in days gone by.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-fourth chapter, the charge of Ghatotkacha against Karna, in the Ghototkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXV

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then, O monarch, beholding the mighty-armed Ghatotkacha, rush against the car of Suta's son Karna, with a view to slaughter him,

2. Your son Duryodhana addressing Dussasana said these words :—"Beholding Karna's prowess in battle, yonder does the Rakshasa

3. Rush against that mighty car-warrior. Do you check the Rakshasa's progress ; supported by mighty divisions do you go to the spot where the highly powerful

4. Karna .the son of Vikartana is fighting with the Rakshasa. O bestower of honor, putting forth your best energies in battle and supported by the troops do you protect Karna in battle.

5. Let not the dreadful Rakshasa succeed, through our negligence, in slaying Karna." Meanwhile, O monarch, the highly puissant son of Jatasura, 6—7. That best of smiters, approaching Duryodhana said these words :—"O Duryodhana, with your permission, do I intend to slay the Pandava brothers and their followers who are your inveterate enemies, and who are regarded as indomitable in battle. My father was Jatasura that foremost of the Rakshasas, endued with great prowess.

8. In days gone by, through some Rakshasa-slaying charms, the puny sons of Pritha slew him. I now desire to render satisfaction to his departed spirit by worshipping him with the blood of his foes,

9. As also with their flesh. O foremost of kings, it behoves you to accord me your permission." Thereupon king Duryodhana, highly gratified, repeatedly told these words to that one :—

10. "Supported by Drona and Karna, and others, I am competent enough to conquer my enemies. With my leave, do you go and slay the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha,

11. That Rakshasa of fierce feats, born of man, ever devoted to the interests of the Pandavas, and always slaying our elephants, horses and charioteers in battle,

12. Staying himself all the while in the firmament,—go, despatch him to Yama's (dreary) place." Then that huge-bodied son of Jatasura saying 'yea' to his words, challenged Ghatotkacha.

13—14. Thereafter the son of Jatasura covered the son of Bhimasena with various kinds of weapons. But the son of Hidimva, single-handed, crushed Alamvusha, Karna and the unfordable ocean of Kuru soldiers, like a furious tempest agitating the clouds. Thereafter the Rakshasa Alamvusha seeing the potenty of the illusion of Ghatotkacha,

15. Quickly covered him with myriads of shafts. Piercing the son of Bhimasena with numerous arrows, Alamvusha,

16. With his arrows, caused the Pandava armies to be routed. Routed by him the Pandava troops, O Bharata,

17. Began to disperse in that night, like masses of clouds torn away by a furious gale. Similarly your troops mangled with the arrows of Ghototkacha,

18—21. Fled away in that night throwing, O monarch, all their flambeaus down. Thereafter wrought up with rage, Alamvusha struck Bhima's son in that fierce battle, with numerous arrows, like a guide striking an elephant with the goad. Then Ghatotkacha cut off into small fragments the chariot, the driver and the weapons of his opponent and laughed terrible. Then like clouds showering torrents of rain on the Meru mountain, Ghotolkacha poured showers of shafts on Karna, Alamvusha and all the rest of Kurus. Afflicted by the Rakshasa, the Kuru troops became greatly agitated.

22. The four kinds of forces of which your army consisted, began to press and crush one another. Then the son of Jatasura deprived of his car and driver,

23. Wrathfully struck Ghotolkacha in that battle with his bare fists. Thus struck Ghototcacha trembled

24—25. Like a mountain with its trees, creepers and grass at the ttme of an earth-quake. Then the son of Bhimasena furious with rage, raising his own foe-slaying arm that resembled a bludgeon, dealt a severe blow to Jatasura's son; thus furiously crushing him, the son of Hidimva quickly threw him down,

26. And then seizing him by his two arms began to press him with great force against the earth. Then the son of Jatasura freeing himself from the grasp of Ghotolkacha;

27. Once more rose up quickly and rushed furiously upon the latter. Alamvusha also, throwing down and dragging the Rakshasa

28—29. Ghotolkacha, out of rage began to press him against the earth. Then between those two roaring heroes of huge proportion, namely Ghotolkacha and Alamvusha, a battle raged that was extremely terrible and horripilating. Then those highly proud heroes, each desirous of getting advantage over the other by means of their illusive powers,

30. Fought on with great fury like the puissant Indra and the son of Virochana. Becoming fire and the ocean, again Garuda and Takshaka,

31. And once a cloud and a tempest and again thunder and a mighty mountain and an elephant and a tiger, and Rahu and the sun,

32. They thus exhibited a hundred different kinds of illusions, desirous of compassing each other's destruction. Indeed Alamvusha and Ghotolkacha fought most wonderfully.

33. With bludgeons and maces and lances and mallets and battle axes, and clubs and crests of mountains, they then struck each other.

34. Riding on the back of elephants or horses, or on their chariots, those foremost of Rakshasas both possessed of potent illusive powers, fought with each other in that battle.

35. Thereafter, O king, Ghotolkacha, impelled by a desire for killing Alamvusha and excited to the highest pitch of fury soared aloft and then came down even like a hawk.

36. Then seizing that foremost of the Rakshasas, namely, the huge-bodied Alamvusha, he raised him high and then dashed him against the earth, like Vishnu dashing Maya against the ground.

37—38. Then with a sword of beautiful appearance, Ghotolkacha of infinite prowess cut off, O king, from the trunk of his fierce and mighty foe, his terrible head that was even then uttering dreadful roars, and that looked frightful, O mighty monarch.

39. Then holding that blood-stained head by the hair, Ghotolkacha quickly proceeded towards the chariot of Duryodhana.

40. Then the mighty-armed Rakshasa, approaching the car, smilingly threw that head with contorted aspect and dishevelled hair in that car of the king.

41. Then like clouds during the rainy season, he uttered a tremendous roar; and then O king, addressing Duryodhana he said these words:—

42. "Here is your friend slain whose prowess you have witnessed yourself. You are destined to see the death of Karna and that of your ownself.

43. There is a saying, O king, that no one, desirous of keeping his morality, profit and pleasure unprejudiced should never approach a king a Brahmana and a female with empty hands, (i.e., without presents.)

44. Do you live without any anxiety whatever up to the time I do not slay Karna." Having thus spoken, O foremost of men, he rushed against Karna,

45. Scattering hundreds of sharp arrows and directing them at the head of Karna. Then, O mighty monarch, a battle of terrible aspect and great fierceness commenced between the human hero and the Rakshasa —battle that filled every heart with great admiration.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-fifth chapter, the slaughter of Alamvusha, in the Ghototkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. How did that battle between Vikartana's son Karna and the Rakshasa

Ghatotkacha rage at that dead of night when they encountered each other ?

2. What appearance did that terrible Rakshasa then assume ? How looked his car and his steeds and what was the nature of his weapons ?

3. What was the measure of his horses, his standard and his bow ? What kind of armour and head-gear did he then wear ? O Sanjaya, expert as you are in the art of narration, tell me all this as I am asking you about them.

Sanjaya said :—

4. Ghototkacha was of gigantic proportion ; his eyes were crimson ; the hue of his countenance was coppery ; his belly was low and sunk. The hair on his body were erect, his head was green ; his ears were straight like shafts ; and his cheeck bones were high.

5. His mouth was large, exending from ear to ear. His teeth were sharp and four of them were long and pointed. His tongue and his lips were long and of a coppery hue. His brows were long drawn. His nose was thick.

6. His body was of blue complexion, his neck was red. Tall as a mountain he was frightful to look at ; of huge stature huge arms and huge head, he possessed unequalled strength.

7. His limbs were hard and ugly, the hair on his head was tied in a ugly shape upwards. His hips were spacious and his navel was deep. His proportions were gigantic although they were not so strong.

8. His arms were duly adorned, and that one of potent illusive energy wore Angadas and a cuirass on his breast like a circle of fire on the breast of a mountain.

9. A bright and beautiful diadem made of gold adorned his head—diadem of which every part was proportionate and resplendent and which looked like an arch.

10. His ear-rings were effulgent like the morning sun and his garlands were of gold and exceedingly bright. His body was cased in a massive brazen armour of great effulgence.

11. His chariot of gigantic size and of the measure of a Nalwa and covered with bear-skin was adorned with a hundred tinkling bells and from its standard fluttered numerous crimson banners.

12. It was well furnished with all sorts of weapons, offensive and defensive, and was decked with a festoon of bannerets. It possessed eight wheels and its clatter resembled the deep rumble of rain-clouds.

13. The horses yoked thereto were stout, mettled, of chequered complexion, fleet, of red eyes and like infuriate elephants.

14. Those indefatigable and spirited steeds bore the dreadful Rakshasa to battle, neighing and throwing back their thick mains repeatedly.

15. A Rakshasa of frightful eyes, and decked with bright ear-rings and possessing a fierce mouth acted as his charioteer, checking the horses by the reins that were as bright as the rays of the sun.

16. Accompanied by that charioteer he came like the sun accompanied by his charioteer Aruna (dawn). Looking like a high mountain enveloped in cloudy masses,

17. A huge standard, touching the very clouds was set upon his chariot. A dreadful vulture of crimson body and flesh-eating was the device on his standard.

18. The Rakshasa then advanced, forcibly stretching his bow of which the twang resembled the rattle of Indra's thunder, and the string was very tough and which measured twelve Aranis in length and one in breadth.

19. Filling all the quarters of the heaven with arrows of the measure of the Aksha of a car, the Rakshasa assailed Karna in that night that witnessed the destruction of so many heroes.

20. Proudly seated on his car, as he stretched his bow, the twang that was heard resembled the rumble of the roaring thunder.

21. Frightened at that sound, your troops O Bharata, trembled like the surging billows of the sea.

22. Beholding that one of frightful eyes and dreadful aspect rush towards himself, the son of Radha quickly withstood him in all cheerfulness.

23. Karna then advanced against the smiting Rakshasa smiting him in return from a near point, like an elephant rushing against another or a bull charging another.

24. (Then the dreadful collision, O mighty monarch, that took place between Karna and the Rakshasa, resembled O ruler of men that between Sakra and Samvara (in days gone by).

25. Each then grasping a fearful bow of loud twang began to wound and cover the other with mighty shafts.

26. Then penetrating each other's brazen armours, they pierced each other with shafts of depressed knots, shot from bows drawn to the fullest stretch.

27. Then like two tigers mangling each other with their claws, or two elephants with their tusks, they mangled each other with their lances and arrows and javelins.

28. Mangling each other's body, aiming their shafts at each other, and burning each other with myriads of shafts, they could not be gazed at.

29. Covered with arrow-wounds all over the body and steeped in torrents of blood, they both looked beautiful like two hills of red chalk with rivulets flowing down their sides.

30. Those two mighty car-warriors, though they were striving hard and each had his limbs torn open with points of shafts, could not make each other flinch or tremble.

31. That nocturnal combat between Karna and the Rakshasa, which both regarded as a game having their lives for the stake, seemed for a long time to be a equal one.

32. As Ghototkacha placed keen shafts on his string and as he let them off, his foes and friends alike became terrified with the twang of his bow.

33. Then, O king, Karna was unable to gain any advantage over Ghototkacha. Thereafter that foremost of all persons versed in the use of weapons, invoked into existence a celestial weapon.

34. Thereupon the king of the Rakshasas beholding a celestial weapon aimed at him, by Karna, brought into use his Rakshasa illusion.

35. Instantly he was encircled by a numerous force of dreadful looking Rakshasas armed with lances and large rocks and stones and clubs.

36. Beholding the Rakshasa come with an uplifted weapon like the Destroyer of beings armed with his fatal bludgeon, all the kings of your host were filled with terror.

37. Frightened at the war-cries uttered by Ghototkacha the elephants discharged urine and men were sorely afflicted.

38. Then a mighty shower of rocks and stones fell on all sides, being poured incessantly by the Rakshasas, who had acquired greater strength, in consequence of the hour being mid-night.

39. Iron wheels, Bhusundis, javelins, lances and spears and Sataghnis and battle axes, then began to fall in torrents.

40. Then beholding that battle fierce to the extreme, your sons and your warriors sorely afflicted (with terror) took to their heels.

41. The proud Karna alone, ever boastful of the strength of his weapons, was not terrified and he continued to stay on the field, baffling with his arrows the illusions displayed by Ghatotkacha. Ghatotkacha then discharged dreadful arrows for compassing the death of Suta's son.

42. Then those arrows piercing through Karna and steeped in blood entered the earth like so many infuriate snakes.

43. Thereupon the light-handed and puissant son of Suta excited to the highest pitch of fury, prevailing over Ghototkacha, pierced him with ten shafts.

44. Pierced in his vital parts and extremely pained by the son of Suta, Ghototkacha took up a discus of celestial make having a thousands pokes.

45. Then the son of Bhima, desirous of slaying the son of Adhiratha, hurled at the latter that discus furnished with a razor-sharp edge, of the effulgence of the morning sun and decked with jems and jewels.

46. That discus of great impetus and hurled with great force, was cut off into fragments with the shafts of Karna, and it fell down on the earth baffled in its object, like the hopes and purposes of an unfortunate man.

47. Beholding his discus thus baffled, Ghototkacha was highly enraged and he then covered Karna with his arrows like Rahu covering the sun.

48. But the son of Suta Karna possessed prowess equal to that of Rudra or Upendra or Indra himself, dauntlessly covered Ghatotkacha's chariot with his winged arrows.

49. Thereafter a gold-decked mace was whirled and hurled at Karna by Ghatotkacha. But the former cutting it off with his arrows felled it on the ground.

50. Then soaring into the sky and roaring like destructive clouds, the huge-bodied Rakshasa poured a veritable shower of trees from the skies.

51. Then Karna pierced with his shafts the son of Bhimasena versed in illusion when he was ranging through the skies, like the sun piercing the clouds with his rays.

52. Next cutting his car into fragments and slaying all his horses, Karna covered him with arrows, like a cloud charged with rain.

53. There was not even space of two finger's breadth in the body of Ghototkacha that was not pierced with Karna's shafts. Soon the Rakshasa appeared to be like a porcupine with its quills erect.

54. So completely was he covered with shafts that we could not in that battle, any onger see either Ghototkacha's person, or his horses, or his car, or standard.

55. Then the Rakshasa versed in illusion destroying by his own weapon the celestial weapon of Karna, began to fight with Suta's son, aided by his own illusive powers.

56. Indeed he fought on with Karna, aided by his illusive powers and exhibiting his great agility. Then showers of shafts began to fall from invisible quarters in the skies.

57. Then Bhimasena's son possessed of potent powers of illusion, O best of the Kurus, assumed, by the help of those powers, a dreadful appearance and began to confound the Kouravas, O Bharata.

58. The puissant Rakshasa then assuming many terrible heads, began to swallow up the celestial weapons of Karna.

59. Soon again, the huge Rakshasas with hundreds of wounds on his body seemed to lie cheerlessly and like one dead, on the field.

60. The foremost of the Kouravas then considering Ghatotkacha to be dead uttered loud joyous shouts. Soon however, he was seen to assume new forms and roving in all direction.

61. Next he was seen to assume a huge form with a hundred heads and hundred stomachs and looked like the mainaka mountain.

62. Once again he became small about the measure of the thumb and moved about transversely or soared high like the surging billows of the ocean.

63. Tearing through the earth, he dived again into the waters. Once seen here he was next seen rising on the surface at a different place.

64. Then coming down from the welkin, he was seen standing, covered in mail, on a chariot adorned with gold, having wandered through earth and sky and all the points of the compass aided by his powers of illusion.

65. Then going near the vicinity of Karna's chariot, Ghatotkacha with his earrings moving, dauntlessly addressed the son of Suta, O king, in these words :—

66. " Wait a little, O son of Suta, whither shall you go with your life, avoiding me? To-day I shall remove your itching for fight on the field of battle."

67. Having thus spoken, the Rakshasa of fierce prowess, with his eyes red in rage, soared into the sky and laughed a tremendous laugh.

68. Then Ghatotkacha assailed Karna like a lion attacking an elephant; and he then covered with his showers of arrows of the measure of the Aksha of a car,

69. That foremost car-warrior viz., Karna, like a cloud with showers of rain. But Karna repulsed that arrowy shower before it could reach him.

70. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, seeing his illusions nullified by Karna, Ghatotkacha once more put forth another illusion and rendered himself invisible.

71. He then became a huge mountain with numersous peaks, covered with tall trees. From that mountain streams of lances, spears, swords and maces began to issue out incessantly.

72. Beholding that mountain resembling a heap of antimony from which fierce weapons continuously flowed out, Karna was not at all daunted.

73. Then smiling, Karna invoked into existence a celestial weapon. Then that foremost of mountains, cut and thrown off by that weapon of Karna, was completely destroyed.

74. Thereafter the Rakshasa becoming a blue cloud decked with the rain-bow began to cover the son of Suta with a fierce shower of stones.

75. Then that foremost of all persons versed in the use of weapons, viz., Karna, the son of Vikartana, discharging the Vayavya weapon destroyed that blue cloud.

76. Then, O king, covering the quarters of the compass with his arrows, Karna baffled the weapons shot by Ghatotkacha.

77. Then the highly puissant son of Bhimasena smiling the while invoked into existence an all-powerful illusion against that mighty car-warrior viz., Karna.

78. Beholding then that foremost of car-warriors viz., Ghatotkacha, dauntlessly approach him surrounded by a large number of Rakshasas,

79. That resembled lions and tigers and infuriate powerful elephants, some mounted on elephants, some on chariots and some on horses,

80. All bearing various kinds of weapons and wearing diverse kinds of armour and ornaments,—indeed beholding Ghatotkacha surrounded by these fearful Rakshasas like Vasava by the Marutas,

81. The mighty bowman Karna began to fight with him fiercely. Then Ghatotkacha piercing Karna with five arrows,

82—84. Uttered a tremendous war-cry, filling all the kings with terror. Once more with an Anjalika, Ghatotkach quickly cut off the bow of Karna held in his hands together with the arrows fitted thereon. Thereupon Karna taking up another mighty bow capable of bearing a greater strain and looking like the bow of Indra itself, began to stretch it forcibly ; thereafter, O king, Karna sped arrows,

85. Furnished with golden wings, capable of slaying foes and ranging through the welkin at those Rakshasas. Afflicted with those shafts that host of broad-chested Rakshasas,

86. Appeared agitated like a host of wild elephants attacked by a lion. Burning with his arrows the Rakshasas and their horses, charioteers and elephant, O lord,

87. The heroic Karna appeared like the god of fire burning down creatures at the end of a yuga. Slaying that Rakshasa host, the son of Suta appeared beautiful,

88. Like the god Maheswara after he had destroyed Tripura in the days of yore. Among the thousands of kings belonging to the Pandavas, O sire,

89—91. There was none who could then even look at Karna, O ruler of men, except the powerful Ghotokacha, that foremost of Rakshasas who was possessed of terrible energy and might and who burning with wrath, then looked like the Destroyer himself. Excited as he was with wrath flames of fire seemed to issue out of his eyes, like burning drops of oil from a pair of flambeaus ; then striking his palms against each other and bitting his nether lip,

92. The Rakshasa was seen to ride a car the creation of his own illusion to which were yoked asses looking like elephants and having the heads of Pisachas.

93. Then excited with rages he addressed his charioteer saying, " Take me near the son of Suta." Then that foremost of car-warriors riding on that chariot of fearful aspect,

94. Once more proceeded, O ruler of men, to fight a terrible fight with the son of Suta. Then that Rakshasa, once more excited with rage, hurled at Suta's son,

95. An Asani of dreadful appearance furnished with eight wheels and manufactured by Rudra himself. Placing his bow on his car, and jumping down on the earth Karna seized that weapon,

96. And hurled it back at Ghototkach. The latter however had jumped down from his car. Meanwhile that highly resplendent weapon burning down the Rakshasa's car with its charioteer, horses and standard,

97. Entered the earth, piercing through her bowels, thereby filling the gods with wonder. Then all creatures applauded Karna,

98. Inasmuch as he succeeded in grasping the Asani of celestial make, having jumped down from his car. Having achieved this feat, Karna again ascended his car.

99—100. Thereafter that afflicter of foes, namely the son of Suta began to shoot his arrows. O giver of honour what Karna then achieved in that battle of fierce aspect was incapable of being acheived by any other creature. Then struck with his Narachas like a mountain by showers of rain,

101—102. Ghototkacha of aerial form once more disappeared from the view. Fighting in this way, the huge Rakshasa, the slayer of foes, destroyed the celestial weapons of Karna, by means of his agility and illusive powers. Thus although his weapons were destroyed by the illusive powers of that Rakshasa,

103. Karna dauntlessly fought on with him. Thereupon the highly puissant son of Bhima, O king, being wroked up with with rage.

104—105. Multiplied himself many times thereby inspiring terror in to the hearts of mighty car-warriors. Thereafter from all the points of the compass, lions, tigers, hyenas, fire-tongued snakes and iron-beaked rangers of the sky, began to issue out. Covered with the swiftly-flying arrows shot from Karna's bow,

106. That gigantic Rakshasa looking like the prince of mountains, disappeared then and there. Then numerous Rakshasas Pisachas, Yatudhanas and

107. Packs of wolves and leopards of frightful aspects, rushed upon Karna for devouring him.

108. These then tried to frighten Karna by their fierce yelsl. With many dreadful weapons ready for use, and steeped in blood,

109. Karna pierced each of those monsters. Then with a celestial weapons baffling that illusion of the Rakshasa,

110. He wounded the former's fierce steeds with arrows of depressed knots. Those steeds thus maimed and deprived of their limbs and with their backs lacerated with Karna's arrows,

111. Fell down on the earth, even before the eyes of that Rakshasa. The son of Hidimva seeing his illusions baffled once more made himself invisible, speaking thus, to Vikartana's son—"I will presently compass your slaughter."

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-sixth chapter, the combat between Karna and Ghototkacha, in the Ghototkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the battle between Karna and that Rakshasa had been thus progressing, Alayudha the prince of the Rakshasa, endued with great strength made his appearance on the field of battle.

2. Supported by a large division of troops and surrounded by thousands of Rakshasas of dreadful aspect, he approached Duryodhana.

3. Indeed surrounded by many heroic Rakshasas of diverse appearances, he came there recollecting the ancient quarrel with the Pandavas. His relative, the Brahamana-devouring Vaka had been slain (by Bhima),

4. So also the highly puissant Krimira, and his friend Hidimva. He waited for a long time, keeping alive the memory of his old enmity with the Pandavas.

5. Now informed of this nocturnal battle he came there desirous of compassing the death of Bhima. Then like an infuriate elephant, or an enraged snake,

6—7. That one longing to engage in the fight spoke these words addressing Duryodhana :—'O mighty monarch, you have heard how Bhima slew my relatives the Rakshasas Vaka, Krimira and Hidimva in battle. In days gone by, he ravished our daughter Hidimva,

8—10. Utterly disregarding ourselves and other Rakshasas. What shall I say more ; O king, I have now come of my own accord here to slay him with his followers and cars, and steeds and elephants as also the son of Hidimva with all his counsellors. To-day slaying all the sons of Kunti, headed by the son of Vasudeva, I will eat them up in company with all my followers. Prevent all your troops from battle with the Pandavas ; we will fight with them."

11. Having heard those words of his, king Duryodhana was filled with delight ; and surrounded as he was with his brothers welcoming the Rakshasa, he addressed these words to him.

12. "Placing you and your followers in our front, we shall fight with our enemies. My froops, impelled by the enmity they bear against the Pandavas cannot be restrained."

13. "Then let it be so," replying thus to the king, that foremost of the Rakshasas, accompanied by his man-eating followers, dashed in fury against Bhimasena.

14. His person was effulgent and his chariot burnt with the splendour of the solar disc. Indeed, O foremost of kings, he looked as beautiful as Ghatotkacha himself.

15. His spacious chariot also emitted unequalled clatter and was adorned with numerous arches and covered with bear-skins and measured a Nalwa.

16. His steeds were also fleet and prodigious like elephants and they brayed like asses. Living upon flesh and blood and of huge bodies, a full hundred of them were yoked to his car.

17. The clatter of his car also resembled the rumble of mighty clouds. His bow was also tough and strong with a hard string.

18. His arrows also were furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone and they resembled Akshas of cars. That hero also possessed might of arms like that of Ghatotkacha himself.

19. His standard also perched upon by hosts of vultures and ravens looked like the sun or the fire ; in beauty of person he excelled Ghototkacha and his countenance was flushed with rage.

20. He wore resplendent Angadas, and effulgent diadem and garlands. His head-gear and sword and floral garlands were duly tied. He was armed with maces, Bhusundis, bludgeons, ploughs and bows and he was covered with a coat of mail tough and impenetrable like the skin o elephants.

21. Then crushing the Pandava divisions with that car of his of the effulgence of the fire, and roving thither and thither he looked beautiful, like a mass of clouds in the welkin fringed with streaks of lighting.

22. Then the foremost royal figters of the Pandava host also, endued with great might and cased in mail and armed with shields fought on delightfully, O king, on all sides (in that battle with Alayudha).

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-seventh chapter, the battle between Alayudha and the Pandavas, in the Ghototkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then beholding Alayudha of fierce deeds come to fight on their behalf, all the Kouravas, were exceedingly delighted.

2. So also your sons, headed by Duryodhana himself, were filled with joy like persons, desirous of crossing a sea, getting rafts, when there was no chance of getting it.

3. Having received Alayudha, that foremost prince of the Rakshasas, with a respectful welcome, the kings of your army considered themselves as born anew.

4. Meanwhile as that nocturnal battle raged between Karna and the Rakshasa—battle that, though terrible and superhuman and fierce, was yet delightful to the eye,

5. The Panchalas and other kings became passive spectators of it. At the same time, O king, your troops, though protected all over the field by their commanders,

6. As also Drona and Drona's son and Kripa and others uttered loud wails, saying All is lost. Indeed beholding on the field those terrible feats of Hidimva's son,

7. All your fighters were filled with anxiety; and uttering shrieks of distress they almost lost their senses. All your troops then, O king, became hopeless of Karna's life.

8. Then Duryodhana, beholding Karna hard pressed, summoned that foremost of the Rakshasas Alayudha, and addressed him in these words :—

9. "Yonder is Vikartana's son Karna engaged in battle with the son of Hidimva. Behold he is achieving feats worthy of his valour and strength.

10. Behold there lie the royal heroic warriors slain and wounded with various weapons by the son of Bhimasena, like so many trees crushed by a huge tusked elephant.

11. Amongst all my kingly allies, I have allotted this (Rakshasa Ghatotkacha), with your permission as your share in battle. O herde, do you bring him down displaying your prowess.

12. O slayer of foes, allow not this sinful Ghatotkacha to crush Vikartana's son through his illusive powers, before you despatch him."

13. Thus spoken to by the king, that Rakshasa, of fierce prowess, replied to former saying "let it be so"; and then that mighty-armed one rushed against Ghatotkacha.

14. Thereupon, O lord, the son of Bhimasena also, bearing alone Karna for a while, began to afflict his advancing adversary with this shafts.

15. Then the battle, that commenced between those two enraged Rakshasa chiefs, resembled that between two infuriate elephants both desirous of consorting with the same she-elephant in her season in the woods.

16. Meanwhile, left alone by the Rakshasa that foremost of car-warriors viz., Karna, rushed against Bhimasena, on his car of solar effulgence.

17. Then disregarding the rushing Karna, and beholding Ghatotkacha hard pressed by Alayudha, like a bull engaged with a lion,

18. That foremost of all smiters, viz., Bhimasena, rushed against the chariot of Alayudha, riding on his own car of solar effulgence and shooting showers of sharp arrows.

19. Then, O lord, beholding Bhimasena approach, Alayudha, leaving Ghatotkacha alone, rushed against the former.

20. Then, O master, that slayer of Rakshasa Bhima, furiously encountering that foremost of Rakshasas, covered him and his followers with showers of arrows.

21. Similarly, O king, that subduer of foes namely, Alayudha, cutting off Bhima's arrows with straight going shafts of his, repeatedly covered the latter with his arrows.

22. On the other hand all these Rakshasas, armed with various weapons and dreadful-looking, assailed Bhimasena from all sides desirous of securing victory to your sons.

23. Then the highly puissant Bhimasena, wounded by those numerous Rakshasas, pierced each of them in return with five sharp arrows.

24. Those Rakshasas, of cruel minds, when thus engaged with Bhima, began to utter loud roars and to run in all the ten directions of the compass.

25. The mighty Rakshas, then beholding the troops belonging to him fly away from fear of Bhima, rushed furiously upon the latter and covered him with arrows.

26—27. In that battle Bhimasena then shot at Alayudha many shafts of keen points. Thereupon Alayudha, in that battle, quckly put off or caught hold of several arrows shot by Bhimasena. Then Bhima of dradful prowess, beholding that feat of the foremost of the Rakshasas, 28—29. Hurled at him with great force a mace whose fall resembled the fall of thunder. With his own mace then Alayudha struck the burning mace of Bhima, whereupon the latter flew towards Bhima. Then the son of Kunti covered that foremost of the Rakshasas with a perfect shower of arrows.

30. The Rakshasa baffled even those arrows of Bhima with his own sharp arrows. Then all the Rakshasa troops of dreadful aspect,

31. At the command of their leader, slew all the elephants of the Pandava division. The Panchalas, the Srinjayas, the horses and the excellent elephants (of the Pandava host),

32. Then could find no security being afflicted severely by the Rakshasa. Beholding then the progress of that mighty and terrific battle,

33. The foremost of all male beings addressing Dhananjaya said these words. "Behold the mighty-armed Bhima succumb to the prince of the Rakshasas.

34. Do you rush to his rescue, O son of Pandu and do not hesitate. Let Dhristadyumna and Uttamanjas,

35. Accompanied by the mighty car-warriors of Drupada's division, assail Karna. Let Nakula, Sahadava, and the puissant Yuyudhana,

36—37. Exert themselves in slaughtering the other Rakshasas at your command O son of Pandu. O mighty-armed one, do you also hold in check this division headed by Drona, in as much as a great panic has seized our troops now." When Krishna had thus spoken, those foremost of car-warriors, as appointed,

38. Assailed Karna and the inferior Rakshasas. Then with shafts shot from full drawn bows and resembling snakes of virulent poison,

39. The highly puissant prince of the Rakshasas cut off Bhima's bow. Then again that mighty hero, with sharp arrows, slew Bhima's steeds and charioteer,

40. Even, O Bharata, before the very eyes of Bhima himself. Then deprived of his horses and charioteer Bhima, jumping down from his chariot,

41. Hurled a heavy and dreadful mace at the Rakshasa, uttering a fierce roar. Then as that mighty mace o fierce roar was flying towards him,

42. The fearful Rakshasa broke it down with his own mace and then uttered a terrible roar. Then beholding that fearful and awe-inspiring feat achieved by the prince of the Rakshasas,

43. Bhima, filled with joy, grasped another fierce mace. Thereupon a terrible encounter raged between the Rakshasas and men,

44. Causing the earth to tremble repeatedly with the fall of their maces. Then again throwing aside their maces and bearing each other,

45. They began to strike each other with their fists emitting a sound like that of the thunder. With car-wheels, and axle and Akshas, and Adisthanas and Upskaras,

46. Whatever things they could then get, with that they rushed furiously against one another shedding blood profusely and encountering each other.

47. They began to drag each other like two infuriate elephants. Then Hrishikesha, ever devoted to the welfare of the Pandavas, beholding that combat (between Bhima and Alayudha) urged Hidimva's son to the rescue of his father.

Thus ends the one hundred seventy-eighth chapter, the battle fought by Alayudha in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then beholding Bhima hard pressed in battle by the Rakshasa Vasudeva's son approaching Ghatotkacha said these words to him.

2. "O mighty armed one, behold Bhima as if devoured by the Rakshasa in battle, before the eyes of all troops and before those of yours, O highly effulgent one.

3. Therefore for a time leaving alone Karna, do you quickly slay Alayudha that foremost of the Rakshasas, Omighty armed one, after which you shall slay Karna."

4. Then hearing the words of that one of Vrishni race, and leaving Karna alone for a while, the highly puissant Ghatotkacha, that brother of Vaka, fought with that prince of the Raksashas.

5. In that night the battle, that raged between the Rakshasa Alayudha and the son of Hidimva, was fierce and confused to the extreme.

6—7. Meanwhile the mighty car-warriors Yuyudhana, Nakula and Sahadeva began to pierce with keen shafts the warriors of Alayudha, viz., those grim looking heroic Rakshasas, who, wielding their bows, were rushing impetuously against them.

8. The diadem-decked Vibhatsu, O monarch, in that battle, discharging arrows on all sides, began to overthrow many foremost of Kshatriyas.

9. Similarly, O king, Karna caused many kings to fly away—including Dhristadyumna, Shikhandin and other mighty car-warriors of the Panchalas.

10. Beholding them thus slaughtered and wounded Bhimasena, of terrible prowess, quickly rushed against Karna shooting sharp arrows.

11. Then those warriors, viz., Nakula, Sahadeva and the mighty car-warrior, Satyaki, also came to the spot where Suta's son was, having slain many Rakshashas.

12—13. These then fought with Karna, and the Panchalas fought with Drona. Meanwhile, Alayudha, excited with rage, began to strike that subduer of enemies, viz., Ghatotkacha on the head with a huge bludgeon. In consequence of that stroke the highly puissant son of Bhima, 14—17. Squatted down, overwhelmed with a partial swoon. Thereafter he hurled at Alayudha a mace, looking like a blazing flame of fire, decked with a hundred bells and adorned with gold. Hurled forcibly by that one of fierce acheivments, that mace crushed into pieces the horses, the driver and the loudly rattling chariots of Alayudha. Then betaking to his illusive prowess the latter then jumped down from his car of which the horses, the wheels Askhasas and standard and Kurara had all been shattered. Then through his illusive powers he showered a copious downpour of blood on the field.

18. Then sky the appeared to be overspread with darts, masses of clouds with flashes of lightning. A thunder storm then made its appearanee accompanied by rumble of clouds and claps of thunder.

19, Loud clappling sounds were also then heard in that combat. Beholding that illusion created by the Rakshasa Alayudha, the cannibal Ghotokacha,

20. Soaring high, destroyed it by his own illusive power. Possessed of potent illusive powers Alayudha then seeing his own illusions nullified by those of his adversary,

21. Began to pour a heavy downpour of stones on Ghatotkacha. That terrible shower of stones, the brave Ghatotkacha baffled by means of a shower of arrows. They then poured on each other diverse weapons,

23. Such as iron bludgeons, lances, maces sharp clubs, mallets, tridents, sabres, spears, long and small, Kampanas,

24. Keen shafts, both long and broad-headed, and arrows and discuses, and battle axes, and Ayagudas, and sharp arrows and weapons with heads like those of kine, Ulukhalas,.

25—27. And they then struck each other tearing up many kinds of large branched trees, such as Sami, Pilu, Karira, Champaka, and O Bharata, Juguda, Vadari, blossoming Kovidara, Plaksha, Arimedhas, Palasha, and the Camian, the Peepul, as also with numerous crests of mountains decked with various kinds of metals.

28. The clash, produced by those trees and mountain crests, became as loud as the sound of the roaring thunder. Indeed the battle, that then raged between Alayudha and Bhima's son was, O monarch, fierce in the extreme,

29—30. Like that which took place in the days of yore between the two monkey chiefs Vali and Sugriva. They wounded each other with shafts and various other kinds of weapons as also with keen-edged swords. Then those two mighty Rakshasas, rushing against each other, caught hold of each other by the hair.

31. And those two huge warriors, covered with numerous wounds on their bodies and blood and perspiration trickling down, appeared beautiful like two mighty masses of clouds pouring rain.

32. Then rushing with great violence and whirling the Rakshasa on high and dashing him down] again, Hidimva's son cut off the large head of his adversary.

33. Then holding that head graced with a pair of ear-rings, the puissant Ghatotkacha uttered a terrific roar.

34. Beholding the huge-bodied brother of Vaka, that subduer of foes, slain, the Panchalas and the Pandavas uttered tremendous war-cries.

35. Thereupon on the fall of that Rakshasa the Pandava troops struck up thousands of drums and ten thousand conches.

36. That night then exclusively brought victory to the Pandavas ; echoing with the sound of musical instruments and illumined with torches it then appeared highly beautiful.

37. Then the highly puissant son of Bhima threw that head of Alayudha at the face of Duryodhana who was then rendered insensible.

38. Thereupon Duryodhana, beholding the heroic Alayudha slain, became filled with great anxiety together with all his troops.

39. Alayudha, having come to Duryodhana out of his own accord, recollecting his old enmity, had said to the latter, that he would slay Bhima.

40. The Kuru king had considered the slaughter of Bhima to be certain and had considered the length of the days of his brother also to be measured.

41. Then beholding that Alayudha (on whom all his hopes rested) slain by the son of Bhimasena, Duryodhana considered Bhima's vow (about the slaughter of himself and his brothers) to be already fulfilled.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-ninth chapter, the slaughter of Alayudha in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXX.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having slain the Rakshasa Alayudha Ghatotkacha was greatly delighted ; and then standing at the very van of the troops he began to utter diverse kinds of roars.

2. Those loud roars of his, capable of his making an elephant tremble, entering into the car of troops, struck a great panic to their hearts, O mighty monarch.

3. Meanwhile the mighty-armed Karna, beholding the highly puissant son of Bhima engaged with Alayudha, rushed against the Panchalas.

4. He proceeded against Dhristadyumna and Sikhandin, each with ten strong and straight shafts, shot from his bow drawn to its fullest stretch.

5. Thereafter with a group of other arrows, consisting of Narachas, &c., the son of Suta caused Yudhamanyu, Uttamanjas and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki to tremble.

6. The bows of all those warriors also, O king, engaged in shooting shafts right and left, were also seen incessantly to be drawn in a circle.

7. In that night the sound of their palms and the twang of their bow-strings and the clatter of their car-wheels were so loud as to resemble the rumble of cloud at the end of summer.

8. Then, O monarch, that battle appeared to be a cloud of which the sound of car-clatter and bow-twang constituted the roar of thunder ; the bows of warriors its flashes and showers of arrows its torrents of rain.

9. O foremost of kings, then Vikartana's son Karna, that crusher of his foes, immovable like a hill and equal to a hill in personal proportions,destroyed that wonderful shower of arrows.

10. Then Vikartana's son, high-souled, ever devoted to the interests of your sons, began to slay his adversaries in that battle, with Tomaras, which, in their fall, resembled the thunder-bolt, and also with sharp arrows furnished with variegated wings of gold.

11. Some (of the enemy's host) then had their standards broken and torn ; some had their bodies torn and mangled with sharp arrows. Some were deprived of their charioteers, some of their horses, and some were soon maimed by Vikartana's son.

12. Getting no refuge, the Panchala hosts then fell back upon the division of Yudhisthira. Beholding these troops broken and compelled to turn away, Ghatotkacha then became excited to the highest pitch of fury.

13. Then mounting on his excellent car adorned with gold and gems, he began to roar like a lion. Thereafter approaching Vikartana's son Karna he pierced him with arrows resembling the bolt of Heaven itself.

14. They both then covered the welkin with showers of barbed arrows, Narachas, Sinimukhas, Nalikas, Dandas, Asanis, Vatsyadantas, Varahakarnas, and broad-headed and razor-faced arrows, and shafts pointed like horns.

15. The welkin then, shrouded with that arrowy shower, appeared in consequence of these gold-winged shafts of burning effulgence flying straight through it, as if hung with festoons of beautiful flowers.

16. Of unequalled splendour, they both were each other's match and they then wounded each other with excellent weapons. None could then find any superiority of either of those two excellent heroes.

17. The battle, that was thus fought between the sons of Surya and Bhima and in which showers of arrows were discharged, looked highly charming, and presented almost an unequalled aspect like what is seen in the fierce encounter between Rahu and the sun in the heavens.

Sanjaya said :—

18. When O king, Ghatotkacha, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, found that he could get no advantage over Karna he invoked into existence an exceedingly fierce weapon.

19. Then with that weapon having at first slain Karna's steed, the Rakshasa next destroyed his driver. And then the son of Hidimva quickly rendered himself invisible even then and there.

Dhritarastra said :—

20. When that Rakshasa, after fighting by underhand measures, had thus disappeared, O Sanjaya, describe to me what befell my troops then.

Sanjaya said :—

21. Then beholding the Rakshasa disappear, all the Kurus then exclained aloud saying :—" Appearing next to view, the Rakshasa, fighting by underhand means, will certainly slay Karna."

22. Thereupon Karna, who was endued with extreme lightness in the use of diverse weapons, covered all the points of the compass with his arrowy net-work. Then in consequence of the welkin being darkened by those showers of arrows, no creature could be seen distinguished.

23. So great was the lightness of hand displayed by the son of Suta that nobody could then mark when he touched his quiver with his fingers, when he placed his arrows on the bow-string, and when he aimed and let them off. The whole welkin was then darkened with his shafts.

24. Then a fierce and dreadful illusion was invoked into existence in the welkin by the Rakshasa. We then beheld in the sky what appeared to be a mass of red cloud resembling the terrible flames of a raging fire.

25. O ruler of the Kurus, then from that cloud were seen to issue out flashes of lightning and burning flame-beams. Tremendous roars also issued therefrom, resembling the din of thousands of drums beaten simultaneously.

26. From it also fell many gold-winged shafts, spears, javelins, heavy clubs and such other weapons, as also battle-axes, swords cleansed with oil, and axes of blazing edges, and darts,

27. And spiked bludgeons pouring shinning rays, charming maces made of iron, long lances of keen points, heavy maces adorned with gold and entwined with strings, and Sataghnis all around.

28. Large stones dropped from it and thousands of thunderbolts with loud clap, and hundreds of wheels and razors of the effulgence of fire.

29. Shooting countless arrows Karna then failed to destroy that thick and blazing shower of lances, swords, clubs, mallets, thunderbolts Asanis and axes.

30. Then a tremendous uproar was caused there as horses fell struck with arrows, elephants came down being crushed with thunderbolts and car-warriors fell deprived of life by other weapons.

31. Afflicted all around with the fall of dreadful weapons of various kinds discharged by Ghatotkacha the army of Duryodhana, in great distress, were seen to move helplessly on the field of battle.

32. Cries of Alas and Oh then arose there; and the warriors with their cheerless expression indicated as if they were on the verge of ruin. But those foremost of men, inspired as they were with honorable sentiments,did not then leave the field with faces turned round.

33. Then beholding that immensely terrible and awful shower of weapons invoked into existence by the illusive energy of the Rakshasa and seeing their own troops felled incessantly by it, your sons were seized with a great panic.

34. Jackals having tongues like the leaping flames of fire began to utter fierce howls by hundreds; the Rakshasa also uttered fierce yells. Hearing these disagreeable sounds, O king, your troops were greatly afflicted.

35. Those fierce Rakshasas having fiery tongues, blazing countenances and sharp teeth, and forms huge as mountains, careering through the sky with lances in grasp, appeared like clouds pouring torrents of rain.

36. Wounded and crushed with those dreadful arrows, spears, darts, maces, spiked bludgeons of great lustre, thunder-bolts, trident, Asanis, wheels, and Sataghnis, the Kaurava troops began to fall down.

37. The Rakshasas then went on pouring upon the warriors of your sons long spears, and treacle and Sataghnis, and Sthunas made of steel and covered with strings of jute, and all the combatants became confounded.

38. Heroic warriors with weapons broken or falling off from their gasp or deprived of heads, or with maimed limbs, began to fall down on the field. Then steeds and elephants, and chariots were also crushed to pieces by the shower of stones.

39. Those Yatudhanas of terrible forms created by Ghatotkacha by the help of his illusive powers, pouring that thick shower of mighty weapons, spared neither those that were frightened nor those that begged for mercy.

40. In the ruthless slaughter of Kuru heroes, brought on by Death himself, in that extermination of Kshatriyas the Kourava warriors suddenly broke and fled with speed, exclaiming :—

41. "Fly, O Kouravas, all is lost. The gods with Indra at their head are slaying us for the sake of the Pandavas." At that time there was nobody that could save the sinking Bharata troops.

42. During that terrible uproar and shout and carnage of the Kurus, the divisions loosing their distinguishing marks the parties could not be differentiated from one another.

43. In that dreadful fight in which nobody paid any regard for any one else, every side of the field, when looked at, appeared to be sad, O monarch. Karna alone was then to be seen drowned in that downpour of arrows.

44. Then Karna covered the welkin with his shafts, striking against that celestial illusion of the Rakshasas. The son of Suta, endowed with modesty and achieving the most difficult and praiseworthy feats, was not at all confounded in that battle.

45. O king, then all the Saindhavas, and Valhikas looked in fear at Karna whose senses were not confounded in that fight. And they all applauded him whether they looked at the triumphs of the Rakshasa.

46. Thereafter a Sataghni, furnished with wheels, was discharged at Karna by Ghatotkacha, and it despatched at once the four steeds of Karna. These horses then fell down on their knees, deprived of life, teeth, eyes and tongues.

47. Then descending from his horseless chariot and seeing the Kouravas fly away and beholding his own celestial weapons repulsed by the illusion of the Rakshasa, Karna, not at all confounded, turned his mind inwards and then began to reflect as to what he should do next.

48. At that time all the Kouravas, beholding Karna and the terrible illusion of the Rakshasas, cried out saying:—O Karna, slay the Rakshas with your dart. The Kouravas and the Dhartarastras are on the point of being exterminated.

49. What can Bhima or Arjuna do to us? Slay this wicked Rakshasa, who is consuming us all, at this dead of night. They, that will escape alive from this encounter, will fight with the Parthas to-morrow.

50. Therefore slay this dreadful Rakshasa now with that dart given to you by Vasava. O Karna, let not these great warriors, the Kouravas, these royal combatants that resemble Indra himself, be all exterminated in this night-fight.

51. Then Karna, seeing the Raksha alive at the middle of night and the Kuru army filled with fear and hearing also the loud wails of the latter, set his heart upon hurling his dart.

52. Burning with wrath like an infuriate lion, and unable to brook the assaults of the Rakshasa Karna took up that foremost of victory-giving and indomitable darts, desirous of achieving the destruction of Ghatotkacha.

53. That dart, O monarch, which he had kept and worshipped through years for encompassing the slaughter of Pandu's son in battle, that excellent dart that Indra himself had given to Suta's son in exchange for the latter's ear-rings,

54. That burning and dreadful dart entwined with strings and which seemed to long for blood, that terrible missile that looked like very tongue of death or his sister, that resplendent and fearful dart Vikartana's son now hurled at the Rakshasa.

55. Thereupon seeing that excellent and glittering weapon, capable of penetrating through the body of every foe, in the hands of Suta's son, the Rakshasa fled away in fear making his body prodigious like the foot of the Vindhya hills.

56. Then seeing that dart in the grasp of Karna all creatures, in the heavens, began to utter loud wails. Fearful winds began to blow and thunders with tremendous clap began to fall on the earth.

57. Then that dart, destroying the blazing illusion and going through the breast of the Rakshasa, soared aloft and penetrated in the night into a stony constellation in the heavens.

58. Thus having fought with various kinds of weapons with numerous heroic warriors and Rakshasa, Ghototkacha, then uttering various dreadful roars, fell deprived of life with that dart of Indra.

59. This is the most exceedingly wonderful feat that the Rakshasa achieved for the destruction of his foes viz that at the time when his heart was penetrated by that dart he shone resplendent, O monarch, like a mighty-mountain or a mass of clouds.

60. Having assumed that terrible and dreadful figure, Bhimasena's son of frightful deeds fell down. When dying, O monarch, he fell upon a portion of your army and pressed those troops down by the weight of his own body.

61. Then falling down with force, the Rakshasa, with his huge and still increasing body, desirous of benefitting the Pandavas, slew a full Akshouhini of your troop, while he himself gave up his life.

62. Then a tremendous uproar composed of the war cries of combatants, beasts, of conchs and sound of drums and cymbals arose there. The Kouravas, then beholding the Rakshasa slain and his illusion destroyed, uttered loud shouts of joy.

63. Then Karna, applauded by the Kurus, as Sakra had been by the Marutas upon the death of Vritra, ascended behind the car of your son and becoming, the object of every body's sight entered the Kuru host.

Thus ends the one hundred eighty first chapter, the slaughter of Ghatotkacha in the Ghatotkachabadha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

(GHATOTKACHA BADHA PARVA) —Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding Hidimva's son slain and lying like a riven hill all the Pandavas began to shed copious tears of grief.

2. But the son of Vasudeva, overwhelmed with delight, began to utter there loud war-cries thereby causing pain to the Pandavas.

3. Indeed uttering loud shouts he then embraced the son of Pandu. Thus uttering loud roars and drawing the reins of the steeds,

4. He began to dance in joy, like a tree shaken by the tempest. Then embracing Partha once more and clapping his armp-its,

5. That undeteriorating god, endowed with great intelligence, once more uttered roud roars standing on the terrace of his car. Then beholding those signs of joy manifested by Kesava, Dhananjaya,

6. O monarch, with a beast overwhelmed with grief, addressed the former saying :— " O slayer of Madhu, you are showing delight at a time scarcely fit for it,

7. Indeed on an occasion for sorrow generated by the death of Hidimva's son our troops, beholding Ghotokacha slain, are flying away.

8. We also are filled with great grief, at the death of Hidimva's son, O Janarddana. The cause of your delight on such an occasion must indeed be very serious.

9. O foremost of all truth-speaking men, therefore tell me today truly the cause of your joy. O subduer of foes, if it is not a secret, it behoves you to say it to me.

10. O Slayer of Madhu, tell me what has disturbed your patienee to day? O Jannardana, I consider this fickleness of yours to be like the drying up of the ocean or the walking of the Meru mountain.

Vasudeva's son said :—

11. Overwhelming is the delight that has filled me now. Hear it, O Dhananjaya. What I shall tell you will immediately dispel your sorrow and impart joy on your beast.

12. O you of great splendour, his sakti having been used against Ghatotkacha, regard Karna as already slain in battle.

13. No person could have confronted Karna, if like, Kartikeya he would have stood in battle armed with that dart.

14. It is through good fortune that his armour had been taken away, that his ear-rings had been taken away from him ; by good luck it is that his infallible dart also had been baffled by Ghatotkacha.

15. Covered in his natural coat of mail and decked with his natural ear-rings, Karna, having his senses under thorough control, could, single-handed, defeat the three worlds with the gods therein.

16. Neither Vasava, nor Kuvera, nor Varuna, the lord of the waters, nor the god of Death, could venture to confront him.

17. If that foremost of men had his natural coat of mail and ear-rings then neither yourself, wielding the Gandiva, nor myself uplifting the discus Sudarsana could have defeated him in battle.

18. For your good, Karna was deprived of his ear-rings by Indra with the aid of illusion. In the same manner that subjugator of hostile troops was deprived of his armour.

19. As Karna had given his effulgent ear-rings and armour cutting them off from his body he is designated as Vikartana.

20. Karna now appears to me to be like an infuriate snake of virulent venom stupi-fied by the virtue of incantation or like a fire with its flames quenched.

21—22. O mighty-armed one, since the time the illustrious Sakra gave that Sakti to Karna in exchange for the latter's ear-rings and armour—that Sakti, which has slain Ghatotkacha from that time, Vrisha having obtained it, had always regarded you as slain in battle.

23. But though deprived of that dart, I swear to you, O sinless one, that hero could not still be defeated by any one else save yourself.

24. Devoted to the Brahmanas, truthful, of ascetic practices and vow-observing, and merciful on his foes, Karna is called Vrisha.

25. Delighting in battles, possessed of mighty arms, his bow ever ready for use, like a lion in the forest depriving leaders of elephantine herds of their pride,

26. Karna ever humilates the pride of many mighty car-warriors, and resembles the mid-day sun incapable of being looked at.

27. When fighting with all the high-souled and excellent warriors of your army, O foremost of men, Karna, discharging his showers of arrows, looks like the autumnal sun of myriad rays.

28. Just like clouds at the end of summer pouring torrents of rain, Karna, shooting incessantly showers of arrows, resembles a pouring cloud charged with celestial weapons.

29. He is incapable of being vanquished in battle by the very gods shooting showers of arrows in all directions and discharging flesh and blood profusely.

30. Deprived of his armour, and his two ear-rings O son of Pandu, and having given up his Sakti given to him by Sakra Karna tody is nothing more than a mortal.

31. There will happen only one opportunity for his slaughter. When the wheels of his chariot will be sunk in the earth, availing yourself of that opportunity and exerting vigourously you should slay him, acting up to my hint.

32—33. The conqueror of Vala that excellent hero, weilding his thunder, cannot slay the indomitable Karna when he stands armed with weapons. Indeed, O Arjuna, for your welfare, by the help of numerous machinations, I have destroyed, one after another Jarasandha, the high-souled ruler of the Chedis, the mighty armed Ekalavya of the Nishada tribe, other great Rakshasas having Hidimva, Krimira and Vaka for their leaders, as also Alayudha that crusher of hostile troops and Ghatotkacha that guider of enemies and of fearful feats.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-first chapter, the joy of Krishna, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Dontinued.

Arjuna said :—

1. How, O Janarddana, and by what measures were those lords of earth Jarasandha and others slain, for our welfare ?

Vasudeva said :—

2. Had not Jarasandha, the ruler of the Chedis and the highly puissant prince of the Nishadas been slain before, they would have become very terrible by this time.

3. Duryodhana would then surely have invited those foremost of car-warriors to embrace his cause, and they, ever hostile to us, must have chosen the Kourava party.

4. They all were brave, fierce bowmen, accomplished in the use of weapons, and firm in battle; and they would have then defended the Dhartarastras like so many immortals.

5. The son of Suta, Jarasandha, the ruler of the Chedis, and the prince of the Nishadas,—these, united with Suyodhana, might have conqured the whole earth.

6. It was through my tactics that they were slain. Hear from me of those tactics. Indeed even the gods, without the employment of tactics, could not have defeated them in battle.

7. Each of them, individually, could have fought with entire army of the celestials, protected by the regents of the worlds themselves, O son of Pritha !

8. Once on a time, afflicted by the son of Rohini, Jarasandha, excited to the highest pitch of fury, hurled at ourselves a mace capable of slaying all creatures.

9. Sparkling like the tongues of fire, that mace flew towards ourselves dividing the welkin like the line that parts the tresses of a woman, and with the impetuousity of the thunder hurled by Sakra.

10. Then beholding that mace course towards us, the son of Rohini, for repulsing that mace, hurled the weapon known as Sthanukarna.

11. Repulsed by the force of Baladeva's weapon, that mace fell on the earth riving her open and causing the mountains thereon to tremble.

12. There was a terrible Rakshasi, by name Jara, possessed of dreadful might. She, O monarch, had put together the different parts of Jarasandha's body, and therefore was the latter so named.

13. From two mothers, the two halves of his body come out separately. And in consequence of those two halves being united by that Rakshasi, he was called Jarasandha.

14. That Rakshashi, that was then within bowels of the death, was slain with her sons and relatives, O son of Pritha, by means of that mace and that weapon Sthanuharna.

15. Deprived of that mace of his Jarasandha was slain in a fierce encounter by Bhimasena even before your very eyes O Dhananjaya!

16. Had the puissant Jarasandha been then armed with his mace then, O foremost of men, even the celestials, with Indra at their head, could not have succeeded in slaying him in battle.

17. For your good also was the mighty son of the Nishadhas, deprived, by a guileful means, of his thumb, by Drona who assumed the position of his preceptor.

18. That prince of the Nishadas of resolute prowess with his finger-protectors tied round them, used to rove in the forest, swelling with his own pride, like a second Rama.

19. Retaining the use of his thumb Akalavya could not have been defeated in battle by the Danavas, the celestials, the Rakshaasas and the serpents, all united together in battle.

20. Of firm grasp, accomplished in the use of weapons, incessantly shooting his weap ons, he could not have been looked at by mere men?

21. For your good, he was slain by me in the van of battle. The powerful ruler of the Chedis was also slain before your very eyes.

22. He also was incapable of being conquered in battle by the celestials and the Asuras. I suffered this birth only for slaughtering him and other such molesters of the gods.

23. With your aid, in order to achieve the world's welfare, O foremost of men, Hidimva and Vaka and Krimira had all been slain by Bhimasena.

24. Also Alayudha, possessed of potent powers of illusion, has been slain by Hidimva's son. All other Rakshasas, brave like Karna and destroyers of the Brahma, sacrifice, have also been slain.

25. Through our tactics Karna used that Sakti of his in felling the son of Hidimva. If on the other hand, Karna had not slain this Rakshasa by his Sakti,

26. Then it would have been my (painful) duty to slay Bhimasena's son Ghatotkacha. It was only for pleasing you that I did not slay him before.

27. This Rakshasa was a contumner of the Brahmanas and a destroyer of sacrifices; this wicked-souled one was inimical to the performance of sacrifices and therefore has he been slain thus.

28. O sinless one, through our tactics the Sakti given to him by Sakra has been also rendered useless. O son of Pandu, those who destroy righteousness are all slayable by me.

29—30. This vow has been taken for establishing righteousness. Where there are the Vedas, truth, self-control, purity, righteousness, humility, prosperity, wisdom, and forbearance, there I am also to be found. You need not now be at all anxious about the slaughter of Karna.

31. I shall tell you the means through which you shall be able to slay Karna. Vrikodara also will slay Suyodhana in battle.

32. O son of Pandu, I shall also tell you the means by which that one's slaughter will been compassed. But now, the tumult of the hostile cry is increasing every moment.

33. Your own troops also are flying away in all the ten directions of the compass; the Kourava warriors, having reached their aim, are now killing your troops. Yonder indeed does Drona, that foremost of smiters, consume our ranks.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty second chapter, words of Krishna in Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. If Suta's son had possessed such a Sakti as was sure to slay one hero, why then excepting all others, did he not hurl it at Pritha's son Arjuna,

2. Had Arjuna been slain by that Sakti, then all the Srinjayas and Pandavas also would have be slain. Indeed, if Phalguna could have been slain, then victory certainly would have been ours.

3. "Challenged, I would never turn back" even this was the vow taken by Arjuna. The son of Suta should therefore have summoned Arjuna in battle.

4. Tell me, O Sanjaya, why then Vrisha, summoning Arjuna to a single combat, did not slay the latter by means of the Sakti given him by Indra.

5. Surely my son is a fool and has not good counsellors also to guide him; that wretch is ever outwitted by the foe, how then can he hope to obtain victory over them?

6. That Sakti which was such a powerful weapon, and on which rested his hopes of victory, also even that Sakti had been made futile by Vasudeva's son through Ghatotkacha.

7. As a fruit is snatched away from the hands of a cripple with withered arms by a powerful man, even so has that mortal Sakti, of Karna, been made futile by Krishna, through Ghatotkacha.

8. Just as in a battle between a boar and a dog, the huntsman is the party to forfeit when either is slain, so, I think, O intelligent one, Vasudeva's son is to be party benefitted in that battle between Karna and Hidimva's son.

9. "If Ghatotkacha slays Karna in battle the Pandavas will be greatly benefitted; on the other hand, if Karna slays Ghatotkacha in battle there will be a great gain to the Pandavas because then Karna's Sakti will be useless."

10. Thinking in this way and for doing what was agreeable to the Pandavas that foremost of men Vasudeva, endued with great wisdom, had caused Ghatotkacha to be slain by Karna in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

11—12. Knowing perfectly well what Karna desired to do, the slayer of Madhu, the mighty armed Jannardanna, O monarch, ordered the foremost of the Rakshasas, viz., Ghatotkacha of puissant might to engage in a duel with Karna for rendering, O king, the latter's death-dealing Sakti fruitless. All this, O monarch, is the out-come of your wicked policy.

13. O perpetuator of Kuru's race, we could then have surely been successful had not Krishna protected that mighty car-warrior Partha from Karna.

14. O Dhritarastra, Partha, with his horses, charioteer, and standard, would have been completely destroyed in battle, had he been deprived of the aid of Jannardana, that lord of all yoga prowess.

15. Protected with various means and always defended by Krishna, Partha ever defeats his foes, encountering them.

16. Indeed, it was Krishna that rescued Pritha's son from that death dealing Sakti otherwise that weapon would have quickly consumed the son of Kunti like the bolt of Heaven destroying a tree.

Dhritarastra said :—

17. My son is quarrelsome; his counsellors are so many fools. He is proud of his wisdom. He has thus overlooked the certain means that have given him victory.

18. Why, O Suta, did not Karna of high intelligence that foremost of all weilders of weapons discharge that fatal Sakti at Dhananjoya?

19. Why, O Gavalgani's son, did you too forget this great object, since, endued as you are with great intelligence, you did not remind Karna?

Sanjaya said :—

20. Indeed, every night, O monarch, this used to form the subject of deliberation among Duryodhana, Sakuni, Dussasana and myself.

21. O Karna, leaving alone the rest of the warriors do you slay Dhananjaya. After that we shall lord over the Panchalas and the Pandavas as if they were mere slaves.

22. Or it may be that upon the fall of Pritha's son, he, of Vrishni's race, will appoint another among the Pandavas to act as the leader of them. Therefore let Krishna be slain.

23. Krishna is the root of the Pandavas, Partha is their risen trunk. The other sons of Pritha and the Panchalas are like their branches and leaves respectively.

24. The Pandavas have Krishna for their shelter, Krishna for their strength, and Krishna for their leader. Krishna is their main support like the moon of the constellations.

25. Therefore, O son of Suta, leave alone the leaves, the branches and the trunk of the Pandava tree. Know Krishna to be its root, ever and every where."

26. (Thus indeed did we then speak to Karna). Had he slain the scion of the Dasarha race, that delighter of the Yadavas, and in that case, the whole earth, O monarch, would certainly have come under your sway.

27. If that illustrious delighter, of the Yadu race and of the Pandavas, had lain prostrate on the field being slain in battle, then, O ruler of men, this earth certainly would have fallen under your sway together with all her mountains, forests and seas.

28. We rose every morning with this resolution regarding that lord of the celestials, viz., Hrishikesha of infinite prowess. But at the time of battle we forgot our resolution.

29. Kesava ever defends Kunti's son Arjuna. He never allowed Arjuna to expose himself before Suta's son in battle,

30. That undeteriorating one even made other foremost of car-warriors confront Karna, thinking how that fatal Sakti of ours might be rendered futile by us, O master.

31. When again the illustrious Krishna protected Pritha's in this manner, why, O king, would not that foremost of kings protect his own self?

32. Upon mature thought, I see that there is no person in the three worlds who is able to defeat that subduer of foes viz Janarddana, that hero bearing the discus in hand.

Sanjaya said :—

33. That foremost of car-warriors viz. Satyaki of prowess incapable of being baffled, asked the mighty-armed Krishna about the great car-warrior Karna saying :—

34. "O Janarddana, it had been Karna's firm resolve that he would hurl that dart of infinite energy at Phalguna. Why then did he not hurl if at him actually,"

Vasudeva said :—

35. Dussasana, Karna, Sakuni the ruler of the Sindhus with Duryobhana at their head, had frequently held consultation about this subject.

36. They used to say to Karna "Oh Karna, oh mighty bowman, O you of infinite prowess in battle, you should not hurl this Sakti at any one close, O foremost of all vtctorious combatants,

37. Except the mighty car-warrior Partha, that son of Kunti who had conquered the lord of wealth himself. Like Vasava among the Gods, he is the most illustrious among the Pandavas.

38. Upon his slaughter, the rest of the Pandavas and the Srinjayas will be heartless like the god deprived of the fire in his mouth."

39. Karna having agreed, saying let it be so, O foremost of the Sinis, the slaughter of the wielder of the Gandiva bow was ever the ruling thought in Karna's mind.

40. O foremost of warriors, it was I who confounded the son of Radha, in consequence whereof he did not hurl that Sakti at the son of Pandu owning white steeds.

41. O foremost of warriors, as long as I did not succeed in nullifying that means of Arjuna's death, I enjoyed neither sleep nor joy.

42. Beholding that dart therefore rendered fruitless through Ghatotkacha, O foremost of the Sinis, I consider Phalguna to be almost saved from the jaws of Death.

43. Neither my father nor my mother nor youreself, nor my brother, nor even my life, is so worthy of my protection as is Vibhatsu in battle.

44. If there be anything more precious that the sovereignty of the three worlds, even that I do not want to have at the cost of Dhananjaya the son of Pritha.

45. Therefore, O Yuyudhana, a great joy has taken possession of my self today, in as much as I look upon Pritha's son as returned from the dead.

46. For this reason also was the Rakshasa despatched by me to meet Karna. No one else could have checked the latter in this nocturnal fight.

Sanjaya said :

47. Then the son of Devaki did thus speak to Satyaki, he who was ever devoted to Dhananjaya's good and to what was agreeable to him.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-third chapter, the words of Krisna in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

(GHATOTKACHA-BADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O sire, this act of Karna, Duryodhana, Sakuni the son of Suvala and especially of yourself, has been very much against the dictates of policy.

2. Indeed when you knew that Sakti was capable of slaying only one person and that it was incapable of being borne and repulsed even by the gods with Vasava at their head,

3. Why then, O Sanjaya, was it not hurled by Karna at the son of Devaki or at Phalguna while he was engaged with these in battle before.

Sanjaya said :—

4. Every day returning from the field of battle, O ruler of men, we used to hold consultation in the night and speak unto Karna, O foremost of the Kurus, in the following manner. O Karna, tomorrow this Sakti should be hurled at either Karna or Arjuna."

6. When however, the day dawned, O monarch, as fate would have it, Karna as well as all the other warriors forgot all about that resolution.

7. Indeed it is destiny that is supreme to all other forces, inasmuch as Karna did not slay either Partha or Krishna with the dart that he had in his grasp.

8—9. Indeed because his intelligence had been confounded by destiny itself that he did not, stupefied by the illusion of the Gods, hurl that death-dealing dart given him by Vasava, though he held in his hand, at Krishna the son of Devaki it at Partha of prowess equal to that of Indra, for their destruction.

Dhritarastra said :—

10. You are destroyed by Destiny, by your own understanding and by Kesava. The fatal dart of Vasava is lost having brought about the slaughter of Ghatotkacha who was as insignificant as a straw.

11. Karna and my sons as all the other kings, through his greatly impolitic act, have already gone to the abode of wealth.

13. Describe to me how the battle raged between the Kurus and the Pandavas after the fall of Hridimva's son.

12. How did the Panchalas and the Srinjayas, arranged in order and well-skilled in smiting, fight, having rushed upon Drona in battle.

14. How indeed did Pandus and Srinjayas resist the striking Drona when he, proceeding against them, penetrated into their host inflamed with wrath at the slaughter of Bhurisravas and Jayadratha, regardless of his very life and resembling a yawning tiger on the destroyer himself with mouth agape.

16. What also did they do in battle, O sire, viz, Drona's son and Karna and Kripa and others headed by Duryodhana that protected the preceptor.

17. Describe to me, O Sanjaya, how my combatants in that battle covered with their arrows Dhananjaya and Vrikodara who were desirous of slaying the son of Bharadwaja.

18. How indeed did those, worked up with anger at the death of the ruler of the Sindhus and those at the death of Ghatotkacha, each side unable to brook their loss, fight during that night.

Sanjaya said :

19. Upon the destruction, that night, O monarch, of the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha by Karna, all your soldiers filled with delight uttered loud shouts.

20. In that dark hour of night they furiously assailed the Pandava troop and began to slaughter them. Seeing all this king Yudisthira became highly depressed.

21. O chastiser of foes, the mighty armed son of Pandu then addressed Bhima and thus spoke: "O you of mighty arms, check the (rushing) host of Dhritarastra's son.

22. Owing to the slaughter of Hidimva's son a great stupefaction is overwhelming me." Having commanded Bhima thus he sat down on the terrace of his car.

23. With tearful countenance and repeated sighs the monarch became highly depressed on seeing Karna's prowess.

24—25. Seeing him so afflicted, Krishna said these words. "O son of Kunti, let not such grief overtake you. This depression is not worthy of yourself, O chief of the Bharatas, as it is of an ordinary person ; arise O monarch and fight and bear this heavy burden of grief.

26. If you are overtaken by depression victory becomes uncertain." Hearing these words of Krishna the very virtuous king Yudhisthira,

27. Wiping his eyes with his hands replied unto Krishna saying :—O you of mighty arms, the excellent path of duty is not unknown to you.

28. The dreadful consequences of Brahmanicide are his that forgets the services he gets at the hands of others. While we were living in the woods the illustrious son of Hidimva,

29. Although then a small boy only, did us many good turns, O Jannarddana. Being informed that Pandu's son Arjuna had gone to acquire weapons,

30. O Krishna, this fierce bowman went to see me in the Kamyaka forest. He there lived with us until Dhananjaya came back.

31. On the occasion of our journey to the Ghandhamadana, we crossed all difficulties with his help. He then carried the fatigued daughter of the Panchalas on his own back.

32. O master, the feats he had achieved in battle, fully prove that he was learned in all modes of warfare. That illustrious warrior did accomplish many difficult tasks for my sake only.

33. O Janarddana, the affection that I naturally bear for Sahadeva, even double that affection did I bear to that foremost of the Rakshasas Ghatotkacha.

34. That mighty armed one was devoted to me; I loved him and he also loved me dearly. For all these reasons, O descendant of the Vrishni race, I am depressed being afflicted with grief caused by his slaughter.

35. Behold, O scion of the Vrishni race, my troops routed by the Kouravas! Behold the two mighty car-warriors, Drona and Karna fight, yonder, to the best of their abilities.

36. Lo! at this dead hour of night, the Pandava army is being crushed like a forest of reeds by two infuriate elephants in rut.

37. O Scion of Madhu" race, the Kouravas are striving hard (for victory) setting at naught the might of Bhima's arm and the vast mastery of weapons of Arjuna.

38. Yonder joyfully roars Drona and Karna and king Suyodhana himself having slain the Rakshasa in battle.

39. How is it, O Janarddana, that Hidimva's son met with death in his encounter with Suta's son, although you and ourselves are still alive?

40. Putting ourselves to shame and under the very eyes of Savyasachin, O Krishna, Karna has slain the puissant son of Bhimasena.

41. O Krishna, when Abhimanyu was slain by the sinful Dhartarastras the mighty car-warrior Savyasachin was not at hand.

42. We also were held in check by the high-souled ruler of the Sindhus; in the perpetration of that deed, Drona and Drona's son became instrumental.

43. Karna was informed of the means of Abhimanyu's death by the preceptor himself. While Abhimanyu was fighting with his sword, it was Drona who cut off that sword in twain.

44. Like one heartless, Kritavarman slew the four steeds and the two drivers of Abhimanyu when the latter was involved in a great predicament.

45—46. Then other bowmen slaughtered and felled the son of Subhadra. For trifling offence only, O Krishna, the ruler of the Sindhus was slain by the wielder of the Gandiva bow. O foremost of Yadus, this act did not afford me much delight. If at all it is just for the Pandavas to slaughter their foes,

47. Then, I think, Drona and Karna should have been slain ere now. O foremost of men, they are the cause of all our miseries.

48. Getting these two for his supporter in battle, Suyodhana has become confident of his success. Indeed it was Drona or the son of Suta, with his followers who deserved to be slain.

49. The mighty armed Dhananjaya slew the king of the Sindhus, who indeed, was the remote cause of the slaughter of Abhimanyu. It is surely my imperative duty to crush the son of Suta.

50. Therefore, O hero, I will fight for compassing the death of Suta's son. The mighty-armed Bhima has already engaged himself with the division of Drona,"

51. Having thus spoken, king Yudhisthira quickly advanced against Karna stretching his mighty bow and blowing his dreadful conch.

52. Then with one thousand cars, three hundred elephants, five thousand horses and the Panchalas and the Pravadrakas,

53. Sikhandin quickly followed the king from behind. Then the drums were beat and conchs blown by the

54. Panchalas and Pandavas who were proceeding in Yudhisthira's van. Thereupon the mighty armed Vasudeva addressing Dhananjaya said :—

55. "Lo! under the influence of anger does king Yudhisthira advance to battle, impelled by a desire for slaughtering Suta's son. It is not proper that you should throughly rely on him in this encounter."

56. Having thus spoken, Hrisikesha urged the steeds to the best of their speed and he then followed behind the king, who had already advanced a long way.

57. At that moment, beholding the very virtuous king Yudhisthira proceed with impetuousity for bringing about the slaughter of Suta's son, Vyasa approached him, and said these words to him who was then burning with the fire of grief and whose reason was clouded by it.

Vyasa said :—

58. Indeed, O king, it is fortunate that Phalguna still lives, although he had several times encountered Karna in battle. It was for compassing the slaughter of Savyasachin, that Karna preserved his Sakti.

59. O foremost of the Bharatas, it is indeed fortunate that till now Jishnu never engaged in any duel with Karna. In that case, each of them, challenging the other, would have discharged their celestial weapons on all sides.

60. Then the weapons of Suta's son would have been destroyed by those of Arjuna. Then sorely distressed the former surely would have discharged the Sakti given him by Vasava at the latter, O Yudhisthira.

61. In that case, O foremost of the Bharatas, a dreadful catastrophe would have overtaken you. O bestower of honor, it is indeed fortunate that the Rakshasa has been slain (with that Sakti) in battle.

62. Death himself has slain the Rakshasa and the fatal Sakti of Vasava was only the instrument. O sire, it is for your good that he has been slain in battle.

63. Do not give way to wrath, O foremost of the Bharatas, and set not your heart on sorrow. O Yudhisthira, this is the finale of all animate beings in this world.

64. United with your brother and the other high souled rulers of earth do you, O descendant of the Bharatas, give battle to the Kouravas.

65. On the fifth day, the earth will fall under your sway. O foremost of men, meditate on virtue.

66. With a delightfuf heart do you ever practise harmlessness, ascetic austerities, charity, forbearance and truth, O son of Pandu. Victory ever follows in the wake of righteousness." Having thus spoken to Pandu's son, Vyasa disappeared then and there.

Thus ends the one hundred eighty fourth chapter, the words of Vyasa, in the Ghatotkacha-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXV.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA).

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus spoken to by Vyasa the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, endued with heroism, desisted himself from slaughtering Karna, O foremost of the Bharatas.

2. Upon the slaughter of Ghatotkacha during that night by Suta's son Karna, king Yudhisthira was overwhelmed with grief and wrath.

3. Then beholding your vast host resisted by Bhima himself, he, addressing Dhistadyumna said, 'Hold the pat-born Drona in check.'

4. O afflicter of your foes, it was for the express purpose of slaying Drona, that you sprang out of fire, armed with a bow and arrows and a sword and cased in a coat of mail.

5. Cheerfully assail Drona in battle. You have nothing to be afraid of. Let also Janamejaya, Sikhandin and Durmukha's son and Jasadhara,

6. Wrathfully assail the pot-born Drona from all sides. Nakula and Sahadeva, the son of Draupadi and the Pravadrakas,

7. And Drupada and Virata accompanied by their sons and brothers, and Satyaki and the Kekayas, the Pandavas and Dhananjaya,

8. Let, all these inspired with the desire for achieving the slaughter of Bharadwaja's son, assail him from all sides. So also, let all the other car-warriors, and elephant riders and horsemen,

9. And foot soldiers strive to overthrow that mighty car-warrior Drona in battle." Thus commanded by the illustrious son of Pandu (Yudhisthira),

10. Assailed the pot-born Drona with a view to defeat him. Then as the Pandavas rushed with great impetuousity and force,

11. Drona, that foremost of all weilders of weapons, received them (duly) in battle. Thereupon king Duryodhana with all efforts, assailed the Pandavas excited as he was with rage, and solicitous of protecting Drona's life. Then ensued the battle between the troops of the Kurus and the Pandavas whose animals were exhausted as they challenged one another furiously. Deprived of sleep and fatigued in battle, O mighty monarch,

14. The mighty car-warriors knew not what to do. That night consisting of three Yamas, hedious and dreadful,

15. And destructive of many lives, appeared to them to consist of a thousand Yamas. While they were being thus slain and mangled by one another,

16. And while their eyes were being closed in sleep, mid-night set in. Then every one became depressed and their spirits became low.

17. Your troops as well as those of the enemy had their supply of weapons exhausted by that time. Passing the time thus the combatants, of both the armies, endued with modesty and energy,

18. And observant of the duties of their order, did not desert their divisions. Others again, oppressed with sleep, left their weapons aside and laid themselves down on the field.

19. Oppressed with sleep, some again laid themselves down on the back of elephants, or ou that of horses or on their chariots, O Bharata, and O foremost of men, they were deprived of all moving powers.

20. Other warriors, that were awake in that battle, despatched these to Yama's abode; others again, deprived of their senses in sleep and dreaming, slew their own comrades as also their opponents, regarding every one as their foes. Indeed they fought on in that fierce battle uttering dreadful exclamations.

22. Many again of our army, thinking that they should continue to fight with the foe, stood, O king, on the field of battle although their eyes were heavy with sleep.

23. Some heroic warriors, during that hour of darkness, though blind with sleep, yet gliding along the field, slew one another in that battle.

24. Many of the enemy, entirely confounded in sleep, were slain without being conscious of the strokes that put an end to their existence.

25. Then, O foremost of men, beholding this plight of the soldiers, Vibhatsu exclaiming to the top of his voice, said these words.

26. "You all are fatigued and oppressed with drowsiness; and your animals also are so. Both the armes are enveloped with darkness and clouds of dust.

27. O soldiers, if you like you may desist from the fight. Close your eyes, here on the field, only for a moment.

28. Then when the moon arises ye Kurus and the Pandavas, having taken rest and shaken off your fatigue, you may again meet one another in battle for securing paradise."

29. Hearing these word of the virtuous Arjuna, the pious warriors of the Kuru army agreed to follow up the former's suggestion, and addressing one another,

30. Loudly said—"O Karna, O king, Duryodhana, desist from fighting. The Pandava host has ceased to strike us."

31. Then, O Bharata, when Arjuna loudly uttered those words the Pandavs and your troop desisted from the fight.

32. Those generous words of the illustrious Arjuna were highly applauded by the Rishis, the celestials and the highly delighted soldiers.

33. Then applauding those noble words of Arjuna, O Bharata, O foremost of men, the fatigued troop laid themselves down only for a moment.

34. Then that army of yours, O Bharata, joyful at the prespect of sleep and rest, sincerely blessed Arjuna saying ;—

35. "In you there are the knowledge of the Vedas and the weapons. In you there are intelligence and might. In you there are virtue, compassion for all creatures, O mighty-armed and sinless one.

36. As we have been comforted by you, we wish you well, O Partha. May you reap prosperity soon and may you get, O brave hero, those objects and that are dear to your heart.

37. Thus, O foremost of men, those mighty car-warriors, while praising Partha, thus were stupified by sleep and soon became silent, O ruler of men.

38. Some laid themselves down on the back of horses, some on the elephants, some on the car-terraces, and some on the bare earth only.

39. Other soldiers, well-armed, and with maces, swords, axes and lances in grasp and covered with coats of mail, laid themselves down separately.

40. Elephants, having trunks resembling the tapering bodies of serpents and adorned with the dust of the field, oppressed with sleep, began to make the earth's surface cool with breaths.

41. The elephants, as they breathed on the ground, appeared beautiful like mountains (scattered over the field of battle) on which mighty serpents hissed.

42. Steeds, in trappings of gold and with manes flowing down their yokes, began to paw and make the ground uneven with their hoops.

43. Thus O foremost of kings, every body slept there with the animal he rode. Steeds and elephants and soldiers, O foremost of the Bharatas,

44. Exhausted with exertion, slept on the field desisting from the battle. That sleeping host, deprived of senses and plunged in sleep, appeared beautiful like a charming picture painted on canvas by a skilful artist.

45. Then those Kshatriyas all youthful and graced with earings, mangled with one another's shaft-wounds, lying down on the back of elephants slept as if lying on the breasts of beautiful ladies.

46. Then the moon, that delighter of the eye and lord of the lilies of hue white as the cheeks of a youthful damsel, rose beautifying the quarter presided over by Indra himself.

47. Indeed like a lion of the Udaya mountain with beams constituting his manes of glittering yellow, he issued out of his cave in the east, dispelling the palpable darkness of night, resembling a large herd of elephants.

48. That lover of all lilies, bright as the body of Mahadeva's excellent bull, full-arched and radiant as the bow of cupid and delightful and charming as the smile on the lips of bashful bride shone in the sky.

49. Soon that Divine Lord having the hare for his emblem showed himsel reddish, shedding brighter beams around.

50. After this, the moon seemed to spread gradually a bright halo of far-reaching light that resembled the glamour of gold.

51. Then the rays of that lustrous orb, dispelling the gloom of night gradually spread themselves on the earth, the welkin and the directions of the compass.

52. Then within a moment the world was flooded with a stream of light and the palpable envelop of gloom soon fled away.

53. When the world was illumined almost to the light of day, O king, some of the night-rangers began to rove about whilst others desisted from doing so.

54. Then, O king, all the troops were awakened by the beams of the moon like lotuses blown by the rays of the sun.

55. Just as the ocean swells in consequence of the rising of the moon so that ocean of troops swelled at the rising of the moon.

56. Thereupon, O ruler of men, once more the battle between men desirous of getting heaven raged, a battle that was destructive of the world of creatures.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-fifth chapter the sleep of the soldiers in the Drona-budha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA) – Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then king Duryodhana, under the influence of anger, approched Drona and addressing him said these word for inspiring him with delight and wrath simultaniously.

Duryodhana said :—

2. No quarter should have been granted to our enemies when they were depressed at heart and exhausted with fatigue, and taking rest, especially as they are ever of sure aim.

3. That we showed them mercy was only from a desire for pleasing you. The fatigued Pandavas, however, have now (after taking rest) become stronger.

4. We, on the other hand, are becoming reduced in might and in energy, while the Pandavas, spared by you, are again and again gaining strength.

5. All weapons of celestial workmanship and all Brahma weapons are known perfectly to you.

6. Neither the Pandavas, nor ourselves nor any other bowman of the world are equal to you in battle. This I tell you truly.

7. Conversant with all kinds of weapons O foremost of regenerate ones, you are competent enough to slay with your celestial weapons, the gods, the Asuras, the Gandharvas and all this world.

8. The Pandavas are all afraid of you. Yet you always forgive them, remembering perhaps that they are your disciples, or owing to my unfortunate luck."

Sanjaya said :—

9. Thus repremanded and incited by your son, Drona, O monarch, wrathfully addressed Duryodhana saying :—

10—11. "Although I am advanced in years, yet, O Duryodhana, I am fiighting in battle to the best of my abilities. All these men are versed in the use of weapons; I am however well-versed in them. If from desire of victory, I slay these men, there can be no more impious act for me to do. However, what is in your heart, be it good or bad,

12—13. I shall accomplish, O foremost of the Kurus, at your behest. It will not be otherwise. Putting forth my prowess in battle and slaying all the Panchalas I will put off my coat of mail, O monarch. I swear this to you for sooth. You think that Kunti's son Arjuna was exhausted in battle.

14—15. O mighty-armed Kourava, listen to what I say regarding his prowess. If Savyasachin's anger is excited, neither the Gandharvas nor the Yakshas, nor the Rakshasas can venture to oppose him. On the occasion of the burning of the Khandava forest, he fought with the chief of the gods himself.

16. With his arrows, the high-souled Arjuna then worsted the pouring Indra. Yakshas and the Nagas and the Daityas and other creatures,

17. Proud of their strength, were then slain by that foremost of men. This also you know. On the occasion of the numbering of cattle, the Gandharvas, headed by Chitrasena and others, were defeated by him.

18. You also were set free from the bondage to the Gandharvas by that resolute bowman. The Nivatakavachas, and other enemies of the gods,

19. Unslayable by the gods themselves in battle, were also vanquished by that hero. Thousands of Danavas dwelling in the golden city,

20. Were defeated by that foremost of men. How is it possible for other men to resist him in battle? You have also seen with your own eyes, O king, how this host of yours, though striving hard, is destroyed by the son of Pandu, O ruler of men!

Sanjaya said :—

21. Thereupon, your son, O king highly enraged, once more thus addressed Drona who had been praising Arjuna then.

22. "Dividing this Bharata army in two, to-day, myself, Dussasana, Karna and my uncle Sakuni will slay Arjuna in battle."

23. Hearing those words of his, the son of Bharadwaja, as if smiling, quickly turned round and said, "Good befall you!"

24. What presumptuous Kshatriya would venture to destroy that foremost of the Kshatriyas viz., the wielder of the Gandiva bow, who never suffers any reduction and who ever burns in his own effulgence?

25. When furnished with weapons, neither the Lord of wealth, nor Indra nor Yama, nor Varuna, nor the Asuras nor the Rakshasas, will be able to defeat him?

26. What you have spoken, O Bharata, is worthy of a fool only. Who ever returns safely to his own home, after having encountered Arjuna in battle?

27. Suspicious of everybody, you are cruel and of sinful purposes. You rebuke even those who are engaged in doing you good.

28. Go yourself to resist the son of Kunti, at your own risk. You are well-born and a Kshatriya too; you are again desirous of battle.

29. Why then do you cause the ruin of all these other un-offending Kshatriyas? You are the root of this hostility, so, do you yourself encounter Arjuna.

30. Here indeed is your sagacious uncle, ever devoted to the performance of the Kshatriya duties. O son of Ghandhari, let this one, addicted to deceitful gambling at dice, meet Arjuna in battle.

31. Expert in the game of dice, crooked, fond of gambling and wily and deceitful —this gamester addicted to deception will surely vanquish the Pandavas in battle!

32. Accompanied by Karna and delightful you used to brag always, out of your foolishness, within Dhristarastra's hearing, with these empty words :—

33. 'O Sire, myself, Karna, and my brother Dussassan, united in battle, shall slay the sons of Pandu!"

34. This brag of yours was heard in every assemblage of the court. Now with their help fulfil your vow and be true to your words.

35. Yonder stand your fierce enemies, the sons of Pandu, prepared to fight to the last. Do now what should be done by a Kshatriya. It is better that you die rather than suffer defeat.

36. You have been charitable and enjoyed edibles to your heart's content. You have acquired wealth to your heart's content, you have accomplished all that one should do. You are debtless. Be not afraid. Encounter the son of Pandu in battle."

37. Having thus spoken Drona desisted from fighting. Then the Bharata troops were divided in twain and the battle commenced.

Thus ends the one hundred eighty-sixth chapter, the division of the troop, in the Drona Badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When three fourths of the night had passed away, O ruler of men, once more the battle, between the delighted Kurus and Pandavas, commenced.

2. Soon after Arjuna (the sun's charioteer) robbing the effulgence of the moon, appeared on the sky, spreading a coppery hue over it.

3. The eastern quarter was soon rendered crimson by the myriad rays of the sun, and the solar disc looked like a circle of gold.

4. Thereupon all the warriors of the Kuru and Pandava hosts, descending from their chariots, steeds, elephants and vehecles borne by men, turned their faces towards the sun, and with folded palms uttered the Sandhya (prayers of the first twilight).

5. The host of the Kauravas having been divided into two parts, Drona, having Duryodhana in front of him, advanced (supported by one of this divisions) against the Somakas, the Panchalas, and the Pandavas.

6. Then beholding the Kuru army divided in twain, the scion of Madhu's race, Krishna addressing Arjuna said :—"Keeping the other division of the enemy to your left, place Drona's division to your right."

7. Obedient to the counsel of Madhava, regarding everything about the Kurus, Dhananjaya wheeled round so as to keep Drona and Karna, those two mighty bowmen, to his right.

8. Then seeing through the purposes of Krishna, that subduer of hostile cities viz., Bhimasena, addressing Arjuna then stationed at the van of the troop, said these words.

Bhimasena said :—

9. Ho, Arjuna, Arjuna, O Vibhatsu, hear these words of mine ! The hour, for the realisation of that object for which Kshatriya ladies bring forth their sons, has now arrived.

10. If at this opportune season you do not exert yourself to attain good, then you shall act meanly like a perfect wretch.

11. With the assistance of might do you, to-day, pay off your debt to Prosperity and Fame ! O foremost of warriors, penetrate into this army and keep this to your right.

Sanjaya said :—

12. Thus urged on by Bhima and Kesava, Savyasachin, disregarding Karna and Drona, began to resist the foe on all sides.

15. Then as that puissant one advanced at the head of battle, leaving the foremost of Kashatriyas, these last, putting forth all their prowess,

14. Could not check him even as men can not check the raging conflagration. Thereupon Duryodhana, Karna and Suvala's son Sakuni,

15. Began to shower thousands of arrows on Kunti's son Arjuna. That foremost of all, versed in excellent weapons, baffling all the weapons hurled by his opponents, poured on them, O foremost of kings, a veritable shower of arrows. Of controlled senses, and endued with great lightness of hand, he repulsed the weapons shot at him by those of his own.

17. Then he pierced each of his foes with ten sharp shafts. The welkin was shrouded in a cloud of dust, and showers of arrows fell thick.

18. Impenetrable darkness set in, and dreadful tumult prevailed on the field of battle. When such was the condition of things, neither the sky nor the earth, nor the points of the compass, were recognised.

19. Confounded with the dust the troops became blind. Neither the foe, O monarch, nor we could distinguish one another.

20—23. For this reason, the royal combatants fought on guided by conjecture and the challenges they uttered. Destitute of chariots, the car-warriors, O monarch, encountering one another, lost all order, and became a confounded mass. Their horses slain and charioteer killed, many, becoming incapacitated, saved their lives and looked highly frightened. Staughtered steeds, with their riders slain, were seen to lie over elephants as if prostrate on mountain tops. Then Drona, moving towards the northern quarter of the field,

24. Stood like fire free from smoke. Then beholding him move away from the field (towards the North),

25. O ruler of men, the Pandava troops began to tremble. Beholding Drona exceedingly handsome, and attended with prosperity and burning in his own effulgence, the soldiers of the enemy were affrighted, depressed and routed, O Bharata.—Challenging the hostile host as he stood, like an infuriate elephant in rut,

27. None ventured to conquer him even as the Danavas could not conquer Vasava. Some were depressed at heart and some intelligent warriors became inspired with rage.

28. Some were filled with wonder and some could not bear him. Some rubbed their hands.

29. Others, overwhelmed with rage, began to bite their lips, with their teeth

Others began to hurl missiles at him and others to rule their arms.

30. Other warriors, of controlled passions and great might, fell upon Drona. Specially the Panchalas, though afflicted with the shafts of Drona,

31. And suffering extreme pain, O king, fought on with Drona. Thereafter Virata and Drupada, both rushed against Drona in battle,

32. Who, invincible as he was in battle, was roving freely on the field. Then O ruler of men, the grandsons of Drupada, in three number,

33. And the Chedis, all fierce bowmen, assailed Drona in battle. Of those three grandsons of Drupada, with sharp arrows,

34. Three in number Drona robbed the vital breaths, whereupon they fell down dead on the ground. Thereafter Drona vanquished in battle, the Chedis the Kaikayas and the Srinjayas.

35. That mighty car-warrior the son of Bharadwaja then also conquered the Matsyas. Thereafter Drupada, worked up with rage, poured a shower of arrows,

36. On Drona, O mighty monarch. Virata also did so in that battle. Then that crusher of foes, viz., Drona, destroying that shower of arrows,

37. Covered the two, Drupada and Virata with his own arrows. Thus covered by Drona and inflamed with wrath at the head of battle,

38. Those two heroes began to afflict Drona wrathfully in that battle. O mighty monarch, therefore, Drona filled with rage and fury,

39. Cut off the bows of them both with a couple of broad headed shafts of great sharpness. Thereupon, filled with rage, Virata hurled ten tomaras,

40—41. As also ten shafts at Drona, with a view to encompass his slaughter. Draupada also, equally enraged, hurled at the car of Drona, a dreadful dart made wholly of iron and decked with gold and effulgent like the body of a excellent snake. Then cutting off with a well-sharpened valla those tomaras,

42. Drona cut off the dart adorned with gold and lapises shot at him with his own arrows. Then that crusher of foes, viz., Drona with a couple of well-tempered valla,

43. Despatched both Drupada and Virata to the region of Death. Upon the slaughter of Virata and Drupada and the Kaikayas also,

44. As also the Chedis and the Panchalas and the Matsyas, and upon the slaughter of the three heroic grandsons of Drupada,

45. And beholding these cruel deeds accomplished by Drona, the high-souled Dhristadyumna, filled with rage and grief, swore amidst the car-warriors saying :—

46. "Let that man lose the merits of his Istha, Purth, Kshatra and Brahmanya, whom Drona shall escape or shall defeat in battle."

47. Thus having sworn in the midst of all bowmen, that slayer of foes, viz., the Panchala prince rushed upon Drona, supported by his own division.

48. The Panchalas attacked Drona from one side whilst the Pandavas attacked him from the other. Then Duryodhana, Karna, Suvala's son Sakuni, 49—50. And his other principal uterine brothers began to protect Drona in battle. Then the Panchalas, though striving hard, could not even look at Drona who was then being thus protected in battle by those high-souled warriors. Therereupon, O sire, Bhimasena became enraged with Dhistadyumna and then addressed that foremost of men in these harsh words.

Bhimasena said :—

51. What man is there who, being regarded as a Kshatriya and who being born in the Dynasty of Drupada, and who being foremost of all men possessing knowledge of weapons, would only thus passively look at his foe, stationed before him ?

52. What person, having seen his father and son slain by his foes and having also sworn such a terrible oath in the assemblage of kings, would thus suffer his foe to stand before him ?

53. Yonder stands Drona like a fire swelling with its own energy ; indeed with bow and arrows constituting fuel he is consuming all the Kshatriyas with his energy.

54. Soon will he completely destroy the Pandava army ; stand here passively as spectators of the feat I am going to perform ; I will myself assail Drona."

Sanjaya said :—

55. Having thus spoken, Vrikodara, worked up with rage, penetrated into Drona's division ; and he then routed your troops with arrows shot from his bow drawn to the fullest stretch.

56. The Panchala prince Dhristadyumna also, pushing into the heart your mighty troops, approached Drona: whereupon a confused and terrible encounter commenced.

57. We never saw nor heard of such a battle before as, O king, was fought during that hour of sun-rise.

58. O sire, the chariots were then entangled with one another; thousands of of corpses of slain creatures were also seen lying on the field of battle.

59. Some, when going to other parts of the field, were assailed by their foe on the way. Some, in flying away, were wounded on their backs and others on their sides.

60. Thus then that general engagement raged furiously. Soon however the morning sun made its appearance of the sky.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-seventh chapter, the fierce battle in the Dronabadha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sanjaya said.—

1. The warriors then, O monarch, clad as they were in coats of mail, worshipped the sun of thousand rays as he made its appearance on the morning sky.

2. Upon the rise of the thousand-rayed sun of the effulgence of heated gold, and upon the illumination of the world, battle raged anew.

3. The same soldiers, that were engaged with one another before sun rise, once more fought with each other, O Bharata, after the sun rise.

4. Horsemen fought with car-warriors and elephants with horsomen and foot-soldiers with elephants, and horsemen with horsemen, and infantry with infantry.

5. Car-warriors with car-warriors elephants with elephants, horsemen with horse men O foremost of the Bharatas. Sometimes, in a body and sometimes individually, the warriors assailed one another in battle.

6. Having fought hard during the previous night many combatants, worn out with toil and weak with hunger and thirst, lost their senses in a swoon.

7—8. The noise, O foremost of the Bharata race, created by the blowing of conchs, the beat of drums, the roar of elephants and the twang of bows streched with force, reached the very heavens, O monarch. The tumult, made also by running foot-soldiers and falling weapons,

9. And neighing steeds and rattling chariots, and shouting and challenging warriors, became tremendous.

10—11. That tremondous din, momentarily increasing, touched the very heavens. The moans, and groans of pain, uttered by falling and fallen foot-soldiers, and car-warriors and elephants, became exceedingly loud and pitiable as they were heard on the field.

12. When the divisions were intermingled and confused, both sides slew each other and also their own men.

13. Swords, hurled by the hands of heroic warriors upon combatants and elephants, in large heaps, were seen on the field, like cloths on the washing ground.

14. The whizz, of lifted and descending swords, wielded by the arms of heroes, resembled that of clothes thrashed for wash.

15. Then that general engagement, in which the warriors encountered one another with swords and scimitars and lances and battle axes, became extremely terrible.

16—17. The brave warriors then caused a river to flow there towads the region of the departed; the blood of elephants and steeds and human beings constituted its currents. Weapons constituted the large number of fish it contained. Its mire was made of blood and flesh. Wails of grief and pain constituted its murmuring sound. Banners and cloths constituted its foam.

18. Afflicted with shafts and arrows, tired with fatigue, worn out with exertion of the previous night and robbed of their strength, elephants, and horses, stood on the field utterly incapable of moving their limbs.

19. Heroes, with pale countenances, and with heads graced with charming ear-rings, and armed with the implements of war, appeared extremely resplendent.

20. On the field infested with carnivarous animals and obstructed with the dead and the dying there was no space for the cars to move.

21. The wheels of cars being thus entangled, the steeds, yoked thereto, with great effort dragged them although they were tired and trembling and afflicted with arrows.

22—23. Those steeds moreover were of good breed and were endued with mettle and strength and resembled elephants in size. Then the Bharata troops, resembling the ocean for its vastness, became affrighted and terribly agitated, save and except Drona and Arjuna. They both then became the refuge and the protectors of the warriors of their respective sides.

24. Meeting them both their opponents went to the regions of Death. Then the mighty host of the Kurus became greatly agitated.

25. And the Panchalas being intermingled with them, none could be distinguished. During the progress of that terrible carnage of the Kshatriyas on that field of battle, enhancing the fear of the cowards, and resembling a crematorium, neither Karna, nor Drona, nor Arjuna, nor Yudhisthira

27. Nor Bhimasena, nor the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, nor the Panchala prince, nor Satyaki nor Dussasana, nor Drona's son, nor Duryodhana, nor Suvala's son,

28. Nor Kripa nor the ruler of the Madras, nor Kritavarman, nor others, nor my own self, nor the earth, nor the different quarters of heaven,

29. Could be discerned, O king, in consequence of all of them being mingled with troop and covered by clouds of dust. During the progress of that dreadful and fierce battle, when that dust-cloud arose,

30. Every body thought that night had once more set in. Neither the Kouravas, nor the Panchalas, nor the Pandavas could be distinguished,

31—33. Nor the quarters of heaven, nor the welkin, nor the earth, nor the undulations of land. The warriors, impelled by the thought of victory, slew friends and foes indiscriminately, in fact all whom they percieved by their touch. The dust that had arisen was very soon driven away by the winds that began to blow then, and it was quenched by the blood that shed profusely. Elephants, steeds, car-warriors and foot-soldiers,

34—35. Steeped in blood, appeared beautiful like the celestial forest of the Parijata flowers. Thereafter Duryodhana, Karna, Drona and Dussasana engaged in battle with four Pandava warriors. Duryodhana and his brothers encountered the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva).

36. Radha's son encountered Vrikodara, and Arjuna engaged with the son of Bharadwaja. All the soldiers then began to look on those marvellous and terrible encounters from all sides.

37—38. The car-warriors of both sides, beheld that wonderful battle, that superhuman engagement between those furious and excellent car-warriors all versed in the different modes of war, mounted on their respective chariots, that moved in various charming motions. Possessed of great prowess, exerting their best, and each anxious to defeat the other,

39. They then poured on each other showers of shafts, like clouds pouring rain at the end of summer. Those foremost of men, mounted on their cars of solar effulgence,

40. Appeared beautiful like vast masses of clouds in the autumnal sky. Then those warriors, O mighty-monarch, inspired with rage, and thought of rivenge,

41. All proud and mighty bowmen, putting forth their greatest effort, rushed upon one another, like infuriate leaders of the herds of elephants.

42. Indeed, O king, coporeal creatures do not forsake their corpus, untill the proper hour comes, inasmuch as, O monarch, all those mighty car-warriors, though fighting hard, were not slain all together.

43. With lopped-off arms and legs, with heads graced with charming ear-rings, with bows and arrows, and lances, and swords and axes and Pattises,

44. With Nalikas, Kshàras, Narachas, nails, darts and Tomaras, with diverse other kinds of excellent weapons, of various shapes and well-cleansed,

45. With wonderful cuirasses of different shapes, with charming chariots shattered, with slain horses and elephants,

46. With brave combatants slain, with standless and warriorless chariots looking like large cities, with vehicles dragged hither and thither by affrighted steeds having none to restrain them,

47. In speed more than that of the wind, with countless warriors adorned with ornaments, with fans, with coats of mail, with overthrown standards,

48. With umbrellas, with ornaments, garments, and perfumeries, with chains, and diadems, and crowns and headgears' and with tinkling bells,

49. With jewels that had adorned the breast of heroes with Niskhas and with jewels that had decorated the crowns of combatants, the field of battle, strewn over, looked resplendent like the star-bespangled firmament.

50. Thereafter an encounter took place between Duryodhana and Nakula when both were filled with feelings of wrath and revenge.

51. Then the son of Madri, delightfully shooting hundreds of shafts, kept your son on his right side. At this, loud sounds of applause arose there.

52. Though placed on the right by his enraged cousin, your son, inflamed with rage, began to resist him from even from that disadvantageous position of his.

53. Your son the king Duryodhana then began to fight wonderfully, O mighty monarch. Then as your son endeavoured to counteract Nakula even from his sight.

54. The latter (Nakula), endued with energy and versed in the diverse courses of a chariot, restrained your son. But your son again, resisting Nakula on all sides and afflicting him, with his arrowy showers,

55. Compelled Nakula to turn back. Your troops then applauded that feat of your son. Then Nakula, keeping alive the memory of the wrongs inflicted on them by your wicked counsel, addressed your son saying 'Wait wait.'

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-eighth chapter, the battle between Nakula and Duryodhana in the Dronabadha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIX.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Filled with rage, Dussasana then assailed Sahadeva causing the earth to quake with the fierce clash of his chariot.

2. While Dussasana was thus rushing at the son of Madri, that subduer of foes, quickly cut off with a broad-headed shaft, the head, protected with a helmet of the former's charioteer.

3. Owing to the quickness with which the charioteer's head was cut off, neither any one among the troops nor Dussasana himself percieved him to have been decapitated by Sahadeva.

4. The reins being no longer held by any body, the horses ran at their free will. It was only then that Dussasana came to know that his driver had been slain.

5. Himself an expert in managing steeds he restrained his horses; and that foremost of car-warriors then fought on lightly, beautifully and skillfully.

6. Then as he covered dauntlessly on the field that driverless car of his, his friends and foes alike applauded his feat.

7. Sahadeva, however, soon covered Dussasana's steeds with sharp arrows, and these, afflicted with those arrows, began to run away wildly.

8. For holding the reins Dussasana once laid his bow aside, again, for using the bow the took up the reins. (Thus did he then fight).

9. During these opportunities, the son of Madri pierced him with numerous arrows. Then desirous of rescuing your son Karna rushed between those two combatants.

10. Thereupon Vrikodara, with due caution, pierced Karna on the breast and the arms, with three broad-headed shafts shot from a full-drawn bow.

11. Thereupon like a snake struck with a stick Karna wheeled back and covered Bhima by scattering sharp arrows by thousands.

12. Thereupon a tremendous combat commenced between Bhima and the son of Radha. Both the combatants then roared like two bulls and their eyes rolled in fury.

13. Filled with rage, and rushing at one another, they challenged one another furiously. Those two foremost of combatants, in consequence of their being too near each other,

14—15. To use bows and arrows, began to fight with their maces. Then Bhimasena succeeded in crushing Karna's car terraced with his mace; O king, that indeed looked wonderful. Then the puissant son of Radha grasping a mace,

16. Hurled it at Bhima's car. But the latter broke it down with a mace of his own. Thereafter once more Bhima threw with force a heavy mace at the son of Adhiratha.

17. Then Karna struck that mace with numerous shafts furnished with beautiful wings and duly sped and also with other shafts. The mace then was thrown back on Bhima,

18. Being repulsed by the arrows of Karna, like a snake charmed with incantations. At the re-bound of that mace the mighty standard of Bhima,

19. Broke and fell down, and his charioteer, also struck with that mace, became insensible. Thereupon furious in rage, Bhima discharged eight shafts at Karna,

20—22. And his standard and bow and his leathern fence, O Bharata. The mighty Bhimasena, that slayer of hostile heroes, with the greatest heedfulness, cut off with those sharp arrows, O Bharata, the standard, the bow and the leathern fence of Karna's chariot. Thereupon the son of Radha, grasping another tough and gold-decked bow, sped a large number of shafts, and therewith quickly despatched Bhima's steed of the hue of bear and then his two flank protectors.

23. When his chariot was thus rendered useless, that subduer of foes, viz., Bhima, quickly jumped into the chariot of Nakula like a lion leaping upon a mountain crest.

24. Meanwhile Drona and Arjuna, those two foremost of car-warriors, preceptor and pupil, both accomplished in the use of weapons, O monarch, fought on with each other in battle,

25. Confounding the eyes and minds of men with the celerity with which they used their weapons, and the sureness of their aims and the motions of their chariots.

26. Beholding that battle between the preceptor and pupil, of which no equal was seen before, the other warriors desisted from fighting and began to tremble.

27. Then those two heroes, displaying various motions of cars on the field of battle, tried to leave each other to their right.

28. Then seeing their prowess, the warriors were filled with delight. Thereafter a mighty battle raged between Drona and that son of Pandu,

29. Like that, O mighty monarch, between two hawks in the heavens for a piece of meat. Whatever efforts Drona made for conquering the son of Kunti,

30. Were overcome by Arjuna who also strove vigorously. When Drona failed to obtain any advantage over the son of Pandu,

31. Then that foremost of all knowers of weapon, began to invoke into existence, Aindra, Pasupata, Sashtra, Vayavya, and Varuna weapons.

32. But as soon as those weapons issued out of the bow of Drona, Dhananjaya destroyed them quickly. Then Pandu's son duly destroyed all those weapons with his own weapons.

33. Thereafter Drona covered Pritha's son with excellent and celestial shafts. Whatever weapon then he shot at Partha, desirous of obtaining victory,

34. Arjuna destroyed it by due measures. Upon the destruction even of his celestial weapons,

35-36. By Arjuna, Drona applauded him in his mind. Then that afflictor of foes, viz Drona, O Bharata, regarded himself to be superior to all knowers of weapon on earth in consequence of his having Arjuna for his pupil. Thus checked by Pritha's son in the midst of all those high souled warriors,

37. Drona, vigorously striving, cheerfully resisted Arjuna (in his turn) being filled with wonder all the while. Then in the welkin, thousands of celestial and Gandharvas,

38. And sages and hosts of Siddhas, were seen on all sides. Thronged with Apsaras, and Yakshasas and Rakshasas,

39. The welkin once more appeared to be darkened by gathering masses of clouds. An incorporeal voice repeatedly spoke,

40. In praise of Drona and the high-souled son of Pandu. When in consequence of the weapons discharged by Drona and Pirtha's son, all the directions were illumined with their effulgence,

41. The Siddhas and the sages present then said :—"This is neither a human, nor an Asura, nor a Rakshasa, nor a celestial, nor a Gandharva battle ; certainly this is a high Brahma battle ; this encounter is exceedingly charming and greatly wonderful. We have never seen nor heard of its like before.

43. At times the preceptor obtained advantages over the son of Pandu and at times the latter again prevailed over the former. None then was able to mark any difference between them.

44. If Rudra, dividing himself in twain, fights with himself, then an example may be obtained that may match it.

45. In the preceptor there is the knowledge of science. The knowledge of sciences and the means to be applied are in the son of Pandu. Heroism exists in Drona whereas both heroism and might exist in the son of Pandu.

46. None of these two combatants could be resisted by the foe in battle. At their will they can destroy the universe with the gods themselves."

47. Seeing those two foremost of men, O mighty monarch, the visible and invisible creatures said these words.

48. Thereafter, Drona of great intelligence, invoked into existence the Brahma weapon thereby afflicting Partha and the invisible creatures.

49. Thereupon the earth, with its mountains, forests and trees, began to tremble. Conflicting winds began to blow, and the oceans were agitated.

50. When that weapon was raised by high-souled Drona for use, the Kuru and the Pandava troops as also all the other creatures were stricken with panic.

51. Thereupon, O foremost of kings, Pirthas' son, with the other Brahma weapons, destroyed that weapon of Drona, and then all things were again pacified.

52. At last when none of them was able to vanquish his opponent in a single combat, a general engagement commenced between the two hosts, creating a terrible confusion on the field.

53. During the progress of that terrible encounter between Drona and Pandu's son, O king, once more nothing could be distinguished.

54. The firmament being covered with networks of arrows, as if with masses of clouds, no ranger of the air was then seen to course through it.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-ninth chapter, in the fierce fight in the Drona-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXC.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that battle, destructive of men, horses and elephants, thus progressed, O mighty monarch, Dussasana fought on with Dhristadyumna.

2. The latter, then mounted on a golden chariot and afflicted with the arrows of Dussasana, became filled with rage, and began to cover the animals of your son with his own arrows.

3. Then, O mighty monarch, covered with the arrows the car of Prisata's son ; soon did the car of Dussasana, its standard and charioteer became invisible.

4. Then, O foremost of kings, Dussasana, being afflicted with the arrows of Panchalas, could not stay before that illustrious warrior.

5. Thus the son of Prisata, having repulsed Dussasana with his arrows, assailed Drona shooting thousands of shafts as he proceeded.

6. Then Hridika's son Kritavarman, with his three uterine brothers, encountered him and tried to resist him.

7. The twins, Nakula and Sahadeva, those two foremost of men, then protected Dhristadyumna from behind as he rushed upon Drona like a blazing fire.

8. Then all those mighty car-warriors, possessed of strength and inspired with wrath, fell to smite one another, keeping death in their view.

9. Of pure souls, and pure behaviours, O king, those warriors, keeping the hope of paradise before their mind's eye, fought on fairly, impelled by a desire for conquering one another.

10. Of stainless extraction and of spotless deeds, and gifted with keen intelligence those rulers of men, keeping paradise in view, fought on fairly with one another.

11. In that battle there was nothing unfair or nothing against the rules of military science. In that battle, neither Kanies nor Nalikas, nor poisoned arrows nor Vastikas,

12. Nor Suchikopisas, nor those made of the bones of bulls and elephants, nor those having two heads, nor those having rusty beards, nor those that were not straightflying, were used by ony body.

13. All then used straight and pure weapon, and attempted to attain both fame and regions of great blessedness by fighting fairly.

14. Between those four warriors of your army and those three of the Pandava side, the battle, that occurred, was highly terrible, but free from all unfairness.

15. Then Dhristadyumna, very quick in the use of weapons, and beholding those brave and mighty car-warriors of your army, resisted by the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), rushed upon Drona.

16. Resisted by those two foremost of men, those four brave warriors encountered the former like the winds assailing a pair of mountains.

17. Each of the twins,—both mighty car-warriors,—was engaged with a couple of opponents. Meanwhile Dhristadyumna poured showers of arrows on Drona.

18—19. Then seeing the indomitable prince of the Panchalas advance upon Drona, and those warriors of his army engaged with the twins, Duryodhana, O king, rushed to that part of the field, discharging myriads of blood-sucking arrows. Beholding thus Satyaki approach the Kuru king in great speed,

20. Those two foremosts of men, the two scions of the Kuru and Madhu race respectively nearing each other, were filled with the desire for smiting down each other.

21. Recollecting their conduct towards each other in their early days, and reflecting with pleasure on the same, they looked at each other and smiled repeatedly.

22. Then king Duryodhana, blaming his own conduct, addressed his ever dear friend Satyki and said :—

23. Fie on wrath, O friend, and fie on vindictiveness, fie on Kshatriya usage and fie on might and prowess,

24. Inasmuch as you aim weapons at me and I also am directing mine at you, O foremost of the descendants of Sini's race. In the days of childhood, you were dearer to me than my very life and I also was so to you.

25. Alas! all those deeds of boyhood that I recollect of both yourself and mine, become as nothing on the field of battle.

26—27. Alas! impelled by rage and covetousness, we are here to-day for fighting with each other, O scion of the Satwata race." Then O king, Satyaki conversant in the use of great weapons, taking up some sharp arrows smilingly replied to king Duryodhana who was thus speaking to him, "This is no assembly, O prince, nor the house of our preceptor where in days gone by, we sported smiling together."

Duryodhana said :—

28. O foremost of Sini's race, where have those sports of our childhood vanished, and alas, how has this battle come upon us. It appears that the influence of time is irresistible.

29. Urged though we are by a desire for wealth, what use have we of wealth that meeting each other, we now engage in battle, urged by avarice."

Sanjaya said :—

30. Satyaki then replied unto king Duryodhana who had thus spoken :—"That they have to fight even with their preceptors has always been the duty of Kshatriyas.

31. If I am indeed believed of you, O king, slay me without delay. O foremost of the Bharatas, then through your instrumentality I shall be launched upon the regions of the righteous.

32. Bring into play, as soon as possible, all your might and prowess, against myself. This carnage of my friends, I do not wish to behold any longer."

33. Having thus replied to king Duryodhana and said his say, O king, Satyaki dauntlessly and reckless of his life, rushed furiously upon Duryodhana.

34. Beholding him thus advance your son received him. Indeed, O king, your son then poured upon him a veritable shower of arrows.

35. Then ensued a dreadful battle between those two foremost of Kuru's and Madhu's race, that resembled an encounter between a lion and an elephant.

36. Then filled with rage Duryodhana pierced the indomitable Satyaki with numerous keen arrows shot from the bow drawn to its fullest stretch.

37. Satyaki quickly pierced Duryodhana in return with fifty keen shafts in that battle and then with twenty and next with another ten shafts.

38. Then in that battle your son smilingly pierced Satyaki in return with thirty arrows shot from his bow-string drawn back to the ear.

39—40. Discharging then a Kshurapra (razor-headed arrow) he cut off in two, Satyaki's bow with arrows fixed thereon ; Satyaki, thereupon with great lightness of hands, grasped a tougher bow and began to shoot a shower of shafts at your son. As those lines of arrows flew for bringing about Duryodhan's death,

41—42. The latter, O monarch, cut them into pieces, whereupon the troops uttered a loud shout. Then quickly he afflicted Satyaki with seventy three shafts, furnished with golden wings, whetted on stone and shot from a bow drawn to its fullest stretch. Then all these arrows and the bow with shafts thereon,

43—44. Satyaki cut off and covered Duryodhana with a fresh shower of arrows. Thus deeply pierced and afflicted with the shafts of that scion of the Dasarha race, Duryodhana, O mighty monarch, took shelter in another car. Then recovering a little your son once more rushed upon Satyaki,

45—46. Shooting myriads of arrows at the chariot of the latter. Similarly Satyaki discharged arrows at Duryodhana's car ; whereupon, O king, the battle became extremely fierced. Then in consequence of those shafts thus discharged and in consequence of their falling on all sides,

47. Loud clashing sounds arose there, resembling that produced by a raging conflagration consuming a large forest. The surface of the earth was then covered with those thousands of shafts shot by both of them.

48. Clouded therewith, the sky became invisible. Then beholding that foremost of car-warriors, namely, him of Madhu's race, prevail over Duryodhana,

49. Karna quickly advanced to rescue your son. But the mighty Bhimasena did not allow him to do so,

50. And he in his turn assailed Karna, quickly shooting numerous arrows. Thereupon Karna smilingly destroyed all those sharp arrows of Bhima,

51. Cut off his bow and arrows, and wounded his driver with numerous shafts. Thereupon Pandu's son Bhimasena, burning with rage, took up a mace,

52. And therewith crushed the bow, the standard, and the charioteer of his opponent in that battle. That mighty hero also shattered one of the wheels of Karna's car.

53. Then staying on his chariot of which one wheel was broken, Karna did not tremble (in fear) but was as firm as the prince of mountains. That chariot of his which had now only one wheel left was drawn by his horses,

54. Like the single-wheeled car of the Sun borne by the seven celestial steeds. Then not tolerating the feats of Bhimasena Karna fought on with the latter,

55. Using different groups of arrows and diverse kinds of other weapons. Bhimasena similarly worked up with rage, fought on with the son of Suta.

56. When then the battle became thus confused and general, king Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, addressing the foremost of heroes of the Panchalas and the Matsyas said :—

57. "They who are like our lives, they that are our heads,they that are possessed of immense strength,—those foremost of men—are now all engaged with the Dhartarastra hosts.

58. Why are you then standing as if stupified and with you, senses confounded ? Hie there where my warriors are valorously fighting.

59. Keeping in view the duties of the Kshatriya order and dismissing your fears, engage in the battle ; for then conquering or slain, you will obtain desirable ends.

60. If you conquer you may celebrate numerous sacrifices, giving away profuse Dakshina to the Brahmanas : If on the other hand you are slain, then becoming equal to the gods, you will attain regions of blessedness.

61. Urged on by the king in the above manner, those brave and mighty car-warriors engaged on the field, quickly rushed upon Drona, keeping in view the duties of the Kshatriyas.

62. Then the Panchalas, from one side began to assail Drona with their arrows, whilst those headed by Bhima began to check him on the other side.

63. Three of the mighty and war-like sons of Pandu were crooked-minded. They were the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) and Bhimasena. These then addressing Arjuna loudly said :—

64. "Rush, O Arjuna, upon the Kurus and separate them from Drona. Then the Panchalas will be able to slay him easily when he will be deprived of their protection.

65. Thereuqon Pritha's son, all on a sudden attacked the Kourava troops, while Drona too marched against the Panchala troops headed by Dhristadyumna. O Bharata, in that the fifth day of Drona's command, the brave combatants were slaughtered in quick succession.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninetieth chapter, the fierced fight, in the Drona-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then Drona effected a fierce carnage in the ranks of the Panchala troops, like the enraged Sakra causing a great slaughter amongst the Danava troops in days gone by.

2. O mighty monarch, the enemies of Drona. all mighty car-warriors and possessed of great strength, though thus slaughtered by his arrows, did not shrink in fear from him.

3. Then those mighty car-warriors, the Panchalas and the Srinjayas, engaged in that battle, O king, rushed upon Drona's self.

4. Slaughtered with arrows and darts, and trying to encompass Drona on all sides, the yells they uttered were terrible and loud.

5. Then beholding the slaughter of the Panchalas by the high-souled Drona, and seeing his weapons enshroud all sides, the Pandavas became frightened.

6. Beholding the profuse destruction of horses and foot-soldiers in the battle, the Pandava troops, O king, became hopeless regarding their victory.

7. 'Is not Drona that warrior well-versed in the use of excellent weapons going to consume us all, like a raging conflagration consuming a heap of straw at the expiration of the winter season ?

8. None can now even look at him in battle. Knowing the rules of fair combat even Arjuna will not now fight with him." (Even thus did they talk with each other).

9. Then beholding the sons of Kunti dismayed and afflicted by the arrows of Drona the intelligent Kesava ever solicitous of the welfare of the Pandavas, addressed Arjuna thus :—

10. "This foremost of all wielders of bows and arrows is incapable of being vanquished in battle by any one, not excepting the gods with Vasava at their head.

11. When he lays aside his weapons in battle, he may be slain even by men. O you sons of Pandu, abandoning virtue, do you therefore now betake yourself to contrivances for securing victory in battle,

12. Before Drona drawn by horses of golden colours succeeds in slaying us all. I think, if Aswathaman be killed, he will desist from fighting.

13. Let some one among ns therefore tell him that Aswathaman has been slain in the battle,—But O king, Kunti's son Dhananjaya did not accept this advice of Krishna.

14—15. Others approved of it. Yudhisthira accepted it with much reluctance. Then the mighty-armed Bhima, O monarch, slew with his mace, a terrible, prodigious and foe-crushing elephant called Aswathaman belonging to Indravarman the ruler of the Malavas.

16. Then Bhimasena approaching Drona with a little bashfulness began to exclaim to the top of his voice "Aswathaman is slain."

17. The elephant known by the name of Aswathaman having been slain, Bhima spoke of Aswathaman's death. Knowing the true fact in his mind, Bhima then spoke what was false.

18. Drona having heard this very disagreeable words of Bhimasena, and he having reflected upon them in his mind, his limbs as if began to dissolve like sand in water.

19. But knowing fully the prowess of his own son, he soon came to regard that news as false and therefore hearing of his slaughter he did not become unmanned.

20. Soon recovering his senses he became comforted, as he recollected that his son was incapable of being assailed by the enemy.

21. Rushing upon the son of Prishata and impelled by a desire to slay that brave warrior who was destined to be his slayer, he covered the former with thousands of sharp arrows furnished with wings of the Kanka feather.

22. Thereupon twenty thousand illustrious car-warriors of the Panchala clan, covered him, thus careering on the field, with numerous shafts from all sides.

23. O ruler of men, covered as he then was with those arrows, we could not see that mighty car-warrior Drona, even as men cannot see the sun covered when it is with clouds during the rainy season.

24—25. Then blowing off all those arrows of the Panchalas, and with a view to effect the death of these heroic Panchala warriors, the mighty car-warrior Drona, the afflicter of hostile troops, invoked into existence a Brahma weapon. At this time he looked resplendent like a blazing fire without a streak of smoke.

26. Once more the highly puissant son of Bharadwaja was filled with rage and he looked equally resplendent when slaughtering all the Somakas.

27. He then cut off, in that great battle, innumerable heads of Panchala warriors as also their mace-like arms wearing golden ornaments.

28. Thus slaughtered by the son of Bharadwaja the royal warriors then began to fall down on the earth, like so many trees up-rooted by the force of the tempest.

29. Miry with the flesh and blood of all the elephants and horses fallen in the battle, O Bharata, the earth appeared to be impassable.

30. Having slain twenty thousand car-warriors of the Panchalas, Drona stood on the battle-field like a blazing fire free from even a single curl of smoke.

31. Thereafter filled with rage, the puissant son of Bharadwaja, lopped off the head of Vasudana from his trunk, by means of a Valla.

32. He then slew five hundred Matsyas, six thousand Srinjoyas and then again ten thousand elephants and ten thousand steads.

33. Then beholding Drona stay on the field for the extermination of the Kshatriya race, the following Rishis headed by the God of Fire approached him.

34—35. They were, Viswamitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Goutama, Vasistha, Kasyapa and Atri, the Sikatas, the Prisnis, Garga, the Valikhilyas, the Marichipas, the Vrigus, the Angiras, and other mighty sages of subtle forms; these all were desirous of taking Drona to the region of Brahma.

36. All these then addressed Drona, that ornament of battle, in these words:— 'You are fighting wrongly, the hour of your death has come.

37. Cast away your weapons, O Drona, and look at us standing before you. Henceforward it behoves you not to perform cruel acts like these.

38. You are learned in the Vedas and their auxiliaries and devoted to truth and righteousness: specially you are a Brahman, so these acts do not become you.

39. Lay aside your weapons, shake off the pale of error that hangs over you and betake yourself to the eternal path (of virtue). To-day, the days of your earthly habitation have been numbered.

40. You have to-day consumed with your Brahma weapon many men who are ignorant of the use of weapons. This act which you have done is not at all praiseworthy.

41. O Drona, quickly lay your weapons aside in this battle; do not hesitate: O twice-born one, you should not perpetrate such sinful acts any longer."

42. Having heard these words of the sages, as also the words of Bhimasena, and also beholding Dhristadyumna stand before him in battle, Drona was dejected at heart.

43. Burning with grief and extremely pained, he then enquired of king Yudhisthira the son of Kunti whether his son was really slain or not.

44. Drona knew it for certain, that Pritha's son would never tell a lie, not even for the sake of getting the wealth of the three worlds.

45. For that reason, that foremost of the regenerate ones questioned Yudhisthira in exclusion of every body else. Since the days of the latter's boyhood, Drona had hoped to hear truth from him.

46. Meanwhile, O king, Govinda knowing that Drona, that foremost of all combatants, could sweep away the Pandavas off the face of the earth, was very much dejected and then addressing Yudhisthira he said:—

47. "If influenced by rage Drona fights only for half a day, then I tell you truly, your troops are sure to be destroyed.

48. Save us from Drona; under the circumstances as the present falsehood is better than truth. Speaking falsehood for the sake of saving a life one does not become a sinner.

49. There is no sin, if falsehood is spoken to women, in marriages or to save kine or the Brahmanas.

50. When they both were thus speaking with each other, Bhimasena said:—As soon as, O king, I heard of the means by which the illustrious Drona might be slain,

51—52. Putting forth my prowess in battle, I immediately slew a mighty elephant resembling that of Sakra, belonging to Indravarman, the Chief of the Malavas who were standing in your army. I then went to Drona and told him,—'Aswathaman has been slain, O Brahman; desist from fighting.'

53. Indeed, O foremost of men, the preceptor Drona did not believe in the veracity of my assertion; desirous of victory as you are, accept the counsel of Govinda.

54. O monarch, inform Drona that the son of Caradwat's daughter is dead. Thus spoken by you that foremost of the Brahmanas will cease to fight.

55. O ruler of men, you are well-known in the three worlds for your truthfulness." Having heard these words of Bhima and influenced by the counsel of Krishna,

56. And owing to the inevitability of Fate, O king, Yudhisthira decided to say, what he was called upon to say. Afraid of speaking lies, but anxious to obtain victory, Yudhisthira,

57. Clearly said that Aswathama was dead, adding indistinctly the word elephant after the name Aswathama. Ere now the chariot of Yudhisthira had remained at a height of four fingers' breadth from the earth's surface;

58. After he had uttered that lie his steeds touched the earth. Hearing these words from the lips of Yudhisthira, Drona that mighty car-warrior,

59. Overwhelmed with grief on account of the supposed death of his son, gave way to despair. Hearing the words of the sages, on the other hand, he regarded himself a great offender against the illustrious Pandavas. Now hearing that his son had been slain he became completely senseless, and filled with anxiety at the sight of Dhristadyumna, O monarch, the chastiser of foes was not able to fight as before.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-first chapter, the utterance of the untruth by Yudhisthira, in the Drona-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCII.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then beholding Drona, exceedingly anxious and depressed at heart in consequence of grief, the son of the Panchala king, viz., Dhristadyumna assailed him.

2. That hero had, for the slaughter of Drona, been obtained by Drupada, that ruler of men, at a great sacrifice, from the God of Fire.

3—5. Impelled by the desire of slaying Drona, he grasped a victory-giving and strong bow, of which the twang resembled the rumble of clouds, of which the string was very tough, and which was irrifragible and of celestial make. He then fixed on the bow-string a formidable arrow resembling a snake of virulent poison, and endued with the effulgence of fire. That arrow resembled a fire of fierce tongues, while inside the circle of his bow appeared like the autumnal sun of great splendour within an effulgent circle.

6. Beholding that resplendent bow bent by the son of Prisata, the soldiers considered that the last hour of the world had come.

7. Seeing then that arrow directed at him, the mighty son of Bharadwaja considered that the last day of his corporal existence had arrived.

8. The preceptor then did not endeavour to baffle that shaft, nor did also the celestial weapons of that high-souled hero appear at his command.

9. His weapons had not been exhausted although he had used them for four days and one night ; on the expiration of the third part of the fifth day, his stock of arrows was exhausted.

10. Beholding then the exhaustion of his shafts and pained with grief on account of his son's death, and in consequence also of the reluctance of the celestial weapons to appear at his command,

11. He desired to lay his weapons aside urged to do so by the words of the sages. Though still charged with great energy, he was unable to fight as before.

12. Then taking up another bow of celestial make, presented to him by Angiras, and several arrows resembling the curses of Brahmanas, he went on fighting with Dhristadyumna.

13. Then he covered Dhristadyumna with a thick shower of arrows, and filled with rage began to mangle his vindictive antagonist.

14. Then with his own arrows Drona cut off those of Dhristadyumna in hundred pieces, and then with sharp arrows he felled the standard, the bow and the charioteer of the latter.

15. Thereupon Dhristadyumna smilingly taking up another bow, pierced Drona in return with a sharp arrow in the centre of his breast.

16. Thus deeply pierced the mighty bowman (Drona) seemed a little flurried in that combat. But once more with a keen-edged valla he cut off his opponent's bow.

17. Then indomitable Drona cut off all the weapons, O king, and all the bows of his antagonist, except only his mace and sword.

18. Then, O subduer of foes, filled with rage, he pierced the wrathful Dhristadyumna with nine sharp arrows capable of putting an end to the life of every body,

19. The mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna of immeasurable soul then invoked into existence the Brahma weapon, and thereby caused the horses of his own chariot mix with those of his opponents.

20. Possessed of the fleetness of the wind, those steeds of the crimson and pegion colours, O foremost of the Bharatas, thus mingled together, appeared highly beautiful.

21. Like roaring clouds surcharged with flashes of lightning at the commencement of the rainy season, O mighty monarch, those steeds mingled together appeared highly beautiful.

22. Then that regenerate one of immeasurable soul, destroyed the wheel-joints, the shaft-joints and other car-joints of Dhristadyumna.

23. With his bow cut off, his car rendered useless, his elephants and driver slain and thus involved in a perilous situation that hero began to whirl his mace.

24. Then that truly valiant and mighty car-warrior the enraged Drona, destroyed with his sharp arrows that mace hurled by Dhristadyumna.

25. Beholding that mace of his cut off by Drona by means of his arrows, that foremost of men, that prince of the Panchalas, quickly took up a clean sword and a resplendent shield with its ground decked with hundred moons.

26. Undoubtedly, under these circumstances, the Panchala prince resolved to make an end of that foremost of preceptors, that most illustrious warrior.

27. Then jumping down from the terrace of his chariot and riding on the car-shaft he with his sword and bright shield uplifted, tried to approach the latter seated on his chariot.

28. Then that mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna, out of foolishness, and for achieving a difficult feat, wished to tear open the breast of Bharadwaja's son in battle.

29. Sometimes he stood on the yoke of Drona's car, and sometimes under the haunche's o hifs red steeds. These motions of his were then greatly praised by all the troops.

30. While he thus stood upon the yoke, or underneath the haunches of those red steeds, Drona saw no opportunity for striking him. That indeed appeared wonderful.

31. Then in that battle the movements of both Drona and the son of Prisata resembled those of a hawk flying through the sky in quest of a piece of meat.

32. Thereafter the puissant Drona inflamed with rage, slew one after another the blue-hued steeds of his adversary, and then destroyed his car, with a powerful shaft.

33. The steeds of Dhristadyumna, thus slain fell down on the ground, whereupon the red steeds of Drona himself were set free from the entanglement in the trappings, O ruler of men.

34. Beholding those horses slain by that foremost of regenerate ones, that son of Prisata, that foremost of all warriors, born in virtue of a sacrifice, that mighty car-warrior, did not tolerate it.

35. Then that foremost of swords-men, deprived of his car, took up his sword, and rushed upon Drona, O king, like Vinata swooping down upon a snake, 36, Solicitous of slaying the son of Bharadwaja, O king, his appearance then resembled that of Hari when, in days of yore, he was going to slay the Daitya king Hiranyakasipu.

37. He then coursed in various tracks. Indeed, O foremost of the descendants of Kuru, Prisata's son careering in that battle, dis layed the well-known twenty-one kinds of evolutions.

38—40. Armed with his sword and his buckler in grasp the son of Prisata, wheeled about, whirled his sword in the air, made side thrusts, rushed forward, ran sideways, jumped up, assailed the sides of his foes, fell backwards, ran into close quarters with his enemy, and pressed them hard. Having practised them well he also exhibited the movements, known as Bharata, Kousika, and Satwata, as he coursed in battle for bringing about Drona's death. Beholding those charming movements of Dhristadyumna, as he coursed, armed with shield and sword in battle, 41—42. All the warriors present as also the celestials, were filled with amazement. The twiceborn Drona then discharging a thousand arrows in the press of the battle, cut off Dhristadyumna's sword and shield covered with hundred moons. The arrows that Drona shot in that fight in close quarters were of the length of a span.

43. Those arrows were only to be used in a fight in close quarters. No one else had arrows of that kind, except Saradwata's son Kripa, Arjuna, Ashwathaman and Karna.

44-45. Pradyumna and Yuyudhana possessed such arrows and also Abhimanyu had them. The preceptor then desirous of making an end of his pupil who was to him like his own son, placed on his bow-string, a strong shaft possessed of great violence. Satyaki however cut off that saft with ten arrows of his own.

46. Before the eyes of your son and of Karna of high-soul, he then thus saved Dhristadyumna who was on the point of falling a victim to Drona.

47—49. Thereafter O Bharata, Kesava and Dhananjaya, both of illustrious soul, beheld Satyaki of prowess incapable of being thwarted, in the track of the Kurus, and thus within the range of the shafts of Drona, Karna and Kripa. Then both of them applauded Satyaki of undiminishing fame saying 'excellent excellent,'—him who was then destroying the celestial weapons of all his foes. Then Kesava and Dhananjaya dashed upon the Kourava warriors.

50. Thereafter Dhananjaya addressing Kesava said:—Behold, O Kesava, that perpetuator of Mhdhu's race, sporting amidst the hostile warriors headed by the preceptor and other foremost car-warriors.

51. Truly valiant Satyaki is thereby affording great delight to me, the twins, king Yudhisthira and Bhima.

52. That Satyaki, the enhancer of the glory of the Vrishnis, well-practised in the use of weapons and free from insolence, is thus careering in the midst of the fight, sporting with mighty car-warriors.

53. The Siddhas and the troops filled with delight, are praising him, saying 'excellent, excellent,' as they find that one of the Satwata race invincible. The warriors of both armies are applauding him, O monarch, in consequence of his feats.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-second chapter, the battle between Drona and Dhristadyumna in the Drona-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCIII.

(DRONA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then beholding those feats of that one of the Satwata race, Duryodhana and others, filled with rage, quickly encompassed the grandson of Sini on all sides.

2. Kripa and Karna and your sons, O sire, quickly assailing Sini's grandson in the battle, began to pierce him with sharp arrows.

3. Thereupon king Yudhisthira, the two sons of Madri begotten by Pandu, and the mighty Bhimasena rushed to protect him of the Satwata race.

4. Karna and the son of Gotama, that mighty car-warrior, and Duryodhana and others, then covered Sini's grandson with their shafts,

5. Then fighting, O king, (fearlessly) on with those warriors, that scion of Sini's race checked that awful shower of pouring arrows which had been begun so suddenly.

6. In that great battle, with his various celestial weapons, he duly baffled the celestial weapons of his high-souled opponents, that were aimed at him.

7. The field of battle looked dreadful during the progress of that encounter between royal combatants, and it resembled the scene of the field where in days of yore Rudra, filled with rage, had slaughtered all creatures.

8. Human arms, and heads, and bows, and torn umbrellas and chamaras, O Bharata,

9. Were seen in heaps on that field of battle. With broken-wheeled cars, with fallen arms,

10. And with heroic horsemen lying slain, the earth became impassable. O foremost of the Kurus, the warriors lacerated with the falling shafts,

11. Were seen to roll in various movements on the ground in that great battle. During the progress of that terrible battle resembling that between the Gods and the Asuras in days of yore,

12. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira addressing the Kshatriyas said :—"You mighty car-warriors, rush unitedly upon the pot-born Drona.

13. Yonder is the heroic son of Prisata engaged with the son of Bharadwaja; he is trying to the best of his endeavours to encompass the death of Drona.

14. Judging from the appearances of his mighty battle, it may be inferred that filled with rage the son of Prisata will to-day overthrow in battle the son of Bharadwaja.

15. Therefore do you unitedly rush upon the pot-born Drona. Thus commanded by Yudhisthira, the mighty car-warriors of the Srinjayas,

16—17. Inpelled by a desire for slaying the son of Bharadwaja, assailed him. That mighty car-warrior the son of Bharadwaja, then received those advancing hosts in fury, knowing death to be inevitable. When Drona of unfailing aim thus advanced, the earth began to tremble.

18. Fierce winds began to blow filling the troops of the enemy with fear. Mighty meteors began to drop down, seeming to issue out of the solar disc.

19. In their fall they illumined the welkin, and foreboded great danger. O Sire, the weapons of Bharadwaja's son began to blaze forth.

20. Cars emitted loud clatters, and horses began to shed tears. The mighty car-warrior Drona, that son of Bharadwaja, appeared to be devoid of his energy.

21. His eyes and his left arm began to tremble. And beholding Prisata's son before him, he became cheerless.

22. Then desirous of going to the Posthumous regions of the sages that duly recite the Vedas, he decided to cast his life off in a fair fight.

23. Then the four directions of the compass were covered with the troops of Drupada's son. Consuming hosts of Kshatriyas Droan then carcered on the field of battle.

24. Then that crusher of foes having slain twenty thousand Kshatriyas, slew another hundred thousand with whetted shafts of keen points.

25. Then exerting himself with care he remained in the battle-field, and appeared like a blazing fire without even a curl of smoke. For the destruction of the Kshatriyas, he then grasped the Brahma weapons.

26. Then the self-controlled Bhima beholding the prince of the Panchalas carless and weaponless, quickly rushed to the rescue of that high-souled warrior.

27. Then beholding the prince of the Panchalas strike Drona from a near point Bhima, that subduer of foes, took him up on his car and thus spoke to him :—

28. "Except yourself there is none who can fight with the preceptor in such close quarters ; therefore be quick in compassing his slaughter, inasmuch as the burden rests wholly on you."

29. Thus spoken to by Bhima, the mighty-armed Dhristadyumna, quickly took up a strong and new bow of very superior make and capable of bearing a great strain.

30. Worked up with rage and discharging his arrows in that battle at the indomitable Drona, Dhristadyumna covered the preceptor with arrows with a desire to withstand him.

31. Those two ornaments of battle, those two superior warriors, filled with rage, then resisted one another, and invoked into existence many celestial and Brahma weapons.

32. Then, O mighty monareh, Dhristadyumna covered Drona in that battle with many weapons. Destroying all those weapons of Bharadwaja's son, the prince of the Panchalas,

33. That warrior of unfading renown, began to consume the Vasatis, the Sinis, the Valhikas and the Kurus who were then engaged in protecting Drona.

34. O king, discharging numerous shafts on all sides, Dhristadyumna at that time appeared beautiful like the sun of myriad rays.

35. Drona however once more cut off the prince's bow and pierced the vitals of the prince himself with large number of shafts. Thus wounded the prince was greatly pained.

36. Thereupon Bhima of great fury holding the chariot of Drona, distinctly spoke these words to him :—

37. "If vile Brahmanas dissatisfied with the duties of their own order but versed in the use of weapons, did not fight, then the Kshatriya order would not have become reduced in numerical strength.

38. Sparing life has been declared to be the most excellent of all virtues. The Brahmana is the root of that virtue. You are again the foremost of all men conversant with Brahma.

39—40. Like a Chandala, slaying numerous Mlechchas and diverse other warriors, who however are all engaged in performing the duties of their order, moved to the deed by folly and ignorance, O Brahmana, and by the desire of benefitting your family and son, indeed for the sake of your only son, —indeed slaying all like one ignorant of his duties and disregarding your own avocation why do you not feel ashamed ?

41. He for whose sake you have taken up arms, and for whom you live, he, deprived of life, to-day lies on the field of battle, unknown to you and behind your back.

42. It behoves you not to doubt the words the very virtuous king Yudhisthira has told you. Thus addressed by Bhima, Drona, laid his bow aside.

43. Then desirous of laying all his weapons aside, Bharadwaja's son of illustrious soul, said aloud :—"O Karna, O Karna, O great bowman, O Kripa, O Duryodhana,

44. Exert your best in the battle : this I tell you repeatedly ; may no injury befall you from the Pandavas ; I am going to lay aside my weapons."

45. Having spoken thus, O mighty monarch, Drona began to cry out the name of Aswathaman at the top of his voice ; and laying aside his weapons, he then sat down on the terrace of his car.

46. Then betaking to yoga, he assuredly gave safety to every creature. Taking advantage of that opportunity, Dhristadyumna collected all his energies.

47. Then placing his dreadful bow with arrows fixed on its string on his car, he jumped down from it armed with a sword and then rushed furiously upon Drona.

48. Then men and other creatures beholding Drona on the point of falling a victim to Dhristadyumna, began to utter loud cries of Oh and Alas.

49. They bewailed piteously and they cried alas and oh and said fie. Meanwhile Drona, having laid aside his weapons, was peacefully seated on his car.

50. Having spoken as before, Drona, had betaken to yoga. Endued with great splendour, and possessed of ascetic merit, he had set his heart on that ancient and paramount being viz., Vishnu.

51. Slightly bending down his face, and throwing his breast forward, and shutting his eyes and reposing on the quality of goodness, and directing his mind on meditation,

52. And thinking on the monosyllabic Om representing Brahma, and recollecting the mighty, paramount, and undestructible god of gods, the effulgent Drona of great ascetic merit,

53. The preceptor of the Kurus and the Pandavas, went to heaven, which is so difficult of being attained even by the virtuous. Indeed when Drona proceeded to heaven, it appeared to us that there were two suns in the sky.

54. The whole welkin was ablaze, and appeared to be one vast sheet of equal light when the sun-like Bharadwaja, of solar splendour, proceeded towards heaven.

55. But within an wink of time however, that light disappeared, and then tumultuous noise of the delighted celestials were heard there.

56. When Drona thus ascended to heaven, Dhristadyumna was standing beside him stupified; only we five amongst mortal creatures beheld,

57. The illustrious Drona, lost in yoga and meditation, ascend to the highest regions of blessedness. These five were, myself, Pritha's son Dhananjaya, Aswathaman, the son of Drona, 58—59. Vasudeva of the Vrisni race, and king Yudhisthira the virtuous son of Pandu. All else could not see the halo of glory that surrounded the intelligent son of Bharadwaja as he ascended, rapt up in yoga, to the Brahma regions, which are mysterious even to the gods and which is the highest of all celestial regions.

60—61. In fact all human beings were then unaware of the fact that Drona had attained to the highest mode of existence. None of them could then descry the preceptor, that subduer of foes, ascend to the region of Brahma, devoted to yoga, in company with the best of sages, his body mangled with arrows, and steeped in blood after he had set aside his weapons.

62. Prisata's son meanwhile, though all creatures cried fie on him, yet casting his eyes on the lifeless Drona's head, began to drag it (by the hair.)

63. Then with his sword he lopped that head off the trunk of his foe who remained silent all the while. Then upon the slaughter of Bharadwaja's son, he was filled with delight.

64. Dhristadyumna began to send up loud war-cries whirling his sword all the while in the air. With his hoary locks flowing down his ears, of a dark complexion that old man of eighty-five years,

65. For your sake used to career on the field of battle, like a boy of sixteen. The mighty-armed Dhananjaya, that son of Kunti, had said (before Drona's head was lopped off :—

66. "O son of Drupada, bring the preceptor alive. Do not slay him. He should not be slain, he should not be slain." Even thus did your troops also,

67. Cry out; especially Arjuna had exclaimed aloud melting with compassion for his preceptor. But unmindful of the cries of Arjuna and those of other rulers of the earth,

68—69. O foremost of men, Dhristadyumna slew Drona in the terrace of his own car. Then that indomitable subduer of foes, his body stained with blood, jumped down from the car on the earth, looking red like the (newly-risen) solar disc. Thus the soldiers beheld Drona slain in the battle.

70. Thereafter, O king, that furied bowman Dhristadyumna, threw that large head of Bharadwaja's son at the front ranks of your troops.

71. Then the troops beholding that head of Bharadwaja's son, felt inclined to fly and O king, without much hesitation they took to their heels.

72. Meanwhile Drona proceeding to the heavens entered the stellar path. I only saw the (true circumstances of the) death of Drona,

73—74. Through the grace of the sage Krishna-Dwaipayana, the son of Satyavati. I then beheld that effulgent one proceeding, after his ascension to the sky, like a blazing flame-beam free from even a curl of smoke, flying through the welkin. Upon the slaughter of Drona, the Kurus, the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, all became depressed,

75. And every body fled in great haste. The army then broke away. Many had been slain and many wounded with keen arrows.

76. Upon the death of Drona, your troops appeared to be senseless. Having suffered a defeat and being inspired with fear about the future,

77. The Kurus lost the benefit of this as well as of the next world. Really they lost all self-control. The rulers of earth then searching for the body of Bharadwaja's son,

78. Could not find it out in consequence of the field being covered over with numerous headless trunks. The Pandavas on the other hand, having obtained victory here and prospects of fame in the future,

79. Began to make loud sounds with their arrows and conches, and they uttered tremendous war-cries. Then Bhimasena and Prisata's son Dhristadyumna,

80. Embraced each other in the midst of the Pandava host which looked upon them both. Then that afflicter of foes Bhima addressing Prisata's son said :—

81. "O son of Prisata, I will again embrace your victorious self, when the sinful sons of Suta and Dhritarastra, will be slain in the battle."

82. Having spoken thus much and filled with joy, Pandu's son Bhima, caused the earth to tremble with the sound of his armstrokes.

83. At that sound your troops, panic stricken, began to fly away; and disregarding the duties of Kshatriyas they exerted themselves in flying away.

84. The Pandavas, having obtained victory were transported with joy, O ruler of men; and great was their happiness at the destruction of their foes in battle.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-third chapter, the slaughter of Drona, in the Drona-badha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCIV.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSHA PARVA).

Sanjaya said :—

1. Upon the slaughter of Drona, O king, the Kurus, afflicted with the weapons of their enemies, their foremost warrior slain and themselves confounded—began to indulge copiously in grief.

2. Beholding their enemies then elated with joy and success, they repeatedly trembled in fear. O ruler of men, they were panic-stricken and depressed and their eyes were filled with tears.

3. They were distracted (with sorrow), their courage gone, and themselves reduced in splendour under the burden of grief. Uttering piteous wails, they then surrounded your son.

4. Covered with dust, trembling (in every limbs), gazing (vacantly) at the ten points of the compass, their eyes flooded with tears, they looked like the Daityas upon the fall of Hiranyaksha in days of yore.

5. Surrounded by those panic-stricken troops of his, who then looked like puny animals, your son could not stay on the field and went away from it.

6. Those warriors of yours, O Bharata, worn out with hunger and thirst, and scorched by the burning rays of the sun were exceedingly dejected.

7—8. Beholding that unthought-of overthrow of Bharadwaja's son, that was like the falling of the sun on the earth, or the drying up of the ocean, or the transplantation of the Meru mountain, or the defeat of Vasava himself, your troops, O king, began to fly away, panic lending speed to their legs.

9. Beholding him of the golden car slain, Sakuni the king of the Ghandharas, with his terrified and affrighted followers fled in all haste.

10. Taking with him his numerous divisions that were flying with all their standards, Suta's son also, out of fear, fled away.

11. The ruler of the Madras viz Salya gathering together his divisions abounding in cars, elephants and steeds, and looking vacantly on all sides, fled away, out of fear.

12. Kripa the son of Saradwata also fled,—saying Alas, Alas, and taking with him his divisions consisting mostly of elephants and infantry, of which the greater part had been slaughtered.

13. Kritavarman, surrounded by the Voja division and the remnants of the Kalingas, Asratta and Valhikas, fled away borne by his swift steeds.

14. Beholding Drona slain, Uluka, filled with fear and with his infantry divisions, fled away in great speed.

15. Handsome, youthful in years and well-known for his bravery, Dussassana inspired with great fear, fled away being surrounded by his elephant division.

16. Beholding Drona overthrown Brishasena fled in haste, taking away with him ten thousand chariots and three thousand tusked elephants.

17. Your son the mighty car-warrior Duryodhana also, O king, then fled from the field attended by cars, elephants and steeds and surrounded by foot-soldiers.

18. Beholding Drona overthrown, O king, Susarman fled away, taking with him the remnants of the Samsaptakas, slain by the diadem-decked Arjuna.

19. Beholding him of the golden car slain, men began to fly on all sides, riding on their elephants and cars and urging on their steeds.

20. Some urging on their sires, others their brothers and others their uncles, and others their sons and other companions, the Kurus fled away in haste.

21. Some exhorting their troops to make haste and others their nephews and other kinsmen, fled away in all directions.

22. Their hair dishevelled and their accoutrements falling off, no two persons were seen to fly together; their courage gone and their splendour destroyed, men then thought that the Kuru army was completely annihilated.

23. Others among your troops fled, O lord, throwing off their coats of mail. O foremost of the Bharatas, then your troops addressing one another loudly said :—

24. "Wait, Wait"; but none of them who thus spoke remained a moment on the field. Abandoning their vehicles and chariots decked with ornaments,

25. Warriors, mounting on the steeds or using their legs, fled in all possible haste.

While the troops, with their splendour lost and filled with fear, were thus flying away,

26. Only Drona's son Aswathaman advanced towards the foe, like a huge alligator swiming against the current. He had recently fought a terrible fight with the hostile division headed by Sikhandin,

27. As also with the Prabhadrakas the Panchalas and the Chedis accompanied by the Kekayas. Having slain numerous indomitable troops of the Pandavas,

28. And with difficulty extricating himself from his perilous situation, that one of the gait of an infuriated elephant, beholding the troops flying away,

29. Approached Duryodhana; and then that son of Drona said these words to the latter:—"Why O Bharata, are the troops flying away, as if in fear?

30. Why, O king, do you not try to rally them when they are thus flying away? O ruler of men, you also are not in your usual mood.

31. In consequence of the slaughter of what foremost of warriors of your army have the troops been reduced to this plight? O foremoct of the Kurus, tell me all truly.

32. O king, even these divisions headed by Karna and others are not staying on the field. In no previons battle was the army thus broken and routed.

33. O Bharata, has any great catastrophe, O mighty monarch, overtaken your army? Thereafter Duryodhana hearing the words of Drona's son,

34. Hesitated to communicate that most terrible and disagreeable intelligence to him. Your son, that foremost of kings, was then sunk deep in the ocean of grief, even like a splintered boat in the sea.

35. At the sight of Drona's son seated on his chariot, the eyes of the king were flooded with tears. Thereafter, O king, your son suffused with shame, said these words to the son of Saradwata:—

36. "May good betide you. Do you first inform Aswathaman of the cause of this flight of our troops. Thereupon O king, Saradwata's son, repeatedly overwhelmed with sorrow, said to Drona's son how Drona had been slain.

Kripa said:—

37. Ourselves, placing that foremost of car-warriors on earth vis Drona before us, commenced the battle with the Panchalas only.

38. During the progress of the battle the Kurus and the Somakas became mingled together and then challenging one another they mangled one another's body with their weapons.

39. When the battle thus raged and when the Dhartarashtra troops were being reduced in number, your father, filled with rage, invoked into existence a celestial weapon.

40. Then, O foremost of men, Drona using that Brahma weapon, slew his enemies by hundreds and thousands.

41. Impelled forward by Fate the Pandavas, the Kaikayas, the Matsyas and the Panchalas, O foremost of the regenerate ones, approaching the vicinity of Drona's car, were slaughtered (indiscriminately).

42. Then with his Brahma weapon Drona despatched a thousand foremost heroes, and two thousand tusked elephants to the abode of Death.

43. With his hoary locks flowring down to his ears, and of a dark complexion and full eighty-five years of age, Drona then careered on the field with the agility of a boy of sixteen.

44. Their troops fatigued and their king slain, the Panchalas although burning with rage, were compelled to turn back.

45. When the enemy's rank was partly broken and when they were compelled to turn their faces away from the field, that conqueror of foes, exhibiting his celestial weapon, looked beautiful like the rising sun.

46. Penetrating into the centre of the Pandava rank, the puissant hero, your father, shooting his ray-like shafts, became incapable of being looked at like the sun shining in the centre of the heaven.

47. Our enemies, then scorched by Drona who then appeared beautiful like the sun, were reduced in their energy, deprived of courage and depressed at heart.

48. Thereupon the slayer of Madhu ever solicitous of the victory of the Pandavas, beholding the troops afflicted by Drona with his shafts spoke these words:—

49. "This leader of the leaders of car-hosts, this foremost of all wielders of bow is incapable of being vanquished in battle even by the slayer of Vritra himself.

50. Therefore disregarding the rules of fair combat do you strive for the sake of giving victory to the Pandavas, in such a manner that he of the golden car may not slay you all.

51. "I think, he will never fight if he hears that Aswathaman has been slain in battle. Let therefore some one tell him this falsehood that Aswathaman has been slain in battle."

52. These words did not sound agreeable to the ear of Kunti's son Dhananjaya. Others again approved of these words. King Yudhisthira accepted them after much hesitation.

53. Then Bhimasena suffused with blashes of shame said to your father:—"Aswathaman has been slain." But your father believed him not.

54. Your father affectionate to his son then doubting the veracity of Bhima's words, questioned the very virtuous king Yudhisthira, whether you were really slain or not.

55. Afraid of telling lies but interested in securing victory, Yudhisthira, then beholding a mighty elephant by name Aswathaman slain in battle,

56. By Bhima,—an elephant belonging to Indravarman the ruler of the Malavas and that was huge as a hill, approached Drona and loudly spoke these words :—

57. "He for whom you are wielding your weapons and looking on whom you live, that dearly-loved son of yours by name Aswathaman has been slain.

58—59. Slain he lies prostrate on the field like a lion-calf in the woods. Cognisant of the evils of falsehood that king clearly spoke these words to the foremost of Brahmanas, adding indistinctly the word elephant after them. Hearing that you have been slain and consequently afflicted with great grief,

60. Withdrawing his celestial weapons he ceased to fight. Beholding him greatly anxious and overpowered with grief,

61. The son of the Panchala king, that perpetrator of vile deeds, assailed him. Beholding that prince who had been destined to be the cause of his death, Drona, conversant with the truths about men and things,

62. Abandoned his celestial weapons and betook to the Praya Joga. Then grasping his hair with his left hand,

63. The son of Prisata lopped off his head disregarding the expostulating cries of the heroes. From all sides they then said :—'He should not be slain, He should not be slain.'

64. Similarly Arjuna also, jumping down from his chariot quickly rushed towards Dhristadyumna, with his arms raised, and repeatedly saying :—

65. "Bring the preceptor alive ; conversant with the rules of fair fig ht, you should not slay aim." Although thus prevented by the Kauravas and Arjuna,

66. Your father, O foremost of men, suffered death at the hands of that most heartless warrior (Dhristadyumna). It is for this reason that the troops afflicted with fear are flying away. Similarly, O sinless one, we are depressed upon the overthrow of your sire.

Sanjaya said :—

67. Then Drona's son, hearing that account of the slaughther of his father in battle, became filled with fury like a snake trampled under feet.

68. Then, O sire, filled with wrath Drona's son appeared to burn on the field, like fire that blazes forth furiously having obtained heaps of fuel to feed it.

69. Squeezing one of his hands with the other and grinding his teeth and breathing like a snake his eyes became coppery (in rage).

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-fourth chapter, the communication of the intelligence of Drona's death to Aswathaman, in the Narayanastramoksha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCV.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. Hearing of the slaughter of his aged and Brahma-knowing sire by Dhristadyumna in an unfair battle, O Sanjoya, what did Aswathaman say,

2. He who is puissant and in whom human and Varuna and Agneya and Brahma and Aindra and Narayana weapons are always present ?

3. Hearing that the pious preceptor has been slain in battle by unfair means by Dhristadyumna what did that Aswathama say ?

4. The illustrious Drona having mastered the science of bowmanship had imparted its knowledge to that son of his desireous of seeing the latter accomplished in every way.

5. There is only one person in the world whom people can desire to be superior to themselves in accomplishments, and that person is one's own son.

6. This is the mystery about all illustrious preceptors, that they impart the knowledge of their respective sciences to their sons or to their beloved pupils.

7. O Sanjaya, the heroic son of Saradwata's daughter, being the disciple of his own sire has obtained all that knowledge in every detail, and has become a second Drona.

8. In knowledge of weapons, Aswathaman is like Rama himself; in battle he is like Purandar, in prowess he equals Kartavirya, and in wisdom he matches Vrihaspati.

9. Youthful in years, he resembles a mountain in endurance, and fire in energy. In gravity he is equal to the ocean, and in anger to a snake of virulent poison.

10. He is the first car-warrior in the world and indefatigable and a resolute bowman. He equals the wind in speed; and in the thick of fight he careers like the Destroyer in person.

11. Shooting his arrows in battle he had afflicted the earth herself. Brave and of great prowess, he is never exhausted in battle.

12. Purified by the recital of the Vedas and by the observance of the vows, he has thoroughly mastered the science of bowmanship. He is incapable of being ruffled and resembled in this direction the mighty ocean or the Dasaratha's son Rama himself.

13. Hearing that the righteous preceptor has been slain in battle by unfair means by Dhristadyumna what indeed did Aswathaman say?

14. Aswathaman was destined to become the slayer of Dhristadyumna the son of Yaynasena, even as this latter was ordained to be the slayer of Drona.

15. What, alas, did Aswathaman say, hearing that the Preceptor has been slain by that sinful, cruel and mean Dhristadyumna of little foresight?

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-fifth chapter, the wrath of Aswathaman in the Narayanastra-moksha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVI.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hearing that his father has been slain by underhand means by Dhristadyumna of sinful deeds, Drona's son became filled, O foremost of men, with tears as well as with (extreme) rage.

2. Inflamed as he was with rage, his body, O monarch, appeared to burn like that of the Destroyer himself when at the expiration of a yuga, he engages himself in slaughtering created beings.

3. Then repeatedly wiping off his eyes shedding copious tears, and breathing in rage, he said these words unto king Duryodhana.

4. I have been apprised of the fact, how my father was slain after he laid his weapons aside; I have also known how a sinful act has been committed by those who boast of hoisting the standard of virtue.

5—6. I have also heard of the vile and ruthless act of the very virtuous king Yudhisthira. Surely either victory or its reverses will fall to the lot of those who engage in fight. Death in battle is ever esteemed. The death overtaking one engaged in fight under fair rules of combat,

7. Should not become a source of grief, as has been observed by the sages. My father, without doubt, has gone to the posthumous regions of the heroes.

8. I should not lament for that foremost of men as he has undergone the most excellent form of death. But when fighting fairly, he was siezed by the hair,

9. Before the eyes of all the troops; this humiliation that he sustained is biting me to the very quick. Whilst I live, my sire was seized by the hair,

10. Why then should sonless men wish to obtain sons (who can help them in no way)? Moved by lust, or wrath or ignorance or hatred or levity,

11. Men perpetrate acts opposed to morality or to humiliate others. This most sinful act has been committed by the son of Prisata,

12. Of wicked soul and ruthless heart, in utter disregard of myself. Dhristadyumna shall behold the dreadful consequences of his act,

13. As also the prevaricating sons of Pandu, who have perpetrated a sinful act. He that caused, by an underhand measure, the preceptor to lay aside his weapon,

14. The blood of that son of Dharma the earth shall drink to-day. I swear by my truth, O foremost of the Kurus, as also by the religious merits acquired by my Istha and Purtha acts,

15. That I shall not drag on my burdensome existence without slaying the Panchalas to the last man. Having recourse to all measures, I shall contend against the Panchalas in great battle ;

16. Either by hook or crook or by violent or mild measures I will achieve the slaughter of Dhristadyumna of evil deeds in battle.

17. O ruler of the Kurus, exterminating the Panchalas, I shall regain my peace of mind. O foremost of men, people desire to have children,

18. In order that these latter may free them from great danger here and hereafter. But my sire was reduced to a woeful plight like one helpless,

19. While myself his son and disciple, equal to a mountain (in might) am still alive. Fie on my weapons of celestial make, fie on my arms, fie on my prowess,

20. Inasmuch as getting me for his son, Drona had to suffer the indignity of being seized by the hair. O foremost of the Bharatas, I shall therefore so exert myself that

21. I may be free from the debt I still owe to my sire who has proceeded to Heaven. A noble person never indulges in his own praise ;

22. But incapable of tolerating the slaughter of my sire, I shall to-day utter my own praises :—Let the Pandavas with Janarddana at their head to-day behold my prowess,

23. As I grind all creatures like the Destroyer himself at the hour of Dissolution. Neither the gods, nor the Gandharvas, nor the Asuras, nor the reptiles, nor the Rakshasas,

24. Will be able to-day to conquer me as I shall ride on my car, O foremost of men. There is none in the world superior to me, or Arjuna in the knowledge of weapons.

25. To-day at the heart of the hostile troops, like the sun in the midst of scorching rays, I shall discharge my celestial weapons.

26. In to-day's mighty battle, shafts shot furiously from by bow will crush and mangle the Pandavas, showing their great energy.

27. My troops shall to-day behold the quarters of the compass, shrouded with sharp-winged shafts, as if O king, by showers of rain.

28. Shooting on all sides shafts of dreadful whirr, I shall fell my foes like the mighty tempest uprooting the trees.

29—30. Neither Vibhatsu, nor Janarddana, nor Bhimasena, nor the twins, (Nakula and Sahadeva), nor king Yudhisthira, nor Prisata's son of wicked soul, Sikhandin, nor Satyaki, even know the weapon which I possess, O foremost of the Kurus, with the mantras for hurling and withdrawing it.

31. Formerly on one occasion, disguised as a Brahmana, Narayana came to my father; whereupon my father bowing down unto him presented him offerings in due course and form.

32. Accepting those offerings that possesser of the six illustrious qualities (the Bhagas) desired to accord a boon to my sire. Thereupon my father asked the boon of getting that most excellent weapon called Narayana.

33. Thereupon that foremost of all gods, that possessor of the six divine qualities said unto him, O king. "No man shall ever be a match for you in battle.

34. But, O Brahmana, this weapon should not be used without sufficient deleberation, for it never returns without despatching the foe at whom it is hurled.

35. O Lord. I know not whom it may not slay. It will even effect the death of him who is unslayable. Therefore it should not be used hastily.

36. When one abandons his car or weapons in battle, or implores for mercy, or surrenders himself,

37. O afflicter of your foes, these are the occasions when this mighty weapon should not be used. He that wants to afflict the unslayable by this weapon, himself becomes afflicted by it.

38. My puissant father then received that weapon. The lord then thus spoke to me also. "You shall destroy many showers of celestial weapons,

39. By means of this weapon and you shall blaze forth in effulgence by its virtue." Having thus spoken that Divine Lord ascended to heaven.

40—41. This is the history how my father obtained the Narayana weapon from the god. With the aid of this weapon, I shall crush the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Matsyas and the Kaikayas in battle like the husband of Sachi crushing the Asuras. Assuming those particular forms which I shall desire them to assume, my arrows,

42. Will fall upon my foes contending vigorously in battle. Staying in battle I shall shower weapons as it lists men to do.

43. I will rout the foremost of car-warriors with sky-ranging arrows furnished with iron tips. I will certainly hurl battleaxes, bludgeons and various other kinds of weapons.

44. An afflicter of foes as I am, with the aid of that Narayana weapon, I shall destroy the foes, completely crushing the Pandavas.

45. That disgrace to the Panchala race, that contemner of his friends, the Brahmanas and his preceptor, that odious fellow of vilest conduct, shall not escape me alive to-day."

46. Hearing those words of Drona's son, the army rallied; all foremost of warriors therein blew their mighty conches.

47. Delightedly they began to strike up the Bheris, and Dindimàs by thousands; the earth then struck with the hoops of horses and wheels of car, rang out loudly.

48. That tremendous din resounded through the welkin, the heavens and the earth. Then hearing that sound that resembled the rumble of rain-clouds, the Pandavas,

49. Those foremost of car-warriors, uniting together began to consult. The son of Drona also, O Bharata, having spoken in the above manner, wahsed his mouth with water and then invoked into existence that celestial weapon known by the name of Narayana.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-sixth chapter, the wrath of Aswathaman, in the Narayanastra-Moksha Parva of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVII.

(NARAYANASTRA-MOKSHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that Narayana weapon had been invoked into existence, the wind began to blow from opposite directions, and peals of thunder were heard though the sky was cloudless.

2. The earth quaked and the oceans became agitated. The ocean-going stream began to flow in contrary directions.

3. The crests of mountains, O Bharata, began to split up. Diverse animals then passed keeping the son of Pandu to their right.

4. The veil of darkness spread over the earth. The sun became dimmed in splendour. Diverse kinds of flesh-eating animals began to alight on the field of battle.

5. O Ruler of men, celestials, the Danavas, and the Gandharvas all became filled with fear. Seeing then that tremendous agitation in nature, they began to question one another saying, 'what is the cause of all this?'

6. All the kings became filled with anxiety and inspired with terror, O ruler of men, at the sight of that dreadful weapon of affrighting aspect, belonging to Drona's son.

Dhritarashtra said :—

7. When unable to brook the slaughter of his sire and overwhelmed with grief, Drona's son did rally the troops.

8. Tell me, O Sanjaya, what consultation then the Pandavas held for protecting Dhristadyumna, as they saw the Kurus return to the charge.

Sanjaya said :—

9. At first having seen the Dhartarastras routed and again beholding them return to the attack Yudhisthira addressing Arjuna said :—

Yudhisthira said :—

10. Upon the slaughter of the preceptor Drona by Dhristadyumna like the slaughter of the mighty Asura Vrita by the wielder of thunderbolt,

11. O Dhananjaya, the enemy depressed at heart, gave up all hopes of victory. They fled from the field, intent on saving themselves.

12-13. Some rulers of men fled on chariots borne along irregular courses, with parshni drivers slain, deprived of standards, streamers and umbrellas, with their boxes and Kuvaras shattered, and all their decorations displaced. Others again, panic-struck, and deprived of reason, goading the steeds of their chariots with their toes, fled in all haste.

14. Others overwhelmed with fear, fled on their cars having their axles, wheels and yokes broken. Others fled, hanging half way from their saddles.

15. Others again displaced from their seats and rivetted with shafts on the necks of elephants, were precipitately borne away by those animals. Others were crushed down by flying elephants, mangled and pierced with arrows.

16. Others with their armours taken off and weapons exhausted fell down on the earth from the back of their animals. Others again were mutilated by car-wheels or crushed by steeds or elephants.

17. Some loudly calling their sires and their sons fled away in fear, without recognising one another and reduced in energy by grief.

18. Some causing their sons, fathers, friends and brothers sit (on their vehicles) and doffing their coats of mail were seen to wash them with water.

19. After the slaughter of Drona, the enemy's host, falling into great distress, fled away in haste. Who hath rallied it now? Tell me if you know it.

20. The sound of neighing steeds and roaring elephants mingled with the clatter of car-wheels is heard aloud.

21. These terrible sounds in the ocean of Kuru army, are swelling every moment and causing my troops to tremble.

22. This tremendous sound that is assailing our ears, causing our hairs to stand erect, meseems, will devour up the three worlds with their lords.

23. I think this to be the tremendous roar of the wielder of the thunder, viz., Vasava, who enraged at the slaughter of Drona is coming to fight on behalf of the Kauravas.

24. O Dhananjoya, hearing this loud and terrible sound our hairs stand erect, and our best car-warriors are becoming filled with anxiety.

25. I ask you who is this mighty car-warrior that rallying this terrible and agitated host like the lord of the celestials themselves, is leading it to the charge.

Arjuna said :—

26. He depending upon whose prowess the Kauravas, having addressed themselves to the accomplishment of fierce deeds, are blowing their conches and facing us with firmness,

27. He about whom you entertain doubts as to who he may be who, having rallied the troops of the sons of Dhritarastra, that had fled from the fall of the weaponless Drona, is now uttering terrible roars,

28. He who is possessed of bashfulness, and mighty arms, who has the gait of an infuriate elephant, who possesses a face like that of a tiger, who achieves fierce feats and gives assurances of safety to the Kurus,

29. He, upon whose birth Drona distributed a thousand kine among Brahmanas of high-worth, he, O king, is Aswathaman who is thus roaring.

30. As soon as he was born that hero neighed like Uchhaisravas and thereby caused the three worlds to tremble.

31. Having heard that sound, an invisible being, O master, ascribed to him the name Aswathaman, (horse-voiced). That brave warrior, O son of Pandu, is roaring to-day.

32. He, who has been slain like one helpless by the son of Prisata, by a cruel and deceitful means, yonder stands the protector of that one.

33. The Panchala prince dragged my poor preceptor by the locks of his hair. Certainly Drona's son will not forgive that act of his, aware as he is of his own manliness and resources.

34. You also, O king, has spoken a lie to the preceptor, being driven to it by the desire for obtaining the kingdom. Conversant with the rules of morality and of pious nature, you have indeed perpetrated a great sin.

35. Like that hanging in Rama on consequence of his slaying Vali, the infamy hanging on you in consequence of the slaughter of Drona will be eternal in the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creations.

36. 'The son of Pandu is accomplished in all virtues; moreover he is my disciple, he will never tell me a lie'. Thinking this Drona believed what you then said.

37. You have spoken an untruth veiled in the garb of truth, to the preceptor, adding the word elephant thereto.

38. Thereupon the Puissant Drona, laid his weapons aside and became indifferent to every earthly concern. He was senseless, and as you have seen was overwhelmed with a swoon,

39. It was then that his disciple, transgressing all morality, slew his preceptor, filled with affection for his son and unwilling to fight and possessed by grief.

40. Having slain by a deceitful means your preceptor who had laid his weapons aside, now do you with your counsellors, protect the son of Prisata, if indeed, you are equal to the task.

41. To-day all of us conjointly will not be able to protect the son of Prisata, who has been as it were devoured by the son of Drona, filled with fury on account of his sire's slaughter.

42. He, who ever treated all creatures with exceeding compassion, even he, hearing that his sire was dragged by the hair will to-day consume us in battle.

43. Setting at naught all dictates of morality, the pupil has slaughtered his preceptor, although I exclaimed at the top of my voice, protesting that the preceptor should not be slain.

44. We have already passed away the greater part of our lives; the lease of life left to us is indeed very short; even that short period is blotted by this sinful act (perpetrated in the maturity of our years).

45. Drona, in consequence of the affection he cherished for us, was indeed like our father. By the ordinances of the holy texts, he was also our father. Yet such a preceptor of ours has been slain by ourselves, for the sake of enjoying sovereignty for a short period.

46. Dhritarastra, O manarch, gave the earth to Bhishma and Drona, and what was more, he entrusted them with the lives of his sons.

47. Though thus esteemed and endowed with such an honorarium by the foe, yet the preceptor looked upon us like his own son.

48. The preceptor, incapable of suffering any reduction in strength and energy, was only slain in battle, when he believing in your words laid his weapons aside. While engaged in fight even Indra the performer of hundred sacrifices could not have defeated him.

49. Even such a preceptor, venerable in years and devoted to our welfare, has been i jured by ourselves, who have betaken to mean conduct for securing sovereignty.

50. Alas, alas, what a heinous sin and a ruthless act have we perpetrated, for, tempted by the desire for enjoying the pleasures of sovereignty, we have slain our venerable preceptor.

51. My preceptor had all along been under the impression, that I, Vasova's son, could abandon all, my sires, brothers, sons, wives, and even life itself, for his sake, in consequence of the affection I bear for him.

52. And yet, alas, longing for sovereignty, I have neglected him when he was on the point of being slaughtered. For this act, O king, I have already been condemned to hell, being covered with great ignominy.

53. It is better that I should die than live, inasmuch as I have to-day, out of a desire for obtaining sovereignty, suffered my old preceptor to be slain, who was a Brahmana and a great muni and who moreover had laid his weapons aside at the time.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-seventh chapter, the words of Arjuna in the Narayanastramoksha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVIII.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing the words of Arjuna, O mighty monarch, the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava host spoke neither agreeable or disagreeable words in reply to Dhananjoya.

2. But the mighty Bhimasena filled with wrath, spoke, O foremost of the Bharatas, these words for reproching Kunti's son Arjuna.

3. 'You are preaching the rules of morality, like a muni living in the woods or like a Brahmana of austere observances who has cut off all connections with this world.

4. Saving others from injuries, defending himself against wounds and injuries, and showing forgiveness to women and the pious, a Kshatriya soon obtains the (rule of the) earth, as also religious merit, fame and prosperity.

5. Yourself endowed with all the desirable qualifications of a Ksharitya, O perpetuater of your race, it looks odd that you should speak like one ignorant of the duties of your order.

6. O son of Kunti, your prowess resembles that of Sakra the lord of Sachi. You never pass beyond the limits of morality even as the ocean never transgresses its banks.

7. What person is there, who will not applaud you,—you who, having forgotten the animosity fanned and kept alive for the last thirteen years, are solicitous for observing the precepts of morality?

8. Surely it is fortunate, O sire, that your heart to-day bends towards virtue. It is also fortunate that your understanding to-day inclines towards showing compassion, O you of undeteriorating fame.

9. Although you are so eager to observe the dictates of righteousness, yet your kingdom was snatched away from you most unrighteously. Your wife Draupadi having been dragged into the open court, was iusulted by your foe.

10. We were exiled, with barks of trees or skins of animals for our cloth and cover. Though undeserving of such a wretched plight, yet we were compelled to wear out thirteen long years in that condition.

11. You, O sinless one, have overlooked all these crying causes that call for revenge. Devoted as you are to perform the duties of Kshatriyas, you have quietly tolerated all these.

12. Keeping alive the memory of all these wrongs inflicted on us, we have come here to-day with you, to avenge them. (But as you are so righteous) I myself will slay all these mean fellows who snatched away our kingdom.

13. You had said before "Addressing ourselves in battle, we shall exert to the utmost of our abilities." But now you are reproaching us.

14. You are now seeking virtue. So you have falsified the words you had said before. Afflicted as we are with fear, you take this opportunity for cutting us to the quick with your harsh words,

15. Like one applying salt on the sores of wounded men, O grinder of your foes. Afflicted with your dagger-like words, my heart is on the point of bursting open.

16. Pious as you are, you do not know the nature of impiety, for you do not offer us applause though we are worthy of it.

17. When Vasudeva himself is here, praise you the son of Drona, who, O Dhananjaya, is not a match for even a sixteenth part of yourself ?

18. Disclosing your own weakness, it is strange that you feel no shame! I can rend this earth open in rage, and split the very mountains,

19. Whirling that heavy and terrible mace of fierce aspect decked with garlands of gold. Like a violent tempest, I can break down trees resembling huge mountains.

20. I can with my arrows rout and crush the assembled host of the celestials led by Indra himself, O Partha, assisted though they be by the Rakshasas, the Asuras, Snakes and human beings.

21. Knowing, O foremost of men, me your brother, to be such, you should not, O you of infinite prowess, entertain any fear from the son of Drona.

22. Or, O Vibhatsu, stay here with all these foremost of men and behold me, alone and armed with the mace, conquer him in fierce battle.

23. Like the Daitya kink Hiranyakasipu addressing the roaring and enraged Hari, the son of the king of the Panchalas addressed Partha thus :—

Dhristadyumna said :—

24. O Vibhatsu, the intelligent sages of yore have prescribed these—viz, conducting sacrifices on behalf of others, teaching, charity, celebration of sacrifices and acceptance of gifts,—to be the duties of the Brahmanas.

25. The sixth duty is study. To which of these six was that Drona who has been slain by me devoted ? Wherefore then do you reproach me, O son of Pritha ?

26. Transgressing the duties of his own order, and observing those of the Kshatriyas that perpetrator of wicked deeds used to slaughter us with his celestial weapons.

27. Professing himself to be a Brahmana, he used to injure us deceitfully; he has now been slain by deceitful means; O son of Pritha, what is there wrong in this ?

28. Upon the punishment of Drona, (which he richly deserved), if his son, out of anger, utter such loud roars, what do I lose by them ?

29. There is nothing wonderful in the fact that Drona's son leading the Kauravas in battle, will cause their destruction, being himself unable to protect them.

30. Now you have turned a virtuous person, and are accusing me with the slaughter of my preceptor; but do you not know that it was for this purpose that I was born as son of the Panchala king, having sprung out of fire.

31. How, O Dhananjaya, can you designate him a Brahmana or a Kshatriya, who when engaged in fight used to look upon fair and unfair acts with an equal eye ?

32. He, who furious in rage, used to slay with his Brahma weapons even those who are unacquainted with the use of weapons, O foremost of men, why should he not be slain by us by every means in our power ?

33. One fallen off from the duties of his order, has been said, by the righteous, to be equal to poison. Knowing this, O you who are conversant with the precepts of morality, why do you blame me, O Arjuna ?

34. That ruthless warrior, being assailed by me, has been overthrown and slain by me. O Vibhatsu, why do you not then congratulate myself on whom actually no blame hangs ?

35. O Partha, I have lopped off Drona's dreadful head, resembling the All-destroying Fire, or the burning Sun or the most virulent poison. Why do you not then applaud an act that is worthy of applause ?

36. He who used to slay my kinsmen exclusively in battle, and of no one else, lopping off his head, have I not been freed from a terrible fever (of revenge) that used to burn me without remission.

37. The fact that I have not thrown his head, like that of Jayadratha, into het dominions of the Nisadhas, is corroding the core of my heart.

38. It has been heard, O Arjuna, that, without slaying one's enemies one incurs sin. The duty of a Kshatriya is to slay or to be slain.

39. O son of Pandu, Drona was my enemy; and therefore it is righteous that I have slain him; and thus you have slain your father's friend, king Bhagadatta.

40. When you slew your aged grandsire, you thought it your duty to do so. But when I have slain my wicked foe, why should it not be regarded as my duty?

41. It behoves you not to speak to me in this way—me who can raise my hand against you in consequence of the relationship I bear to you and who am therefore like a prostrate elephant with ladder against its body, for helping puny creatures to get on its back.

42. I forgive your abusive language, O Arjuna, for the sake of Draupadi and her sons and not for any other cause.

43. It is well-known that the hostility I bore to the preceptor was bequeathed to me by my sire. Every one in the world knows it but you sons of Pandu feign to be ignorant of it.

44. The eldest son of Pandu is not a liar nor am I a sinful wretch, O Arjuna. The wicked Drona used to injure his pupils. He has been slain by me. Now fight, and victory will be yours.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety eighth chapter, the words of Dhristadyumna, in the Narayanastramoksha of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CXCIX.

(NARAYANASTRA-MOKSHANA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. That high-souled person who had duly studied the Vedas and their auxiliaries, he who had mastered the entire science of arms and who possessed modesty,

2. That Drona that son of mighty sage, who had been insulted by the low-minded, cruel and mean Dhristadyumna the slayer of his preceptor,

3. That Drona through whose grace the foremost of men still achieve superhuman feats difficult of being achieved even by the gods and the Asuras,

4. When that Drona suffered such an insult at the hands of that most sinful Dhristadyumna under the very eyes of all the warriors present, was there no Kshatriya who was then inspired with wrath? Fie on the Kshatriya order and fie on wrath itself!

5. Tell me, O Sanjaya, what did the Parthas or the other kings of the earth, all illustrious warriors, say, having heard the words of the Panchala prince?

Sanjaya said :—

6. Hearing those words of the ruthless son of Drupada, O king, all the rulers of the earth remained silent.

7. But Arjuna only casting side glances at Prisata's son, and sighing and shedding copious tears said 'fie, fie.'

8. Yudhisthira and Bhima and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) and Krishna himself were overwhelmed with shame, O king. Then Satyaki spoke these words :—

9. "Is there nobody that will quickly despatch this sinful, low, and cursed wretch, even when he is thus speaking?"

10. Like the Brahmanas blaming a Chandala, all these Pandavas are reproaching you for your having perpetrated this sinful act.

11. Having perpetrated the most sinful act and condemned by the pious, do you not feel ashamed to open your lips in this august assemblage?

12. O Despicable wretch, why did not your tongue and your cursed head go off into thousand fragments, when you were on the point of slaying your preceptor? Why were you not smitten down by that sinful act?

13. You richly merit the condemnation of the Parthas and all the Vrishnis and the Andhakas inasmuch as parpetrating this sinful act, you are boasting of it in the presence of this august assembly.

14. Having committed the most heinous act of sin, you further reveal your hatred for the preceptor. For this you deserve to be slain; there is no use in sparing your life even for a moment.

15. What other sinful wretch, except yourself, will dare cause the virtuous preceptor's death, holding him by his hoary locks?

16. Having obtained you—the disgrace to their race—for their decendant, seven generations before you and seven after, in your race, have sunk in hell, being deprived of their glory.

17. You have accused Partha that foremost of men with the slaughter of Bhisma. But this latter illustrious personage has himself caused his own destruction.

18. Indeed that vilest of wretches viz. your uterine brother Sikhandin, was the cause of Bhisma's death. Really there is no one more sinful on the face of the earth, than the sons of Panchala king.

19. Your father had begotten Sikhandin for the slaughter of Bhisma. As regards Arjuna he only protected your brother when he caused the death of the high-souled Bhisma.

20. The Panchalas have gone astray from the paths of rectitude, and like despicable wretches they are injuring their friends and their preceptors, only for having obtained yourself and your brother, hated by the pious, among themselves.

21. If you again speak such words before me, I shall knock down your head with a mace resembling the bolt of heaven.

22. Stained as you are with the sin of Brahmanicide, people looking at you the slayer of a Brahmana, have to look at the Sun for purifying themselves.

23. Ill-mannered wretch of a Panchala, villifying my own preceptor in the first instance and then my preceptor's preceptor, why don't you feel ashamed ?

24. 'Wait, Wait.' Bear but this single stroke of my mace. I will bear many strokes of that of yours."

25. Thus reproached by that scion of the Satwata race, Prisata's son inspired with wrath, addressed these harsh words to the enraged Satyaki.

Dhristadyumna said :—

26. O you of Madhu's race, I have heard you speak. But I forgive you; yourself sinful and impious, you desire to throw odium on the righteous?

27. Forgiveness is a praiseworthy virtue, but sinful wretches do not deserve it. A wicked fellow regards him who shows forgiveness as powerless (lit : conquered).

28. Ill-behaved, of low mind and sinful resolutions, you are condemnable from the end of your hair to the tip of your toe. Yet do you desire to censure others ?

29. What act can be more unrighteous than that perpetrated by you when, repeatedly prevented, you slew Bhurisrava, whose arm was lopped off and who had betaken to the Praya Yoga ?

30. Arranging his troops in order Drona was fighting with his celestial weapons; he laid aside his weapons and I slew him O crooked one, what is there improper in this ?

31. How can he, O Satyaki, censure such as act, who himself has slain his opponent, desisted from battle,—an opponent that was sitting in Praya Yoga and whose arm was cut off by another.

32. That puissant opponent of yours, careered on the field having thrown you down with the stroke of his feet. Foremost if you were of all male beings why did you not then slay him ?

33. When Partha had already vanquished him, it was only then that by an unfair means you slew the puissant son of Somadatta.

34. In whatever quarter Drona had sought to rout the troops of the Pandavas, in that quarter I proceeded, shooting myriads of shafts.

35. Having yourself perpetrated an act worthy of a Chandala only, it is strange that you desire to censure me in such a vile language.

36. You are the perpetrator of vile acts and not I, O vilest of the Vrishni race. You are the hot-bed of sin. Do not again blame this deed of mine.

37. Hold your tongue. It is improper that you shall move after this. I give you this reply from my own lips, you should not address me any longer.

38. If again, out of folly you speak such harsh words to me, I shall despatch you to the abode of Death with my own arrows.

39. One cannot overcome his foes, O fool, solely through fair means. Hear how our opponents also acted unfairly.

40. Pandu's eldest son Yudhisthira was a few years back cheated unfairly (out of his own kingdom) and O Satyaki, Draupadi was also most vilely insulted.

41. The Pandavas with Krishna their wife were also exiled to the woods, and O fool, all their possessions were robbed out of them by unrighteous means.

42. The king of the Madras was again weaned away from our side by an act of unrighteousness by the foe, unfairly also was the tender son of Subhadra slain.

43. Now for the Pandavas, the grandfather of the Kurus, Bhisma was slain by an act of unrighteousness. Bhurisrava was unfairly slain by your very justicel-oving self.

44. Thus, O you of the Satwata race, the heroic Pandavas and the Kurus have both acted sinfully for victory in bat although they are all conversant with the rules of morality.

45. Thus morality is a mystery, as also immorality is difficult of being ascertained. Fight on with the Kauravas, and do not return to the home of your fathers.

Sanjaya said :—

46. Addressed in such ruthless and harsh words, the handsome Satyaki trembled from head to foot.

47. Hearing those words Satyaki with his eyes coppery in rage, laid his bow aside on the car and breathing like a snake he grasped his mace.

48. Then advancing furiously upon the Panchala prince he said :—"I shall not waste my harsh words on you any longer, but I shall crush you, as you richly deserve to be slaughtered."

49. Beholding the puissant Satyaki rush, from wrath and desire for revenge, at the Panchala prince, like Death against a match of his,

50. The mighty Bhima urged by Vasudeva, quickly jumped down from his chariot and caught hold of him by the arms.

51. The puissant Satyaki, who was then furiously rushing (at Dhristadyumna) advanced a few steps, dragging after him the mighty son of Pandu, who was trying to withhold him.

52. Then Bhima firmly planting his feet, succeeded in stopping that foremost of all beings endowed with strength viz., that illustrious scion or Sini's race.

53. Then, O king, Sahadeva jumping down from his car, addressed Satyaki held in check by the strong arms of Bhima, in these soothing words :—

54. "O feremost of men, we possess not friends dearer to ourselves, than the Andhakas, the Vrishnis and the Panchalas, O descendant of Madhu's race.

55. Similarly the Andhakas and the Vrisnnis, specially Krishna among the latter, cannot have any friends dearer than ourselves.

56. The Panchalas also, O scion of the Vrishni race, will not be able to find friends dearer to themselves than the Vrishnis and the Pandavas, even if they search the whole earth to the very boundaries of the seas.

57. You are a dear friend to this prince and even such is he to you. You are to us even as we are to you.

58. Versed in the rules of duty, restrain your anger having the prince of the Panchalas for its object, remembering the duties that you owe to your friends.

59. Forgive the son of Prisata, let him also forgive you. We will also practise forgiveness. What other virtue can be equal to forgiveness !

60. When, O sire, Sahadeva was thus pacifying the grandson of Sini, the son of the Panchala king thus smilingly spoke :—

61. "Bhima, let the grandson of Sini, so proud of his prowess in battle, he released. Let him encounter me like the wind encountering the mountains.

62. I shall smother his wrath with my sharp arrows, as also his itching for battle ; O son of Kunti, let me deprive him of his life in battle.

63. I am alone competent to achieve the mighty task the sons of Pandu have undertaken, heavy though it may be. Yonder come the Kauravas,

64. Or Phalguna himself will hold all of them in check. Let me cut off this one's head with my arrows.

65. He takes me for Bhurisravas with his arm lopped off. Leave him. Either I will slay him or he shall slay me.

66. Hearing the words of the Panchala prince the mighty Satyaki breathing like a snake, began to swell even within the embrace of Bhima's arms.

67. When those strong-armed and mighty heroes were thus roaring at each other like two bulls, O sire, Vasudeva and the son of Dharma Yudhisthira,

68. With great difficulty restrained those two heroes. Thus restraining those two mighty bowmen, whose eyes were red in rage, the foremost of the Kshatriyas advanced desirous of meeting the foe in battle.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-ninth chapter, the rage of Dhristadyumna and Satyaki, in the Narayanastramoksha, of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CC.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSANA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereafter the son of Drona began to crush his foes like the Destroyer at the end of the yuga, slaughtering all creatures.

2—3. Slaying his foes with his broad-headed shafts, he caused a mountain by corpses, whose trees were constituted by standards, peaks by weapons, stones by slain elephants; which teemed with Kimpurusas formed by slain horses, which was covered with creepers constituted by bows, whose cranes were constituted by flesh-eating animals; and which was full of birds formed by the ghosts.

4. Then, O foremost of the Bharatas, once more exclaiming aloud with great force, Aswathaman made your son to hear his vow,

5. "Inasmuch as Kunti's son Yudhisthira, disguised in the garb of righteousness, has spoken to the fighting Preceptor, saying 'lay your weapons aside,'

6. For that reason I shall crush his army even before his very eyes. Shattering the ranks of the hostile army I will slay the sinful son of the Panchala king.

7. I will slay them all in battle if they only face me in battle. This I speak to you for sooth. Let the army be rallied and return to the charge.

8. Hearing those words of Drona's son your son rallied the troops, having dispelled their fear by uttering a loud leonine shout.

9. Thereupon O king, once more a terrible encounter took place between the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas, resembling the dashing of two oceans at full tide.

10. The Kouravas were rallied and incited with revenge by Drona's son, the Pandavas and Panchalas were also excited to fury by having slain the Preceptor Drona.

11. The violence of the collision was indeed very great,—collision that then took place on the field of battle between those warriors all of whom were filled with joy and rage and inspired with hopes of victory.

12. The collision between the Kurus and the Pandavas was like that between a mountain against a mountain or an ocean against an ocean.

13. Then the Kuru and the Pandava troops filled with delight struck up ten thousand Bheris and blew a thousand conches.

14. Like the deep roar of the ocean when it was churned, a tremendous din was then heard in those troops.

15. Thereafter Dron's son invoked into existence the Narayana weapon and he aimed it at the armies of the Panchalas and the Pandavas.

16. Then thousands of arrows with blazing tips appeared in the welkin looking like snakes of fiery mouth, that continued to agitate the Pandavas.

17. Those arrows, O king, like the rays of the Sun, in that terrible battle, covered all the quarters of heaven, the sky and the Pandava soldiers.

18. Then, O ruler of earth, countless iron balls appeared there like lustrous orbs in the cloudless firmament.

19. Sataghnis of four or two wheels, and a large number of maces, and sharp-edged discs, effulgent like the sun also appeared there.

20. Then beholding the firmament densely covered by those weapons, O foremost of the Bharatas, the Pundavas, the Sanjayas and the Panchalas became exceedingly anxious.

21. The weapon showed its exceeding strength in all those places, O ruler of men, where the great car-warriors of the Pandava hosts contended furiously.

22. Slaughtered by the Narayana weapon, as if burnt down by a raging fire, the troops of the Pandavas were greatly distressed in battle.

23. O lord, as fire consumes a heap of dry grass in summer, even so did that weapon begin to consume the army of the Pandavas.

24. The very virtuous king Yudhisthira was filled with fear, as his army became reduced in number and that weapon swelled in its fury.

25. Then beholding the army broken and deprived of its senses, and seeing the indifference of Partha, the very virtuous king Yudhisthira thus skope :—

26. "Fly, O you Dhristadyumna, taking with you all the Panchala divisions; you also, Satyaki, go away with all Vrishnis and the Andhakas.

27. The high-souled son of Vasudeva will look after his own safety. Indeed he is competent to protect all the worlds; what to speak of his own self; it is useless to give him advise.

28. Ye soldiers, I command you to desist from the battle. I with my uterine brothers, am going to enter into a burning fire.

29. In this war so dreadful to the timid, having crossed the ocean represented by Bhima and Drona, I shall now sink in the water contained in the vestige of a calf-foot represen ted by the son of Drona.

30. Let king Duryodhana to-day attain the fruition of his desires for I have slain the preceptor who used to treat us so mercifully and like a friend.

31. Indeed this preceptor with the help of other cruel warriors, slew and did not spare the son of Subhadra of tender years, who was unacquainted with the modes of warfare.

32. This preceptor with his son remained indifferent, when Krishna, dragged into the open court and about to be made a slave, asked him to speak the truth in answer to her questions.

33. This preceptor gave an impenetrable armour to Duryodhana, when all other warriors were worn out with fatigue, in order that the latter may slay Phalguna and effect the protection of Jayadratha.

34. Indeed this preceptor with his Brahma weapon exterminated that whole Panchala division under Satyajit, who had been exerting to bestow victory on me.

35. Indeed this preceptor did not withhold his permission though solicited to do so by our friends, when despoiled of our kingdom we were on the point of being exiled into the woods.

36. Alas, such a well-wishing friend of ours who did us many good turns has been slain by us. For his sake I shall with all my relatives embrace death."

37. When the son of Kunti was thus speaking, the scion of the Dasarha race, Krishna, forbidding the troops with the waive of his hand from flying away, said these words :—

38. "Quickly throw aside your weapons and come down from your vehicles; even this is the means ordained by the high-souled Narayana, for baffling this weapon.

39. All of you quickly alight from the elephants, horses, and chariots in the ground. Thus when you stand in earth laying aside your arms this weapon will not slay you.

40. Wherever you shall contend in battle for checking the force of this weapon, in all those places the Kouravas will become more powerful than yourselves.

41. Those men, on the other hand, who will throw down their weapons and alight from their vehicles, will not be slain by this weapon.

42. Those who will even think of contending against this weapon will be slain by it, even if he takes shelter within the bowels of the earth."

43. Hearing those words of Vasudeva, O Bharata, all the Pandava warriors laid their weapons aside and discarded all thoughts of battle from their mind.

44. But Bhimasena the son of Pandu, beholding the Pandavas about to abandon their weapons had thus spoken, O king, gladdening the hearts of all.

45. None should throw his weapons aside. I shall check the weapon of Drona's son with my swift-flying arrows.

46. Or armed with this heavy mace adorned with gold I shall career on the field of battle like Death himself, quelling the weapons of Drona's son.

47. Just as no luminary is equal to the Sun in effulgence, so there is no man equal to me in prowess and strength.

48. Look at my strong arms like the trunks of the foremost of elephants. They are capable of pulling down the crests of the Himavat mountain.

49. Among men, I am the only person possessed of the strength of ten thousand elephants. Like Sakra among the gods in heaven, I am known to be matchless on earth.

50. To-day you shall behold the strength of my arms and my expanded chest, when I shall exert in resisting the effulgent and burning weapon of Drona's son.

51. If there is none who can venture to contend against the Narayana weapon, let then the Kurus and the Pandavas behold how I shall quell that weapon.

52. O Arjuna, O Arjuna, O Vibhatsu, it befits you not to lay aside your Gandiva-bow; then from yourself the halo of glory will be gone, like that of the moon leaving it."

Arjuna said :—

53. O Bhima, my great vow is that I shall not use the Gandiva-bow against Brahmanas the kine and the Narayana weapon, and against these I shall lay it aside.

Sanjaya said :—

54. Thus spoken to, Bhima, that subduer of foes, rushed against Drona's son on a chariot whose clatter resembled the roll of thunder and whose effulgence outvied that of the Sun.

55. Endued with great activity and prowess, the son of Kunti possessed as he was of extreme lightness of hands, succeeded in covering Drona's son with a net-work of arrows, within the twinkling of the eye.

56. Thereupon Drona's son smilingly eyeing the rushing Bhima, challenged him and then covered him with arrows of keen points and inspired with Mantras.

57. Then Pritha's son shrouded with those shafts, of blazing points like the mouths of snakes, capable of penetrating to the very vitals, looked as if covered with sparks of gold.

58. Then O king, the appearance of Bhimasena became like that of a mountain surrounded by the fire-flies at the close of day.

59 That weapon of Drona's son directed against Bhimasena, swelled in fury like a conflagration assisted by the wind.

60. Beholding that weapon of great energy increasing in its fury, the troops of the Pandavas were filled with fear with the exception of Bhima.

61. Thereupon laying aside their celestial weapons on the ground they alighted on all sides from their cars and their horses.

62. Thus when they had thrown their weapons down and when they had alighted from their vehicles and horses, that weapon of immense energy flew towards the head of Bhima.

63. All creatures cried Oh and Alas and specially the Pandavas did so, at the sight of Bhimasena wrapt in the effulgence of that weapon.

Thus ends the two hundredth chapter, the laying aside of weapons by the Pandava troops in the Narayanastra Mokshana of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CCI.

(NARAYANASTRA-MOKSHANA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding Bhimasena completely shrouded by that weapon, Dhananjaya for quenching the fire produced by it shot the Varuna weapon.

2. The lightness with which Arjuna shot the weapon, and also the fiery energy of the Narayana weapon, rendered it impossible for any body to perceive that Bhima was also protected by the Varuna weapon.

3. His steeds, charioteers and horses covered by the effulgence of the weapon of Drona's son, Bhima then was incapable of being looked at like a blazing fire within another blazing fire.

4. Just as at the close of night, all the luminaries fly towards the western hills, so also the shafts of Drona's son flew towards the car of Bhima.

5. Then thus shrouded with shafts by Drona's son, Bhima, his horses and charioteer, O sire, looked as if wrapt in the flames of a blazing fire.

6. Just as at the hour of the universal annihilation the All-destroying Fire having burnt down the mobile and immobile creation proceeds to enter the mouth of the Creator, so also that weapon proceeded to enter the body of Bhima.

7. Just as the fire penetrating into the Sun or the Sun penetrating into the fire, can not be perceived by any body so alsc that weapon entering into Bhima's body could not be perceived.

8. Beholding then that weapon swelling in fury near Bhima's chariot, and also Drona's son career unopposed on the field of battle,

9. And seeing that all the warriors of the Pandava army had laid their weapons aside, and that all the mighty car-warriors headed by Yudhisthira had turned their faces away from the field,

10. Those two brave heroes of great effulgence viz. Arjuna and Vasudeva, then jumping down from their chariot, ran towards Bhima.

11. Those two puissant persons then plunging into the energy born of the might of Aswathaman's weapon, betook to their power of illusion.

12. The fire of that weapon failed to burn them down in consequence of their having laid aside their weapons, as also in consequence of their great personal prowess and the energy of the Varuna weapon.

13. Then Nara and Narayana began forcibly to take off all weapons from Bhima and to drag him out of the fire of that weapon.

14. Thus dragged the puissant son of Kunti (Bhima) began to roar aloud, whereupon the invinsible weapon of Drona's son also swelled in its fury.

15. Then the son of Vasudeva, addressing him (Bhima) said :—"O delighter of Pandu, what do you mean ? Why don't you desist from fighting though repeatedly forbidden to do so.

16. Had it been possible now to vanquish the Kouravas in battle, then we as well as all these forrmost of men would have fought against them.

17. All your troops have alighted from their chariots, so you also, O son of Kunti, quickly come down from your chariot,"

18. Having thus spoken, Krishna dragged him down on the earth,—him who was breathing like a snake with eyes coppery with rage.

19. When he was thus dragged down from the car, when he was thus compelled to lay his weapons aside, the Narayana weapon, capable of burning down the foe, became pacified.

Sanjaya said :—

20. When the unbearable energy of that weapon was pacified by this means, all the quarters, subsidiary and cardinal, became clear.

21. Auspicious winds began to blow and animals and birds became quiet. The steeds and elephants as well as the warriors themselves became cheerful, O ruler of men.

22. O Bharata, when that dreadful energy was thus stilled, the intelligent Bhima shone like the Sun at the close of night.

23. Then the remnant of the Pandava troops, beholding the subsidence of the energy of that weapon, again stood ready in order to slay your sons.

24. When the Pandava army was rallied and rearranged and when the Narayana weapon was thus counteracted, your son Duryodhana, O king, addressing Drona's son said these words :—

25. "O Aswathaman, once more discharge that weapon quickly, for the Panchalas, desirous of victory, have again rallied."

26. Thus spoken to by your son, Aswathaman, O sire, depressed and sighing heavily, replied to the king saying :—

27. "That weapon never comes back, neither, O king, can it be used twice. If invoked back it will slay the person invoking it.

28. The son of Vasudeva has counteracted the weapon by what means you have seen. For this, O ruler of men, the extermination of the foe has not been accomplished in battle.

29. The worst in battle is either defeat or death. Death is better than defeat. The enemy compelled to lay aside their weapons are vanquished and more than dead."

Duryodhana said :—

30. O son of my preceptor, O you foremost of those versed in the science of weapons, if this weapon cannot be used twice, then slay those slayers of their preceptor with other mighty weapons.

31. Like the three-eyed Mahadeva of infinite energy, you possess all the celestial weapons; even the enraged Indra cannot escape you alive if you wish it not.

Dhritarastra said :—

32. When Drona had been slain with underhand measures and when that weapon of his son had been baffled, what did Aswathaman, urged on by Duryodhana, do?

33. Beholding the Parthas, rally for the fight and freed from the influence of the Narayana weapon and career at the head of their divisions,

Sanjaya said :—

34. Remembering the unfair slaughter of his sire, Drona's son, having the lion's tail as a device on his banner, casting off all fear, and filled with fury rushed upon the son of Prisata.

35. Thus assailing him, that foremost of men, at first pierced his enemy with twenty small arrows and then again with five others, with great force.

36. Thereupon, O king, Dhristadyumna pierced Drona's son looking like a blazing fire, with four and sixty winged arrows.

37. He pierced the latter's charioteer with twenty shafts furnished with golden wings and whetted on stone and the four horses with four very sharp arrows.

38. Repeatedly piercing the son of Drona, and making the earth tremble with his roars, Dhristadyumna appeared to be engaged in taking away the lives of every body on the face of earth in that dreadful battle.

39. O king, the son of Prisata was endued with prowess, and accomplished in weapons and of resolute purposes. He rushed upon the son of Drona making death to be the final goal.

40. Then that foremost of car-warriors, that prince of the Panchalas, of unmeasurable depth of soul, poured a veritable shower of arrows on the head of Drona's son.

41. Thereupon Drona's son covered that enraged hero with innumerable winged shafts, and remembering the slaughter of his sire, pierced him with ten shafts.

42. Cutting down the bow and the standard of the Panchala prince with two well-directed razor-headed arrows, the son of Drona began to afflict the former with numerous other shafts.

43. Drona's son deprived his opponent of his horses, chariot and driver; and he, worked up with rage, covered the latter's followers with myriads of arrows.

44. Thereupon, O ruler of men, the troops of the Panchalas broke and fled away; their appearance reflected fear, and they were greatly distressed and mangled with shaft-cuts.

45. Then beholding the troops turning back and Dhristadyumna greatly afflicted, the grandson of Sini, directed his chariot to be driven in haste towards that of Drona's son.

46. With eight sharp arrows he afflicted Aswathaman; then once more he pierced his revengeful adversary with another twenty shafts of diverse shape.

47. He pierced his opponent's driver and the four horses with four arrows; and then like one endued with great lightness of hand, he cut off his bow and standard with well-armed shafts.

48. He consumed the horses of his antagonist and shattered his car of golden effulgence; then he pierced the latter on the centre of his breast with twenty shafts.

49. Thus afflicted and enshrouded in a net-work of arrows, the puissant Aswathaman, O king, knew not what to do.

50. When the preceptor's son was involved in such a perilous position, your son, that mighty car-warrior, supported by Kripa, Karna, and others, began to cover that scion of the Satwata race with numerous arrows.

51. Then Duryodhana with twenty, Saradwata's son Kripa with three, Kritavarman with ten, Karna with fifty,

52. Dussasana with hundred and Vrishasena with seven sharp arrows pierced Satyaki quickly and from all sides.

53. Thereupon, O king, the puissant Satyaki deprived all those mighty car-warriors of their cars, and compelled them to turn away from the field of battle, within a moment's time.

54. Meanwhile Aswathaman having regained his senses, began, O foremost of the Bharatas, to reflect, distressed with grief and sighing repeatedly.

55. Thereafter that afflicter of foes, namely, Drona's son, riding on another car proceeded to oppose Satyaki, and shot hundreds of arrows.

56. Then beholding that son of Bharadwaja's son once more advance against him in battle, the mighty car-warrior Satyaki once more compelled him to turn away and deprived him of his car.

57. Thereat the Pandavas beholding the prowess of Satyaki, O king, loudly blew their conches, and uttered deafening war-rcies.

58. Then Satyaki of infallible prowess, thus rendering Drona's son carless, slew the three thousand mighty car-warriors engaged in supporting Vrishasena.

59. He also slew ten thousand tusked elephants that accompanied Kripa, as also fifty thousand horses that constituted Sakuni's division.

60. Then once more, O king, the valorous son of Drona, mounting on a fresh car and excited to the highest pitch of fury assailed Satyaki for slaughtering him.

61. But the grandson of Sini that subduer of foes seeing him once more proceed against him, ruthlessly pierced him with numerous sharp arrows.

62. But this time, though thus deeply pierced by Yuyudhana with arrows of diverse descriptions, that mighty bowman, that son of Drona, worked up with rage, addressing his foes, smilingly said these words:—

63. "O grandson of Sini, I know the partiality you bear for that murderer of his preceptor (viz. Dhristadyumna), but you shall not succeed in saving him and your ownself when assailed by me.

64. By my truth and by my ascetic austerities, I swear before you, that I shall enjoy no rest without slaying the whole Panchala race.

65. You may unite together the troops of the Pandavas as well as those of the Vrishnis, yet I will exterminate the Somakas inspite of all their endeavours."

66. Having thus spoken, Drona's son hurled at that scion of the Satwata race an excellent arrow of the effulgence of the solar rays, like Hari (Indra) hurling the thunder-bolt against Vritra.

67. That arrow hurled by him, penetrating through the armour and the body of Satyaki, entered the earth like a hissing serpent entering its hole.

68. Then like an elephant afflicted with the goad-stroke, with his armour pierced through and shedding copious blood from the wound, that hero Satyaki left his bow and arrows.

69. And steeped in blood and loosing strength he squatted down on the terrace of his car. His driver then quickly drove him away from the vicinity of Drona's son.

70. Then that afflicter of his forces namely the son of Drona, pierced Dhristadyumna between his brows with another shaft of depressed knots furnished with beautiful wings.

71. The Panchala prince had ere this been much wounded, and now deeply pierced, he lost all his strength and caught hold of his flag-staff for supporting him.

72. Then fierce heroic warriors of the Pandava army rushed quickly to the rescue of Dhristadyumna, who then resembled an elephant assailed and afflicted by an enraged lion.

73. Those warriors were the diadem decked Arjuna, Bhimasena, Vrihat Kshatra of Puru's race, the youthful prince of the Chedis and Sudarsana the ruler of the Malavas.

74. Then all these brave warriors crying Oh and Alas and grasping their bows and arrows surrounded Drona's brave son on all sides.

75. Advancing twenty paces, each of these warriors shot with great care, five arrows at the revengeful son of Drona.

76. But Drona's son, almost at the same time cut off those twenty-five arrows shot at him with twenty-five sharp arrows of his own, resembling snakes of virulent poison.

77. Then Drona's son afflicted the scion of the Puru race with seven sharp arrows, the Malava king with three, Partha with one aud Vrikodara with six.

78. Thereupon, O king, all those mighty car-warriors, simultaneously and separately began to pierce the son of Drona with gold-winged arrows whetted on stone.

79. The youthful prince of the Chedis pierced Drona's son with twenty winged shafts, Partha with eight and all the rest with three arrows each.

80. Thereupon the son of Drona pierced Arjuna with six, and Vasudeva's son with ten and Bhima with five, and the youthful Chedi prince with four and the ruler of the Purus and the Malavas with a couple of shafts.

81. Piercing Bhima's charioteer with six and cutting off his bow and standard with two other arrows, and once more piercing Partha with a shower of arrows, the son of Drona uttered a dreadful war-cry.

82. Then as Drona's son shot his well-tempered, well-sharpened arrows, the earth, the welkin, the firmament, the cardinal and subsidiary quarters, all in his front and rear became covered with arrows of dreadful look.

83. Possessed of fierce energy and matching Indra himself in prowess, Aswathaman with three arrows, almost at the same time cut off the two arms, like Indra's poles, and the head of Sudarsana, as the latter was seated on his car.

84. Then piercing Paurava with a lance and cutting off his chariot into smaller fragments, by means of his shafts, Aswathaman severed the two sandal-smeared arms of his opponent; and then with a valla he severed his head from his trunk.

85. Endued with agility, he then pierced with numerous arrows resembling blazing flames of fire in energy, the young and the puissant prince of the Chedis of complexion like that of a blue lotus, and then despatched him to Death's domain, together with his steeds and driver.

86. Then beholding the king of the Malavas, the Pourava prince and the youthful ruler of the Chedis slain under his very eyes by the son of Drona, Pandu's son,

87. Bhimasena of mighty arms became filled with terrible rage; then with hundreds of sharp arrows, looking like enraged snakes,

88. That scorcher of foes covered the son of Drona. Then the highly powerful son of Drona baffling that shower of arrows,

89. Wrathfully pierced Bhima with sharp arrows. Then the mighty armed Bhima, possessed of great might in battle,

90. Cutting off the bow of Drona's son with a razor-headed arrow, pierced him with a winged shaft. Thereupon the high-souled son of Drona, throwing off that severed bow,

91. Took up another and pierced Bhima with winged shafts. Then Drona's son and Bhima, both valorous and possessed of might, in that battle,

92. Showered upon each other their arrowy showers like two clouds discharged with rain. Shafts, equipped with golden wing and bearing the name of Bhima, and whetted on stone,

93—94. Covered Drona,s son like masses of clouds covering the Sun. Similarly Bhima also was quickly covered over with hundreds and thousands of arrows of depressed knots, shot by Drona's son. Covered in battle by Drona's son accomplished in battle,

95—96. O Mighty monarch, Bhima was not at all pained; and that looked indeed wonderful. Then the mighty-armed Bhima discharged ten gold-decked arrows of great keenness resembling the darts of Death himself, at his adversary. Those shafts, O sire, falling upon the shoulder of Drona's son,

97. Quickly pierced her body like snakes entering into an ant-hill. Thus deeply pierced by the illustrious soul of Pandu, Drona's son,

98. Caught for support his flag-staff and shut his two eyes (in pain). But in a moment regaining his consciousness that son of Drona, O king,

99. Became excited to the highest pitch of anger, steeped as he was with profuse blood. Wounded deeply and firmly by the high-souled son of Pandu,

100—101. That mighty armed hero rushed furiously upon the chariot of Bhimasena. Then, O Bharata, he sped a group of hundred arrows, all endued with fierce energy, shot from a string drawn back to the car and resembling snakes of virulent poison. Ever boastful in battle, and in utter disregard of the prowess of his adversary Bhima,

102. That son of Pandu, soon discharged dreadful arrowy showers in Drona's son. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, cutting off with sharp arrows the bow of his foe, Drona's son,

103. Wrathfully struck Pandu's son on the breast with extremely keen darts. Thereat filled with a eager desire for revenge Bhimasena took up another bow,

104. And with fine sharp arrows pierced Drona's son in battle. Like two clouds at the expiration of summer, those two warriors, pouring showers of arrows,

105—106. And looking at each other with eyes coppery in rage soon covered each other. Thus covering each other and both filled with rage they fought on with each other producing sounds with their palms and desirous of counteracting each other's feats. Then stretching his mighty bow decked with gold,

107. Drona's son cast burning glances on Bhima who was shooting arrows at him from his vicinity. Aswathama then appeared like the Sun shining in the meridian in a day of Autumn.

108. So quickly did he then shoot his arrows that people could not mark when he took them out of his quiver, placed them on his bow-string, drew the string back and let them off.

109. Then as he shot those shafts, O mighty monarch, the bow of Drona's son looked like a circle of fire.

110. Arrows shot from his bow then, in hundreds and thousands, were seen to range through the welkin, like flights of locusts.

111. Those arrows discharged from the bow of Drona's son and decked with gold and dreadful, fell incessantly upon Bhima's car.

112. We then beheld the wonderful prowess, energy, might, perseverance and strength of Pandu's son Bhima, O Bharat,

113. Inasmuch as considering that dreadful showers of arrows, thick as a dense mass of gathering clouds falling round him, to be nothing more than a shower of rain at the close of summer,

114. Bhima of terrible prowess, desirous of slaughtering the son of Drona, in return poured his arrowy showers upon his foe, like a cloud in the season of rains.

115. Then the mighty and formidable bow of Bhima, of golden staff stretched continuously in that battle appeared beautiful like another bow of Indra (rainbow).

116. Issuing out of it, hundreds and thousands of shafts covered, in that battle, that ornament of battle namely Drona's son.

117. The arrowy showers discharged by them were so thick that the very wind, O sire, could not find space for blowing through them, O king.

118. Thereafter Drona's son, O king, shot at Bhima, desirous of slaying him, arrows of keen points, washed with oil.

119. Then exhibiting his superiority over his adversary Bhimasena cut each of those shafts into three fragments, before they could reach him. And the latter then said 'Wait, Wait.'

120. Once more the mighty son of Pandu, excited with rage, and desirous of slaying the son of Drona, discharged upon him a formidable shower of arrows.

121. Thereupon, Drona's son, acquainted with the use of the most excellent weapons, soon destroying that arrowy shower by the illusive force of his own weapons, cut off Bhima's bow in that battle.

122-126. Inflamed with fury he then pierced Bhima himself with numerous shafts. Then the highly puissant Bhima, when his bow was cut off, having whirled with impetuosity a lance hurled it at Aswathaman's car. But the son of Drona, displaying his great lightness of hands, cut off by means of his keen-arrows that lance as it flew towards himself, burning like a flame-beam. Meanwhile the formidable Bhima taking up a very strong bow smilingly began to wound the son of Drona with innumerable arrows. Then the son of Drona, O king, pierced the forhead of Bhima's driver with a straight-flying arrow. The latter then thus deeply pierced by the mighty son of Drona,

127—128. Was overwhelmed with a swoon, and the reins of the horses fell off from his hands. Then when the charioteer of Bhima was overwhelmed with a swoon the horses, O king, no longer restrained, fled away in great speed in the presence of all bowmen. Then seeing Bhima borne away from the field by those steeds,

129. The victorious Aswathaman cheerfully blew his large conch. Beholding Bhimasena carried away from the field, the Panchalas, 130—131. Filled with fear, abandoned the car of Dhristadyumna and fled in all directions. Then Drona's son discharging his arrows with great fury, pursued those routed troops spreading a terrible carnage in their ranks. Thus carnaged by the son of Drona those Kshatriyas fled away in all directions from fear of that illustrious warrior.

Thus ends the two hundred and first chapter, the display of Aswathaman's prowess in the Narayanstramokshana of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CCII.

(NARAYANASTRA-MOKSHANA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said.—

1. Beholding the troops broken and routed Kunti's son Dhananjaya of illustrious soul, rallied them from a desire of slaying the son of Drona.

2. Rallied with effort by Arjuna and Govinda, O king, the troops stayed on the field of battle.

3. Then Vibhatsu, supported by the Somakas, Matsyas, Andhas, and Pouravas returned to the charge.

4. Then the fierce bowman Savyasachin, rushing quickly upon Aswathaman having the lion's tail as the device on his banner, spoke these words to the latter.

5. "All your might, your energy, your knowledge, your manliness, your partiality for the sons of Dhritarashtra, your hostility against us,

6. And all your fiercest prowess do you now display to me. Even that son of Prisata who has slain Drona, your sire, will also humiliate your pride.

7. Encounter now the prince of the Panchalas, who is like the fire at the universal destruction or like the Destroyer of his foes, as also me accompanied by Kesava. To-day in battle I shall humiliate the pride of your haughty self.

Dhritarashtra said :—

8. The son of the preceptor is, O Sanjaya, worthy of honour, and possessed of prowess ; he loves Dhananjaya and enjoys the love of that high-souled warrior.

9. Ere this Vibhatsu had never addressed such words to him ; why then did the son of Kunti address his friend in that harsh language.

Sanjaya said :—

10. Upon the slaughtering of the youthful Chedi prince, of Vrihatkshatra of Puru's race and O king, of Sudarsana the chief of the Malavas, who was accomplished in the use of all weapons and conversant with the rules of military science.

11. Upon the defeat of Dhristadyumna, Satyaki and Bhima, and cut to the quick by those words of king Yudhisthira,

12. And agitated at heart and remembering all his former woes, O lord, Vibhatsu was possessed by an anger engendered by grief, the like of which had never possessed him before.

13. For this reason it was that like a mean fellow, he then addressed Aswathaman, the son of his preceptor, and worthy of his respect in such a vile, cruel, disagreeable and undeserving language.

14. Thus wrathfully addressed, O king, by Partha in that indecent and harsh language, that foremost of all best bowmen,

15. Namely the son of Drona, became extremely angry with Dhananjaya and specially with Krishna. Then that highly puissant hero, staying carefully on his car ruiced his mouth with water,

16. And then invoked into existence this Agneya weapon incapable of being resisted even by the gods. Aiming that weapon at his visible and hidden foes the preceptor's son,

17. That slayer of hostile heros, filled with extreme rage, let go with due Mantras that shaft that looked resplendent like fire without a curl of smoke.

18. Then from the welkin a thick shower of arrows began to fall, and wrapt up in fiery flames those arrows then surrounded Pritha's son on all sides.

19. Meteors dropped down from the concave dome, and the points of the compass did not any longer shine ; and suddeny a dreadful gloom enveloped the army in ts sober folds.

20. The Rakshasas and the Pisachas, joining together began to utter fierced yells; inauspicious winds began to blow and the Sun ceased to shine and give heat.

21. Ravens fiercely croaked on all sides; on the sky clouds emitted roars of thunder and showered torrents of blood.

22. Birds, beasts, kine, sages of illustrious vows and tranquil soul, could not then find any peace.

23. The very elements became perturbed, and the Sun appeared to evolve in an opposite course. The triune world seemed as if afflicted in consequence of being under the influence of a corroding fever.

24. Afflicted with the energy of that weapon, elephants and other creatures of the land fled with precipitation, breathing heavily and desirous of saving themselves from that fierce energy.

25. The watery expouses being heated, the acquatic creatures, scorched with the heat, O Bharata, could not find any ease.

26. Showers of shafts, swift-flying as Garuda or the wind itself, fell from all points of the compass, cardinal and subsidiary from the welkin and out of the earth.

27. Wounded with those arrows of Drona's son, arrows endued with the energy of the thunder, his foes, scorched and consumed began to fall down like trees consumed by fire.

28. Dreadfully schorched mighty elephants fell on the ground uttering terrible roars resembling the rumble of clouds.

29. Other huge elephants scorched with the burning heat fled and careered in fear in the battle-field as if in a forest set on fire.

30. O Sire, divisions of steeds, and hosts of cars were seen there burnt like the tops of trees during a forest conflagration.

31. Thousands and thousands of car divisions then fell on that field; and O Bharata, the illustrious God of fire then consumed that army of the Pandavas,

32. Like the Samvartaka fire consuming all creatures at the end of a Yuga. Beholding the Pandava troops consumed in that terrible battle,

33. Your warriors became filled with joy and they uttered loud and defiant war-cries. Then O Bharata, thousands of drums of various sorts,

34. Were quickly struck up by your troops when victory then appeared sure. The complete host of the Pandavas and Sabyasachin himself, O king,

35—36. Could not be seen in that dreadful battle in consequence of the darkness that then enveloped the world; O king, we neither heard of, nor beheld the like of that weapon that the revengeful son of Drona then invoked into existence. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, Arjuna invoked into existence the Brahma weapon,

37. That had been created by lotus-born Brahma for baffling all weapons. Then in a moment only that darkness was dispelled.

38. Cold breeze began to blow, and the points of the compass became clear and bright. We then beheld a wonderful sight, namely, a Askshouhini of the Pandavas laid low.

39. Their forms could not be distinguished, so horribly were they scorched by the energy of Aswathaman's weapon. Then the two heroic bowmen, Kesava and Arjuna, freed from that darkness,

40. Appeared like the two dispellers of darkness, the Sun and the Moon, rising in conjunction. The wielder of the Gandiva and Kesava were not at all wounded or injured.

41. Freed from that fire with their car, their banners and flags, and steeds, and excellent weapons, they then shone resplendent inspiring terrors at the heart of your troops.

42. Then from among the Pandava troops filled with delight, various confused sounds of life mingled with the sounds of drums and the blast of conchs.

43. Both the armies had thought Kesava and Arjuna to be destroyed. Beholding Kesava and Arjuna (freed from that fire of the weapon and that darkness) and seeing them quickly reappear,

44. Both uninjured and cheerful and blowing their excellent conchs, the Pandava troops were filled with delight whilst those of yours were greatly pained.

45. Then Drona's son also beholding those illustrious warriors freed and uninjured, became cheerless and O sire, for a moment only be thought. 'What is this?'

46. Thus reflecting, O king, and overwhelmed with grief and anxious contemplation, and sighing hot and heavily, he became cheerless in mind.

47. Then Drona's son throwing aside his bow, and leaping down with agility from his car, fled from the field of battle—saying :—" O Fie, O fie, every thing is untrue."

48. Then as he was flying, he came across the sinless Vyasa, that compiler of the Vedas, that receptacle of Saraswati, that habitation of the Vadas, who possess the hue of rain clouds.

49. O pepetuator of the Kuru race, then Drona's son beholding him stand before him, saluted and then in a voice choked in grief addressed him thus like one greatly distressed :—

50. O sire, O sire, is this an illusion or a caprice (on the part of the weapon) ? I do not know what this may be ? Why has this weapon been repulsed ? What has been my fault in the method of its invocation ?

51. Or is it something beyond the natural order of things or is it the defeat of the three worlds, inasmuch as the two Krishnas are still alive. Time indeed, is irresistible.

52. Neither Asuras, nor Gandharvas, nor Pisachas, nor Rakshasas, nor Snakes, nor Jakshas, nor insects, nor men,

53. Dare baffle this weapon invoked by me. This weapon however has become pacified having slain only one Akshouhini of troops.

54. I discharged this fierce weapon capable of slaying all things but why and how then did it not slay Kesava and Arjuna both possessed of attributes of the human kind.

55. O you possessor of the six qualities the Bhagas, explain to me all this truly as I have questioned you on the matter. O great sage, I want to hear the truth about the subject.

Vyasa said :—

56. What you have asked me from curiosity is a matter of great significance. I shall speak to you everything. Hear me attentively.

57. He that is called Narayana is the most ancient of the ancients ; that creator of the worlds took his birth as the son of Dharma for accomplishing a certain mission.

58. On the Himalaya hills, he performed severe austerities ; possessed of great energy, and resembling the Sun or the fire, he stood there with his arms upraised.

59. Endowed with eyes like lotus petals he reduced his bodily strength, by the observance of austerities for six and sixty housand years living all the while upon air only.

60. Again undergoing severe austerities of another kind for twice that period, he filled the space intervening between heaven and earth with his energy.

61—62. When in virtue of those austerities, O son, he became equal to Brahma ; then obtained a sight of that Master, Origin, and Protector, of the universe, the Lord of all the gods, the paramount Deity, who is highly difficult of being looked at ; who is smaller than the smallest, and larger than the largest ;

63. Who is denominated the Rudra, who is the Lord of all the superior ones, who is called Hara and Sambhu ; who wears matted locks on his head ; who imparts vital energy to all beings, who is the primordial cause of all the mobile and immobile things ;

64. Who is incapable of being resisted and of dreadful aspect, who possesses fierce anger and magnanimous soul, who is the all-destroyer and of generous heart, who bears the celestial bow and a pair of quivers, who is covered in a golden coat of mail and whose energy is infinite,

65. Who wields the Pinaka, who is armed with the thunderbolt, the blazing trident, the battle axe, mace and a large sword. Whose eye-brows are fair, whose locks are matted, who wields the heavy bludgeon, who bears the moon on his forehead, who is clad in tiger-skin, and who is armed with the heavy short club,

66. Who is furnished with beautiful angadas, who has got snakes round his neck in the shape of the sacred thread, who is surrounded by various creatures and numerous ghosts of the universe, who is the One, who is the receptacle of ascetic rites, and who is greatly admired by persons of venerable age,

67. Who is water, heaven, sky, earth, sun, moon, wind and fire, and who is the measure of the duration of the universe. Beings of evil mode of life can never obtain a sight of that unborn one, that slayer of all contemners of Brahmanas, that origin of immortality.

68—69. Only Brahmanas of pious mode of life, when purged of their sins and liberated from the influence of griefs obtain a sight of him, in their mind. Through the merits of his severe ascetic austerities Narayana beheld that undeteriorating, that most venerable one, that Being having the universe for his form. Beholding that best receptacle of all kinds of splendour, that divinity with a garland of Akshasas round his neck, Vasudeva with gratified soul became filled with delight, which he tried to express by his words, heart and understanding, and body. Then Nararayana worshipped that divine Lord, that primordial cause of the universe,

70. That giver of boons, that lord of illustrious soul engaged in sporting with the beautiful-limbed Parvati, and surroundd by hosts of ghosts,

71. That unborn one, and paramount ord, that unmanifest one, that essence of all causes and that undeteriorating one; then Narayayana of eyes like lotus petals, having saluted Rudra, that slayer of Andhaka, reverentially began to praise that god of three-eyes.

Narayana said :—

72. O most adorable one, O first of all the gods, the creators (the Prajapatis) who are the protectors of the world, and who having entered the earth,—your first creation—had, O lord, protected it before, have ing all sprung from you.

73. The celestials, the Asuras, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the Pisachas, human beings, birds, the Gandharvas, Yakshas, and all other creatures, with the whole of this universe, we know have all originated from you.

74. All acts done for gratifying Indra, Yama, Varuna, Kuvera, the Pitris, and Tashtri and the Moon, all are done to propitiate you. Form and light, sound and the etherial space, wind and touch, taste and water, scent and earth,

75. Time, Brahma, and the Vedas, and the Brahmanas, and all the mobile and immobile creatures have all sprung from you. Vapours rising up from expanses of water are turned into rain drops and which falling upon the earth, are separated from one another. When the hour of the universal dissolution comes, those separated individual drops once more unite together and make the earth one vast sheet of water.

76. He who is conversant with the nature of things, thus observing the origin and destruction of all things from you, comprehends your unity and oneness. Two birds (Iswara and Jiva), four Aswathas with their branches (the Vedas and the auxiliaries), the seven guardians (the five elements,and the heart and the understanding).

77. And the ten others (the ten senses) that constitute the city, the body) have all been created by you; but you are separate from and independent of them all; the past, the present and the future, beyond the sway of any body, have all originated from you, as also the seven worlds, and this universe.

78. I am your most devoted worshipper, be propitious on me; do not injure me by allowing evil thoughts to pierce into my heart. You are the soul of souls beyond all comprehension; he who recognises you to be the seed of the universe, attain to Brahma.

79. Out of a desire for paying homage o you, I am eulogising you, with a view to ascertain your real nature, O you that are beyond the comprehension of all gods. Worshipped by me, accord me the boons I desire to have, although they may be difficult of being acquired. Do not allow your illusion to shade you from me.

Vyasa said :—

80. Then that god of inconceivable soul, possessed of blue throat, and the wielder of the Pinaka bow, that divinity always eulogised by the sages, accorded boons unto Vasudeva, who deserved then all.

The auspicious Lord said :—

81. O Narayana, through my grace, among human beings, among the celestials, and the Gandharvas, you shall be one whose soul and strength will be immeasurable.

82. The celestials, the Asuras and the mighty serpents, the Pisachas, the Gandharvas, men and Rakshasas, none among these will be able to withstand you (in battle).

83. Neither Suparna, nor any Naga, nor any other creature born in the universe, nor even any of the gods shall be able to vanquish you in battle.

84. By weapons, or thunder-bolt, or fire, or wind, or with any object that is wet or dry, or with any mobile or immobile thing,

85. None will be able to cause you pain, in consequence of my grace. You will be superior in battle even to me, if perchance you ever fight with me."

Vyasa said :—

86. Thus in days gone by were these boons earned by Sourin. Even that god now roves on the face of the Earth (as Vasudeva) confounding the world by his llusion.

87. From the ascetic observances of the great Narayana, a mighty sage, called by the name of Nara was born. This latter is equal to the god Narayan himself. Know that Nara to be Arjuna.

88. These two sages, said to be older than the older gods, take their births in every Yuga for carrying on the easy rule of the universe.

89. You endued in energy and wrath also, O you of generous heart, have sprung from a portion of Rudra, through the merits of all your pious deeds, and as a consequenee of high ascetic austerities,

90. Being embodied, your intelligent self considered the world to be pervaded byt Mahadeva; and then for propitiating tha god you emaciated your body by the observance of hard vows.

91. Creating a white image of that foremost of male beings, O Bestower of honor, you adored him with homage, offerings and reiterating prayers.

92. Thus adored by you, the god became gratified on you in your previous life; and he then accorded to you, O learned one, excellent boons that you cherished in your heart.

93. Like those of Arjuna and Kesava, your acts, birth, austerities and Yoga have all been seperior; the god Mahadeva was adored by them as well as by you in every Yuga.

94. This, O Kesava, is devoted to Rudra and has sprung from Rudra himself. He ever adores Bhabha, recognising his Phallic from to be the origin of all forms.

95. In him are eternally present Atma Yoga and the undeteriorating Sashtra Yoga. The celestials, the Sidhas, and the foremost sages all adore him,

96. With a view to obtain that highest object in the world viz., Sthanu or Mahadeva: He is the creator of all. The eternal Krishna ought to be adored in all sacrifices.

97. Knowing the Phallic form of Siva to be the origin of all forms, the lord Kesava adores him. The god having the bull for his emblem entertains great respect for Kesava.

Sanjaya said :—

98. Hearing those words of his, that mighty car-warrior viz. the son of Drona, saluted Rudra and conceived a great regard for Kesava.

99. That one of controlled soul bowed also to that mighty sage (Krishna) and had the downs of his body erect. Then looking at his own divisions he withdrew them from the field of battle.

100. Thereupon, O ruler of men, the Pandava and the Kourava troops were both withdrawn, the latter highly defeated in consequence of the overthrow of Drona.

101. Fighting only for five days and spreading carnage among the Pandava troops, O king, that Brahmana Drona, conversant with the contents of all the Vedas, attained to the posthumous region of the Brahmanas.

Thus ends the two hundred and second chapter, the words of Vyasa, in the Narayanastra Mokshana of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CCIII.

(NARAYANSTRA-MOKSHANA PARVA)——Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. When that Atiratha, viz. Drona had been slain by the son of Prisata, what, O Sanjaya, did my troops and those of the Pandavas do afterwards?

Sanjaya said :—

2. When that Atiratha Drona had been slain by the son of Prisata, and when the Kourava ranks were broken and routed, Kunti's son Dhananjaya,

3. Beholding a wonderful sight indicative of his victory, questioned, O foremost of the Bharatas, the mighty sage Vyasa who had gone there at his own pleasure.

Arjuna said :—

4. When slaying my foes in battle with myriads of resplendent darts, I saw a male being of the effulgence of fire proceeding before me.

5. Raising his blazing trident wherever he turned, my foes in that direction, O mighty sage, he routed and scorched.

6. People think that I rout my foes whereas they are really routed by him. I only pursue from behind the troops already broken and routed by him.

7. O illustrious possessor of the six qualities the Bhagas, tell me who is that excellent of all male beings, whom I see armed with the trident and who resembles the Sun himself in effulgence.

8. He never touches the earth with his feet nor does he hurl his trident; but in consequence of his energy, thousands of arrows issue out of that trident of his.

Vyasa said :—

9—10. O son of Pritha, you have seen Sankara, that first af all the creators of the world, that lord of all energies, primary male being, he that is the embodiment of heaven, earth and sky, the divine Lord, the saviour of the universe, the paramount master, the bestower of boons, also called Ishana. O, do you seek the refuge of that boon-giving deity, that lord of the universe.

11. He was the Paramount Divinity, of illustrious soul, also called Ishana, the wearer of matted locks and the origin of all auspiciousness. He possesses three eyes, and mighty arms and fierce energy; and his locks are tied as a crown of his head and he is clad in deer-skin.

12. That supreme god, called Hara or Sthanu, is the lord of the universe and the giver of boons. He is the foremost of all beings in the universe and incapable of being vanquished. He is the afforder of joy to the universe, and is its paramount ruler.

13. The origin, the light and the refuge of the universe, he is ever attended with victory. He is the soul and the creator of the universe; and the universe is his form and he is ever-glorious.

14. The Lord of the universe, and its ruler, that great one is the lord of all action. Known by the name of Sambhu he is self-born, he is the lord of all creatures, and the origin of the past, present and future.

15. He is the Yoga and the lord of Yoga. He is called Sarva and is the lord of the lords of the world. He is superior to every thing. He is the most excellent of all things in the universe and the highest of all and is called Paramesthin.

16. He is the ordainer of the three worlds and the sole refuge of them all. He is the protector of the universe and incapable of being vanquished, and is beyond the reach of birth, decline and death.

17. The essence of knowledge and incapable of being comprehended by the understanding, and the best of all knowledge, he is unknowable. Out of his grace he gives to his worshippers the boons they desire.

18. That great one has for his companions, celestial beings of various forms, some of whom are dwarfs,some with matted locks, some with bald heads,some with short necks, some with large stomaches,

19. Some with huge bodies, some endued with great might and some with long ears. All of them have, O son of Pritha, distorted faces, mouths and legs, and strange dresses.

20. That great lord Mahadeva, O Partha, is adored by even these kinds of followers. That Siva, O son, possessed of energy, goes in advance of you through kindness only.

21—22. In that dreadful battle, O son of Pritha, capable of causing the hair to stand erect, who else, O Arjuna, except the divine Maheswara, that foremost of all bowmen, could even in his mind, dare defeat that host that was protected by those great smiters and bowmen, viz. Aswathaman, Karna and Kripa.

23. Nobody can venture to withstand the fighter, in whose front walks Mahadeva himself. There is no creature in the triune worlds who is a match for him.

24. At the very smell of the enraged Mahadeva, the enemy trembles and drops down senseless in large numbers in battle.

25. For this reason the gods in heaven ever adore and bow down to him. The men of this world as also others that have attained to heaven,

26. If they devoutly worship the boon-giving, auspicious and divine Rudra, the lord of Uma, obtain happiness here and the highst felicity hereafter.

27. O son of Kunti, bow down unto him who is peace incarnate, unto him called Rudra (or the fierce), who is of blue throat, exceedingly subtle, and of great effulgence,

28. Unto him known as Kapardin, him that is dreadful, him who possesses twany eyes, him that is boon giving; unto that great ordainer of red locks and righteous conduct, unto him who is ever-engaged in the performance of auspicious acts,

29. Unto him who is an object of desire with all beings; unto him who is of tawny eyes; him that is called Sthanu; him that is called Purusha; unto him of twany hair; him that is bald and him that is extremely subtle and of great splendour,

30. Unto him that is the giver of light, him that is the embodiment of all holy waters, him that is the god of gods, him that is possessed of great impetuousity; him that is of various forms; him who is called Sarva and is vested in pleasant garments,

31. Unto him that possesses an excellent turban, a handsome face and a thousand eyes; him that is the giver of rain, him that has the mountains for his habitation; him that is peace, him that is the protector, him that has the barks of trees for his cloth,

32. Unto him whose arms are adorned with ornaments of gold, him who is furious; him who is the lord of all the different quarters; him who is the master of clouds and of all created beings,

33. Unto him who is the lord of all trees and of kine; him that has his body covered with trees; him who is the general of the celestial armies; him who is the inspirer of all thoughts;

34. Unto him who has the sacrificial laddle in his hands; him who is effulgent, him who wields the bow; him who is Rama himself, him who has numerous semblances; him who is the lord of the universe; him who has the Munja grass for his attire;

35. Unto him who has a thousand heads; him who has a thousand eyes; and him who has a thousand arms and a thousand legs.

36. O sun of Kunti, seek the refuge of that Lord of the universe, who bestows boons, who is the lord of Uma, who possesses three-eyes and who is the destroyer of Daksha's sacrifice ;

37. Who is the protector of all created beings ; who is ever-cheerful ; who is the saviour of all ; who is undeteriorating in his glory ; who is called Kapardin, and whose gait is like that of the bull ; whose navel is like that of the bull and whose emblem is the bull,

38. Who is proud like the bull, who is the lord of the bull, who is known by the horns of the bull,, and who is the bull of bulls, whose banner-devise is the bull ; who is generous like the bull ; who has eyes like those of the bull ;

39. Whose weapons are all of superior make ; whose arrow is the Vrisha (Krishna), and who is righteousness incarnate ; who is called the Great Lord, whose stomach is extended and body prodigious ; whose seat is the leopard's skin,

40. Who is the lord of the worlds, who is the giver of boons, who is bald, who is devoted to the Brahmanas and who loves the Brahmanas, who is armed witn the trident, who is boon-giving ; who wields the sword and the buckles ; and who is the highly auspicious one :

41—42. Who uses the bow Pinaka, who is shorn of his battle-axe and who is the sovereign and the saviour of the universe. I totally consign myself to the care of that divine lord, that giver of protection, that god vested in deer's skin ; sa lutation to that lord of the gods who has Vaisravana for his friend, salutation to him of illustrious vows, to him whose companions are all best bow-men ;

43. To him who himself wields the bow, to that great Divinity with whom the bow is a favourite weapon ; who is himself the arrow hurled by the bow ; who is the bow-string and the bow and the preceptor instructing others in the use of the bow.

44. Salutations to that deity whose weapons are terrible, and who himself is the foremost of all gods ; salutations to him whose semblances are various, and who has got diverse bowmen as his attendants.

45. Salutations unto Sthanu, unto that best of all wielders of bow, salutations even to the destroyer of "Tripura," and the slayer of Bhaga.

46. Salutations unto the lord of the Vanaspatis (Trees &c.,) and to the lord of men ; salutations unto the lord of the celestial mothers, and to the lord of the Ganas.

47. Salutations ever to him who is the lord of kine and the master of all sacrifices. Salutations to the lord of waters and of the celestials ;

48. Salutations unto him who is the destroyer of Surya's teeth, who is of three eyes, who is the giver of boons, who is called Hara, who is blue-throated and who is of golden locks.

49. I shall now relate to you, according to my knowledge and as I have heard them related, all the divine deeds of the supremely wise Mahadeva.

50. If Mahadeva is worked up with rage, neither the gods, nor the Asuras, neither the Gandharvas, nor the Rakshasas, even if they conceal themselves in deep caves, can enjoy any peace.

51. In days of yore when Daksha had collected all the necessary objects for the celebration of his sacrifice, Mahadeva excited with rage destroyed them all ; indeed then he became unusually stern.

52. Shooting an arrow with his bow then, he uttered a tremendous roar. The celestials, who always perform acts beneficial to the world, then were filled with anxiety.

53. When the sacrifice was destroyed, and when Maheswara was enraged, the gods were greatly frightened at the sound produced by his twanging bow and his palm-strokes.

54. The gods and the Asuras all succumbed and fell down, and O son of Pritha, the waters were agitated and the earth trembled with everything on it.

55. The mountains split and the quarters of heaven and the Nagas became stupified. Enveloped in a pall of gloom the universe was lost to view.

56—57. The splendour of the luminaries as also of the Sun was destroyed. The Rishis filled with fear became agitated, and desirous of their own good and that of all other creatures, performed propitiatory rites. Then Sankara, smilingly rushed upon Pushana,

58. Who was eating the sacrifcial oblations, and then tore out his teeth. The gods then, bowing down to him, fled away trembling.

59. Once more Mahadeva aimed at the gods a shower of burning and sharp arrows resembling tongues of fire mixed with smoke, or clouds with lightning.

60. Beholding that arrowy shower, all the gods, bowing down to Maheswara, assigned to Rudra a substantial share in sacrifices.

61. Afraid, the gods sought his protection, O prince. His anger having subsided the great god re-established the sacrifice.

62. The gods that had fled away returned. Indeed they are afraid of Maheswara even to this day. Formerly the puissant Asuras had three cities in heaven.

63. One was made of gold, another of silver and the third of iron ; each of them was excellent and large. The golden city belonged to Kamalaksha, the silver city to Tarakaksha.

64. The third, made of iron, belonged to Vidyutmalin. Using all his weapons Maghabat failed to capture those cities.

65. Thereupon all the celestials, afflicted as they were, sought the refuge of Rudra. The gods then, with Vasava at their head, said these words to that high-souled one.

66. "The denizens of the three cities, having obtained boons from Brahma, and proud in consequence of those boons, are excessively opressing the worlds.

67. O Lord of the gods, O supreme Divinity, save yourself, there is none capable of slaying the Daityas. Do you slay those injurers of the gods.

68. O Rudra, then creatures immolated in every sacrifice will be yours. Do you therefore, O lord of the universe, over-throw those Asuras."

69. Thus addressed by the gods, and moved by the desire for benefiting them, Mahadeva said 'yea' to their proposals. Then he made the two mountains, viz. Gandhamadan and Vindhya the two bamboo poles of his car,

70. And the earth with all the oceans and the forests his chariot, and the snake Sesa the Aksha of his chariot.

71. The Sun and the Moon then became the wheels of the car of that god of gods, that wielder of the Pinaka bow. The three eyed Divinity then made Elapatra and Puspadanta the pins of his car.

72. The puissant Mahadeva then made the Malaya mountains the yoke and the great Takshaka the chord for fastening the yoke to the poles, and the other creatures about him the bounds of his steeds.

73. The mighty god then made the four Vedas the four steeds of his chariot ; the lord of the three worlds made the auxiliaries of the Vedas the briddle-bits of his steeds.

74. Mahadeva then made Gayatri and Savitri the reins, the mystic monosyllable Om the whip and Brahmana the driver.

75. Then making the Mandar mountains the bow, Vasuki its string, Vishnu its excellent arrows, Fire the arrow-head,

76. And Vayu the two wings of that arrow, Yama the feathers in its tail, lightning the whet-stone, and Meru his standard,

77—78. The god Siva, riding on that wonderful car composed of all the excellent celestial forces, proceeded for the destruction of the tripple city. Indeed Sthanu, that foremost of Smiters, that destroyer of Asuras, that most beautiful-looking warrior of infinite energy, adored by the gods and and Rishis, possessed of the wealth of asceticism, O Partha,

79. Created an excellent and unequalled array called after his own name, and then stood firm for a thousand years.

80. Then when the three cities came together on the firmament, he pierced them with that shaft of his having three knots.

81. The denizens of those cities, the Danavas, then could not look at that arrow composed of the Fire of Dissolution and of Vishnu and Soma.

82. When the tripple city began to burn, the goddess Durga went to see the sight, with a child on her lap having only five clumps of hair on its head.

83. Uma then asked the gods who that child was. The malevolent Indra then tried to strike him with the thunder bolt.

84. Thereupon the all-powerful Lord of all the worlds, possessed of the six excellent qualities the Bhagas, smilingly paralysed the arm of the enraged Indra wielding the thunder-bolt.

85. Then with his arm paralysed, Sakra, surrounded by the celestials, quickly proceeded to the undeteriorating Brahma.

86. Then the gods bowing their heads down to Brahma addressed him, with folded arms, thus :—"O Brahma, what wonderful creature is now lying on the lap of Parvati ?

87. As he appeared to be a mere boy we did not offer salutations to him. But we have been defeated totally by him. It is therefore that we want to ask you about him.

88. With Purandara to head us, we were easily defeated by that boy though he did not at all fight with us." Hearing those words of theirs, that foremost of all conversant with Brahmas viz., Brahma,

89. Reflected for a while and then decided that boy of infinite prowess to be a manifestation of Sambhu himself, that possessor of the six illustrious qualities, the Bhagas. Then the almighty Brahma addressing Sakra and other foremost of celestials, thus spoke :—

90. "He is the almighty lord Hara, the Master-ruler of the mobile and immobile creation. There is nothing superior to that foremost of gods known by the name of Maheswara.

91. That boy of immeasurable effulgence whom you have seen with the goddess, is Siva himself, assuming the boy-like appearance for gratifying Parvati.

92. Let therefore yourselves with me seek his refuge,—that god who is the ruler of all the worlds and the possessor of the six illustrious qualities, the Bhagas.

93—94. O gods, you could not recognise that lord of the worlds." Thereafter the celestials with the Prajapati approached that boy of the radiance of the rising Sun. Then Brahma beholding the mighty lord and the grandsire knowing him to be the paramount master, began to adore him thus :—

Brahma said :—

95. You are the sacrifice, you are the refuge of this world and you are its sole stay. You are Bhava, you are Mahadeva, you are the abode of all things and you are the most supreme of all things.

96. Yourself pervade the whole universe with its mobile and immobile creatures. O lord of the past and the future, O lord of the Lokas, O master of the universe, be propitious on Sakra afflicted as he is with your wrath.

Vyasa said :—

97. Hearing the words of the lotus-sprung Divinity, Maheswara then became propitiated, and desirous of showering his grace, he then laughed aloud.

98. Then the celestials gratified both Uma and Maheswara with eulogies. Then the arm of the wielder of the thunderbolt once more regained its natural state.

99. Then that illustrious Divinity whose emblem is the bull, and who had destroyed the sacrifice of Daksha, together with his better half, became gracious on the gods.

100. He is Rudra, he is Siva, he is Agni, he is all and the knower of all. He is Indra, he is Vayu, he is the twin Aswins and he is lightning.

101. He is Bhava, he is Parjanya, he is Mahadeva and he is sinless. He is the Moon, he is Ishana, he is the Sun and he is Varuna,

102. He is Time, he is the Destroyer, he is death, he is Yama and day and night; He is a month, a fortnight, as well as the seasons, the twilights and the complete year.

103. He is Dhata and Vidhata, the soul of the universe and the doer of all acts of the universe. Himself formless, he is embodied in the person of all the celestials.

104. He is eulogised by all the gods. He is one and many. He is hundred, he is thousand and he is hundreds of thousands.

105. Brahmanas versed in the Vedas, say that he has two forms,—one is dreadful and the other peaceful—These two again are divided in numerous portions.

106. His terrible forms are Fire, Vishnu and Vashkara (the Sun); and his peaceful forms are, water, the luminaries and the moon.

107. Whatever there is highly mysterious in the Vedas, their auxiliaries, in the Upanishadas, in the Puranas, and in Metaphysics, is identical with the god Maheswara.

108. Such is the Lord Mahadeva, that Divinity without birth and that possessor of the six illustrious qualities the Bhagas. It is beyond my power to enumerate all the qualities or that Lord,

109—110. Even if, O son of Pandu, I were to recount them for a thousand years. On those who are under the malicious influence of evil stars, on those who are stained with every sin,

111. That great protector is pleased and grants them salvation, if indeed they seek refuge in him. He grants and takes away, life, health, prosperity, wealth, and all other kinds of desirable objects. The prosperity seen in Indra and other gods is really his.

112. He is present in both the evils and good that exercise influence over the human kind. He gets by a fiat of his will whatever prosperity he desires. Therefore is he called the Lord Paramount.

113. He is called Maheswara and he is the supreme lord of all superior creatures. In multefarious forms of many kinds, he pervades the universe.

114. What is known as the mouth of that god is the ocean; and it is well-known that assuming the form of the sea-fire it drinks the libations in the shape of water.

115. This Divinity ever dwells in the places of cremation. Men worship this god there where only the braves can go.

116. The effulgent forms of this lord are many and marvellous; those forms are worshipped in the worlds and are praised and spoken of by men.

117. Many also are the names of truthful import of this Divinity. known in the worlds. Those names are all founded upon his supremacy, omnipotence, and his acts.

118. In the Vedas, the excellent hymn called Sata Rudriya has been sung in his praise, he who is the great Lord called the infinite Rudra.

119. That divinity is the Lord of all wishes both human and heavenly. He is the Lord Paramount and the supreme ruler and pervades this extensive universe.

120. The Brahmanas and the sages call him the most ancienf of beings. He is the first-born of all the gods, and fire came out from his mouth.

121. As he always and by every means protects the creatures of the universe, and always finds pleasure in their company, and as he is the lord of them all, he is truly called Pasupati.

122. As his Phallic form is ever present in the observance of the Brahmacharyya vow, and as it adds to the glory of the world,—he is called Maheswara.

123. The Rishis, the celestials, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras, worship the Phallic emblem of this god, that ever remains erect.

124. When his Phallic unblem is worshipped Maheswara becomes glad and is pleased and delighted and transported with joy.

125. As in the past, the present, and the future, the god has many forms, both mobile and immobile, he is truly called Vahurupa.

126. With one of his eyes blazing forth, he appears to have eyes on all sides of his body; and as in his wrath, he possesees the worlds, he is called Sarva.

127. As his form is like that of smoke he is called Dhurjati; and as the Devas in the world are present in him he is called Viswarupa.

128. As three goddesses viz., the sky, the firmament and the water, ever worship that lord of the worlds, therefore he is truly called Tryambaka.

129. As he ever helps in the accomplishment of all acts, and increases the wealth of men and is engaged in doing good to them, therefore he is called Siva.

130. Possessed of thousand or ten thousand eyes, or eyes on all sides of his body, as he ever protects the universe, he is called Mahadeva.

131. As he is Great and Ancient and is the fountain of life, and the cause of its continuance, and as his Phallic from is eternal, he is called Sthanu.

132. The rays of light that proceeding from the sun and Moon, are seen in the worlds, are said to be the hair of his head, and therefore is he called Vyomakesa.

133. As he destroys Brahma, Indra, Varuna, Kuvera and Yama, after having afflicted them greatly, therefore is he called Hara.

134. Since he is the Past, the Future and the Present, and in fact, everything in the universe and since he is the origin of the past, the future and the present, he is for that reason called Bhava.

135. Whatever of soundness or unsoundness there is in the bodies of men, is said to be his manifestation. He is the Pana and Apana breaths in embodied creatures.

136. He that ever worships the Phallic emblem of that illustrious god, attains great prosperity even by such worship of his.

137. Below his two thighs the forms are fiery; the other half of his auspicious body is in the moon. So also half his soul is fire and half the moon.

138. His auspicious form surcharged with energy is more blazing than all the forms of the other gods. Amongst men his blazing and dreadful form is called Fire.

139. With his auspicious form he practises the vow Brahmacharya, whereas with the dreadful form he has, he devours everything.

140. As he burns, as he is keen, and fierce and endued with the great prowess, and as he devours flesh, blood and marrow, he is called Rudra.

141. The word Kapi is said to mean supreme, and Vrisha to mean righteousness; therefore that god of gods, the possessor of the illustrious qualities the Bhagas, is called Vrisha Kapi.

142. Shutting his two eyes, that Potent Lord created a third on his forehead by sheer force; and therefore is he called the Three-eyed.

143. It is this god of gods, the paramount lord, the wielder of the Pinaka bow, O Partha, whom you have seen go before you slaying your enemies.

144. After you had vowed to slay the ruler of the Sindhus, O sinless one, Krishna showed you this god, in your deam, seated on the top of that best of mountains.

145. It is this god, the possessor of the six illustrious qualities, that goes before you in battle. It is he who gave you weapons with which you slew the Danavas.

146. That excellent, praiseworthy, life-giving, holy hymn approved of by the Vedas, in honor of that god, known by the name of Satarudriya has now been explained to you, O Partha.

147-148. This hymn of four parts, capable of accomplishing every object, is holy, destructive of all sins, and capable of driving away all stains and destroying all sorrow and all fears. The man that always hear it succeeds in vanquishing all his enemies, and is held in high veneration in the region of Rudra.

149—150. The person that always attentively reads or hears the recital of this excellent and auspicious piece of history relating to the fight fought by the illustrious deity, and who worships reverentially that generous lord of the universe, obtains all high objects of desire, through the grace of the three-eyed God.

151. Go and fight, O son of Kunti; you are not destined to meet with defeat.—You who have Janardana by your side as your counsellor and protector.

Sanjaya said :—

152. Then the son of Parasara having addressed Arjuna in the above manner returned, O foremost of the Bharatas, O afflictor of foes, to the place from which he came.

Thus ends the two hundred and third chapter, the description of the Sata-Rudriya, in the Narayanastramokshana of the Drona Parva.

CHAPTER CCIV.

(NARAYANASTRAMOKSHANA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The highly puissant Drona belonging to the Brahmana order, having fought dreadfully for five days, was slain, O king, and repaired to the region of Brahma:

2 Whatever benefit is derived from a perusal of the Vedas, is also reaped by a perusal of this Parva, in which the achievements and feats of many brave Kshatriyas have been described.

3. He that always reads it or hears it read by others is freed from most heinous sins and liberated from the bondages of his atrocious acts.

4. Hear from the Brahmanas may reap the fruits of the accomplishment of a sacrifice; the Kshatriyas may obtain victory in dreadful battle; and the other orders may obtain desirable objects and good sons and grandsons.

Thus ends the two hundred and fourth chapter, the fruit of the perusal of the Drona Parva, in the Narayanastramoksha, of the Drona Parva. Thus ends also the Narayanastramoksha Parva.

KARNA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana), and the highest of all the male beings (Nara) and also the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati), let us cry success!

Vaisampayana said :—

1. O king, after Drona had been killed, the monarchs headed by Duryodhana, with greatly anxious hearts, all went to the son of Drona.

2. Thereupon mourning for the death of Drona, they (the kings) being highly oppressed with grief and deprived of energy on account of their gloominess of mind sat around the son of Saradwata.

3. Then having comforted him for a short while by citing reasons arrived at in the Shastras, the rulers of the earth departed to their respective abodes on the advent of the night.

4. O descendant of the Kuru race, the lords of the earth could not enjoy pleasure while resting in their own abodes; and they could not obtain sleep, thinking of that immense massacre.

5. Especially the son of Suta, king Suyodhana, Dusasana and Sakuni could not at all sleep.

6. And they passed together that night in the abode of Duryodhana, whilst they were seriously thinking of the griefs with which the lofty-minded Pandavas were afflicted.

7. Recollecting these, viz., that they (the Pandavas) were greatly oppressed during the game at dice, and also that Krishna (Draupadi) was (forcibly) brought to the assembly (of kings), they greatly regretted, with hearts filled with anxiety.

8. Thus reflecting upon those miseries resulting from the gambling match, (which the Pandavas had become subject to), their night had passed away with great uneasiness, which (night), O king, seemed to be (so long as) a hundred years.

9. Thereupon at the break of day they, being obedient to the injunctions of ordinance, all performed the necessary ceremonies, prescribed by the established usage.

10. Having finished all the necessary ceremonies, and consoled themselves, they, O Bharata, ordered for the array of soldiers and then started for battle,

11—12. After having made Karna their generalissimo with the due performance of the most auspicious rites (by tying a thread round his wrist) and having adored the foremost of the regenerate persons by offerings of vessels of curds, clarified butter, and vessels filled with corn and other auspicious articles, as well as by presents of gold-coins, kine, and gems, valuable cloths, and immense wealth, and also having been praised by the charioteers and panegyrists, born in the country of Magadha, (the Magadha-panegyrists are the mixed tribes born of a Kshatriya mother and a Brahmana father), with hymns about victory.

13. O monarch, the Pandavas on the other hand, having similarly performed the morning ceremonies, came out of their tents; and, O king, they were resolved upon the battle.

14. Thereupon the formidable battle began, which caused the hairs of the body stand erect, between the Kurus and the Pandavas, each party being desirous of vanquishing the other.

15. O monarch, the most formidable battle, between the troops of the Kurus and those of the Pandavas, lasted only for two days during the leadership of Karna.

16. Thereupon Vrisha (Karna), having brought about an immense slaughter of the opponents in battle, was himself slain by Falguna (Arjuna), whilst the sons of Dhritarastra were observing it.

17. Thereafter Sanjaya departed towards the city of Hastinapur, and told all to Dhritarastra, that had taken place at Kurujangala.

Janamejaya said :—

18. Having heard that both Bhishma and the car-warrior Drona of indomitable courage were slain (in the battle), the old king (Dhritarashtra) the son of Amvika, was highly oppressed with sorrow.

19. Having heard of the death of Karna the benefactor of Duryodhana, how could he, O best of the regenerate persons, hold his life, much agrieved as he was ?

20. How could that royal descendant of Kuru hold his life, after having heard of the fall of that hero, on whom he supposed the hope of his sons' victory to rest ?

21. I suppose that men, falling in the most distressful circumstances, find greatest difficulty in yielding up their lives ; for, the king, even after hearing of the death of Karna, could not (possibly) forsake his life.

22—23. As, O twice-born one, having heard of the fall of the old son of Santanu, of Valhika, of Drona, of Somadatta, of Vurisrabas, as well as of other friends, of his sons, and grandsons, the king did not give up his life ; so, I suppose, that to yield up one's life is, O regenerate person, highly difficult.

24. Relate to me all these in their entirety, as they had really taken place. I am not (at all) satisfied with (simply) hearing the mighty achievements of my forefathers.

Thus ends the first chapter, the speech of Janamejaya, of the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER II.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O great king, when Karna was slain, the son of Gavalgana, greatly mortified in heart, repaired that very night to the city of Nagpur, in the back of horses resembling the wind in swiftness.

2. He then arrived at the city of Hastinapur ; and, with a greatly anxious heart, repaired to the house of Dhritarastra which had now been vacated by all its friends.

3. He then beholding the king deprived of energy in consequence of his gloominess of mind, folded his hands : and, indeed, worshipped the monarch's feet by bowing down his head.

4. Having worshipped the ruler of the earth, Dhritarastra, according to the just rites, and having uttered—Alas ! and woe ! —he then addressed him saying :—

5. O ruler of earth, I am Sanjaya ! Are you not at ease ? After having obtained distress by your own faults, are you not now deprived of all your senses ?

6. The good advices, uttered (given) by Vidura, Drona, son of Ganga, and Keshava, were not received by you. Do you not feel pain to remember them now ?

7. Also do you not feel pain to remember the rejection of the good advices given to you by Rama, Narada, Kanwa, and others in the assembly (of kings) ?

8. Remembering that your friends, Bhishma, Drona, and others, who were ever occupied in contributing to your welfare, were slain by the enemies in battle, do you not feel pain ?

9. Sighing heavy and hot, the king, oppressed with grief, addressed in these words the son of Suta, who with folded hands, was telling him the above :

Dhritarastra said :—

10. O Sanjaya, owing to the deaths of that heroic wielder of celestial weapons, the son of Ganga, and the mighty bowman, Drona, my heart greatly aches.

11. That mighty hero, who was the incarnation of the (eighth) Vasu, killed every day ten thousand car-warriors protected by armour.

12. He (that mighty hero) was killed in the battle by the son of Yajnasena (namely) Shikhandin, who was protected by the Pandavas. At this (occurrence) my heart greatly aches.

13. The son of Vrigu gave to that lofty-minded one (that hero, Bhishma) the knowledge of the best weapons. To him also, during the childhood, the science of the bow was taught by Rama himself.

14. Through whose (Drona's) kindness, the sons of Kunti,—the royal sons,—the mighty car-warriors,—as well as several other rulers of earth, attained the abilities of a Maharathee (one simultaneously fighting with ten thousand bowmen) :—

15. Hearing of that mighty bowman, Drona, who was true to his aim, slain by Dhristadyumna in battle, my heart greatly aches.

16. Those two had not a peer in this world in the wielding of the fourfold weapons. Hearing that both Drona and Bhishma were slain in the battle, my mind is greatly pained.

17. In the three worlds there is no person, who is equal to him in the use of weapons. Hearing the death of this hero, Drona, what did my followers do ?

18. The army of the Samsaptakas was sent away to the region of Yama by Dhananjaya, the lofty-minded son of Pandu, through the exertion of his terrible prowess.

19. (After the above occurrence and also) after the Narayana weapon of the most intelligent son of Drona had been destroyed, as also after the divisions of my army had fled away (from the battle-field), what did the troops of my side do?

20. I think that, on the death of Drona, my troops, plunged deep into the ocean of grief, ran away (from the field of battle), even as the ship-wrecked mariners float on the ocean.

21.—22. O Sanjaya, when my troops had run away (from the battle field), what had become the color of the faces of Duryodhana, Karna, Kritavarman the ruler of the Bhojas, Shalya the king of the Madras, Ashwathaman the son of Drona, and Kripacharja, as well as of the remaining sons of mine, and several other monarchs.

23. O son of Gavalgana, relate to me all those in detail that had actually happened in battle as to the prowess shown by Pandavas as well as by the troops of my own side.

Sanjaya said :—

24. O Lord of kings, you should not be pained to hear of what had taken place in respect to the Kouravas through thy misconduct. For, the learned sage never feels any anguish at what is brought about by Fate.

25. What is not likely to happen to man (being subject to Fate) may happen to him; or what is likely to take place may, again, happen to a person. Hence at the acquisition or non-acquisition of the purposes the learned sage should not at all grieve.

Dhritarashtra said :—

26. O Sanjaya, no great anguish does find place in me. For, I think that all this is (the unavoidable consequence of) superior destiny. So, do you describe according as you desire.

Thus ends the second chapter, the parley between Sanjaya and Dhritarashtra, of the Karna Parva.

CPAPTER III.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When that mighty bowman Drona, was slain, your sons, the great car-warriors, became pale-faced, gloomy, and senseless.

2. And, O king, all those who were armed with the weapons, stood speechless; and highly oppressed with grief, they neither beheld nor spoke any words to one another.

3. O descendant of the Bharata race, seeing them changed in countenance, on account of their being oppressed with sorrow, your troops, themselves being highly afflicted with grief and anxiety, looked upwards.

4. Beholding the death of Drona in battle, O foremost of kings, the weapons of many of them, indeed besmeared with blood, dropped down from their hands.

5. O great monarch, O descendant of the Bharata race, several of those (weapons), still retained by the troops in the various parts of their bodies, were seen hanging, like the meteors of heaven (pending from above).

6. O great monarch, seeing your force (his own troops) thus eclipsed (by that of the Pandavas), and standing as if lifeless, king Duryodhana addressed them, saying :—

7. "Depending upon the strength of your arms, this war had been entered into and the descendants of Pandu had also been summoned to the battle by me.

8. But you, however, look very cheerless (dispirited) now in the death of Drona. All the warriors engaged in battle are slain in battle.

9. Victory or death falls to the lot of one who is engaged in battle. What wonder then there is in this (the fall of Drona)? So do you fight with your faces in all directions.

10. Do you behold that lofty-minded Karna, the son of Vikartana, that highly powerful and mighty bowman,—that wielder of celestial weapons, who is roving about in the (field of) battle.

11. Through fear, indeed, Dhananjaya,—that coward son of Kunti,—always flies away from him in battle, even as the small deer (does) from a lion.

12. It is by him that Bhimasena of mighty strength, endowed with the force of ten thousand elephants, was brought, through the tactics of warfare that are peculiar to man, into the same circumstance.

13. It is by him that Ghatatkacha, that wielder of celestial weapon, that god, that enchanter, that one who made a tremendous roar, was slain in battle through the most indomitable power.

14. Do you behold to-day in battle the inexhaustible strength of arms of that intellectual one, who is of unsubdued energy, and of fixed purpose.

15. Do you behold to-day the prowess of both the son of Drona and the son of Radha who are high-souled, among the troops of the Pandus and the Panchalas.

16. All of you are, however, capable of slaying in battle the sons of Pandu with their troops even fighting singly. What then, when fighting together? Endowed with immense strength and acquainted with the use of 'weapons, do you behold to-day one another (engaged in battle?.'

Sanjaya said :—

17. O faultless one, having thus addressed, your son (Duryodhana) of mighty prowess, (after having consulted) with his brothers, afterwards made Karna the generallissimo (of the Kuru troops).

18. O king, after having obtained the generalship (of the Kuru army) the mighty car-warrior Karna, invincible in battle, engaged himself in battle, making a tremendous roar like a lion.

19. He caused a great slaughter among the Srinjayas, all the Panchalas, the Kekayas, and the Videhas, in the sight of all.

20. Hundreds of arrows most fearfully issued from his bow, one closely following the wings of another like the lines of bees (flying away from the hive).

21. Having oppressed the Pandavas and the Panchalas, of immense activity, and killed thousands of heroes, he, at last, was slain by Arjuna.

Thus ends the third chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, of the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER IV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having heard this (the above intelligence), the great king Dhritarastra, the son of Ambika, experienced, indeed, the farthest limit of grief, and considered Suyodhana slain (in the battle); and highly perturbed, he fell down upon the ground, like an elephant, that had lost all his senses.

2. O the most excellent of the Bharata race, on the fall of the highly agitated and foremost of monarchs upon the ground, there was a tremendous wailing of women, which (the noise) filled the entire earth to all its points.

3. The ladies of the household of Bharata, greatly burnt in grief, and with hearts filled with great anxiety, bewailed most bitterly, plunged as they were in the very deep ocean of sorrow.

4. O best of the Bharata race, advancing towards the king, Gandhari, as well as all other ladies of the royal household, fell down upon the ground, all having lost their senses.

5. Thereupon, O monarch, Sanjaya consoled those ladies, who were highly oppressed with sorrow and deprived of their senses, and who, again, were copiously shedding tears from their eyes.

6. Inspite of their being comforted (by Sanjaya), those ladies shivered every moment like the plantain trees constantly shaken by the wind.

7. Thereupon Vidura, too, began to sprinkle water over the face of that descendant of Kuru, and consoled that powerful monarch, who had eyes of wisdom.

8. O Lord of earth, having gradually attained to consciousness, and understanding the miserable plight of those ladies, the monarch, like a senseless being, remained silent for sometime.

9. Thereupon he, reflecting (upon the matter) for a pretty long time, and sighing heavily and incessantly, condemned his own sons but spoke highly of the Pandavas.

10. Then having condemend his own reason as well as that of Shakuni the son of Suvala, and meditated (upon the matter) for a long while, the king trembled at every moment.

11. The king had, again, restrained his mind, and collected enough of patience. Then he asked his charioteer Sanjaya, the son of Gavalgana, these words :—

Dhritarastra said :—

12. O Sanjaya, whatever words were uttered by you were all heard by me. O charioteer, has not my son Duryodhana gone to the region of Yama?

13. Has my son, who is ever desirous of victory, grown desperate of success? O Sanjaya, do you repeat to me in detail truly what you have said already.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. O Janamejaya, having been thus asked, the Suta addressed the king, saying :—"O king, the son of Vikartana, that mighty car-warrior, was killed in battle along with his sons and brothers, as well as the other warrior sons of Suta, who were all great bowmen, and who also were ready to give up their lives in battle.

15. Dusasana, too, was slain in an encounter by Bhimasena, that famous son of Pandu, who had drunk his (Dusasana's) blood out of anger.

Thus ends the fourth chapter, the bewailing of Dhritarastra, of the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER V.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O great king, hearing this intelligence, Dhritarastra, the son of Ambika, with a heart filled with great anxiety on account of sorrow, addressed his charioteer Sanjaya thus :—

2. "O son, on account of the dishonest policy of my son, who has no foresight of the distant future, the son of Vikartana was slain in battle. Hearing this, I find my vital parts all cut asunder.

3. Do you now remove all my doubts, who are most willing to bridge over this ocean of sorrow, by relating to me, who amongst the Kurus and the Pandavas are yet alive and who are already dead.

Sanjaya said :—

4. O monarch, after having killed an innumerable number of the Sanjayas and the Panchalas, Bhishma, the son of Santanu, of mighty strength, and of indomitable courage, was slain after ten days (of the battle).

5. Again, after having killed the whole force of the Panchalas in battle, the mighty bowman Drona of indomitable courage, riding upon a car of gold, was slain afterwards.

6. Having slain the half of the troops, that had survived the slaughter by the high-souled Bhishma and Drona, Karna, the son of Vikartana, was at last killed.

7. O great king, having killed hundreds of Anarta warriors, the royal son Vibingsati of mighty strength was himself slain in battle.

8. Thereupon your heroic son Vikarna, having remembered the duties of a Kshatriya, stood in front of the enemies, without his weapons on, and also without a conveyance.

9. He was slain by Bhimasena, who had (at the time) recollected the most severe and innumerable wrongs inflicted upon him by Duryodhana, and also the most solemn promise of his own.

10. Having performed the most striking exploits in battle, the two royal sons, Vindu and Anuvindu, of the country of Avanti, of mighty prowess, departed to the region of Death.

11—12. That heroic leader, under whose control ten kingdoms remained, the foremost of which was the kingdom of Sindhu ; and, who, again, was under your subjection :—that one Jayadratha, O monarch, of mighty prowess, was slain by Arjuna, after he had subdued eleven Akshauhinis by his sharp arrows.

13. So also the son of Duryodhana, of immense activity and incapable of being vanquished in battle, and resting ever obedient under the command of his father, was killed by the son of Subhadra.

14. So again the heroic son of Dusasana looking most terrible in battle and endowed with the mighty strength of arms, was sent away to the region of Yama by the son of Draupadi, who careered in battle showing forth his prowess.

15—16. The most virtuous king Vagadatta, ever obedient to the duties of a Kshatriya, who was the paramount lord of the Kiratas—dwelling in the low-land countries on the sea-coast, and who, again, was the most esteemed and intimate friend of the king of the celestials, was sent away to the region of Yama by Dhananjaya showing forth his prowess (in battle).

17. O monarch, similarly Vurisrabas, the heroic son of Somadatta, of great renown,—the kinsman of the Kauravas,—was slain in battle by Satyaki.

18. Fearlessly roving about in the field of battle, the Amvastha chief Srutayus, the most exalted of the Kshatriyas, was slain by Savyasachin.

19. O great king, your ever wrathful son Dusasana, who is well acquainted with the science of weapons, and who is incapable of being vanquished in battle, was slain by Bhimasena.

20. O monarch, that Sudakshina, who had under him several thousands of extraordinary warriors fighting on elephants, was slain in battle by Savyasachin.

21. Having slain several hundreds of the enemies, the lord of the Koshalas was himself sent to the abode of Yama by the son of Suvadra showing forth his prowess in battle.

22. Having fought several times with that great car-warrior Bhimasena, your son Chitrasena was slain by Bhimasena.

23. The heroic younger brother of the king of Madras, inspiring greater terror in the enemies—that handsome wielder of sword and shield,—was slain by the son of Suvadra.

24—25. The highly energetic Vrisasena of steady prowess, and ready in managing the weapon,—that peer of Karna in battle, was sent to the abode of Yama by Dhananjaya, who, remembering the death of his son and also his own solemn vow, showed forth his prowess in battle.

26. That Srutayus, O king of the earth, who always entertained animosity against the Pandavas, was reminded of that animosity, before he was slain by the son of Pritha.

27. O,Sire, O monarch, Rukmaratha the son of Shalya, of mighty prowess,—that brother |(of Shahadeva), being son of the latter's maternal uncle,—was slain by Shahadeva in battle.

28. Both the old king Vagiratha and Vrihatkshatra, the chief of the Kekayas, highly powerful, possessed of prowess and greater energy as they were, were also killed in battle.

29. O monarch, the highly powerful and wise son of Vagadatta was slain by Nakula, who moved about in 'the field of) battle like a hawk.

30. So also your grand father Valhika, endued with great strength and prowess, was slain by Bhimasena with all the Valhikas.

31. Then again, O monarch, the Magadha prince Jayatsena, the most powerful son of Jarasandha, was slain in battle by the lofty-minded son of Subhadra.

32. Your son Durmukha and the other son the great car-warrior Dussaha,—both of them are considered to be the most heroic,—were slain in battle by Bhimasena by means of his mace.

33. Having achieved the extraordinary exploits in battle, Durmarsana, Durvisaha, and the great car-warrior Durjaya departed to the region of Death.

34. Having achieved the extraordinary exploits in battle, both the brothers, Kalinga and Vrishabha, who are inca able of being vanquished in battle, departed to the abode of Death.

35. Your highly energetic minister, the Suta Vrisavarman, was sent to the abode of Death by Bhimasena, who displayed his superior prowess in battle.

36. In the same way, the great king Paurava, possessing the power of the thousand elephants, was slain with all his attendants by Savyasachin, the son of Pandu.

37. O great monarch, the great smiters of foes, the two thousand Vashati troops, as well as all the Surasenas possessed of great prowess, were slain in battle.

38. The Abhishaha troops, the mighty smiters of foes, who are all clad in armour and most fierce in battle, as also the powerful car-warriors, the Shivi soldiers, all were slain with the Kalingas.

39. So also those other heroes, gradually grown up in Gokula, who were most furious in battle, and had never turned their backs in the field, were slain by Savyasachin.

40. Having approached Partha, many thousands of the Sreni warriors, as well as the army of the Samsaptakas, all these departed to the abode of Death.

41. O powerful monarch, your brothers-in-law, the princes Vrishaka and Achala, displaying their mighty prowess in battle for your sake, were slain by Savyasachin.

42. The Shalya king of mighty strength and active habits, who was a great bowman both in name and deeds, was slain in battle by Bhimasena.

43. O powerful monarch, Aghovat and Vrihantha, both exerting themselves in battle and displaying their prowess for the sake of their friends, departed to the region of Death.

44. So also, O ruler of earth, Kshemadhurti, that best of the car-warriors, was slain by Bhimasena in battle by means of his mace.

45. Having wrought an immense slaughter, then the great bowman king Jalasandha of mighty strength was slain in battle by Satyaki.

46. Alayudha the lord of the Rakshasas who had a chariot drawn by arms, was sent to the abode of Yama by Ghatotkacha displaying his prowess in battle.

47—49. The sons of Radha, the descendants of Suta, the mighty car-warriors, who are brothers to one another, the Kaikeyas, the Malabas, the Madrakas, the Dravidas who are most terrible in prowess, the Yodheyas, the Lalityas, the Kshudrikas, even the Usinaras, the Mavelyakas, the Tundikeras, the Sabitriputrakas, the men of the eastern, the northern, the western and the southern countries, all these, O sire, were slain by Savyasachin.

50. A large body of foot-soldiers were slain, so also many millions of horses. And a large number of car-warriors were killed. Many elephants of large shape and superior kind fell in the battle.

51—52. Furnished with standards and weapons, several heroes decked in ornaments, garments and armour, who were of superior conduct and parentage, and possessed of reseverence, as well as other warriors, who, again, were of immeasurable strength, and desirous of each other's fall, had, in course of great time, all been slain in battle by Partha, who is indefatigable in achievements.

53. These and several other kings were slain with their followers by thousands. O monarch, thus I have answered now what you asked me.

54. Thus this destruction was brought about, while Karna and Arjuna fought against each other; even as Vritra was slain by Mohendra or as Ravana by Rama;

55. Or as Naraka and Mura were slain by Krishna in battle, or as Kartavirjya of mighty strength by Rama of the Vrigu race.

56. That hero (Kartavirjya), who is incapable of being vanquished, had fallen with all his friends and relatives, after having fought a great and terrible battle, renowned in the three worlds.

57. Mahisha was slain by Skanda, as Andhaka by Rudra; even as that hero invincible in battle, was slain by Arjuna in a single engagement of 'two cars'.

58. O king, that great smiter of enemies Karna, who was the hope of victory of all the Dhartarastras, and the cause of these hostilities, (was slain) with all his counsellors and friends.

59. The awful ocean has now been crossed over by the sons of Pandu. O great king, although you were told by all your well-wishing friends all this, yet you could not realise before the nature of this calamity, which has now befallen you, bringing about a great slaughter (of your troops).

60, O monarch, it is by you, who are desirous of doing good to your sons, that mischiefs have been wrought upon them, most covetous of kingdom as they are. The consequence of those mischiefs have now come.

Thus ends the fifth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, of the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER VI.

Dhritarasta said :—

1. O son, you have related which of my followers were slain in battle by the Pandavas. But now do you tell me, O Sanjaya, which of the Pandavas were slain by the warriors of my side.

Sanjaya said :—

2. All the descendants of Kunti, exerting themselves with prowess in battle, and possessed of great spirit and strength, was slain by Bhisma in battle with all their kinsmen and counsellors.

3. The Narayanas, the Vallavas, the Ramas, and hundreds of other warriors, attached to the Pandavas in the field, were all slain by Bhishma in battle.

4. Satyajit, who was like Kiritin (Arjuna, decked in diadem) fighting in the field, both in prowess and strength, was slain in battle by Drona, who was of sure aim.

5. All the mighty bowmen among the Pandavas, who were expert in battle, departed to the region of Death, after having fought with Drona.

6. So also, the old king Virata and Drupada, displaying their prowess in battle, were slain by Drona for sake of their ally, with all their sons.

7—9. O Lord, that invincible hero, Abhimanyu, who, as a boy, was like Savyasachin, Keshava, and Valadeva, and who also was greatly skilled in battle, was surrounded by six of the most exalted of the car-warriors, and slain by them, after having made an utter extermination of the enemies, when they (warriors) became incapable of withstanding Arjuna. O powerful monarch, the son of Dussasana, after having dispossessed the son of Subhadra of his car, who was still observing the duties of a Kshatriya, slew him in battle.

10.—11. The handsome slayer of Patachcharas, having been encompassed by a large force, exerted himself with great prowess for the sake of his ally; and along with Armashta, approached heroic Lakshana the son of Duryodhana, in battle; and, also having made an immense slaughter of the enemies, repaired to the abode of Death.

12. Vrihanta, that great bowman, who was well acquainted with the use of weapons, and most invincible in battle, was sent to the region of Yama by Dussasana showing forth his prowess in the field.

13. The two princes, Manimat and Dandadhara, who were incapable of being vanquished in battle, and also who exerted themselves with prowess, were, for the sake of their friends, slain by Drona.

14. So also, the mighty car-warrior Ansuman, the king of the Bhojas, was despatched to the abode of Death with his soldiers by the son of Varadwaja, displaying his prowess in battle.

15. O descendant of the Bharata race, Chitrasena, dwelling in the sea-coast, was forcibly sent with his son, to the region of Yama by Samudrasena.

16. O powerful monarch, Neela, the dweller of Anupa, and Vyaghradatta, endued with great prowess, both these were sent to the abode of Yama by Ashwathaman.

17. After having wrought an immense carnage, the two heroes, Chitrayudha and Chitrayodhi, were slain in battle by Vikarna, who was well acquainted with the diverse means of stratagems, and displayed immense prowess (in the field).

18. Having been encompassed by the Kaikeya warriors, the king of the Kaikeyas, who was the peer of Vrikodara in battle, was slain by (his brother) Kaikeya showing forth his prowess in this encounter of brother against brother.

19. O great monarch, that great wielder of mace, Janamejaya, the dweller of the hilly country, who was possessed of great energy, was slain by your son Durmukha.

20. O monarch, the two most exalted of persons, the two brothers known by the name of Rochamana (the bright), like two bright planets, were caused by Drona with his shafts, to repair at the same time to heaven.

21. O ruler of earth, several other monarchs, possessed of immense prowess, who were engaged in battle (on the side of the Pandavas), all repaired to the abode of Death, after having achieved the most terrible and difficult deeds.

22. Purujit and Kuntibhoja, the two maternal uncles of Savyasachin, were sent by the shafts of Drona to those regions that are attainable in battle.

23. Having been encompassed by a larrge number of the Kashis, Abhivus, the king of the Kashis, was caused to lay down his body (i.e. life) in battle by the son of Vasudana.

24. Having slaughtered hundreds of heroes, Amitaujah, Yudhamanyu, and Uttamanjah endued with prowess, were all slain by our followers.

25. O descendant of the Bharata race, the Panchala princes, Mitravarman and Kshatradharman, those mightest bowmen, were sent to the abode of Yama by Drona.

26. O respectable person, O monarch, the heroic son of Shikhandin, named Kshatradeva, that foremost of warriors, was slain by your grandson, Lakshmana.

27. The two heroes, possessed of mighty strength, Suchitra and Chitravarman, who are related to each other as father and son, roving about in the field of battle, were slain by Drona.

28. O great king, when all his weapons were exhausted, Vardhakshemi obtained in the end the superior kind of peace, even as the ocean at full tide becomes p:aceful after its (superfluous) water has been drained up.

29. O great monarch, having destroyed innumerable enemies in battle, Senavindu, that foremost of the Kurus, was himself slain by Valhika the great Kourava prince.

30. O powerful king, having achieved the most difficult feats, Dhristaketu that greatest car-warrior among the Chedis, departed to the abode of Death.

31. So also, having wrought a carnage of the foes in battle for the sake of his ally, the Pandava army, heroic Satyadhriti, who was possessed of great energy, was sent to the region of Yama.

32. Having slaughtered the enemies in battle, the lord of the earth Suketu, the son of Sishupala, was slain by Drona in the field.

33. Having achieved the tasks most difficult to perform, the sons of Virata, Sankha and Uttara of mighty strengths departed to the abode of Death.

34. So also, Satyadhriti the chief of the Matshyas, and powerful Madirashwa, and Suryodatta of mighty prowess, were slaughtered by the shafts of Drona.

35. O great king, having achieved the most terrible tasks Srenimat, who was engaged in battle, and possessed of mighty prowess, had gone to the abode of Death.

36. So also, O king, having been slain by Bhishma, the Magadha prince, that slayer of heroes on the side of the foes, who displayed his prowess in battle, and was highly acquainted with the use of weapons, is now lying (in the field).

37. Having made a great slaughter in battle, Vasudana was sent to the abode of Yama, by the son of Varadwaja careering in battle with great prowess.

38. These and several other mighty car-warriors among the Pandavas were slain by Drona displaying their prowess in battle. These are all that you had asked me.

Thus ends the sixth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, of the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, when the most exalted of my heroes were slain, I do not see the survival of the rest of the warriors on my side that had escaped the destruction.

2. Having heard that those two mighty bowmen, the foremost of the Kurus, the heroic Bhishma and Drona, were slain for my sake, what necessity can I have for my life ?

3. Also I cannot bear the fall of the son of Radha, who adorned the field of battle (by his presence), and whose strength of arms was equal to the power of ten thousand elephants.

4. After the most heroic warriors on my side were slain in battle, O Suta, the best of speakers, do you relate to me which of my army are still alive unhurt.

5. The names of those, who are slain to-day, had been described by you. But my opinion is that those who are still alive are now perhaps dead.

Sanjaya said :—

6. O monarch, the hero—to whom were given the four kinds of brilliant and mighty weapons of innumerable shapes, as well as various other celestial weapons by Drona the best of the regenerate persons,

7. That great car-warrior, the high-souled son of Drona,—who is most expert in military performances, light-handed, having steng weapons and the strongest fist among the boxers, and capable of shooting surely from a distance,—is still staying in the field most desirous ol fighting for your sake.

8. That mighty car-warrior Kritavarman, that son of Hridika, the dweller of the country of Anarta, the most exalted of the Satwatas, that chief of the Bhojas himself is still staying in the field of battle, desirous of fighting for your sake, as he is well acquainted with the use of weapons.

9—10. Having forsaken the sons of his own sister, the Pandavas, with the desire of making good his words, that son of Artayana, —who never trembles in battle, who is the head of all the warriors and the first of those on your side, who is possessed of immense activity, and who has promised before Ajatasatru that he would destroy the energy of the son of Suta in battle, who is incapable of being vanquished, who is Shakra's peer in prowess,—that hero Shalya is still staying in the field desirous of fighting for your sake.

11. Attended by an excellent force consisting of the Ajaneyas, the Saindhavas, the High-landers, the dewellers of the river-basins, the Kambhojas, the Vanayus and the Valhikas, the king of the Gandharas, is still staying in the field desirous of fighting for your sake.

12. O monarch, Gautama, the son of Shardwata, of great strength, and variously skilled in the use of innumerable weapons, is staying in the field desirous of fighting, upholding an extraordinary bow capable of bearing a pretty great strain.

13. Riding in the front part of his car, yoked to beautiful horses and furnished with standards, the son of the king of Kekayas, that mighty bowman, that foremost of men, is standing on the field with the desire of fighting for your sake.

14. O lord of men, riding on a car resembling the Sun or the fire in splendour, similarly your son, Purumitra, that best hero amongst the Kurus, is careering on the field, even as the Sun, shining brightly, wanders on the cloudless firmament.

15. Riding on a car adorned with gold, Duryodhana of mighty prowess, in the midst of a force consisting of the elephants, is staying on the field with all his heroic soldiers, ready for battling.

16. Putting on an armour decked in gold, that foremost of persons, possessing the splendour of a lotus, shone in the midst of kings, like the fire sending out little smoke, or like the Sun rising after he has emerged from the clouds.

17. Similarly, your sons, Sushena furnished with the sword and shield and the warlike Satyasena are still waiting on the field of battle with joy, and desirous of battling for your sake.

18. The modest princes of the Bharata race, namely Chitrayudha, Srutavarman, Jaya, Shala, Satyavrata and Dusshala, who are all endued with mighty strength, are still staying in the field with the desire of battling.

19. The lord of the Kitavyas, that prince, that smiter of foes, who considers himself most heroic, and who is careering in the field accompanied by both infantry and cavalry, as well as by the elephant force and cars, is still in the field with the desire of fighting for your sake.

20. Those foremost of persons, those mighty smiters of enemies, considering themselves highly proud, the heroic Srutayus, Srutayudha, Chitrangada, and Chitravarman, all of whom are of sure aim, are similarly staying in the field with the desire of battling.

21. Satyasandha, the lofty-minded son of Karna, is still on the field, desirous of battling. So also, O lord of men, two other sons of Karna, who are acquainted with the use of excellent weapons, and are light-handed, are both staying on the field with the desire of battling for your sake, being accompanied by a large army incapable of being vanquished by a force of little prowess.

22. O monarch, being surrounded by these and several other chiefs, who are all best of warriors, and are endued with immeasurable prowess, the Kuru king is staying in the field, in the midst of an elephant force, with the object of winning victory; even as Indra (stands in the midst of the celestials).

Dhritarastra said :—

23. All have been related to me in detail' viz. who having escaped from the enemies are alive. From this I clearly understand which side will win the victory; this may really be arrived at from facts.

Vaishampayana said :—

24—25. While Dhritarastra, the son of Ambica, was thus addressing, and also having heard that the most exalted of the heroic warriors on his side were slain and only a small portion of the whole army was alive, he was plunged deep in sorrow, and his heart, too, was greatly agitated by grief. Thereafter, he (the king) became almost senseless, and addressed (after having recovered his senses a little) Sanjaya, saying: —'Do you stop for a moment.'

Dhritarastra said :—

26. O son, having heard of this exceedingly evil intelligence, my mind becomes greatly perplexed. My mind (brain) as well as the different limbs are growing paralysed, which I am not able to uphold.

27. Having uttered these words, Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambica, that lord of earth, had wholly lost his senses and fell down (upon the ground).

Thus ends the seventh chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER VIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O foremost of regenerate persons, being consoled a little, what did the lord of kings say, when he heard of the death of Karna, as well as the fall of his sons?

2. He (the monarch) attained exceedingly great uneasiness (in the mind) arising from the fault of his sons. Relate to me, as I ask you, what did he say at that time.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Having heard of the death of Karna, which, being extraordinary, was incredible, which stupified the senses of all creatures, which was most dreadful, and which was like the downfall of the mountain of Meru,

4. And which (the fall of Karna) was as impossible as the dullness of the intellect of highly energetic Vargava, and which, again, was like the defeat of Indra of formidable deeds at the hands of the enemies,

5. And which (the fall of Karna), also, was like the falling of the highly blazing Sun upon the earth from the heaven, and which was as incomprehensible as the drying up of the ocean, whose waters are never exhausted,

6. And which (the fall of Karna), again, was as extraordinary as the total destruction of the earth, the firmament, the different points of the horizon and the waters, and also as the fruitlessness of both virtuous and vicious acts,

7. And then having meditated most skillfully in the mind upon the slaying of Karna in battle in the similar manner, and also having deeply thought upon this, viz., that his army was no more,

8. And also having argued that the other creatures would be of the similar fate, Dhritarashtra, the lord of men, was burnt by the fire of grief, and looked like a burning serpent.

9. With paralysed limbs, sighing long, looking helpless, uttering —woe and alas and highly oppressed with sorrow, the great king Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, began to weep most bitterly.

Dhritarashtra said :—

10. O Sanjaya, the warlike son of Adhiratha was possessed of the strength of a lion or an elephant; and his neck was like that of a bull; and his eyes, speed and voice were also like those of a bull.

11. That young man of limbs as strong as the thunderbolt never desisted from battle even with so great an enemy as Indra himself, even as a bull never desists from battle with another bull.

12. At the sound of whose bowstring and at the roaring of whose arrowy showers, the men and horses (the infantry and the cavalry), the cars and elephants could not stand in the field of battle.

13. Having taken refuge under the mighty arms of that imperishable slayer of innumerable foes, Duryodhana made enemies of the sons of Pandu, those great car-warriors.

14. How could Karna, that foremost of car-warriors, that powerful hero, that one of mighty prowess, was slain in battle by force by the son of Pritha?

15. Placing confidence upon the strength of his own arms, he (Karna) always indeed did care neither for Achchuta, nor for Dhananjaya, nor for the whole of the Vrishni race nor for the other enemies.

16. 'In the field of battle, alone I shall hurl down at once both the wielder of sharanga and the wielder of Gandiva bow,—who are unconquerable and are united together,—from their celestial cars.'

17. This (the above saying) he always uttered to Duryodhana, who was bad, darkened by avarice, foolish and desirous of kingdom, and also who was highly afflicted.

18. That hero (Karna) had subdued the unusually powerful and invincible enemies namely the Gandharas, the Madrakas, the Matshyas, the Trigartas, the Tanganas the Shashas,

19. And the Panchalas, the Vidahas, the Kulindas, the Kashi-koshalas, the Suhmas, the Angas, the Bangas, the Nishadhas, the Pundras, the Kichakas,

20. And the Vatsyas, the Kalingas, the Taralas, the Ashmakas, and the Rishikas. In the days of yore, he subjugated these (above-mentioned) heroes in battle, and made them pay tribute (to us),

21. By means of his sharpened and keen arrows, that were adorned with the Kanka feathers for the sake of Duryodhana's aggrandisement. That one (Karna) was still waiting in the field for winning victory (for Duryodhana).

22. How was that protector of armies (on my side), that one well-versed in the use of weapons, viz. Karna was slain in battle by the foes, the heroic sons of Pandu, who were possessed of immense strength?

23. Indra is the foremost of the celestials even as Karna is the best amongst men. In this world we have not heard of a third one, who was the most exalted like them.

24. Uchchaisravas is the best of all horses, Vaisravana is the best of the Yakshas; and Indra is the foremost of the celestials; so also Karna is the best of all smiters.

25. Having been unsubdued by the heroic and mightiest monarchs of immense prowess, he then subjugated the entire earth for the aggrandisement of Duryodhana.

26. Having obtained his (Karna's) alliance, by means of conciliating terms, by paying honours and wealth to him, and also by speaking gloriously of him, the king of Magadha had opposed all the Kshatriyas of the world excepting the Kauravas and the Jadavas.

27. Having heard of the slaughter of that Karna by Savyasachin in a single combat I am plunged deep in the ocean of grief, even as a ship-wrecked one (is plunged) in the vast sea.

28. Having heard of the fall of that best of men, that foremost of car-warriors, in a single combat, I am plunged in the ocean of grief, even as a person without a boat (is plunged) in the sea.

29. O Sanjaya, when having been afflicted with such a grief as this, I do not die, I suppose that my heart is harder than the thunderbolt, and most impenetrable.

30. O Suta, having heard of this utter defeat of kinsmen, relatives and friends, what other person in this world except myself would not give up his life?

31. I desire (to swallow) poison, (to be burnt in) fire, and the fall from the summit of a mountain; for I am indeed unable, O Sanjaya, to bear the grief and pain.

Thus ends the eighth chapter, the speech of Dhritarashtra, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER IX.

(KARNA PARVA).—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The sages consider you to be equal to Yayati, the son of Nahusha, in beauty, in lineage, in celebrity, in austerity and in the knowledge about the Shastras.

2. O monarch, you are equal to a great sage in learning; and you are highly successful in respect of all actions. So be you concentred in self, and let not your heart be plunged in sorrow.

Dhritarashtra said :—

3. I consider Destiny to be superior, and human effort to be fruitless; for the reason that Karna, who was like a Sal tree, was slain in battle.

4. Having slain the entire force of Yudhisthira as well as the car-warriors of the Panchala race, and having afflicted, by the showers of arrows, the men in the different directions of the horizon,

5. And also having rendered the Parthas senseless in battle, even as Indra with the thunderbolt in his hand, stupifying the Asuras, how has that great car-warrior (Karna) been slain in battle, who now lies dead (in the field) like a large tree uprooted by the wind.

6. I do not find the end of my sorrow like that of the overflowed ocean. My anxieties are growing more acute; and the desire for death has been growing in me,

7. Having heard of the intelligence of the slaughter of Karna and the victory of Falguna. To me, O Sanjaya, the death of Karna, seems to be incredible.

8. Really, my heart is pretty well hard and seems to be made up of the essence of the thunder-bolt, because it does not split up into thousand pieces on my hearing of the death of Karna.

9. Indeed, my life was ordained before (my birth) to be pretty long by Destiny; since, when having heard of the slaugter of Karna, I am still alive, although I am highly afflicted with grief. O Sanjaya, let there be shame to this my life, who am deprived of friends.

10. O Sanjaya, I have been reduced to-day to this hateful condition. Foolish as I am and subject to universal pity, I shall (hereafter) have to lead a miserable life.

11. O Suta, having at first been highly esteemed by all people, how shall I, being vanquished by the enemies, be able to hold my life?

12. O Sanjaya, on the death of Bhishma, Drona, and the lofty-minded Karna, I have attained to the greatest sorrow and calamity.

13. When the son of Suta was slain in battle, I do not see the end (viz. that any one on my side will escape the slaughter); since he, indeed, O Sanjaya, was the best means of crossing over (this ocean of hostilities) to my sons.

14. While that hero was showering forth innumerable arrows, he was slain in battle. Without that foremost of persons what necessity have I for my life?

15. Having been highly afflicted with the showers of arrows, the son of Adhiratha, indeed, fell down from his car, like the summit of a mountain, split up by the fall of the thunder-bolt.

16. Surely having adorned the earth, he, besmeared with blood, sleeps in the ground, like an elephant killed by an infuriate lord of elephants.

17. That Karna who had been the strength of all the Dhartarashtras and who had been the object of terror to the Pandavas, and who, again, had been the type of the best of all bowmen, was slain by Arjuna.

18. That heroic and mighty bowman, conferred fearlessness on my sons; and that warlike one, being in battle, lies on the ground like a mountain pierced by the lord of the celestials.

19. The realisation of the end of Duryodhana is even like the walking of the lame, and like the fulfilment of the desires of the poor, and also like straying out of the water drops from the mouth of the thirsty.

20. Actions considered in one way turn out differently. Alas, Destiny is really powerful, and Time is insuperable?

21. O Suta, how was my son Dussasona slain, while that one of low spirit, that wretched one of little prowess, was flying away from the battle?

22. O son, O Suta, has he not acted in a cowardly manner? Was not that hero slain, even as the other Kshatriyas were slain?

23. The stupid Duryodhana did not accept the constant advice of Yudhisthira viz., do not fight, which was like the wholesome drug.

24. Being asked for water by Bhishma, lying on his arrowy bed, Partha of great fame pierced the surface of the earth.

25. Having seen the torrent of water (flowing from the surface of the earth caused by the son of Pandu, that mighty-armed hero addressed him saying :—' O son, do you conclude peace with the Pandavas.'

26. Stop all hostilities, and then there will be peace. Let your war be concluded with my death. Do you enjoy sovereignty over the earth in brotherly feelings with the sons of Pandu.

27. Having disregarded the advice of that one of long foresight, my son is surely repenting, that advice of his is now realised into its effect.

28. O Sanjaya, I, who am deprived of counsellor and sons, have, too, obtained great misery consequent upon the game at dice, like a bird shorn of its wings.

29. O Sanjaya, even as the playful boys having cought a bird and torn off its wings most cheerfully let it go,

30. And whose (the bird's) flight does not become possible in consequence of the loss of its wings; so I have become (motionless) like the bird deprived of its wings.

31. Now I am weak, destitute of all resources, and deprived of all kinsmen, and left by my friends,'and also I am poor, and possessed by my foes: To what point of the horizon shall I depart?

32. Who subdued all the Kamvojasd an the Amvashtas along with the Kakeyas, and the Gandharas, and the Videhas; and having defeated them in battle for the fulfilment of his wishes,

33. That lord subdued the entire earth for the aggrandisement of Duryodhana. But he himself was subdued by the heroic Pandavas of immense capacity and mighty arms.

34. When that mighty bowman Karna was slain in battle by the holder of Kiriti (Arjuna), what other heroes were still waiting in the field. Tell me this, O Sanjaya,

35. Was he not alone and forlorn, while slain by the Pandavas in battle? O son, it was told by you beforehand how the heroes my side were slain.

36. Shikhandin slew in battle, by means of the best of his darts, that great wielder of all weapons, Bhishma, who did not care for repelling the foes.

37. So also, O Sanjaya, by Dhristadyumna, the son of Drupada, lifting up his sword, was slain that mighty bowman Drona, practising severe asceticism, who, being already pierced by innumerable weapons had put aside all his weapons in battle.

38. I have, indeed, heard of this, viz., that these two, Bhishma and Drona, were slain at a disadvantage and especially by means of a stratagem.

39. Surely even the wielder of the thunderbolt (Indra) himself can not slay in battle by just means both Bhishma and Drona, while contending in battle. Indeed, that I tell you truly.

40. While Karna was engaged in throwing down his innumerable celestial weapons in battle, how could Death touch that hero who was like Indra himself?

41. Purandara awarded to that hero, in exchange for his ear-rings, that celestial dust that had the splendour of lightning, and also that was decked in gold and capable of destroying the foes.

42. Whose that heroe's) celestial arrow, known by the name of Snake-mouthed, that was decked in gold and besmeared with soft sandal and also that was capable of slaying the enemies, was always laid up in the quiver.

43. Having disregarded fhe heroic great car-warriors with Bhishma and Drona at their head, that hero, O mighty monarch, learnt the use of the Brahma weapon from the son of Jamadagni.

44. Having seen the great warriors, with Drona at their head, deeply pierced by the arrows, and turning away from the battle, that mighty-armed one had severed the bow of the son of Subhadra by means of his sharp arrows.

45. Having deprived, all on a sudden, Bhimasena of his car, who was of never-failing energy and had the speed of wind and the strength of ten thousand elephants, that (mighty-armed) one afterwards laughed at him.

46. Having subdued Sahadeva by means of his sharp and straight arrows, and also having deprived him of his car, he did not slay him out of kindness and feelings of virtue.

47. He had slain, by means of his arrow given to him by Shakra, Ghatotkacha, the lord of the Rakshasas, who had made a thousand illusions, and who was most desirous of victory.

48. How could that hero be slain in battle, with whom even Dhananjaya was afraid to engage in a single combat for several days.

49. When his car was not broken, nor his bow was cut off, nor his weapons were exhausted, how could he (Karna), therefore, be slain by the enemies?

50. Who, indeed, was able to subdue Karna in battle, that foremost of persons, possessed of the speed of a tiger, while that mighty bowman was shaking his bow, and shooting forth his terrible arrows, and exausting his celestial weapons in battle.

51. Surely his bow-string was torn; his car was engulfed in the earth; and his weapons were all spent, because you tell me that he was slain. Indeed, I do not find any other cause of his slaughter.

52. 'I will not have my feet washed, so long as I do not slay Falguna.' This was highly the terrible vow of the high-souled one.

53. Being afraid of him, the foremost of persons Yudhisthira, the royal impersonation of justice, could not enjoy sleep, while exiled in the forest, for a period of thirteen years.

54. Relying upon the prowess of that high-souled hero of great energy, my son forcibly dragged the wife of the Pandavas to the assembly-hall.

55. There in the midst of that assembly, that one (Karna) called the Princess of Panchala, in the very sight of the Pandavas and also in the presence of all the Kuru's, the wife of slaves.

56, 'O Krishna (Panchalee), all your husbands are no more; and if they really exist, they are more like the sessame seeds without the kernal. So do you, O beautiful lady, choose another husband.'

57. That person of the Suta race had made, in anger, Krishna listen to these harsh expressions in the midst of the assembly. How was he slain by the enemies?

58, That hero, having disregarded the severe touch of the shots from the Gandiva bow, addressed Krishna, saying,—'Doubtless you have no husbands;' and he also cast his glance upon the sons of Pritha.

59. Again, O Sanjaya, placing confidence upon the strength of his own arms, that hero had no fear even for a moment, aroused by the sons of Pritha, accompanied as they were by their sons and Janardana himself.

60. I do not consider that his slaughter can ever be brought about by all the celestials, rushing against him, headed by Vashava himself. Again, O son, how can it be by the Pandavas?

61. While that son of Atiratha had touched the bow-string and put on his fences, surely there was no person, who could be bold enough to stand up in his front.

62. Indeed, the earth might be deprived of the splendour of the Moon and the rays of the Sun; but the slaughter of the lord of men who did never turn away from the field could not be possible in battle.

63. Having been assisted by that hero as well as by his brother Dussasana, that my evil-souled and wicked-minded son had resolved upon to reject the proposals of Vasudeva himself.

64. I consider that my son, having witnessed the fall of Karna of bull-like shoulders, and also having seen the slaughter of Dussasana, is surely lamenting.

65. Having seen that the son of Vikartana was slain by Savyasachin in a single combat, and that the Pandavas were victorious, what, indeed, did Duryodhana say?

66. Having seen that both Durmarsana and Vrishasena were slain in battle, and also having witnessed that his army being slaughtered by the mighty car-warriors, was dispersed,

67. And, again, having seen that the kings (in his side), most unwilling to fight, were turning away from the field of battle and having beheld the great car-warriors already fled, I think my son is now surely lamenting.

68. What did that undaunted, proud, and evil-souled Duryodhana of uncontrolled passions say, after beholding his army grown pretty well dispirited?'

69. Although having been forbidden by the friends, yet himself having created this fierce hostility, what did Duryodhana say, after beholding the slaughter of innumerable soldiers in battle?

70. Having seen that his brother was slain in battle, and his blood was drunk by Bhimasena, what did Duryodhana say?

71. He (my son) said in the midst of the assembly-hall with the king of the Gandharas that Karna would slay Arjuna in battle. But now having seen that hero slain, what did he (Duryodhana) say?

72. O son, when Karna was slain, what did Sakuni, the son of Suvala, having at first played at dice with a cheerful heart and deceived the son of Pandu, say?

73. Beholding the son of Vikartana (slain in battle), what did that son of Hridika, Kritavarman, that mighty bowman, that great car-warrior amongst the Satwattas, say?

74. Most willing to acquire a knowledge in archery, the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas received instructions of that highly intellectual son of Drona.

75. O Sanjaya, what did that youthful, that handsome-looking, that highly famous Ashwathaman, endued with beauty, say, when he saw Karna slain in battle?

76. What did that son of Sharadwatta, Kripa of the Gotama race, that mighty car-warrior, that teacher of archery, say when he saw Karna slain in battle?

77—79. On beholding the slaughter of Karna, what did the king of Madras, that ghty bowman, that ornament of assemblies, Shalya of the Shauvira tribe, that foremost of charioteers engaged in driving away the car (of Karna), that leading chief of the Madra warriors, who was possessed of mighty strength, say? And again, O Sanjaya, what did the other warriors, who with difficulty could be vanquished, as well as all the kings of the earth, who had come with the desire of figting, say, when they beheld the slaughter of the son of Vikartana?

80. When that hero, that foremost of the car-warriors, that best among men, Drona was slain (in battle), who, O Sanjaya, had been the leaders of the several divisions of the army in succession?

81. O Sanjaya, do you relate to me, how Shalya, the king of the Madras, that best among all the car-warriors, was engaged as the charioteer of the son of Vikartana?

82. While the son of Suta was fighting, who were the persons guarding his right wheel, and those who protected his left, and again, who were they that guarded his back.

83. What heroes did not forsake Karna, and what mean-minded men flew away from him? While you had been present in the field, how could that mighty car-warrior be slain in battle?

84. How could the heroic and great car-warriors oppose the Pandavas, who were pouring forth showers of arrows like the clouds pouring forth drops of water.

85. O Sanjaya, do you relate to me, how then could that celestial Snake-mouthed arrow, that best one of its kind, become of no avail?

86. When the best of the leaders were slain, I do not see, O Sanjaya, that even some of the soldiers on my side, who had already lost their courage, will survive (the terrible slaughter).

87. Indeed, those two heroes, the great bowmen, were ready to give up their lives for my sake. Hearing of their (Bhishma and Drona) death, what use have I of my life?

88. Again and again, I cannot bear that Karna should be slain by the Pandavas; for whose strength of arms is equal to that of ten thousand elephants.

89. O Sanjaya, relate to me in detail what had happened in the battle that raged between the mighty heroes among men, namely, the Kauravas, and their enemies, when Drona was slain.

90. Relate to me also how the sons of Kunti conducted the battle with Karna, and do you tell me, again, how that slayer of enemies became quiet (was slain) in battle.

Thus ends the ninth chapter, the repentance of Dhritarashtra, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER X.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O Descendant of the Bharata race, when, in that day, that mighty bowman Drona was slain in battle, and when again, the objects of that mighty car-warrior were unfulfiled;

2. And when, O great king, the army of the Kauraves, that was like the vast ocean, had fled away, the son of Pritha, having arranged his own troops properly waited in the field with all his brothers.

3. O foremost of the Bharata race, your son having seen him staying in the field, and also having witnessed his own army flying away from the battle, forbade them run away in the most encouraging terms.

4. Then with the confidence in the strength of his own arms, having arranged his own army in a regular position, and O descendant of the Bharata race, having fought for a while with the Pandavas,

5. Who had attained their objects, and who were the most cheerful enemies, and who, again, were engaged for pretty long time in battle, he, on the approach of the evening, caused the army of the enemies to withdraw.

6. Thereupon having drawn the troops and entered into their own encampment, the sons of Kuru held a consultation among themselves for their own welfare.

7. They had seated themselves in the most excellent seats, and valuable couches furnished with beautiful coverlets, even as the celestials take their seats on the most pleasant bows.

8. Thereupon king Duryodhana addressed these mighty bowmen in the most agreeable and pleasant terms, and spoke them in a way most suited to the time.

Duryodhana said :—

9. O monarchs, all of you are the best of the intellectual persons; do you at once give your individual opinions as to what is necessary or what is unnecessary under the present circumstances.

Sanjaya said :—

10. When these words had been uttered by the lord of men, then the foremost of princes, who had seated themselves on the throne, and were most willing to fight, began to make various gestures (expressive of their heroism)

11. Having understood the gestures of those, who were ready to sacrifice their lives in the battle, and having beheld the face of the king, that had the splendour of the newly rising Sun,

12. The highly intellectual son of Acharya, who was versed in speech, spoke these words: 'Zeal, perseverence, as also skillfulness and diplomacy,—these have been declared by the learned men to be the principal expedients of accomplishing ends, —which, again, are wholly dependent upon Destiny.'

13. Those foremost of men, the mighty car-warriors, on our side, who had been like the celestials, and who were acquainted with the principles of government, and who were most persevering, skilful, and devoted, were all slain in battle.

14. In spite of all these, there should be no disappointment as regards victory. For, Destiny could be made favourable, if we can take recourse to the honest principles comprehensive of all the expedients.

15. O descendant of the Bharata race, we shall, therefore, install Karna, that best of men, endowed with all the good qualities, as the commander of the army.

16. Having made Karna the commander of our force, we shall be in a position to destroy all the enemies. Because this hero, who is possessed of immense strength, and who is acquainted with the use of weapons, and who cannot easily be vanquished, and who is like Death himself, and who is irresistible, is capable of subduing the enemies in battle.

17. O king, having heard these (words) from the son of the preceptor, then your son had entertained great hopes in respect to Karna.

18. When both Bhishma and Drona have been slain, Karna will surely then defeat the Pandavas. O descendant of the Bharata race, having cherished this hope in his heart, and also having comforted himself,

19. Thereupon king Duryodhana was exceedingly gratified to hear his words, that were fraught with delight and reverence, that were also beneficial to himself and true, and most pleasant.

20. Then having secured the steadiness of his mind, and relied upon the strength of his own arms, the most powerful king Duryodhana spoke these words to the son of Radha :—

21. 'O Karna, I know your strength, as well as great intimacy that you entertain for myself. In spite of all that, O mighty-armed one, I will tell you some words that are beneficial to yourself.

22. O hero, you are the greatest sage, and you are always my highest protection as well. Now, having heard my words, do whatever you desire, or whatever you like most.

23. My two great generalissimos, Bhishma and Drona, those car-warriors of the first class, have been already slain in battle. You are more powerful than either of them. Now should you be installed as the commander of my army.

24. Indeed, those two mighty bowmen were very old; and they were favourably disposed towards Dhananjaya. In despite thereof, O son of Radha, those two heroes were selected by me as the generalissimo of my army at your word.

25. Beholding their connexion of grandfather with themselves, the sons of Pandu, O father, were saved in that formidable battle by Bhishma for ten consecutive days.

26. When you had laid aside your arms, Bhishma of mighty prowess was slain in battle by Falguna, who had placed Shikhandin in his front.

27. When that great bowman had fallen, and lain down on the bed of arrrows, it was then, O foremost of men, that Drona was appointed as the commander (of the army) at your request.

28. My opinion is, that by that hero, too, the sons of Pritha were saved (from the hand of Death) in consideration that the latter were the pupils of the former. But even that old man, again, was speedily slain (in battle) by Dhristadyumna.

29. Reflecting for a while, I do not see any other person, like yourself, of more immeasurable prowess than those two best of warriors, who are already slain in battle.

30. At present you are able to obtain victory for ourselves. There is no doubt about it. In accordance therewith you have rendered good to us both before and after, as well as in the middle.

31. You should, like the commander of the force, bear all the burden in battle. So, should you be installed as the general by yourself.

32. Therefore, do you maintain this force of Dhritarashtra, even as lord Skanda of eternal energy, the leader of the celestials, maintain the celestial force. Do you slay all the foes, even as Mahendra slays the Danavas.

33. When the most powerful car-warriors, the Pandavas, will see you waiting in the field of battle, they will surely fly away with all the Panchalas, even as the Danavas fly away, beholding Vishnu. Consequently, O foremost of men, do you command this mighty force.

34. When you will stay in the field, all those Pandavas of wicked soul with their allies, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas, all will run away from the field.

35. So, do you exterminate all the enemies, even as the risen Sun, burning by his own energy, destroys the awful darkness.

Sanjaya said :—

36. That after the slaughter of both Bhishma and Drona, Karna would surely subdue the Pandavas,—this hope, O king, of your son was found to be very great.

37. Having entertained in the mind that strong hope, he then addressed Karna saying thus: "O son of Suta, the son of Pritha would never fight, staying before you (in the field)."

Karna said :—

38. O son of Gandhari, this was already told by me before you, namely that I would subdue all the Pandavas with their sons, and with Janardana, too.

39. I will be your generalissimo, there is no doubt about it. O powerful monarch, have peace. And do you think the Pandavas were already conquered.

Sanjaya said :—

40. O great monarch, on his being thus addressed, king Duryodhana stood up with all other monarchs, like Indra of one hundred sacrifices with the celestials, in order to pay respect to Karna, as the commander of his force, even as the gods do to lord Skanda.

41. Thereupon, O monarch, all the kings, at the head of whom was Duryodhana, who were most desirous of victory, installed Karna (in the general-ship of army), according to the rites ordained by Providence.

42. By the offerings of gold and earthen vessels filled with water, sanctified with the holy expressions (the Mantras) and of the tusks of elephants, and the horns of rhinoceroses and well-constituted bulls,

43. And also by the offerings of other vessels overlaid with jewls and gems, and of fragrant herbs. He (Karna) at that time seated himself at ease on a seat made of Udumvara wood, and covered over with a piece of silken cloth.

44. The Barhmanas, the Kshatriyas, the Vyaishyas, as well as the Sudras of high social position began to praise that lofty-minded one, who was installed, with the offerings of articles collected according to the rites enjoined by the Shastras, in that highest position.

45. Thereupon, being thus installed, O lord of monarchs, the son of Radha, that slayer of the most war-like enemies, worshipped the foremost of the regenerate persons by the offerings of gold, kine and other wealth ; and thereby caused them to say benedictions to him.

46. O foremost of men, the bards and the twice-born persons uttered these words to him:—"Do you subdue the sons of Pritha, with Govinda and with their principal attendants in that fermidable battle.

47. O son of Radha, do you slay the sons of Pritha, along with the Panchalas, that we may win victory, even as risen Sun always destroys the thick gloom by his terrible rays.

48. The faithless sons of Pandu with Keshava, can not indeed bear with the sight of the arrows shot by you, even as it is most intolerable to look at the burning rays of the Sun.

49. Having put on all the weapons, the sons of Pritha, along with the Panchalas, will not be able to stay before you in the field, even as the Danavas are not able to stand before Indra (in battle).

50. Having been thus installed in the generalship, the son of Radha of unparalleled radiance surpassed all in beauty and splendour like a second Sun.

51. Having installed the son of Radha in the leadership (of the army), thereupon, your son, insisted upon by Death as it were, considered himself most successful.

52. O monarch, Karna, the subduer of enemies, having obtained this leadership, ordered for arranging the troops in battle-array towards the rising of the Sun.

53. O descendant of the Bharata race, Karna, having been surrounded by your sons in the battle, looked resplendent, even as the lord Skanda, encompassed by all the celestials, looked radiant in the battle, wherein the Asura Taraka, like an evil, was sought to be defeated.

Thus ends the tenth chapter, the installation of Karna, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1—2. Having attained the generalship of the army, and been addressed by the king himself in sweet and brotherly terms, and thereupon having ordered the troops to be arranged in battle-array towards the rise of the Sun, relate to me, O Sanjaya, what did the highly intellectual son of Vikartana, Karna, do at that time.

Sanjaya said :—

3. O foremost of the Bharata race, your sons, having understood the object of Karna, ordered for the arrangement of the troops, followed by a joyful music of various instruments.

4. Towards the close of the night, O lord of earth, a loud noise arose from amongst your soldiers, saying 'array—and—array.'

5—6. Thereupon, O lord of the world, there was a terrible uproar of the best of elephants and cars overlaid with beautiful coverlets, whilst they were being equipped, and of the infantry crying out in joy, of the horses, whilst being harnessed and of the warriors, whilst moving to and fro, shouting to one another in mirth. The uproar was so very great that it reached the very heavens.

7—9. Thereupon the son of Suta appeared on the field of battle, mounted upon a car furnished with innumerable flags and white standards, drawn by horses as white as cranes, ornamented with a flag bearing the design of an elephant's rope, filled with one hundred quivers, and, again, furnished with mace and wooden fence, supplied with the Shataghnis, rows of bells, shafts, lances and spears, loaded with several excellent bows, and having had the splendour of the resplendent Sun, and himself wielding a babow bound with gold in the ck.

10. O monarch, (Karna then began) to blow his conch adorned with a net-work of gold, and also to shake his terrible bow studded with gold.

11. Having seen Karna, that mighty bowman, that foremost of car-warriors, who was seated on his car, and also was like the risen Sun destroying the thick darkness, and who also was inapproachable.

12. None of the Kauravas, O sire, O foremost of persons, considered the fall of either Bhishma, or Drona, or other warriors to be a loss at the time.

13. Thereupon, O e, Karna, having ordered the warriors to make haste by the sound of his conch, led the vast army of the Kauravas.

14. Then Karna, that powerful bowman, that smiter of enemies, having arranged the troops in the from of a Makara, started against the Pandavas with the object of winning victory (over them).

15. O king, Karna placed himself in the tip of the beak of that Makara; and the heroic Shakuni and the great car-warrior Uluka were stationed in both the eyes.

16. The son of Drona was stationed in the head; and all the uterine brothers were in the neck. King Duryodhana was stationed in the middle, surrounded by a large force.

17. O lord of kings, Kritavarman was placed in the left foot, who was attended by the Narayana-army, namely the Gopalas, most difficult to be vanquished in battle.

18. O king, the son of Gotama, possessed of the unbaffled prowess, was stationed in right foot, encompassed by the most powerful bowmen, the Trigartas, and the troops from the south.

19. There Shalya was placed in left hind-foot accompanied by a vast army recruited from the country of the Madras.

20. O great king, Sushena of certain resolution was stationed in the right hind-foot, encompassed by a force of one thousand cars and three hundred elephats.

21. Thereupon the two royal brothers, Chitra and Chitrasena, of immese prowess having been accompanied by a vast army, stood in the tail (of the Makara).

22. O lord of kings, when Karna, that best of persons had started for battle, the king of righteousness (Yudhisthira) beheld Dhananjaya, and addressed him saying :—

23. "O heroic son of Pritha, behold how the army of Dhritarashtra was arranged in battle-array by Karna, and encompassed by the most heroic car-warriors.

24. Indeed, the best of the heroes amongst the vast army of Dhritarashtra were all slain before. O mighty armed one, only the feeble ones are alive, who are in my opinion as worthless as the straw. But in the whole force one mighty bowman, namely, the son of Suta, is shining brilliantly.

25. That foremost of car-warriors is incapable of being defeated by the three worlds, both mobile and immobile, along with the Gods, Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Kinnaras, and the Nagas.

26. O mighty-armed Phalguna, having slain him to-day, you will surely win victory and the great thorn, pierced in my heart for twelve years, will now also be rooted out. Understanding this, O mighty armed one, do yon arrange the troops in battle-array according to your desire.

27. Having heard the word of his brother, the Pandava (the third brother), conveyed by white horses, arranged his army in the form of the half moon against the face of the enemies' force.

28. Thereupon Bhimasena was stationed in the left side of that (half-moon); and the mighty bowman, Dhristadyumna, was placed in the right.

29. In the middle (of that half-moon arrangement) both the monarch and the Pandava Dhananjaya were stationed. But Nakula and Shahadeva were placed in the rear of the king of righteousness (Yudhisthira.)

30. The two Panchala chiefs, Yudhamanyu and Uttamanjas, who were the guards of the wheels of the car (of Arjuna), did not forsake him in battle, as they were supported, by the diadem-decked one (Arjuna.)

31. O descendant of the Bharata race, the rest of the heroic princes, who were all clad in armour, were stationed in the different positions of the array allotted to them according to their respective zeal and earnestness.

32. O descendant of the Bharata race, the Pandavas, as well as the mighty bowmen in your side, having arranged their troops in the array of battle in the above manner, directed their mind towards the battle.

33. Having witnessed your army arranged in battle by the son of Suta, the son of Dhritarashtra (Duryodhana), with all his kinsmen, considered the Pandavas to be slain.

34. O lord of men, in the similar way, Yudhisthira, having observed the troops in the side of the Pandavas arranged in battle-array, considered the army of Dhritarashtra to be surely slain along with Karna himself.

35. Thereupon conches, kettle-drums, tabours, and drums of large size, and cymbals and other instruments, such as Dindimas and Jharjharas were begun to be blown and struck on every side.

36. O monarch, there was a loud sound of musical instruments amongst the soldiers on both the sides. There were terrible lion-roars of the heroes, who were most desirous of victory.

37. O lord of men, there arose the sound of snorting of the horses and the grunting of elephants. And also there was the terrible noise of the car-wheels.

38. O descendant of the Bharata race, beholding that mighty bowman, Karna, stationed at the front of the battle-array, none in the field amongst the Kourava troops considered the death of Drona to be a loss.

39. O mighty monarch, in both the armies there were men filled with cheerfulness, who were all desirous of battle. O king, they waited in the field with the object of slaying one another without delay.

40. O foremost of kings, there in the field) these two namely, Karna and the son of Pandu, who beholding each other were filled with firm resolution rushed to and fro in the midst of their armies.

41. The two armies came face to face, meeting each other, as if dancing (in great cheer). The heroes on both the sides, who were most desirous of battle, came forth accompanied by their respective divisions.

42. O mighty monarch, thus commenced the battle of men, elephants, horses, and cars, who were all engaged in slaying one another.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, commencement of the battle, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon the two vast armies, composed of horses, men, and elephants, that were filled with cheer, and also that had the brilliancy of the celestial and Asura hosts, came face to face, and struck each other down.

2. Then the men, the cars, the horses, the elephants, as well as the infantry, all possessed of formidable strength, continued to strike most fiercely, thereby destroying the bodies and the sins as well.

3. The lion-like men, began to scatter over the earth, the heads of lion-like men, which were equal in splendour to the full-moon and the sun, and also which had resembled the lotuses in fragrance.

4. They, again, began to sever the heads of the figting warriors by means of the crescent-shaped, broad-faced and razor-headed arrows, swords, axes, battle-axes, and other weapons.

5. The arms of men, possessed of long and stout arms, severed by men, possessed of long and stout arms, looked resplendent upon the ground, decorated as they were with both weapons and bracelets.

6. The earth shone most brightly with the halo of their (the warriors') red fingers and palms, even as it shines with the fierce and five-headed snakes upon itself slain by Garuda.

7. Smitten by the enemies, the heroic warriors fell down from the elephants, the cars, and horses, even as the dwellers of heaven fall down from the celestial baloons, when their virtues are entirely spent.

8. While other heroic warriors, having been smitten by heroes of greater prowess with heavy maces, spiked clubs, and maces, fell in the battle by hundreds.

9. In that formidable battle, the cars were smitten by cars, the infuriate elephants were crushed by infuriate elephants, and the horsemen were struck down by horsemen.

10. The men smitten by the cars, and the cars destroyed by elephants, and the horsemen slain by the foot-soldiers, and the infantry slain by the cavalry, are lying dead in the field.

11. And again, the cars, the horses, and the infantry smitten by the elephants; and the cars, steeds and elephants slain by the infantry; and the cars, the infantry and the elephant-force destroyed by the horses; and also the men and elephants struck down by the cars, are lying dead in the battle.

12. A terrible slaughter of car-warriors, horsemen, the elephant-force, and men was wrought by men, steeds, elephants and cars, with the help of their hands and feet, weapons and cars.

13. While the army was being thus smitten and slain by the horses, the sons of Pritha with Vrikodara at their head proceeded against us.

14. So also Dhrishtadyumna, Shikhandin, the sons of Draupadi, the Provadrakas, and Shatyaki and Chekitana accompanied by the Dravida warriors (proceeded against us);

15. And also the Pandyas, and the Cholas along with the Keralas (advanced against us), surrounded by a formidable array of soldiers, who were all possessed of strong chests, long arms, huge statures, and very large eyes;

16. And who, again, were adorned with various ornaments, and were of red teeth, and were endowed with the strength of mad elephants, and were clothed in dresses of various colours, and also were besmeared with scented powders;

17. And, O monarch, as they were possessed of swords and nooses in their hands, and endued with the power of withstanding the infuriate elephants, and as they were equally determined to die, they (the warriors) did not forsake one another (in the field).

18. The infantry, belonging to the Andhra race, commanded by Satyaki, were all possessed of quivers and bows in the hand, of long hairs, and were very sweet in speech, and endowed with fierce forms and mighty prowess.

19. Thereupon the other heroic leaders, namely the Chedis, the Panchalas, the Kaikeyas, the Karushas, the Koshalas, the Kanchyas, and the Magadhas advanced most rapidly.

20. Their car-warriors, cavalry, and elephant-force, that all belonged to the superior class, as well as the terrible-looking infantry, were highly gratified to hear the harmonious sound of several instruments, and began to dance and laugh.

21. In the midst of that vast army stood Vrikodara, encompassed by the foremost elephant-force, and advanced against your troops, each riding on the neck of an elephant.

22. That terrible-looking elephant, the best of his kind, shone with all the equipments befitting him, even as the mountain-abode on the top of the Udaya (mountain) looks resplendent with the rising Sun over it.

23. His best armour, made of iron and bedecked with the most precious gems, shone like the autumnal firmament besprinkled with innumerable stars.

24. He (that Bhima), who had a lance in the hand stretched out, and who was crowned with a handsome diadem, and who was adorned with innumerable ornaments, and who, again, had the brilliancy of the autumnal sun when at the meridian, began to burn the enemies by energy.

25. Seeing that elephant from a distance, Kshemadhurti, riding on an elephant and very much gratified in the heart, invited that one, who was much more cheerful than he, to battle, and rushed against him (Bhima).

26. Then there followed an encounter between the two elephants of formidable appearances according as they desired, which (the elephants) were like the two gigantic mountains with trees at their tops.

27. Those two heroic warriors, whose elephants had thus been engaged in the encounter, forcibly pierced each other with their lances, that were resplendent like the rays of the sun, and they roared most loudly.

28. Having receded back, they (the two heroes) roved about in circles dismounting from their elephants; and, also having taken up their bows, really struck each other.

29. They cheered the hearts of the people by their roaring sounds, and the slaps of their arm-pits, as well as by the whistling sound of their arrows on all sides; and then they shouted aloud like lions.

30. Again mounting upon their elephants, that had their trunks raised up in the air, and that were adorned with banners floating on the wind, both the heroes, perfectly accomplished and possessed of immense strength, went on combatting.

31. Thereupon both of them, having cut off each other's bow, roared and poured forth showers of arrows and lances upon each other, even as the two masses of clouds during the rainy season drop down rains.

32. Then having roared aloud Kshemadhurti pierced Bhima in the chest with great force by means of his lance, as well as by six other (lances).

33. That Bhimasena, whose form looked bright with rage, shone with those lances adhering to his body like the resplendent Sun with the masses of clouds about him.

34. Thereupon Bhima thurst at his enemy most carefully the lance, made of iron, that had the splendour of the colour of the solar rays and had a speed, direct and straight.

35. Thereupon having stretched out his bow, the lord of the Kulatas severed the lance by means of ten arrows, and pierced the son of Pandu (Bhima) by sixty other shafts.

36. Then having taken up his bow having the twang like the roar of clouds, Bhima the son of Pandu, oppressed his enemy's elephant by arrows, and uttered terrible shouts.

37. That elephant, being thus oppressed by the arrows of Bhimasena, did not stay in the field of battle, although repeatedly restrained, even as the cloud dispersed by the wind (runs away from their positions).

38. The most formidable and royal elephant of Bhima rapidly followed that elephant of (Kshemadhurti), even as the wind-blown cloud pursues the cloud dispersed by the tempest.

39. Kshemadhurti of immense energy having checked his own elephant, pierced with his arrows the elephant of Bhimasena pursuing his own.

40. Thereupon, he (Kshemadhurti), having cut off his enemy's bow by means of an arrow well-shot, razor-like, and straight, highly oppressed that elephant belonging to his foe.

41. Then highly wrathful Kshemadhurti struck Bhima in the battle, and killed the elephant by piercing all his vital parts with his arrows. O descendant of the Bharata race, thus the great prince of elephant, belonging to Bhimasena, fell down.

42. Before the fall of his elephant, Bhimasena dismounted from him, and stood on the earth. Then he, too, struck down the elephant of his enemy by means of his mace.

43. Then Vrikodara killed Kshemadhurti with his mace, who then had descended from his crushed elephant, and had advanced against him with uplifted weapons.

44. Having been thus killed, he, with a sword in the hand, fell down dead by the side of his elephant, even as a lion killed by thunder falls dead by the side of a hill broken down by thunder.

45. O foremost of the Bharata race, having seen the most famous lord of the Kulatas killed, your troops, highly distressed, ran away from the field.

Thus ends the twelfth chapter, the slaying of Kshemadhurti, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then the mighty bowman, the heroic Karna, killed the troops of the Pandavas in battle with the straight arrows.

2. O king, the mighty car-warriors, namely the Pandavas, had most wrathfully smitten the soldiers of your son in the same way in the very presence of Karna.

3. So also Karna, O monarch, began to smite the army belonging to the Pandavas in the field of battle with the arrows, that were bright like the rays of the sun, and excellently polished by the black-smith.

4. O descendant of the Bharata race, there (in the field of battle) the elephants) highly afflicted by Karna with his straight arrows, roared most loudly, became weakened and senseless, and ran away towards the ten points of the horizon.

5. O father, while that immense force was being killed by the son of Suta, Nakula proceeded against that mighty car-warrior, the son of Suta with great rapidity.

6. Then Bhimasena checked the progress of Drona's son, who was achieving the most arduous tasks, and Satyaki, that of the two Kaikeya princes, Vindu and Anuvindu.

7. The lord of the earth, Chitrasena, rushed towards Srutakarman, who was advancing against him ; so also Prativindhya towards Chitra, who carried a standard of diverse colours and a beautiful bow.

8. Duryodhana, too, proceeded against the king Yudhisthira the son of Dhrama, while Dhananjaya rushed against the wrathful Samsaptakas.

9. While that whole host of the foremost heroes was being thus slain, Dhrishtadyumna rushed against Kripa ; and that undecayable Shikhandin proceeded against Kritavarman.

10. O mighty monarch, so again, Shrutakirti closed with Shalya ; and that son of Madri, Shahadeva of immense prowess, closed with your son, Dussashana.

11. In that great battle, the two Kaikeya princes covered Satyaki with a shower of arrows. Satyaki on the other hand covered the two Kaikeya princes (with a shower of brilliant arrows, O descendant of the Bharata race).

12. Those two heroic brothers deeply pierced this warrior (Satyaki) in the chest, even as two elephants strike another hostile elephant with their tusks in a dense forest.

13. O monarch, these two heroic brothers whose vital parts were deeply struck with the arrows, pierced Satyaki, who always performed appropriate deeds with their shafts.

14. O powerful monarch, Satyaki on the other hand, having smiled and shrouded all the points of the horizon with a shower of arrows, closed with the two brothers, O descendant of the Bharata race.

15. Thereupon those two brothers, whose progress was checked by the shower of arrows of Shini's grandson, indeed, covered the car of Shini's grandson with lots of shafts.

16. Having severed the most beautiful bows of those two brothers, then the highly celebrated Shaurin restrained the progress of them both in the battle with a shower of sharp arrows.

17. Then having grasped two other beautiful bows, and most effective shafts, they two, too, shrounded Satyaki (with the arrows) and roved about in the field with immense activity and expertness.

18. Those mighty arrows, shot by the two brothers, adorned with the feathers of the Kanka and the peacock, and ornamented with gold, fell down (upon the foes), after having illumined all the points of the horizon.

19. O monarch, there was a gloom in that formidable battle owing to the shower of arrows shot by both the parties. Then those great car-warriors severed each other's bows.

20. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, wrathful Satwata, most invincible in the field, having taken up another bow and stretched its string properly, severed the head of Anuvinda with an arrow, sharp like the razor, in the battle.

21. O monarch, that mighty head, adorned with ear-rings, fell like the head of Shamvara, slain in that dreadful battle (of old). This, having fallen upon the earth most rapidly, greatly aggrieved all the Kaikeyas.

22. Having seen that hero slain, his brother, that mighty car-warrior (Vinda), after having stretched out the string of another bow, restrained the course of Shini's grandson.

23. Having pierced Satyaki with sixty shafts, all sharpened on stone and adorned with the feathers of gold, he roared most loudly and said,—wait—wait.

24. The mighty car-warrior of the Kaikeya troops then pierced Satyaki in his arms and chest most rapidly with several thousands of arrows.

25. O king, Satyaki, of true prowess, being thus wounded with the arrows in all his limbs, shone in the field of battle like a Kinshuka with flowers.

26. In the battle, Satyaki, having been pierced by the lofty-minded Kaikeya, smilingly pierced back the Kaikeya chief with twenty-five shafts.

27. Thereupon those two best of car-warriors, having broken down each other's beautiful bows, and also slain each other's drivers and horses, with the greatest speed in that great encounter, descended from their cars, and advanced, one against the other, in order to fight with their swords in that dreadful battle.

28. Both of them, having taken up shields, as if adorned with hundred moons, and grasped the best of swords, and possessed as they were with the handsome arms, looked resplendent in that great field of battle like the most powerful ones, Jamva and Shakra, in the battle between the celestials and the Asuras.

29 Thereupon both the warriors roved about in that dreadful field of battle in circles, and speedily approached each other, engaged in combatting, in the battle. Thus the two, again, made the best of their efforts in slaying each other.

30. Then Satwata severed the shield of the Kaikeya chief into two pieces. So also this Pandava severed the shield of Satyaki into two pieces.

31. The Kaikeya chief, indeed, having thus broken into pieces the shield, that was decked with hundreds of stars, roved in circles in the field, sometimes advancing and sometimes receding back.

32. Thereupon the grandson of Shini who was possessed with the greatest activity severed him (his head) who having grasped the best of swords, careered in that broad field of battle, by a side-stroke.

33. O monarch, the Kaikeya prince, that mighty bowman, who was adorned with the shield, being thus cut off into pieces in that dreadful battle, fell down like a hill broken down by a thunderbolt.

34. That war-like grandson of Shini, that best of car-warriors, that scorcher of enemies, after having slain him (the Kaikeya chief) in battle, immediately ascended the car of Yudhamanyu.

35. Thereupon, again, having ascended another car, that was furnished with its due equipments, Satyaki began to destroy the immense army of the Kaikeyas with his arrows.

36. That vast force of the Kaikeyas, being slaughtered in battle, left that enemy in the field and ran away in the ten different directions of the horizon.

Thus ends the thirteenth chapter, the slaying of Vinda and Anuvinda, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XIV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thereupon, O monarch, the wrathful Shrutakarman had slain down Chitrasena, the lord of the earth, in the battle, by means of fifty different arrows.

2. O king, Avishara, indeed, after having struck down that Shrutakarman with nine straight shafts, pierced his driver with five other arrows.

3. Wrathful Shrutakarman, on the other hand, had struck down that Chitrasena, who was then standing at the head of his force, with a keen arrow in the most vital part of his body.

4. O great king, that hero, having been deeply pierced by the arrow by that lofty-minded warrior, attained the condition of senselessness, and entered into the abode of great grief.

5. During this interval, the highly famous Shrutakirtin closed this ruler of the earth (his insensible foe) with ninety different shafts.

6. Thereupon Chitrasena, that mighty bowman, having attained consciousness again, struck down his enemy's bow by a brood-headed shaft, and also pierced him with seven arrows.

7. Then he (Shrutakarman) took up another bow, that was capable of casting away fierce arrows, and was adorned with gold, made Chitrasena, by piercing him with the torrents of shafts, wear a varied appearance.

8. That youthful prince, wearing an wonderful appearance with the shafts, and putting on handsome garlands, shone in the field of battle, like an youth, excellently decked with ornaments, in the midst of an assembly.

9. O monarch, he, indeed, then pierced Shrutakarman in the chest with a keen shaft immediately; and afterwards uttered to him—'wait and wait.'

10. There Shrutakarman, on the other hand, being thus pierced by the arrow in the field of battle, began to shed blood, even as a mountain lets the liquid red chalk flow down.

11. Thereupon that heroic one, whose limbs were washed in blood, and who, again was stained with blood, shone in the field of battle like a Kinshuka covered over with flowers.

12. At that time, O monarch, Shrutakarman, having been attacked by his antagonist (Chitrasena), became very wrathful and severed his bow, that was capable of resisting the enemies, into two pieces.

13. Then, again, O monarch, he (Shrutakarman) covered, with three hundred arrows, him, whose bow was already severed into two pieces, and pierced him in the field with excellent winged shafts.

14. Thereupon he had severed the head of that high-sould one, that was adorned with an (iron) protection, with another brood-headed, pointed and sharp-headed arrow.

15. That head of Chitrasena, which looked most respledent, fell down upon the earth, even as the moon, out of her own will, falls upon the ground, being loosened from heaven.

16. O Sire, the troops of Chitrasena, having seen their king slain, marched with great rapidity against Avishara.

17. Thereupon that mighty bowman, who became very wrathful, rushed against those troops, shooting arrows upon them; even as, during the period of universal dissolution the king of the nether world (Yama), filled with wrath, rushes against all creatures.

18. Those warriors, having been slain by that bowman, your grandson, in the field of battle, most speedily ran away in all directions; even, as the elephants, burnt by the forest-conflagration, (run away from the forest).

19. Having seen them flying away (from the battle) hopeless of conquering the enemies, Srutakarman, pursuing and shooting keen arrows upon them, looked most brilliant.

20. Thereupon Prativindhya pierced Chitra with five rapid-going shafts, and pierced the driver of his car with three others. Then he broke down his standard by a single arrow.

21. Then he, (Chitra) pierced him by throwing at his arms and chest nine broad-headed shafts, that were adorned with the wings of gold, and sharp points, and ornamented with the feathers of the Kanka and peacock.

22. O descendant of the Bharata race, Prativindhya, having severed his (enemy's) bow with keen arrows, slaughtered him with five well-sharpened shafts.

23. Thereupon, O great king, he (Chitra) threw at your grandson the shaft, called Shakti, which was decked with golden bells and which, again, was most irresistible and dreadful, and which also, was like the flame of fire.

24. Prativindhya, as if laughing, severed into three pieces that shaft, in the field of battle, falling upon him, which was like a great flashing meteor suddenly falling from the sky.

25. That shaft which was cut off into three pieces by the keen arrows of Prativindhya, fell down like the thunderbolt, during the period of expiration of the Yuga, thus inspiring great fear in all creatures.

26. Having seen that arrow, called Shakti, severed into pieces, Chitra took up his powerful mace, that was adorned with a net-work of gold, and threw it against Prativindhya.

27. That mace had smitten his (antagonist's) heroes, and the driver of his car in that great battle, and then, having smitten his car, fell impetuously upon the ground.

28. O descendant of the Bharata race, he (Prativindhya), in the mean time, having descended from his car, threw at Chitra the arrow, called Shakti, that was furnished with golden bells, and decked with several ornaments.

29. The high-minded king Chitra caught hold of it (that shaft), whilst it was falling upon him; and thereafter, O descendant of Bharata race, he threw it back at Prativindhya.

30. That highly resplendent shaft, having pierced heroic Prativindhya in the field of battle and also having penetrated through his right arm, fell down upon the ground; and, as it fell, it illuminated that whole region (the battle-field) by its splendour, even as the lightning, falling upon the earth, illumines the entire place, where it falls.

31. Thereupon, O monarch, the most wrathful Prativindhya, most desirous of slaying Chitra, hurled at him a lance, adorned with gold.

32. That lance, having pierced through his armour and chest, immediately fell down upon the earth; even as the gigantic serpent enters into its hole.

33. Then that king, naving been smitten by the lance, fell upon the earth, stretching out his two long and massive arms, that resembled two iron clubs in splendour.

34. Having seen Chitra slain (in the battle), the troops on your side, who are all ornaments of battle, rushed from all sides with great impetuousity against Prativindhya.

35. Shooting several kinds of arms and the shaft called Shataghni, that was ornamented with the rows of bells, (those troops) covered him all ever, even as the clouds cover the Sun.

36. That mighty-armed one (Prativindhya), having struck those warriors with a net-work of arrows in the field of battle, overthrew your force, even as Indra, who carried the thunderbolt in the hand, overthrew the Asura host.

37. Thus slain in the battle by the Pandavas, the troops on your side, O monarch, suddenly broke in all directions, even as the clouds, scattered by the wind, run away in all sides.

38. Amongst your whole force, that was immensely slain, and (the rest) running away from the field, the son of Drona alone proceeded with great impetuousity against that highly powerful Bhimasena.

39. Then there suddenly followed a dreadful conflict between these two parties; even as there took place an encounter between Vritra and Vashava (Indra) in the battle between the celestials and the Asuras.

Thus ends the fourteenth chapter, the slaying of Chitra, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XV.

(KARNA PARVA.—Continued,)

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon, O king, the son of Drona who was possessed of great alacrity, and who showed easiness in the management of weapons, pierced Bhimasena with an arrow.

2. In the same way, he (the son of Drona), who was well acquainted with the different vital parts of the body, and who, again, was very smart in the management of his arms, after having seen all the vital parts of his body, had struck him with ninety sharp-headed shafts.

3. O monarch, Bhimasena, having been closed with a shower of keen arrows by the son of Drona, shone in the field of battle like the sun with all his rays.

4. Thereupon the Pandava, after having covered the son of Drona with one thousand arrows, well-aimed, sent forth a leonine roar.

5. Then, O monarch, the son of Drona, having checked the course of his (antagonist's) shafts by his own arrows in the field of battle, smilingly struck the son of Pandu in the forehead with a dart.

6. Thereafter, O king, the son of Pandu carried the shaft, that was struck in his forehead; even as the proud rhinoceros in the forest bears his horn.

7. Then Bhima of immense prowess smilingly pierced the son of Drona, who attempted very hard in the battle, in the forehead with three shafts.

8. Then this twice-born person looked most resplendent with the arrows struck in his forehead; even as the best of mountains, being washed (with water) during the rainy season, looks resplendent with its three peaks.

9. Thus the son of Drona afflicted the son of Pandu with hundreds of arrows, but he could not shake him; even as the wind can not shake the mountain.

10. In the same way, the son of Pandu, highly gratified, could not shake the son of Drona, in the field of battle, with hundreds of his sharp-headed arrows; even as the torrents of rain can not shake the mountain.

11. Those two mighty car-warriors, the two heroic warriors of terrible prowess, having covered each other with their dreadful shafts, looked very handsome, sitting upon their cars.

12. Both (the heroes) looked resplendent like two suns, and were destructive of men on each other's side. Moreover both of them burnt each other by their own excellent arrows, that resembled their own rays.

13. Thereupon, in that dreadful battle, those two heroic warriors made their best attempts in counteracting each other's deeds; and with the torrents of shafts they most fearlessly made efforts in challenging each other.

14. Those two foremost of persons, those invincible and fierce heroes, whose teeth were constituted by the shafts and whose mouths were formed by the bows, roved about in the field of battle like two terrible tigers.

15. Both of them became invisible on account of the torrents of shafts in all sides; even as both the sun and the moon in the firmament become invisible, when they are covered over by the net-work of clouds.

16. Then the two smiters of foes appeared for a very short while, and shone forth like Mars and Mercury, when they become wholly released from the cover of clouds.

17. Then at that moment, in that dreadful battle, the son of Drona made Vrikodara in the field occupy his right position.

18. And he showered forth hundreds of terrible shafts, even as the masses of clouds drop down torrents of rain upon a mountain. This, indeed, namely the indication of his antagonist's victory Bhimasena could not like to tolerate.

19. Thereupon, O monarch, the son of Pandu baffled his enemy's efforts from the position on his (antagonist's) right side; and they advanced or withdrew according to the divisions of their circular situations.

20. Thus there ensued a fierce battle between those two foremost of warriors, who roved about (in the field of battle) in several ways and circles.

21. Both of them struck each other with the arrows shot from their bows stretched to their perfect length; and also they made the best efforts in slaying each other in the battle. Again, each of them wished to make the other car-less in the field.

22. Thereupon the son of Drona, that mighty car-warrior, imparted strength to the most powerful weapons, which, indeed the son of Pandu frustrated by the weapons of his own, in the battle.

23. Then, O mighty king, there ensued a very dreadful battle of weapons; even as there had taken place a very terrible battle of the planets, during the time of destruction of creatures of the universe.

24. O descendant of the Bharata race, those arrows, shot by both of them, struck one another; and thus illumined all the points of the horizon, as well as the troops on your side, from all directions.

25. O king, the firmament looked very fearful as it was wholly covered by the showers of arrows, even as it appears during the destruction of the creatures of the universe, when it is entirely shrouded by the fall of the meteors.

26. O descendant of the Bharata race, there (in the field of battle) was produced a great fire by the counteraction of shafts from both the parties, which, viz., the fire was attended with sparks and blazing flames. It continued to burn both the hosts.

27. O powerful monarch, the Siddhas, who hovered about there in the battle, uttered these words :—'O Lord, this battle is the foremost of all the battles fought (in the days of yore).

28. 'All the battles (of old) will not be worth the sixteenth part of this (battle). Hardly, again, there will be a battle like this.

29. 'O! these two personages, viz,, this Brahmana and this Kshatriya are possessed of knowledge. O! both of them are endowed with heroism; and also they are of terrible prowess.

30. 'O! Bhima is of fierce strength. O! what a great skill is possessed by the other. O! what an essence of the energy of both. O! how great is their skill.

31. 'Both these persons are, indeed, waiting in the field of battle like two all-destroying Yamas at the end of time. As if both of them are born like two Rudras, or like two light-giving suns.

32. 'Both these foremost of persons of dreadful forms are standing in the battle like two Yamas.' These words of the Siddhas were, indeed, heard there every moment. Moreover there was generated a great leonine roar amongst the celestials who assembled there (in the field of battle).

33. Having witnessed the extraordinary and inconceivable achievements of those two in the field of battle, the assemblage of the Siddhas and the Charanas were greatly astonished.

34. Then the celestials, the Siddhas and the high-class sages (the Rishis) praised them both, and uttered these words: 'Excellent, O powerful-armed son of Drona! Most remarkable, O Bhima!

35—36. In the field of battle, O monarch, those two heroic warriors committed injuries to each other. They also looked upon each other; and they had their lips quivering with wrath. Out of wrath, again, they grinded their teeth, and in the same way their lips as well.

37. Those two mighty car-warriors shrouded each other with the torrents of shafts. In the field of battle, they were like two masses of clouds, dropping down showers of arrows, and sending forth lightning, that was formed by their weapons.

38. Those two warriors having penetrated each other's standards, and also having pierced each other's drivers of cars, and, again, having pierced each other's horses, pierced each other in that dreadful battle.

39. Thereupon, O powerful monarch, those two wrathful warriors, most desirous of slaying each other, after having taken up two arrows hurled at each other those shafts without any hesitation, in that dreadful encounter.

40. O mighty monarch, these two arrows that shone most brilliantly, and that had the force of thunder, and also that were most inapproachable, came and struck them both who stood at the head of their respective hosts.

41. The two highly-energetic warriors, deeply struck with those two arrows by their respective forces, then fell down at the back of their cars.

42. Thereupon, O king, his driver having been conscious of the insensible condition of the son of Drona, carried him away from the field of battle in the presence of all his (the son of Drona) soldiers.

43. In the same way, O monarch, the son of Pandu, that scorcher of enemies, who had fainted every moment, was carried away from the field of battle, in his car, by his driver.

Thus ends the fifteenth chapter, the encounter between Ashwathaman and Bhima, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XVI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. Do yon relate to me how the battle of Arjuna waged with the Samsaptakas, and that of other lords of the earth with the Pandavas.

2. Moreover describe to me, O Sanjaya, how that battle of Arjuna took place with Ashwathaman; and also that of other supporters of the earth with the sons of Pritha.

Sanjaya said :—

3. O monarch, do you hear me, who am describing to you how that battle, which was destructive of the bodies, sins, and lives of persons, waged between the heroes (on our side) and the enemies.

4. The son of Pritha, that slayer of enemies, having entered into the army of the Samsaptakas, that was like the great ocean, afflicted it most highly; even as the dreadful tempest agitates the vast ocean.

5. Dhananjaya, after having severed the heads of the heroic warriors by broad-headed and sharp-edged arrows, that (viz., the heads) had faces, as resplendent as the full moon, and also very handsome eyes, eyebrows, and teeth, immediately scattered the earth over with these heads, as if with lotuses severed from their stalks.

6. Arjuna cut off the arms of his antagonists with keen arrows, that were like the razors, which, viz., the arms were excellently round, long, and muscular, and also were rubbed over with soft sandal and other perfumes, and, again, were furnished with weapons, and fingers protected with leathern cases, and resembled the five-headed snakes, in that dreadful battle.

7. The son of Pandu, again and again, cut off with his broad-faced arrows the horses and horsemen, the drivers of cars and standards, bows and arrows, as well as arms, that were ornamented with valuable jewels.

8. O monarch, in that battle Arjuna, sent away innumerable car-warriors, elephants, horses and cavalry to the abode of Death, by striking them with several thousands of arrows.

9. The foremost of heroes, who became very wrathful, and who roared most loudly and who, again, like bulls, were highly excited as if for a cow in season, proceeded most rapidly against him (Ajuna) with great uproars.

10. Then those warriors began to strike him (Arjuna) with their shafts who at that time continued to slay his (Arjuna's) antagonist, even as the bulls strike another of their kind with the horns. Thus the battle, which caused the hairs to stand on points, waged between him (Arjuna) and them (other warriors); even as there had taken place a battle of the Daityas with the wielder of the thunder-bolt (Indra) at the conquest of the three worlds.

11. That Arjuna, after having restrained the weapons of his antagonists, coming from all sides, by the weapons of his own, and also having pierced the foes with a large number of shafts most rapidly, had taken away their lives.

12—14. That impersonation of victory (Jaya), that enhancer of the fears of his antagonists, after having broken into minute pieces, like the tempest breaking the vast masses of clouds into fragments, the cars, which had their poles, wheels and axes already shattered (by him), and which had their warriors, horses and drivers slain, and which also had their weapons and quivers dislodged, and which had their standards smitten down, and which had their traces and reins of horses broken into pieces, and which had their wooden fences already shattered into pieces (by him), and which had their arrows (deposited in them) struck down, and moreover after having astonished every body, worked out deeds, like those of a thousand mighty car-warriors, fighting together, that were worth seeing.

15. The assemblage of the Siddhas and the divine Rishis, as well as the Charanas, began to praise them highly. The celestial kettle-drums also begun to be sounded; and showers of flowers continued to fall upon the heads of both Keshava and Arjuna. Meanwhile a voice, as if incorporated, uttered these words :—

16. 'Those two heroes, Keshava and Arjuna, are always said to be possessed of the splendour of the moon, the light of the fire, the strength of the wind, and the brilliancy of the sun.

17. 'Those two are as invincible as Brahman and Ishana. They are seated on the same car. They are the best of all creatures. They are most heroic. And the both are equal to Nara and Narayana.'

18. Thus hearing and beholding this wonderful event, O descendant of the Bharata race, Ashwathaman, firmly resolved upon, rushed towards the two Krishnas, viz., Arjuna and Keshava, in that battle.

19. Having invited to battle the son of Pandu, who was pouring forth showers of arrows, that had the power of slaying the antagonists, with his arm holding an arrow within its reach, the son of Drona smilingly addressed him, saying :—

20. 'O hero, if you consider me to be your worthy guest, who am arrived here, then allow me, with your entire soul, the hospitality of battle to-day.'

21. Having been thus invited by the son of the Preceptor out of desire for battle, Arjuna considered himself to be highly respected, and spoke to Janardana the words :—

22. 'The army of the Samsaptakas should be slaughtered by me ; but, again, the son of Drona is inviting me to battle. O Madhava, do you order me really what should be performed first. If you consider it proper, that the work of hospitality should be given (done) first after rising.

23. Having been thus addressed (by Arjuna), Krishna carried, to the near presence of the son of Drona, the son of Pritha, who was invited to battle according to the prescribed maxims of triumphant challenge; even as the God of wind carries Indra to the sacrificial place.

24. Keshava, after having invited (to battle) him, who had his whole heart directed upon one thing, addressed the son of Drona, saying : 'O Ashwathaman, having been still (in the field), do you begin to strike without hesitation, as also do you bear (patiently).'

25. This, indeed, is the fit occasion for those, who support their lives with the food of their masters, to repay obligation to their supporters. The struggle between the Brahmanas is most insignificant ; but the war between two Kshatriyas is a grand and decisive one, resulting either in victory or defeat.

26. You, who are most willing to receive, out of foolishness, those celestial rites of hospitality at the hands of the son of Pritha, after having becalmed yourself this day, continue to fight with the son of Pandu.

27. Having been thus addressed by Vasudeva, the best of the twice-born persons said—So be it. He also pierced Keshava with sixty arrows, and penetrated Arjuna with three other shafts.

28. Having been highly wrathful, Arjuna broke asunder his (antagonist's) bow with three powerful arrows. The son of Drona, on the other hand, took up another bow, more dreadful than the first.

29. Having stretched his bow within so short a time as the twinkling of the eye, he (the son of Drona) pierced both Arjuna and Keshava—Vashudeva with three hundred shafts, and the son of Pandu with one thousand arrows.

30. Thereupon, the son of Drona, after having rendered Arjuna wholly stupid with the greatest care in the field of battle, shot thousands and tens of thousands and millions of shafts.

31—32. Innumerable shafts continued to be poured forth from the quiver, the bow, the bow-string, the fingers, the arms, the two hands, the breast, the face, the nose, the two eyes, the two ears, the head, the different limbs and pores of the body, the car and its standards, of that professor of Brahmana, O sire.

33. The son of Drona, after having pierced Madhava and the son of Pandu with a heavy shower of shafts, became highly gratified, and sent forth a great uproar like the loud roar of a vast congregated mass of clouds.

34. Having heard this great uproar of him (the son of Drona), the son of Pandu, addressed that Eternal One, saying : O Madhava, observe this great oppression of the son of the preceptor towards me.

35. This warrior considers us to be slaughtered, who have entered into the house of thick arrows (i.e., the arrowy shower). But we will surely frostrate his aim by means of our learning and energy.

36. The most excellent of the Bharata race, after having severed every one of the shafts of Ashwathaman into three pieces, destroyed the power of those arrows even as the sun does away with the mist.

37. Thereupon the son of Pandu pierced with dreadful arrows the army of the Samsaptakas, with their horses, drivers, cars and elephants, and with their standards, infantry and car-warriors repeatedly.

38. Then these persons, who having posted there in any way they liked, witnessed the battle, considered themselves to be wholly covered over with the showers of arrows, as if closing themselves by themselves.

39. Those arrows of innumerable forms furnished with the wings, having been shot from the Gandiva bow, had slaughtered the elephants, horses and men, either stationed there or at the distance of two miles, in that (dreadful) battle.

40. The trunks of the elephants, that had been pouring forth their juice (as the mark of their excitement), having been thus cut off by the broad-headed arrows, began to fall down; even as the pretty-well gigantic trees, having been hewn down by axes in the forest, fall down upon the earth.

41. After a short while, the elephants that resembled hill, along with those riding upon them, tumbled down upon the ground even as the large mountains broken down by the thunder-bolt fall upon the ground.

42—43. Having severed into minute fragments the cars that appeared like the dissolving columns of vapour in the evening sky, and also that were well-furnished with all its equipments, and that were yoked to well-trained horses, and, again, that were occupied by the warriors, invincible in battle, by powerful arrows, (he the son of Pandu) began to pour forth shower of shafts upon the enemies. Moreover Dhananjaya slew both the horsemen and the infantry, well-adorned with the ornaments.

44. Dhananjaya, like the sun appearing at the end of the yuga, had soaked away the vast deep of the Samsaptaka army, that was most difficult to be dried up, by means of his sharp-headed arrows, that constituted his rays.

45. Then again he (Dhananjaya) without hesitation perfectly penetrated the son of Drona, who was like a huge mountain with straight arrows, that had great force and also that were as resplendent as the sun; even as the wielder of the thunder-bolt pierces a mountain (by thunder).

46. The most wrathful son of the Preceptor, desiring to fight, proceeded against him (Arjuna) with a view to pierce him along with his horses and drivers with swift arrows. The son of Pritha, on the other hand, sundered those arrows shot at him.

47. Thereupon he (the son of Pandu), having been highly wrathful, continued to shower forth quivers upon quivers of arrows upon the person of Ashwathaman; even as one serves a guest with things upon things in his house.

48. Then the son of Pandu, after having forsaken the army of the Samsaptakas ran towards the son of Drona; even as the doner, after having abandoned the unworthy guests, rushes towards the worthy one with his gifts.

Thus ends the sixteenth chapter, the encounter between Ashwathaman and Arjuna, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XVII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon the battle waged between them (Arjuna and Ashwathaman) who were like the planets Sakra and Angirasha in splendour; even as there had taken place a battle between Sakra and Angirasha in the firmament for entering the constellation.

2. Those two warriors, who inspired the people of the world with fears, afflicted each other with resplendent arrows, that were like their rays, and resembled two planets, that had gone away from their proper paths.

3. Thereupon Arjuna deeply penetrated him (Ashwathaman) in the midst of his eye-brows with a sharp arrow. Therewith the son of Drona blazed forth like the sun with his upward rays.

4. Thus the two Krishnas (Arjuna and Keshava) having been greatly afflicted by Ashwathaman with hundreds of keen arrows, stood (in the field), blazing forth, covered ever as they were by their own rays, like the two suns appearing at the end of the yuga.

5. Thereupon when Vasudeva became invisible, Arjuna shot a weapon with sharp edges on all sides. He then slew the son of Drona with a large number of arrows, that were either like the thunder-bolt, or like the rod of Death.

6. That one of immense strength, always performing the most difficult deeds, pierced both Keshava and Arjuna in the most vital part of their bodies with arrows, that were endued with fierce impetuosity.

Even death, being struck by them, feels great pain.

7. After having restrained the arrows shot by the son of Drona, Arjuna shrouded him over with twice as many shafts, furnished with the wings. He then, having closed over that best hero, the unique of his class, along with his horses, the driver of his car and his standards, began to smite down the army of the Samsaptakas.

8—9. Then the son of Pritha cut off with his will-shot arrows the bows, the shafts, the quivers, the bow-strings, the hands, the arms, the weapons grasped in their hands, the umbrellas, the standards, swift horses, the shafts deposited in the cars, the clothes, the floral wreaths, the ornaments, the coats of mail, the shields, the heads, all of them most handsome and endearing, of the enemies, who stood in the field determined never to turn their backs towards their foes.

10. The excellently ornamented cars, horses and elephants, that were ridden over by heroes among men, who were capable of fighting with the greatest care, were smitten down with hundreds of arrows shot by the son of Pritha. Along with these the foremost of heroes among men fell down.

11. The heads of persons, furnished with faces resembling the lotus, the sun, and the full moon in beauty, and adorned with diadems, crowns of highest splendour, and, again, slain by the broad-headed, the crescent-shaped, and razor-like arrows, fell down upon the earth without cessation.

12. Thereupon the heroes, belonging to the races, called the Kalingas, the Bangas, the Angas and the Nishadhas, most desirous of slaying him, riding upon elephants as splendid as the elephant of the great enemy of the Daityas, proceeded most rapidly against the son of Pandu, who had checked the pride of the foes of the celestials.

13. The son of Pritha severed into fragments, the armour, the vital parts, the trunks, the riders, the standards and flags of those elephants, which then fell down upon the earth, even as the summits of mountains drop down on the ground, when smitten by the thunder.

14. When that elephant force was entirely destroyed, the diadem-decked one (Arjuna) closed the son of his preceptor with arrows, having the color of the newly-risen sun; even as the wind wholly covers the risen sun with the net-work of vast masses of clouds.

15. Then having restrained the shafts of Arjuna with the arrows of his own, the son of Drona after closing both Arjuna and Vasudeva with innumerable shafts, roared most loudly; even as the vast mass of clouds, appearing in the firmament at the end of the summer season, after covering both the sun and the moon, makes a loud uproar.

16. Arjuna having been highly oppressed with those weapons, and having dispelled the darkness (caused with the arrowy showers of Ashwathaman), suddenly darkened all with the torrents of arrows, and again, and again pierced him (Ashwathaman) and all those, belonging to your army, with arrows furnished with the excellent wings.

17. Savyasachin could not be seen while taking up the arrows, or aiming them, or shooting them. But only this could be seen that the elephants, the horses, the foot-soldiers, and the cars (i. e. the car-warriors), with their bodies cut off, were slain (with the arrows of Arjuna).

18. Then the son of Drona, after having immediately aimed ten foremost of arrows, shot them, as if one with great activity. Of these ten shafts, excellently shot, five pierced Arjuna, and the remaining five deeply penetrated that Eternal One (Keshava).

19. All the people considered these two foremost of persons, resembling Kuvera and Indra, who being struck with those arrows, were drenched in blood (i. e. blood having flowed down their limbs), and who were highly afflicted by that one, who had completed his education (in the science of arms), slain in the field of battle.

20. Thereupon the king of the Dashaha race, said to Arjuna these words: 'Why do you make this mistake? Do you slay this heroic chief. This will, indeed, be committing a great fault, if this person be neglected, who will hereafter be the cause of great uneasiness, even as the disease, if neglected, becomes the cause of great woe. Unerring Arjuna, having said to the Eternal One—So be it, cut into minute fragments the son of Drona with the greatest care.

21 Then, again Arjuna having been filled with wrath with good care, pierced the son of Drona in the two arms, that were the best of their kind and also that were besmeared with the soft sandal, and also of the chest, the head, and the extraordinary thighs, with arrows furnished with heads like the ears of goats, excellently shot from his Gandiva bow. Moreover the son of Pandu, having severed the traces of his antagonist's horses, pierced the horses themselves, and also carried away his foe to a great distance from the field of battle.

22. The son of Drona, who was thus carried away from the field, on those horses, as swift as the wind, became deeply afflicted with the arrows of the son of Pritha. Then that intelligent one (Ashwathaman) having meditated for a while, liked not to return back with a view to fight with the son of Pritha.

23. The most exalted one of the Angirasha's race, who was possessed of immense activity, and who became destitute of all aspirations, and who had all his arrows and weapons exhausted, after knowing that victory was ever with the chief of the Vrishni race and Dhananjaya, entered into the army of Karna.

24. Then, indeed, O sire, the son of Drona, after having checked his horses and consoled himself entered the army of Karna, that was teemed with cars, horses and men.

25. When Ashwathaman, who was their bitterest enemy, had been carried away by the horses from the field of battle, even as the disease is driven away from the body by incantations, medicines, and efficacious means,

26. Both Keshava and Arjuna, riding upon cars, with flags waved by the wind and whose rattle was like the lond roar of the clouds, advanced towards the front of the army of the Samsaptakas.

Thus ends the seventeenth chapter, the defeat of Ashwathaman, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then there had arisen a great uproar, towards the nothern part of the Pandava army, amongst the cars, the elephants, the horses, and the infantry, as they were being slaughtered by Dandadhara.

2. Having turned the course of his car, but not having restrained his horses, that were as swift as either the Garuda (the chief of the birds) or the wind, Keshava addressed Arjuna, saying the following : —

3. "The king of the Magadhas of unequalled prowess, who was accompanied by his elephant crushing (his enemies), was not at all inferior to Vagadatta, either in learning or energy.

4. Having slaughtered him (the chief of the Magadhas) at first, do you slay, again, the army of the Samsaptakas." Having uttered these words, Keshava carried the son of Pritha to the front of Dandadhara.

5. That foremost one of the Magadha race, who, like the calamitous planet Ketu amongst all the Planets, was unbearable in managing the elephant-hook, destroyed the army on the side of the antagonist; even as the most dreadful comet destroys the entire earth.

6. Having ridden on his elephant, that was furnished with all its equipments, and that was like the Danava with the face and form of an elephant, and also that roared like the vast mass of congregated clouds, and that had the power of crushing the antagonists, Dandadhara slaughtered thousands of cars, horses, and elephants, as well as warriors.

7. That elephant, also, having trumpled upon the cars, crushed down upon the earth innumerable men, along with their horses and drivers, by his feet. That best of elephants, that resembled the wheel of Time, crushed with his two feet a large number of several other elephants, and also had slain them with his trunk.

8. Having slaughtered the men, who were adorned with the coats of mail made of iron, along with their horses and infantry, he (the chief of the Magadhas) crushed down upon the ground these people by the best and the mightiest of the elephants; even as one crushes the reeds with a sort of crackling sound.

9. Thereupon Arjuna, having ridden upon the most handsome car, fell upon that foremost of elephants, that stood in the midst of the army, which echoed with the twang of bow-strings, the sound of palms (of hands), and the noise of car-wheels, and also was filled with the beat and blare of a large number of cymbals and drums, and conches, and which, again, was filled with the thousands of cars, horses and elephants.

10. Then, again, Dandadhara pierced Arjuna with twelve best arrows, and Janardana with sixteen others. Then he pierced the horses, each with three ; and he roared most loudly and laughed over and over again.

11. Thereupon the son of Pritha cut off the bow, with its string and arrow, of him (his antagonist), as well as his standard by means of his broad-headed shafts. Then, again, he cut off his drivers, along with the infantry protecting his animal. Thereupon, also, the lord of Giribraja became highly enraged,

12. Most desirous of highly afflicting both Arjuna and Janardana with his elephant (possessing tusks), that had his temples split up (out of great excitement), and that resembled a thick mass of clouds, and also that was like the wind in speed, Dandadhara had smitten Dhananjaya with his innumerable lances.

13. Thereupon the son of Pandu cut off, as if at the same time, the two arms, that resembled the trunks of elephants, and the head, that was furnished with a face like the full moon, of him, (his antagonist) with his broad-headed arrows, the latter with three, like the razor. He, again, poured forth hundreds of shafts upon his enemy's elephant.

14. Having been struck with the arrows of the son of Pritha, and covered over with several ornaments, that elephant, that had an armour made of gold, looked most resplendent (in the battle) ;even as the mountain, that had its trees and herbs burnt by the forest fire, looks most handsome during the night.

15. That elephant that was highly afflicted with pain, and that roared like a mass of clouds and also that became greatly weakened, fell down (upon the ground), uttering a loud uproar, wandering, roving about and running away (from the battle) with tottering steps, along with his driver; even as the mountain, being shattered by the thunderbolt, falls (upon the earth).

16. On the fall of his brother in the field of battle, Drona, after having ridden on his elephant that was white like a mass of snow and that was ornamented with gold, and, again, that resembled a summit of the Himalayas, proceeded with a view to slay the younger brother of Indra, and Dhananjaya.

17. That one (Danda), after having smitten Janardana with three sharp lances resembling the rays of the sun in splendour, as well as Arjuna with five other whetted ones, shouted most loudly. Thereupon the son of Pandu, making a loud roar, severed the two arms of him (his antagonist).

18. Those two arms, that were deeply cut by two razor-like shafts and that had two lances in their grasp, and that had been adorned with the Angadas and also that had been smeared with soft sandal and again, having fallen from the back of the elephant at the same instant of time shone brightly even as two gigantic snakes after having dropped down from the summit of the mountain, shine (on the earth).

19. So also the head of Danda, after having been severed by diadem-decked Arjuna with a crescent-shaped weapon, fell down from the back of the elephant upon the ground ; and it shone brightly, as it was smeared with his own blood, after having dropped down, even as the sun, after having fallen from the Asta (setting) mountain towards the western point of the horizon,looks very bright.

20. Thereupon the son of Pritha pierced that elephant, that was like a mass of white cloud, with the foremost of arrows, resembling the rays of the sun. On this he fell down (upon the earth) roaring most loudly ; even as the summit of a mountain falls on earth broken down by thunder.

21. Thereafter several other foremost of elephants, resembling the above-mentioned ones, that were most desirous of gaining victory, were slain by Savyasachin, even as the two elephants (belonging to Dandadhara) had been slaughtered smiten already. Afterwards the vast army on the side of the enemies dispersed.

22. The elephant, the cars, the horses, and men, that had thronged together, having been struck by one another, fell down on the field of battle. So also the soldiers, extolling one another highly, were deeply struck by one another and slain : and with tottering steps they fell down upon the ground.

23. After a short while, the heroic warriors, after having surrounded Arjuna, even like the celestials encompasing Purandara, addressed him, saying: 'O hero, that enemy, of whom we were greatly afraid like the creatures being afraid of death itself, has now been slain by you.'

24. O smiter of enemies, had you not protected those people from terror, who had greatly been oppressed by the most powerful foes, then there would have been immense gratification amongst the antagonists, even as there had been a great merriment amongst us on the slaughter of the enemies.

25. Having heard these words and others repeated by his friends, Arjuna with cheerful mind advanced once more against the army of the Samsaptakas after having worshipped the people ascending to their positions.

Thus ends the eighteenth chapter, the slaughter of Dandadhara, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XIX.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Having careered round, Jishnu slaughtered again an innumerable number of the Samsaptakas; even as the Planet Mercury destroys a large number of people by travelling in an exceedingly curved line.

2 O monarch, O descendant of the Bharata race, the men, horses, cars and elephants, having been struck by the arrows of the son of Pritha, wavered, roved about, lost their color, fell down and died.

3—4. The son of Pandu severed in the field of battle, with his broad-headed, razor-like and crescent-shaped arrows, as well as with those equipt with the teeth of calves, the best of horses yoked to the cars, drivers, standards, bows and arrows, hands and the weapons held in the hands, the arms and heads of heroic warriors on the side of the enemies, who were fighting against him.

5. The mighty heroes fell upon Arjuna by hundreds and thousands, even as the mighty bulls fight with another bull in order to gain a cow during season.

6. The battle that took place between him and them made the hairs to stand on points. This battle resembled the great war between the Daityas and the wielder of the thunder-bolt at the time of the conquest of the three worlds.

7. Thereupon the son of Ugrayudha pierced him (the son of Pritha) with three arrows that were like the Dandashuka snakes. He (the son of Pritha) on the other hand, severed his head from his body.

8. Then they (the heroic warriors), highly enraged, shrouded Arjuna from all sides with innumerable weapons; even as the masses of clouds being urged by the winds cover the Himavat at the expiration of the summer.

9. Arjuna, after having restrained the weapons of his antagonists coming from all sides with the weapons of his own, slaughtered a large number of his foes with well-shot arrows.

10—11. Afterwards Arjuna made innumerable cars severed of their Trivenus; and slaughtered the horses, the drivers and the Parshnis (drivers of another class) of them; and, again, displaced their weapons and quivers; and also destroyed their wheels and standards; and cut off their chords, traces and axes; and moreover despoiled their bottoms and yokes; and at last displaced their equipments from their proper places with a large number of his shafts.

12. Those cars, lying there (on the field of battle) in innumerable numbers, having been broken into pieces and injured (by Arjuna), looked like the mansions of the rich men, smitten down either by the fire, or wind, or the rains.

13. The elephants, having their vital parts penetrated with the arrows that were like the thunderbolt in speed, fell down like the mansions on the summits of a mountain shattered by the blasts of lightning.

14. Having been afflicted by Arjuna, large number of horses, that had their tongues and entrails driven out, and that were greatly weakened, and that were smeared with blood, and also that had held an awful appearance, fell down upon the ground along with their riders.

15. O sire, having been pierced by Savyasachin with the keen arrows, the men, horses and elephants wandered about, with tottering steps, fell down, roared most loudly and died.

16. The son of Pritha had slaughtered his antagonists with innumerable arrows, that were sharpened on stones, and also that were as deadly as the thunderbolt or the poison; even as Mahendra slays the Danavas.

17. Many heroes, who had put on valuable coats of armour, and who were adorned with various kinds of ornaments, and who had diverse forms, and who, again, were equipt with innumerable weapons of the best kinds, are lying, with their cars and standards, on the field of battle, having been slaughtered by the son of Pritha.

18. The warriors, who were vanquished, of noble deeds and of high parentage and learning departed to paradise on account of their noble deeds, whereas their bodies only lay upon the earth.

19. Thereupon several kings of many countries, who were accompanied by their attendants, and who, again, were highly enraged, belonging to your army, proceeded most rapidly against Arjuna, that foremost of car-warriors.

20. Conveyed by their cars, horses and elephants, several warriors and foot-soldiers who were all very desirous of slaying (Arjuna), advanced most rapidly against their antagonist (Arjuna), letting off innumerable weapons of great speed.

21. Thereupon Arjuna, who was like the winds, had done away with the showers of weapons, that resembled the showers of rains, and that were let off by the warriors resembling the masses of clouds, by means of sharp arrows, shot with great readiness.

22. Then the people saw him (Arjuna) crossing that bridgeless ocean, which was constitued by the horses, infantry, elephants, and cars, and whose waves were formed by the most powerful weapons of the foes, by means of a bridge composed of his offensive and defensive weapons.

23. Then Vasudeva said :—"O son of Pritha, O sinless one, why do you play thus? Having crushed down this army of the Samsaptakas, then make haste to slay Karna."

24. Having uttered—so be it,—to Krishna, Arjuna then forcibly struck down the rest of the army of the Samsaptakas; and slaughtered them, even as Indra had slaughtered the Daityas.

25. It could not be seen by the people with even the greatest attention, when Arjuna had taken up, or aimed the arrows, or shot the shafts with rapidity in the field of battle.

26. O descendant of the Bharata race, Govinda considered this event to be most wonderful. Those arrows (shot by Arjuna) looking white like swans and possessed of great impetuosity, entered into the hostile army, even as the swans enter into a lake.

27. Thereupon Govinda, after having observed the field of battle during the course of the slaugter of men, addressed Savyasachin, saying :—

28. "O son of Pritha, this formidable and great destruction of the kings of the Bharata race, as well as of the rulers of entire earth has taken place on account of the (foolish) actions of Duryodhana.

29. O descendant of the Bharata race, behold these bows, having their backs decked in gold, of the mighty bowmen, so also the girdles and quivers, that were displaced from their bodies.

30. (Again, behold), the straight shafts adorned with the golden wings, as well as the long arrows, washed with oil, even like the snakes coming out of their sloughs.

31. O descendant of the Bharata race, (behold also) the lances of diverse kinds, that are adorned with gold and scattered on all sides, as well as the coats of mail, having golden backs and loosened from the bodies of the warriors.

32. (Behold) the spears adorned with gold, and the Sakti-arrows also decorated with gold, as well as the huge maces bound with the threads of gold and chords of hemp.

33. (Behold) the swords ornamented with the workmanship of gold, the axes decorated with gold, as also the battle-axes equipt with the handles made of bright gold.

34. (Again behold) the spiked maces, the short arrows, the Bhushandis, the Kanayas, the Kuntas, made of iron, scattered about, and the huge Mushalas.

35. The mighty warriors most desirous of victory and possessed of immense activity, after having taken up weapons of diverse kinds, although dead, still looked as if they were living.

36. Behold those thousands of warriors, who had their limbs crushed by the maces, and who had their heads severed by the Mushalas, and again, who were highly pressed by the elephants, horses and cars.

37—38. O destroyer of foes, the fields of battle were scattered over with the dead bodies of the elephants, horses and men, that had been torn into fragments with the shafts, the arrows called Sakti, swords and lances, and scimitars, axes, spears, and the Nakharas and clubs; and also those bodies were smeared with the torrents of blood.

39. O descendant of the Bharata race, the earth shines most brilliantly with the arms scattered over her, that are smeared with the soft sandal and that are ornamented with the Angadas, and also that are marked with the auspicious signs, and that are furnished with the leathern protections, and that are adorned with the Keyuras.

40. (Again, the earth looks most resplendent), strewn over with the hands furnished with the well-protected fingers, severed from their arms and adorned with innumerable ornaments, and also with the thighs severed from their bodies and resembling the trunks of elephants, and, again, with the heads of the most skilful and active warriors, that are adorned with the turbans set with, the most valuable gems, and furnished with the handsome ear-rings.

41. Now do you behold the most handsome cars, equipt with the golden bells and broken into numberless fragments, so also the large number of horses, that are smeared with blood; and again the bottoms of cars and long quivers; as well as several kinds of flags and standards.

42. (Again do you behold) the large conches of the warriors; the yak-tails that are perfectly white; and the elephants whose tongues have come out (of the mouths), and that are lying on the field, resembling the hills.

43. (Also behold) the variegated triumphal banners, and the elephants, warriors, slain in the battle, the beautiful coverlets of elephants; and the innumerable blankets with excellent (needle) workmanship.

44. (Moreover behold) the blankets, that are most handsome, variegated and torn into fragments, and as well as the bells, broken into minute particles by the falling elephants and loosened from their bodies.

45. (Also behold) the hooks, that are furnished with handles, decked with precious stones called Vaidurya and lying on the ground; and the most handsome yokes of horses, as well as the armours for their breast, that are decked with diamonds; and the valuable pieces of cloth, that are adorned with gold and tied to the summit of the standards carried by horsemen.

46. (Behold) the coverlets of horses upon their backs lying upon the ground, that are most beautiful, and that are set with the precious jewels and that are adorned with gold and made of the skins of Ranku (a kind of deer).

47. (Behold) the headgears of the lords of men, and the beautiful garlands made of gold, and the umbrellas fallen from their proper places, and also the white yak-tails and fans.

48. (Behold) the earth scattered over with the faces, that resemble either the moon or the stars in splendour, and that are furnished with handsome ear-rings, and that are ornamented with well-cut beards, and that are as brilliant as the full moon.

49. As the lake is adorned with the assemblage of white and pink lilies and lotuses, so the earth strewn ever with those faces resembling the lilies and lotuses in splendour is decked with them.

50. Behold this (the earth), that resembles the clear moon in splendour, and that is variegated with the myriads of stars, and also that looks like the autumnal firmament sprinkled over with the millions of stars.

51. O Arjuna, the deeds that had been wrought by you to-day in this dreadful battle are proper for you, or for the lord of the celestials in heaven.

52. While Krishna was thus showing that field of battle to the diadem-decked Arjuna, and going to their camp, he heard a loud roar in the army of Duryodhana.

53. (In the army of Duryodhana were heard) the blare of conches and the beat of drums and cymbals, and the rattle of car-wheels, the neigh of horses, the roar of elephants and the dreadful class of innumerable weapons.

54. Having entered that army with horses swift as the wind, and also having seen your force crushed down by the chief of the Pandyas, Krishna became highly astonished.

55. That foremost of heroes, who was skilled in the management of arrows and weapons in battle, slaughtered large throngs of enemies with different kinds of shafts, even as Yama (Death) destroys the creatures, deprived of their lives.

56. That foremost of smiters, after having penetrated the bodies of the elephants, horses and soldiers, with keen arrows, had struck down the foes, who were deprived of both their bodies and lives.

57. Then the chief of the Pandyas after having cut off the innumerable offensive weapons shot by the most dreadful of his enemies with his own arrows had slaughtered those enemies, even as Shakra had slain the Asuras (in the battle of old).

Thus ends the nineteenth chapter, the general encounter, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. The name of that foremost of heroes celebrated all over the world, was related by you already; but O Sanjaya, his achievments in battle were not related by you.

2. Describe to me in detail the prowess, learning, spirit, energy, the amount of strength, and pride of that best of heroic warriors.

Sanjaya said :—

3. You regard Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, the son of Drona, Karna, Arjuna, and Janardana to be well versed in the knowledge of weapons, and also to be the foremost of all bowmen, and, again, the best of car-warriors.

4. But he (the chief of the Pandyas) indeed surpasses all those mighty car-warriors in prowess. And he also does not consider any one of the kings to be equal to himself.

5. He (Pandya) does not admit that he is equal to either Karna or Bhishma; nor does he wish that he is inferior to Vasudeva or Arjuna.

6. That foremost of kings, Pandya, who was the most superior to all that are versed in the management of all weapons, slaughtered the army of Karna, even as highly insulted Death destroys all the creatures.

7. That army (of Karna), which teemed with innumerable cars and horses, as also with the most expert of foot-soldiers, having been smitten down by Pandya,circled round ike the wheel of the potter.

8. Pandya had, with his excellently-shot arrows, continued to scatter about that force, slaughtering its horses, drivers, standards, and cars, as also displacing its weapons and striking down its elephants, even as the wind disperses the masses of clouds.

9. He (Pandya) had slaughtered the elephants along with their riders and foot-soldiers guarding them, and had split asunder the banners, weapons and standards (with which they were equipt) of that army; even as the breaker of mountains splits asunder the mountains with the thunderbolt.

10—11. He had smitten down the horses as well as the horsemen, who were armed with the arrows called Sakti, the lances and quivers. And then had destroyed the lives of the Pulindas, the Khasas, the Valhikas, the Nishadhas, the Andhakas, the Tanganas, the Southerners, and the Bhojas, who were all possessed of heroism and very hardly and obstinate in the field of battle, after having deprived them of their weapons and coats of armour, by means of innumerable arrows.

12. Having seen that Pandya in the field was slaughtering the army consisting of the four principal elements by means of his shafts, then the son of Drona, undaunted with fear, advanced against that fearless warrior.

13. Having fearlessly addressed this hero (Pandya) in sweet words, who was then supposed to dance (on his car, in the field of battle), and also having called him to battle with a smiling face, that foremost of smiters (the son of Drona) uttered these words:—

14. "O monarch, O thou, who art possessed of eyes like the petals of a lotus, O thou of high parentage, O thou who art versed in all the sciences, O thou who dost resemble the mightest smiter of the thunderbolt, (Indra), O thou whose strength and prowess are most noted,

15. Having caught the long bow-string in your grasp and stretched the bow by your two massive arms, and also having pulled it by your hands, you look most handsome like a mass of congregated clouds.

16. You have continued pouring down showers of arrows, possessed of great impetuosity. I do not find any other hero than myself who can stand against you in the field of battle.

17. Being alone, you smite down innumerable cars, elephants, foot-soldiers, and horses; even as the fearless lion of undaunted prowess kills a large number of deer in the forest.

18. Having made both the firmament and the earth resound with the great rattle of your car-wheels, you look most resplendent, O monarch, like the congregated mass of clouds, that destroys all the crops appearing at the end of the rains and making loud roars.

19. Having taken out your sharp arrows from the quiver, that are like the snakes of virulent poison, do you fight with me alone; even as Andhaka (Asura) fought with the three-eyed deity (Shiva) (in the days of yore).

20. Having been thus addressed by the son of Drona and uttering these words—So be it, and also strike,—Malayadhwaja was greatly assailed, and he (Pandya) himself in return pierced the son of Drona with a barbed arrow.

21. Thereupon the son of Drona, that foremost of preceptors, had smilingly struck down Pandya with numerous arrows, that penetrate even the vitals, and also that are possessed of great impetuosity, and, again, that resemble the flames of fire in splendour.

22. Thereafter Ashwathaman, too, shot (at his enemy) several other broad-headed arrows, that are furnished with sharp points and that are capable of penetrating the very vitals, and also that are possessed of ten different motions.

23. Then Pandya severed those arrows (of his antagonist) by means of his nine keen shafts; and by means of four other arrows he afflicted the horses (four in number), that had immediately been deprived of their lives.

24. Thereupon, having struck down those arrows of the son of Drona, that had the splendour of the sun, with his own keen shafts, Pandya cut off the stretched bow-string (of his antagonist).

25. Then having stringed his bow, that was without the string, and also having behold that his car was immediately yoked to the foremost of horses by his men, that son of Drona, that smiter of enemies,

26. That twice-born person then sent away thousands of arrows (upon his antagonist); and he thereby filled the entire firmament and the different points of the horizon with his shafts.

27. Having been conscious of the fact that all those arrows of the high-souled son of Drona shot by himself, were, indeed, inexhaustible, that foremost of persons. Pandya, then cut them all into fragments.

28. Then, again the antagonist of the son of Drona, after having severed those arrows shot (by his foe)most carefully, had slain in the battle the two protectors of his (enemy's) car-wheels, by means of his own keen shafts.

29. Thereupon having observed the lightness of hand of his antagonist, the son of Drona had stringed his bow into a circle, and shot innumerable arrows, even as the mass of clouds pours down the torrents of rain.

30. O sire, the son of Drona shot, within the eighth part of a day, as many weapons as could be conveyed in eight carts drawn by eight bullocks.

31. Almost all those people, whoever behold him (Ashwathaman), who then looked like the highly enraged Death himself, or who resembled the very destroyer of Death himself, had wholly lost their senses.

32. The son of the preceptor poured forth showers of arrows upon that hostile army, even as the mass of congregated clouds, at the expiration of the summer, drops down showers of rain upon the earth, containing mountains and trees upon her.

33. Then Pandya, who was like the wind, after having checked,with his weapon, called the Vayavya, that intolerable shower of shafts poured down by the son of Drona, who was like the mass of clouds, roared most loudly with great gratification.

34. The son of Drona, after having cut off the standard, that was smeared with soft sandal and paste of Agura, and also that resembled the Malaya mountain,—of that person, who uttered most loud roars, slaughtered four horses (belonging to him—Pandya).

35. After having slaughtered his (Pandya's) charioteer with a single arrow, and also having severed his bow, that twanged like a vast mass of clouds, with a crescent-shaped arrow, had broken down his car into smallest fragments.

36. Having restrained the weapons (shot by his antagonist) by the weapons of his own, and also having struck down all these weapons, the son of Drona, most desirous of encountering (with his foe), did not slaughter him even on receiving his antagonist (within his reach).

37. Within a very short time Karna proceeded most rapidly against the elephant-force belonging to the Pandavas, as also then rushed against their vast army.

38. O descendant of the Bharata race, he then deprived the car-warriors of their cars, and, with numerous straight arrows, cut off the elephants, horses, and warriors in large numbers.

39. Thereupon that mighty bowman, the son of Drona, did not slaughter Pandya, who was the great smiter of his enemies, and who, again, was the foremost of car-warriors, after having made him carless, for he had the desire of battling with him for some time.

40. After having roared against another hostile elephant, that foremost of elephants, that was riderless, and that was furnished with all his equipments, and that was possessed of great activity, and that followed the echves (of other hostile elephants), and, again,that was endowed with great strength, and that was struck with the aorows of the son of Drona, and also that had great impetuosity, advanced most rapidly against him (Pandya).

41. That lord of the Malaya mountains, that prince (Pandya) well versed in fighting upon the back of the elephant, ascended, with great activity, that foremost of elephants, resembling the summit of a mountain and also proceeding towards him ; even as a lion, roaring most loudly, ascends the peak of a mountain.

42. Being highly enraged, and most careful in the matter of hurling weapons with great impetuosity, that lord of the prince of mountains, roaring most loudly and afflicting the elephant, had hurled immediately a lance, that had the splendour of the rays of the sun, towards the son of the preceptor.

43. Having shouted with joy, uttering repeatedly—You are slain, you are slain,—he (Pandya) broke into pieces the diadem of the son of Drona, that was ornamented with the best sorts of jewels and furnished with the superior kinds of diamonds, and again, equipt with first-class gold and excellent cloth and garlands of pearls.

44. That diadem, that was as resplendent as either the sun, or the moon, or the planets, or the fire, fell down on account of the severe stroke, and was broken into minute fragments ; even as the summit of a mountain, smitten by the thunder of Indra, falls upon the face of the earth, sending forth a very great noise.

45. Thereupon he (the son of Drona), became fiery with great wrath, even as the king of the snakes, being trodden down by the foot, blazes forth with anger. He then took up fourteen shafts, that resembled the rod of Death himself, and also that were capable of afflicting the enemies.

46. He then cut off the (four) feet and trunk of that elephant (belonging to his antagonist) with five arrows, as well as the arms and head of the king with three other shafts; and thereafter he slaughtered the mighty car-warriors, who accompanied king Pandya to the field, and who, again, were highly resplendent.

47. Those two arms of the king, that were pretty long and round, and that were smeared with excellent sandal paste, and also that were ornamented with gold, pearls, gems and diamonds, rolled on, falling upon the earth, like two snakes slain by Garuda.

48. The head, again, that was furnished with a face resembling the full moon, and with eyes, large and red like copper, on account of wrath, and that had a prominent nose, and also that was adorned with the ear-rings, blazed upon the earth, even as the moon shines betw en two constillations.

49. That elephant, indeed, was divided into six pieces with five foremost of arrows, and the king was cut into four porsions with three others. These ten parts thus divided by the skilful warrior were like the clarified butter portioned out into ten parts offered up to ten diffierent deities.

50. That king Pandya, after having severed into fragments innumerable horses, men and eleph ints, and also h ving offered them to the Rakshashas as their food, was himself quieted (by the son of Drona with blazing shafts), even as the cremation fire, after having received the libation of dead body, and also having appeased the dead fore-fathers, is itself extinguished by the constant flow of waters.

51. The king, your son, after having advanced towards him, most joyfully worshipped, with enough of reverence, the son of tne precepter, who had finished all learning, and who, again, had completed all his tasks, while (the king) was himself surrounded by all his brothers; even as the lord of the celestials most cheerfully worshipped Vishnu after the subjugation of Vali (an Asura).

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the fall of Pandya, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, on the slaughter of Pandya and also while that foremost of warriors, Karna, destroyed the hostile force, what did Arjuna do in the field of battle?

2. That son of Pandu, who had finished the study of all sciences, and who also was possessed of immense strength, and who was attentive to fixed duties, and who was a hero, was made by the lofty-minded Sankara most invincible amongst all creatures.

3. My greatest and highly tormenting terrors are from that slayer of antagonists, Dhananjaya. O Sanjaya, do you relate to me in detail what the son of Pritha had done there on that occasion.

Sanjaya said :—

4. On the death of Pandya, Krishna, with great activity, uttered these most beneficial words to Arjuna: 'I do not find out the king. The other Pandavas have fl d away (from the field of battle).'

5. The vast hostile force was repeatedly broken by the son of Pritha, who retreated (from the field). The Srinjayas were slaughtered by Karna in carrying out the purposes of Ashwathaman.

6. Then also a dreadful slaughter of the horses, cars and elephants was made (by that warrior). Thus the hero, Vasudeva, related all these to the diadem-decked one (Arjuna).

7. Hearing of the great and immense fear of his brother (Yudhishtira), as also witnessing it, the Pandava readily addressed him thus: 'O Hrishikesha, urge the horses.'

8. Thereupon, Hrishikesha went (to the battle), ascending on an irresistible car. Then there raged a dreadful battle.

9. Then once more both the Kurus and the Pandavas fearlessly came face to face (for an encounter). The sons of Pritha were headed by Bhimasena: and we were headed by the son of Suta.

10. Thereupon, O best of monarchs, again the dreadful battle took place between Karna and Pandavas, which aggrandised the kingdom of Yama.

11—12. Having taken up the bows, the arrows, the spiked maces, and the swords, lances, and the battle-axes and also the short clubs, the Vushandis, the Shakti-darts, the rapiers and the axes, as well as the iron maces, the spears, the white Kuntas, the short arrows, and the hooks, the warriors most rapidly fell upon one another with the desire of killing them.

13. Having filled the firmament, the ten different points of the horizon as well as the other subsidiary points, and the upper atmosphere with the noise of arrows, the bowstring, and the sound of palms, and, again, having made the entire earth echo with the noise of the clattering car-wheels, the warriors proceeded against their antagonists.

14. Being gratified with that tremendous noise, the hero, who were most willing to cross over and reach the shore of that dreadful ocean of hostility, began to fight with numerous other horses.

15. There was a great noise of the bowstrings, bows and lances, and the loud roar of elephants; as also there were terrible shouts of the foot soldiers and men falling (upon the earth).

16. There, having heard the numerous kinds of arrow sounds, and the terrible uproar of the heroic warriors, the combatants were deeply struck with terror, fell down and became very pale.

17. The warlike son of Adhiratha crushed, with innumerable arrows, large numbers of these enemies, who uttered loud roars, and poured forth showers of weapons.

18. Then Karna led to the abode of Death twenty car-warrios against the Panchala heroes, along with their horses, drivers, and standards, by means of his innumerable arrows.

19. Then, again, the best of the warriors of the vast Pandava force, who were all very powerful, and who also were very smart in the management of weapons, after having careered round, surrounded Karna from all sides in the field of battle:

20. Thereupon Karna crushed the army belonging to the foes by means of showers of shafts; even as the leader of the elephants, plunging into a lake, crushes down the lotuses and swans, adorning the lake itself.

21. The son of Radha, after having entered the hostile force, and also having shaken his best of bonds had struck off their heads with his keen arrows, and caused them to fall upon the earth.

22. Being broken into pieces, the shields and coats of mail, belonging to the warriors, fell upon the earth; and none of them could bear the touch of a second arrow (to be shot by Karna).

23. He (Karna) struck the fences of the antagonists, that could be perceivable only by the bowstrings, by means of shafts shot from his bow, that were capable of crushing the coats of mail, the bodies and the lives (of the combatants); even as one strikes the horses with the whip.

24. Then Karna, with great speed, crushed down the Pandus, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas, who came within the reach of his arrows; even as the lion slays the whole lot of deer.

25. Thereupon, O sire, the king of the Panchalas, the sons of Draupadi, the twin brothers and Yuyudhana, who all gathered together, advanced against Karna.

26. Whilst the Kurus, the Panchalas and the Pandus were fighting with one another, the combatants, offering up their lives slaughtered one another in the field of battle.

27—28. O sire, the mighty warriors, who were all protected with armours and coats of mail, and who also were ornamented with the head-gears, uplifting their maces, short clubs and spiked maces, that resembled the very uplifted rod of Death himself, uttered loud roars, challenged, jumped, marched most rapidly and dreadfully against their antagonists.

29. Thereupon they (the combatants), being highly afflicted by one another, and also being deprived of their brains, eyes and weapons, struck one another and fell down in the field of battle, when blood gushed out of their limbs.

30. Some of the warriors, who were covered over with innumerable weapons, lay (in the field of battle); and they were supposed to be alive with faces, that were as handsome as the pomegranates, and also that were adorned with numerous teeth, and smeared with blood.

31—32. With the battle-axes, short maces, swords, the arrows called Sakti, the Vindipalas, and hooks, spears and lances, others, again, who were highly enraged, either crushed, cut off, pierced, hurled down lopped off or slaughtered one another in that vast ocean of battle.

33. Being slain by one another, they (the combatants) fell down dead and covered over with blood; even as the sandal trees, being felled, fall down shedding red and excellent juice.

34. Cars, being destroyed by cars, and elephants, smitten down by elephants and men, slaughtered by men, and horses struck down by horses, fell (upon the earth) in thousands.

35. The standards, heads, umbrellas, trunks of elephants and arms of men, being severed by the razor-like, broad headed, and cresent-shaped arrows, fell down upon the earth.

36. They (the combatants) had smitten down in that battle, the men, elephants, and horses yoked to the cars. Many heroes, were slaughtered by horsemen: and the elephants had their trunks cut off.

37. The elephants and cars being smitten down by the foot-soldiers, their standards along with their banners fell down like the cloven mountains.

38. On all sides, some (of the warriors) were slaughtered, and some were in course of being slaughtered, and others, again, fell down. Then the horsemen after having encountered most actively with the foot-soldiers, were killed (by the foot-soldiers.)

39. The throngs of foot-soldiers, being slain by the horsemen, were lying on the field of battle, resembling the crushed lotuses and faded floral wreaths.

40. The faces and limbs of the slain rested on the field. And, O king, the most beautiful forms of the elephants, horses and men, that resembled the dirty cloths, presented an exceedingly gloomy site.

Thus ends the twenty-first chafter, the general encounter, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having been persuaded by your son, many elephant-warriors, riding upon their elephants, and desiring to bring about his destruction, became highly enraged and marched against Dhristadyumna.

2. Many foremost of elephant-warriors belonging to the tribes called the Easterners, the Southerners, the Angas, the Bangas, the Pundras, the Magadhas, and the Tama-liptakas,

3. And, O descendant of the Bharata race, also belonging to the Mekalas, the Koshalas, the Madras, t e Dasharnas, and the Nishadhas, who were all very skilful in fighting on the back of elephants, and who again, were accompanied by the Kalingas,

4. Began to pour forth showers of arrows, lances and broad-headed shafts, like the masses of clouds, and also they all drenched the whole force of the Panchalas (with them) in that battle.

5. He (Dhristadyumna) then dropped down showers of arrows, and broad-headed shafts upon those elephants, that crushed down the enemies, and also that were urged forward by their being deeply struck in the sides with heels, toes and hooks.

6. O descendant of the Bharata race, he (the Panchala chief) pierced every one of these elephants, that resembled mountains with ten, six or eight keen arrows.

7. Both the Pandus and the Panchalas, uttering loud roars and being furnished with the sharp weapons, advanced towards him (the Panchala chief) who was then closed with by those elephants even as the sun is covered over with the masses of clouds.

8. Then they (the above warriors) continued to shower (their weapons) upon those elephants, and having been excited by the sound of bowstrings and palms, as well as by the beatings (caused by the heroes), began to dance the dance worthy of the heroic warriors.

9. Afterwards Nakula, Shahadeva, the sons of Draupadi, the Provadrakas, Satyaki, Shikhandin, and the most powerful Chekitana,—these heroes drenched (these elephants) from all sides (with their weapons); even as the clouds drench the mountains with the torrents of water.

10. Being driven by the Mlechchas, these elephants, highly enraged, had cast down the men, the horses, and cars, with their trunks, and crushed them with their feet.

11. Then they (the elephants) pierced them with the points of their tusks, and having thrown them down shattered them. Others, again, being lifted up with their tusks, fell down upon the ground exciting great horror (in the spectators.)

12. Thereupon Satyaki, after having pierced the elephant of the Vanga prince, that was standing before him, in the very vitals with a long arrow possessed of great impetuosity, hurled him down upon the ground.)

13. Again, Satyaki had struck the chest of him (the rider of that elephant), whose body was not yet touched, and who also fell down from his elephant, with a long shaft. Thus struck, he (the rider) fell upon the ground.

14. Shahadeva, on the other hand, had struck the elephant of falling Pundra, that was moving like a mountain, with three long arrows, which were most excellently directed.

15. Then Shahadeva, after having deprived that elephant of his banners, driver, armour, standard and life, again advanced against the ruler of the Angas.

16. But Nakula, having forbidden Shahadeva (from advancement), himself crushed the chief of the Angas with three long shafts resembling the very rods of Death in appearance, as well as his elephant with hundred others.

17. The ruler of the Angas, on the other hand, had directed eight hundred lances, that were as respledent as the rays of the sun, towards Nakula, who, again, shattered each of them into three pieces.

18. So again, the son of Pandu severed the head (of his antagonist) with a crescent-shaped arrow. That Mlechchha, being thus cut off, fell down with his elephant.

19. Thereupon, when the prince of the Angas, who was well versed in the knowledge of managing elephants, was thus slain, the highly enraged elephant-warriors of the Anga race, rushed against Nakula, riding upon their elephants,

20. That were adorned with waving banners, and also that were furnished with excellent mouths, and that were decked with the housings made of gold, and that were as resplendent as the blazing mountains; for, the warriors were most desirous of crushing him and all possessed of immense activity.

21. The Mekalas, the Utkalas, the Kalingas, the Nishadhas, the Tamraliptakas, who were all very willing to slaughter him, continued to pour forth showers of arrows and lances (upon Nakula).

22. Then the highly enrgaed Pandus, Panchalas, and Somakas proceeded most rapidly to rescue Nakula, who was closed with by those warriors, even as the sun is covered over with the masses of clouds.

23. Thereupon, the battle raged between the car-warriors,—who were shooting showers of shafts, and hurling down thousands of lances, (at the antagonists).—and the heroes fighting from the back of elephants.

24. The frontal globes and several other vitals, the tusks and the equipments of the elephants, that were deeply pierced with long shafts, were all shattered.

25. Thereupon Shahadeva had most rapidly slaughtered eight of the gigantic elephants with sixty-four arrows, possessed of great impetuosity. On that, they all fell down along with their riders.

26. Nakula also, who was the darling of his family, after having lifted up the foremost of his bow with great care, had slaughtered innumerable elephants with straight shafts.

27. Thereupon the chief of the Panchalas, the grandson of Shini, the sons of Draupadi, the Provodrakas and Shikhandin, poured forth showers of arrows upon those huge elephants.

28. Having been killed with the torrents of shafts by such clouds as the Pandu warriors, those hills of elephants belonging to the foes, fell down; even as the mountains are struck down by the falling of thunders.

29. Having thus slaughtered your elephants, those foremost of car-warriors, belonging to the side of the Pandus, looked at the army (on your side), that was running away from the field like a river, flowing down a shore other than where it took its rise.

30. Those warriors, belonging to the side of the son of Pandu, after having first agitated that army and again having afflicted, proceeded most rapidly against Karna.

Thus ends the twenty-second chapter, the encounter between several heroes, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O great monarch, Dushasana rushed against Shahadeva, that is, brother against brother, who was highly enraged and blasted your army.

2. In the field of battle, the mighty car-warriors, seeing those two thus engaged in a fierce encounter, began to utter shouts resembling the roars of lions, and to wave their cloths.

3. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race, the most powerful son of Pandu was deeply struck in the chest with three shafts by the bowman, your son, who was highly enraged.

4. Then, O monarch, Shahadeva, after having first pierced your son, again struck him with seventy shafts, as well as his charioteer with three others.

5. Thereupon, O king, Dushasana, after having severed his bow in that dreadful battle, struck Shahadeva with seventy-three arrows both in the arms and the chest.

6. Then the highly enraged Shahadeva, after having taken up his sword and turned it round, had hurled it immediately towards the ear of your son in that fierce encounter.

7. Thus having severed his (Dushasana's) bow along with its string and arrow, then that fearful sword fell down upon the earth, even as a snake falls down from heaven upon the ground.

8. Thereupon Shahadeva, possessed of immense prowess, having taken up another bow, hurled at Dushasana a shaft, capable of bringing about death.

9. Then the son of Kuru had severed into two fragments, with his keen-edged sword, that shaft, which was as resplendent as the very rod of Death himself, directed towards him.

10. Then having turned round that sharp-edged sword in the field of battle, the most powerful one took up another bow most rapidly, and grasped an arrow.

11. On the other hand, Shahadeva, as if laughing, had suddenly thrown down that sword with keen arrows, that was directed towards him.

12. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race,your son most rapidly directed sixty-four arrows against the car of Shahadeva, in that dreadful battle.

13. Then Shahadeva, O monarch, cut off every one of these innumerable arrows, that were falling with speed (upon him) with five shafts of his own in that battle.

14. Having thus restrained those powerful arrows, shot by your son, he (Shahadeva) sent away innumerable shafts against him (his antagonist) in that dreadful battle.

15. Your son, too, having severed every one of these arrows with three shafts of his own, sent out a great uproar; and thereby caused the whole earth echo with it.

16. Thereupon, O monarch, Dushasana, having pierced the son of Pandu in that battle, had struck the charioteer of the Madraya chief with nine shafts.

17. O mighty monarch, the most powerful Shahadeva, being highly enraged at this, fixed an arrow on his bow, that was as deadly as Death himself. Then having stretched his bow with great force, he shot that arrow at your son.

18. O monarch, that shaft, after having successively pierced with great force through his body and his strong armour, itself entered into the earth, even as the snakes enter into the ant-hill. Thereupon, O king, your son, that mighty car-warrior, became senseless.

19. Having seen him thus senseless and himself being deeply struck with sharp arrows, his charioteer with great rapidity carried away the car.

20. Having defeated that Kuru warrior in battle, the son of Pandu looked at the army of Duryodhana and crushed it on all sides.

21. O descendant of the Bharata race, O monarch, that force belonging to the Kurus was crushed by the son of Pandu, even as a swarm of ants is crushed to death by a man with great rage.

Thus ends the twenty-third chapter, the encounter between Shahadeva and Dushasana, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. O monarch, Karna the son of Vikartana, indeed, restrained with great rage Nakula, who was destroying and dispersing the army (belonging to the Kurus) in that battle.

2. Thereupon, Nakula smilingly uttered these words to Karna:—'I am, after a long while and through the kindness of the celestials, seen by you.

3. O wretched one, such as I am, you have become the object of my sight in this battle. Indeed, you are the root of all these evils, as well as of this hostility and warfare.

4. Through your faults the Kuru warriors, after having fought against one another had become thinned. Having slaughtered you to-day in the battle, I will consider myself as having performed my duties; and also I will be free from the fever (of my heart).'

5. Being thus addressed, the son of Suta replied to Nakula in expressions worthy of the son of a king, and of a bowman specially.

6. 'O brave warrior, strike me; we will behold your manliness. O hero, first having achieved some deeds in the battle, then it behoves you to speak.

7. O sire, without speaking anything (highly of themselves) in the battle, the warriors fight to the best of their might. Hence, do you fight with me to the best of your power. I will surely destroy your vanity.

8. Having addressed him thus, the son of Suta struck the son of Pandu most rapidly, and pierced him in the battle with seventy-three arrows.

9. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race, Nakula, indeed, having been thus pierced by the son of Suta, pierced the Suta's son in return with eight shafts, that were as deadly as the snakes possessing virulent poison.

10. Then Karna, that most powerful bowman, after having severed his (enemy's) bow with numerous shafts, winged with gold and sharpened on stone, crushed the son of Pandu with thirty other arrows.

11. Those arrows, after having pierced through his armour, drank his blood in the battle; even as the snakes of virulent poison, after having penetrated the earth, drink the water.

12. Then he (Nakula), taking up another bow, that was most formidable and adorned with gold on the back, penetrated Karna with twenty shafts, and pierced his charioteer with three others.

13. Thereupon, O mighty king, the highly enraged Nakula, that slayer of heroic foes, severed the bow of Karna with sharp razor-like arrows.

14. Thereupon that brave warrior (the son of Pandu) smilingly struck this one (Karna), the mightiest of all car-warriors, (Karna) whose bow was severed with three hundred shafts.

15. O sire, seeing Karna thus crushed by the son of Pandu, all the car-warriors, along with the celestials, obtained the highest condition of astonishment.

16. Then Karna the son of Vikartana, grasping another bow, had shot upon Nakula five shafts in the shoulder-joint.

17. Thus the son of Madri blazed with those arrows sticking to that place (in his body); even as the sun, shedding lustre on the earth, looks resplendent with his own rays.

18. Thereupon Nakula, indeed, after having penetrated Karna with seven impetuous arrows, once more severed one of the horns of his bow, O sire.

19. Thereupon in the field of battle he (Karna), taking up another bow, that was possessed of greater strength, closed the different points of the compass, on every side of Nakula, with his arrows.

20. That mighty car-warrior (Nakula), being thus suddenly closed with the arrows, shot from Karna's bow, rapidly struck down these shafts with the arrows of his own.

21. Then that net-work of arrows, spread over the sky, looked like the firmament, covered over with innumerable fireflies, that roved about it.

22. Then, O ruler of earth, the welkin, covered over as it was with the hundreds of arrows shot by both of them, looked even as it was covered over with the swarms of locusts.

23. Those arrows, that were adorned with gold, having issued forth in continuous lines, looked most handsome like the cranes flying in continuous lines (through the sky).

24. When the firmament was thus closed with the net-work of arrows, and the sun was covered over with them, none of the rovers of the sky descended upon the earth.

25. While all the directions were thus closed with the shots of innumerable arrows from all sides, those two lofty-minded heroes blazed forth like two risen suns appearing at the time of universal dissolution.

26. O foremost of monarchs, having been highly oppressed with the pain, and greatly crushed, and slaughtered by these arrows shot from the bow of Karna, all the Somakas died.

27. In the same way, O king, the army on your side, thus slain by the arrows of Nakula, dispersed on all sides; even as the masses of clouds are dispersed by the wind.

28. The two armies, being thus slaughtered by both the (above) warriors with divine arrows, possessed of great impetuosity, fled beyond the reach of falling shafts, and stood even as they were spectators (of the battle.)

29. Thus when both the armies were dispered by the arrows of Karna, and the son of Pandu, these two high-minded warriors pierced each other with showers of shafts.

30. Most willing to kill each other, both the warriors showed their celestial weapons in the battle-field, and closed each other all on a sudden (with showers of arrows.)

31. The arrows that were furnished with the Kanka, the peacock feathers and garments, shot by Nakula, after having closed the son of Suta, appeared to stay on the sky.

32. In the same way, the arrows that were shot by the son of Suta in that fierce battle, after having closed the son of Pandu appeared to stay on the sky.

33. O monarch, both the warriors, having entered the chambers composed of arrows, could not be seen by any persons; even as both the sun and the moon, covered over with the masses of clouds, cannot be seen by any persons.

34. Thereupon Karna, who was highly enraged, after having assumed a very terrible look in the field of battle, shrouded the son of Pandu with showers of shafts shot from all sides.

35. O powerful monarch, the son of Pandu, who was wholly shrouded by the son of Suta (with arrowy showers), did not feel any uneasiness; even as the sun (the giver of light), covered by the clouds, feels no pain.

36. Thereupon, O sire, the son of Adhiratha, after smiling for a time, shot forth hundreds and thousands of shafts in the field of battle.

37. There (upon the field of battle) all appeared to be one continuous shade by the shafts of that lofty-minded one (Karna) even as there formed a shade of clouds by the foremost of falling arrows.

38. Then, O powerful monarch, Karna after having severed the bow of that high-souled one (Nâkula), smilingly caused the fall of his charioteer from the car-nichi.

39. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race,, he (Karna) sent away the four horses of him (Nakula) to the abode of Death most rapidly by means of four sharp-edged arrows,

40. Then also he with innumerable arrows, cut off into minute fragments his (antagonist's) celestial car, his standard, the protector of his car-wheels, his mace and sword, and his shield, that was furnished with hundreds of moons, as well as his all other equipments of war, O sire.

41. O ruler of earth, losing his horse, and being deprived of his car and shield, he (Nakula) immediately alighted from his car, and, taking up his spiked club, stood (in the field of battle).

42. O monarch, the son of Suta had struck down that dreadful mace, uplifted by him, with the keenest arrows, capable of bearing the greatest strain.

43. On seeing him (his antagonist) without any weapons, Karna afflicted him with numerous straight arrows; but he did not oppress him too severely.

44. O monarch, Nakula of agitated senses, who was struck by that most powerful warrior, well versed in the science of arms in the battle, fled away all on a sudden.

45. O descendant of the Bharata race, the sons of Radha, indeed laughing, again and again, and pursuing him (Nakula), placed the bow, that was furnished with string, around his neck.

46. Thereupon, O king, that strong bow placed round his neck, blazed forth like the moon in the firmament, when she is surrounded by a halo of light, or like the mass of black clouds adorned by the bow of Indra.

47. Then Karna addressed him thus: 'whatever you speak is of no avail. Being delighted, do you utter those words once more, as you are struck over and over again.

48. O son of Pandu, do you not fight with the mightiest of Kurus; O son, fight with those, that are your equals. O son of Pandu, do not be ashamed of it.

49. O son of Madri, go home, where are Krishna and Falguna.' O most powerful monarch, he then, having addressed him thus, dismissed him at that time.

50. Thereupon that hero (Karna), who was well-versed in the code of morality, and did not slaughter him (Nakula), who was almost within the reach of Death himself. Then, O monarch, resembling the words of Kunti, he (Karna) let him go,

51. O king, the son of Pandu, being thus abandoned by that bowman, the son of Suta, and feeling shame for it, went towards the car of Yudhisthira.

52. He then, being afflicted by the son of Suta, ascended the car (of his brother); and, being oppressed with grief, sighed heavily like a snake confined within a vessel.

53. Then Karna, after having defeated him (Nakula), rushed most rapidly against the Panchalas, riding upon a car, that was furnished with innumerable standards, and having the colour of the moon.

54. On seeing the commander of the (Kaurava) army rushing against the car-warriors of the Panchala force, there arose a dreadful uproar against the Pandavas, O ruler of earth.

55. O most powerful monarch, that lord the son of Suta, circling round the field of battle, like a wheel,perpetuated an immense slaughter there at the time when the sun attained the meridian.

56—58. O sire, we saw numerous car-warriors of the Panchala army, who were carried away (from the field of battle) upon cars, some of which had their wheels broken down, and some of which had their banners and standards torn into pieces, and some also had their horses and drivers slaughtered (in the battle), and some, again, were without their wheels. Innumerable elephants, also, wandered and run about in the different directions of the field of battle, some of which had their bodies wholly burnt by the forest-fire, like the elephants in the dense forest; and others, again, amongst the elephants, had their frontal globes severed, and the bodies besmeared with blood, and the trunks cut off into fragments.

59. Moreover, O sire, some other elephants, being slaughtered by that highsouled one (Karna) fell down with their armours cut off, or their tails curtailed, like the masses of clouds dispersed by the wind.

60. Again, other elephants, that were terrified by the shots of arrows and lances of the son of Radha, rushed with their faces towards him (the son of Radha); even as the insects rush towards the blazing fire.

61. Other mighty elephants were looked to strike against one another. They also shed blood from their limbs, even as the mountains let flow streams of water from their summits.

62—64. There in the field of battle, we saw numerous best heroes roving about in all directions—the heroes that were deprived of their breast-plates, and several kinds of ornaments, made of silver, brass, and gold, and also that were divested of their trappings, bridle-bits yak-tails, and saddle-cloths, and, again, that had their quivers, falling off (from their bodies), and whose brave riders, who formed the beauty of battle were all slain.

65—66. O descendant of the Bharata race, we saw numerous horsemen, furnished with armours and coronets, who, being penetrated by the swords, scimitars, lances and clubs, were either slain, or in course of being slaughtered, or were trembling with terror, and who, again, O descendant of the Bharata race were deprived of their various limbs, on all sides of the field of battle, O descendant of the Bharata race.

67. We behold the cars, that were adorned with gold and to which were yoked the heroes of greatest speed, dragged in the different directions of the field with great rapidity; while their riders were all slaughtered.

68. O descendant of the Bharata race, some of these cars had their axes and poles shattered into fragments; and some others had their wheels broken; and others, again had their banners and standards torn into pieces; and several others were deprived of their arrows.

69. O ruler of earth, there in the field of battle we saw numerous car-warriors rushing in all directions, who were all deprived of their cars, and who also were afflicted by the arrows of the son of Suta, and some of whom, again, were divested of their weapons; and innumerable other car-warriors were seen slaughtered there still with their weapons on.

70. We saw numerous elephants running in all directions of the field of battle, that were adorned with innumerable stars, and that were furnished with the most handsome bells, and also that were ornamented with banners variegated with various colours.

71. Moreover, we behold on all sides of the field of battle, numerous heads, arms, chests, and other parts of the body, that were severed by the arrows shot from the bow of Karna.

72. The most dreadful and distressing calamity had fallen upon all the warriors while they were fighting with the keen arrows, and cut off with the shafts of Karna.

73. The Srinjayas were slaughtered by the son of Suta in the field of battle, and they rushed towards the force of Karna, even as the insects rush towards the fire.

74. All the Kshatriyas (the warriors) abandoned that mighty car-warrior who was slaughtering the forces (belonging to the Pandavas) on all sides of the battle, even as they abandon the blazing fire, that appears at the universal dissolution.

75. That hero of immense prowess (Karna) pursued these powerful car-warriors belonging to the Panchala divisions, shooting dreadful arrows at them from behind, while they (these car-warriors), as they survived the slaughter, were broken, and running away from the field, and deprived of their armours and standards.

76. The son of Suta, who was endowed with great strength, afflicted them with his arrows; even as the remover of darkness (the sun), having reached the meridian, afflicts all the creatures with his rays.

Thus ends the twenty-fourth chapter, the prowess of Karna, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then Uluka rushed most rapidly against Yuyutsu, who was routing the vast force belonging to your son; and uttered to him these words—'do you wait, do you wait.'

2. Thereupon, O monarch, Yuyutsu afflicted Uluka with a sharp-edged arrow (supplied with wings), even as a huge mountain is struck with the thunderbolt.

3. Thus Uluka, too, being highly enraged and cutting off the bow of your son with a razor like shaft, struck him with a barbed arrow in the field of battle.

4. Yuyutsu, whose eyes became red with anger, after having thrown aside that severed bow, grasped another, the most dreadful one, possessed of greater impetuosity.

5. Thereupon, O foremost of the Bharata race, he (Yuyutsu) penetrated Uluka with sixty arrows; and then struck down his driver with three; and he once more pierced him (Uluka).

6. Uluka, too, who became highly wrathful, after having pierced him (Yuyutsu) with twenty arrows, decked with gold, struck down his standard, that was made of gold, in the field of battle.

7. O monarch, that huge and magnificent standard, that one made of gold, being torn off and shattered into fragments, dropped down in front of Yuyutsu.

8. Seeing his standard thus cut off, Yuyutsu, who became senseless with rage, struck Uluka with five arrows in the chest.

9. O descendant of the Bharata race, O sire, Uluka then severed the head of his foe, with a broad-headed arrow, dipped in oil, in the field of battle.

10. Then he (Uluka) slaughtered his four horses, and pierced himself (Yuyutsu) with five shafts. He (Yuyutsu), being thus fierced by that powerful one (Uluka) went into another car.

11. O monarch, Uluka, after having defeated him (his antagonist) in the battle, hastened towards the Panchalas and the Srinjayas, and slew them with the keen arrows.

12. O mighty monarch, your son, Srutakarman, deprived, without any fear, Shatanika of his horses, charioteer, and car within half the time taken up by the twinkling of an eye.

13. O sire, that mighty car-warrior, Shatanika, waiting in a car, that was deprived of its horses, and becoming very wrathful, had thrown a mace upon your son.

14. O descendant of the Bharata race, that mace, after having reduced the car and the horses along with the riders themselves into dusts (belonging to your son), fell down upon the earth most rapidly, and penetrated through it.

15. Then those two brave warriors, who were divested of their cars, and who also had contributed to the increase of the glory of the Kurus, really fled away from the battle, looking each other in the face.

16. Thereupon your son, who became highly terrified, ascended the car of Vivingsa. Shatanika, too, with rapidity, mounted upon the car of Prativindhya.

17. Shakuni, who became very angry, after having pierced Shutasoma with excellently sharpened arrows, could not cause him to tremble (with fear); even as a torrent of rain can not shake a mountain.

18. O descendant of the Bharata race, Shutasoma, too, after having seen the bitterest enemy of his father, closed him with several thousands of arrows.

19. Shakuni, too, on the other hand, who was of light arms, and who was acquainted with all sorts of warfare, and who, again, was most desirous of winning victory, severed all those shafts with other winged arrows of his own.

20. Then he (Shakuni), who was greatly enraged, after having restrained these arrows with the keen arrows of his own in the field of battle, struck down Shutasoma with three other shafts.

21. Thereupon, O great king, your brother-in-law cut off his (antagonist's) horses, standard, and charioteer into minute pieces by numerous arrows. At this, the people sent forth a loud roar.

22. O sire, after taking up another excellent bow, that great bowman who was now steedless and carless, and whose standard also was cut off, waited upon the earth on descending from his car.

23. He (Shutasoma) then directed the shafts, that were furnished with the golden wings, and also that were whetted on stone; and afterwards severed the car of your brother-in-law (with those shafts) in the field of battle.

24. That mighty car-warrior, the son of Suvala did not at all feel pain to behold the flights of arrows, that were like the throngs of locusts, approaching towards his car. Rather that highly glorious one really restrained those arrows with numerous arrows of his own.

25. There (in the field of battle) the warriors, as well as the Siddhas resting in the firmament, became highly gratified to witness that extraordinary and incredible deed of Sutasoma. For he (Sutasoma) was fighting on foot with Shakuni, who rested upon his car.

26. O king, he (Shakuni) severed the bow, as well as all the quivers of him (Sutasoma) by means of his broad-headed arrows, that were excellently whetted, and also that were endued with great impetuosity, and again, that were very straight.

27. Then he (Shutasoma), who was thus deprived of his car and bow, raised a loud roar, after raising his sword that bad the splendour of a blue, lotus-color, and also that had a handle made of ivory.

28. That sword of highly intellectua Shutasoma, whirled round by him, he (Shakuni) considered to be as resplendent as the clear sky, like the very rod of Death himself.

29. O powerful monarch, that holder of sword, who was endued with great lore and prowess, suddenly roved about creating fourteen different kinds of circles (Manœuvres) on all sides (of the battle).

30. He then exhibited in the field of battle the different kinds of dexterities of motion, namely, wheeling and whirling at a certain height, and making side-thrusts, rushing forward and jumping on high, and moving about rapidly and advancing upwards and forwards,

31. Thereupon the son of Suvala, who was possessed of immense prowess, shot innumerable arrows at him (his antagonist), who, again, immediately severed them by means of his sword, that were directed against him.

32. Thereupon, O mighty monarch, the son of Suvala, who became very angry at this, once more shot numerous arrows at Shutasoma, that resmbled snakes of virulent poison.

33. That warrior (Shutasoma), who resembled Garuda in strength, after having exnibited the lightness of his arms in the battle, severed those arrows by his sword with the assistance of both his learning and strength.

34. O monarch, he (Shakuni) severed the sword,—that was most excellent,—of his foe, who then was careering in circles in the field, by means of his sharp razor-headed arrows.

35. That strong sword, being thus cut off, dropped down upon the ground all on a sudden. But, O desendant of the Bharata race, the other half of the sword still rested in the hand of that Shutasoma.

36. Knowing that his sword was thus severed, then that powerful car-warrior, Shutasoma, after having retreated six steps back, struck his antagonist with that half (he still held in his hand).

37. That half (of the sword), after having severed the bow, that was ornamented with gold and gems, along with the string, of that high souled one (Shakuni), immediately dropped down upon the ground.

38. Thereupon Shutasoma proceeded to that strong car of Shrutakirti.

39. The son of Suvala, too. after having grasped another bow, that was most dreadful and invincible, rushed against the army of the Pandavas, slaughtering innumerable enemies on the way.

40. On the very sight of the son of Suvala, who was wandering about in the field of battle most fearlessly, there had taken place, O ruler of earth, great roar amongst the Pandava host.

41. Then it was seen that those divisions of the army, that were very proud, furnished with the weapons, and very vast, were routed by that high-souled son of Suvala.

42. O king, the son of Suvala continued to slaughter the soldiers of the Pandava force; even as the king, of the celestials crushed the army of the Daityas.

Thus ends the twenty-fifth chapter, the encounter between Shutasoma and the son of Suvala, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O king, Kripa restrained proud Dhristadyumna in the field of battle; even as a Sharava resists a proud lion in the forest, while fighting.

2. O descendant of tte Bharata race, the son of Prishata, being thus resisted by the most powerful son of Gotama, was not able to move a step further there (in the battle).

3, Witnessing the car of Gautama staying by the side of that of Dhrishtadyumna, all the creatures were greatly terrified, and considered that destruction was to be attained by him (Dhrishtadyumna).

4—5. There all the car-warriors and horsemen, who became very inattentive (or gloomy), adderssed thus : 'This best of persons, the son of Sharadwata, who was possessed of immense prowess, and who also was acquainted with the use of celestial weapons, and who was, again, very high-minded, is sorely filled with anger at the fall of Drona. Will there be escape of Dhrishtadyumna from the hands of Goutama ?

6. Will this entire army be freed from that extreme fear ? Will not this twice-born person slay us all, who have assembled here ?

7. Gautama, who exactly appears even like the most dreadful Destroyer himself,—will he not obtain to-day the appellation of the son of Varadwaja?

8. The preceptor (Gautama), who is light-handed (in the use of weapons), and who is always victorious in battle, and who is furnished with various kinds of weapons, and who is possessed of immense prowess, is now filled with rage.' The son of Prishata, too, appears to-day to have withdrawn from the great battle.'

9. O great king, this and several other speeches were heard to have delivered by the men on your side, as well as by the antagonists; while those two (warriors) assembled there to fight against each other.

10. Thereupon, O monarch, Kripa, the son of Sharadwata, sighing heavily with rage, struck the son of Prishata, who had lost all his efforts, in all his vital parts.

11. Having been thus struck in the battle by the high-sould Gautama, he (Dhrishtadyumna) could not make out what should he do, encompassed as he was by great insensibility.

12. Thereupon his charioteer uttered these words to him:' O son of Prishata, it is well with you, perhaps. Such a great calamity was never witnessed by me in the battle, overtaking you?

13. Those shafts, that were capable of piercing through the very vital parts and that were shot by the foremost of the twice-born persons, aiming at all the vital parts, had not struck you through the favour of the celestials.

14. I will have the car immediately turned back like the current of a river from the great ocean. I consider that the twice-born person is incapable of being slain, by whom your prowess was done away with.

15. Thereupon, O monarch, Dhrishtadyumna slowly said these words:' O sire, my mind is being stupified; and there is perspiration in my limbs.

16. I feel a sensation of trembling in my body; and also the hairs are standing erect upon it. After abandoning the twice-born person in the battle, proceed slowly where Arjuna stays.

17. After having come to the presence of either Arjuna or Bhimasena in the field, O charioteer, I will surely attain prosperity to-day. This is my certain belief.

18. Thereupon, O powerful king, the charioteer, after having driven the horses, advanced to the place, where that powerful bowman, Bhimasena, was battling with your soldiers.

19. O sire, Gautama, after witnessing that the car of Dhrishtadyumna was withdrawing from the field, then followed it, shooting hundreds of arrows at it.

20. That chastiser of foes blew his conch over and over again; and then he routed the son of Prishata, even as Indra routed Namuchi (a Danava, in the battle of old).

21. The son of Hridika, smiling over and over again, resisted Shikhandin, who was the cause of death of Bhishma, and most invincible in the field of battle.

22. Shikhandin, however, coming against the mightiest car-warrior of the Hridika race, struck him with five sharp and broad-headed arrows at the shoulder-joint.

23. O king, the mighty car-warrior, Kritavarman, indeed, being highly enraged, penetrated through his antagonist with sixty winged arrows, and then, smiling for a time, severed his bow with one individual shaft.

24. Taking up another bow, the most powerful son of Drupada, being greatly enraged, replied to the son of Hridika saying,—Wait, Wait.

25. O lord of kings, then he (Shikandin) shot at his antagonist ninety arrows, that were furnished with the wings of gold, and possessed of great force. But these arrows were shot back from his (Kritavarman's) armour.

26. Beholding those arrows thus sent back and scattered over the ground, he (Shikhandin) severed his dreadful bow with a sharp, razor-headed shaft.

27. Then having been filled with rage, he struck this one (the son of Hridika), who, with his severed bow, resembled a bull with his broken horns, with eighty different arrows both in the chest and arms.

28. Kritavarman, too, who became very angry, and who also was greatly wounded by those arrows, vomited blood from his various limbs, even as a water-vessel sends forth water through its mouth.

29. O king, Kritavarman, being thus smeared with blood, blazed forth like a red-chalk mountain streaked (by the streams of liquified red-chalk) by a shower.

30. Then the lord (Kritavarman), taking up another bow that was furnished with its string and an arrow, afflicted Shikhandin with the foremost of shafts in the shoulder.

31. Shikhandin, indeed, shone most brightly with these shafts, sticking on his shoulders; even as a large tree looks very pretty with its numerous branches and twigs.

32. Both the warriors, who were smeared with blood, after having penetrated each other deeply, looked like two bulls, that wounded each other with their horns.

33. Those two most powerful car-warriors, who made efforts in slaying each other, whirled round upon their cars, thereby creating thousands of circle, there (in the battle).

34. O great king, Kritavarman pierced the son of Prishata in the battle with seventy sharp arrows, that were furnished with golden wings, and also that were whetted on stone.

35. Thereupon the prince of the Bhojas, that foremost of chastisers of foes, shot with great activity at his antagonist a dreadfu arrow, that was capable of bringing about the destruction of life, in the field of battle.

36. O monarch, he, being thus wounded by that arrow, immediately fall into the condition of insensibility; and he, being so choked with stupefaction, suddenly supported himself by holding his flag-staff.

37. Thus his charioteer immediately carried away from the field of battle that foremost of car-warriors, who was highly afflicted by the arrows of the son of Hridika, and was sighing repeatedly.

38. Thereupon, O lord, when the warlike son of Drupada was defeated, the whole army of the Pandavas, being slain on all sides, retreated from the field of battle.

Thus ends the twenty-sixth chapter, the retreat of Shikhandin, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O great king, Arjuna, riding upon a white horse, slaughtered the force on your side, even as the wind, coming before a heap of cotton, disperses it away.

2. The Trigartas, the Shivis along with the Kaurava force, the Shalyas, the army of the Samsaptakas, and the force called the Narayana, all proceeded against him (Arjuna).

3. Then Satyasena, Chandradeva, Mitradeva, Shrutanjaya, Sausruti, Chitrasena, and Mitravarman, O descendant of the Bharata race,

4. And the prince of the Trigatas, who was attended on all sides in the battle by his brothers and sons, that were all very powerful bowmen, and that were acquainted with the management of various kinds of weapons,

5. All these scattered and shot innumerable arrows at Arjuna in the battle, even as the masses of clouds suddenly pour forth showers of rain, that approach towards the vast ocean.

6. Those hundreds of thousands of warriors all met with destruction at their approaching towards Arjuna, even as the snakes are all destroyed by Garuda.

7. Then, O mighty monarch, those warriors, who were being thus slaughtered in the battle, did not abandon the son of Pandu, even as the insects, being burnt by the blazing fire, do not leave it.

8. In the battle, Satyasena penetrated the son of Pandu with three arrows; and Mitradeva pierced him with sixty-three; while, indeed, Chandradeva pierced him with seven arrows.

9. Again, Mitravarman (pierced) him (Arjuna) with seventy-three shafts; Sausruti, with seven; and Satrunjaya, with twenty; and Shusharma, with nine arrows.

10. He (Arjuna) being thus penetrated, in the battle by numerous heroes, pierced in return those kings—piercing Susruti with seven arrows, and Satyasena, with three,

11. And Satrunjaya, with twenty arrows, and also Chandradeva, with eight, and Mitradeva, with one hundred, and Srutasena, with three,

12. And, again, piercing Mitravarman with nine and also Shusharman with eight. Then having slaughtered king Satrunjaya there (in the battle) with arrows, that were sharpened on stone, he (Arjuna) severed the head of Susruti, that was ornamented with a head-gear, from his body.

13. He then with great activity sent Chandradeva to the abode of Death by shooting innumerable arrows at him. So also, O mighty monarch, he restrained every one of the other car-warriors, who were engaged in the contest, by means of five arrows shot at each.

14. Then Satyasena, indeed, being greatly enraged, directed his large lance, aiming at Krishna, in the battle; and sent forth a loud roar like that of a lion.

15. Then that lance, that was made of iron, with a golden rod, after having penetrated through the left arm of that lofty-minded Madhava, went into the earth.

16. O lord of earth, the whip and reins of Madhava, who was pierced with lance in that dreadful battle, dropped down from his hands.

17. Seeing Vasudeva thus pierced, Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, collected all his fierce wrath; and addrssed Krishna, saying :—

18. "O mighty armed lord, drive the steeds towards Satyasena that I may send this one to the abode of Death by means of sharp arrows.

19. Then that highly famous one (Krishna) immediately taking up the whip as well as the reins, led those steeds (i.e. the car) towards the car of Satyasena.

20. Beholding the lord of the universe thus pierced, that powerful car-warrior Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, restrained the course of Satyasena by means of keen shafts.

21. Thereupon, he (Dhananjaya) severed the huge head, that was ornamented with ear-rings, of that monarch, who stood at the head of the army, from his body by means of whetted broad-headed arrows.

22. O sire, having thus severed his (Satyasena's) head, he then hurled down (slain) Chitravarman with numerous keen arrows, as well as his charioteer with a calf-toothed sharp shaft.

23. Thereupon that powerful one, being filled with wrath, again caused the destruction of hundreds and thousands of the force of the Samsaptakas by means of hundreds of arrows.

24. Then, again, O monarch, that powerful car-warrior severed the head of the high-souled Mitrasena with a razor-headed arrow, that was furnished with the wings of silver. Afterwards he, being greatly enraged, struck Shusharman on his shoulder-joint.

25. Thereupon the entire army of the Samsaptakas, that became very wrathful, having surrounded Dhananjaya on all sides, crushed him with a shower of weapons and thereby caused the ten points of the horizon echo with their roars.

26. Having been thus oppressed by those weapons, that mighty car-warrior, Jishnu, who was possessed of prowess equal to that of Sakra (Indra) himself, and who also had a soul immeasurable, took up his weapon, called Aindra. Thereupon, O ruler of earth, thousands of arrows continuously issued forth therefrom.

27. O sire, of broken standards and bows, of cars along with their banners, of quivers and yokes,

28. Also of axles and wheels, of traces along with the chords, of bottoms of cars, of wooden fences about the cars, and innumerable shafts in the field of battle,

29. And of falling horses, and of spears along with the swords, of maces and spiked clubs, of Sakti-arrows, lances and axes,

30. And of Shataghnis furnished with wheels, as well as of the arms along with the thighs, of wreaths and Angadas, of Keyuras, O sire,

31. And, O descendant of Bharata race, of garlands and cuirasses, of armours, of umbrellas and fans, of heads adorned with coronets,—of these a tremendous roar, O ruler of earth, was heard in all the directions of the field of battle.

32. Upon the field of battle, the heads (of severed warriors), that were ornamented with ear-rings, and furnished with the eyes as resplendent as the full moon, were seen, even as the net-work of stars is seen in the firmament.

33. The bodies of the slaughtered warriors, that were furnished with the most handsome floral wreaths, and covered with the excellent garments, and also that were ointed with the soft sandal, lay resplendent upon the ground.

34—35. Then the dreadful field of battle resembled the clouded firmament filled with various vapoury forms, and the earth being scattered over with the slaughtered princes and the Kshatriyas, possessed of great strength, as well as with the fallen elephants and horses, became as impassable in the battle as the ground strewn over with numerous hills.

36. There was no way in the field of battle, that the car-wheels of that high-souled son of Pandu could proceed, whilst he was slaughtering his antagonists, and greatly smiting the elephants and horses by means of his broad-headed arrows.

37. O sire, the car-wheels of that one, who was careering in the battle, stopped, as if with terror, while they were moving in that bloody mire.

38. His horses, however, that were possessed of the speed of either the mind or of the wind, had with great labour drawn these wheels, that were lagging behind.

39. O descendant of the Bharata race, that army, which was thus slain by the son of Pandu, that great bowman, almost wholly ran away (from the field of battle); and in fact, none remained (to fight with the foe).

40. Then Jishnu, the son of Pritha, having defeated that immense force of the Samsaptakas in the field of battle, blazed forth like the burning fire without any smoke.

Thus ends the twenty-seventh chapter, the victory gained by Arjuna, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. O great monarch, the king Duryodhana himself received, without any fear, Yudhishthira, who was then shooting innumerable shafts (at his antagonists).

2. Then Yudhishthira, the righteous, after having quickly penetrated your son, that mighty car-warrior, who was all on a sudden proceeding against him, addresed him, saying—wait, wait.

3. Then he (Duryodhana), indeed, who became highly enraged, penetrated him (Yudhishthira) in return with nine whetted arrows, and, again, afflicted his charioteer most dreadfully by means of his broad-headed shafts.

4. Thereupon king Yudhishthira shot at Duryodhana thirteen keen arrows, that were furnished with the wings made of gold, sharpened on a stone.

5. Then that powerful car-warrior, having slaughtered his (Duryodhana's) four horses with four arrows, with the fifth severed the head of his charioteer from his body.

6. Thereafter he smote down the king's standard with the sixth arrow, and his bow with the seventh, upon the ground.

7. The most righteous king crushed most severely the Kuru monarch with five other arrows. At this, your son, descending from his car, that had its horses all slain, became subject to the greatest danger, and stayed upon the field.

8. After beholding him thus fallen into imminent danger, Karna, the son of Drona, Kripa and other heroes all on a sudden proceeded towards him with the desire of saving that ruler of men.

9. Thereupon, O monarch, all other sons of Pandu, collected round Yudhishthira, and rushed forth at that battle; whereupon a great encounter took place.

10. Thereupon in that dreadful battle thousands of trumpets were beaten; and after this, O mighty lord of earth, a mixed noise, consisting of numerous voices, arose there (in the battle).

11. In that part of the battle, where the Panchalas encountered the Kaurava divisions, the men came against the foremost of elephants.

12. The car-warriors encountered the car-warriors, and horsemen with horsemen. Thus, O great monarch, several kinds of unthought encounters took place between heroes armed with the best of weapons, which were most beautiful to look at upon the field.

13. Those heroic warriors, who were possessed of great force, and who also were willing to kill one another, continued to battle most excellently, and with great lightness of hands and skill.

14. Indeed, those heroes, strictly observed the vow of warriors, and slaughtered each other in the battle; but they not at all fought from each other's back.

15. But that battle looked only for a while most excellent. Thereupon, O monarch, the encounter look a very mad turn, in which all became regardless of one another.

16. Then the car-warrior, rushing against the elephant, pierced him with sharp arrows and led him towards the abode of Death by means of his straight shafts.

17. Thereafter the elephants coming before the horses, hurled a large number of them in the battle and deeply pierced them in the different directions of the field.

18. Then numerous horsemen, after having encompassed the best of horses created a very sweet noise with their palms, and then fell down upon them.

19. The horsemen, again, slaughtered those horses, that were running away from the field, as well as the mighty elephants, that also were roving in the battle, both from behind them and from the sides.

20. O monarch, the most furious elephants, after having caused large numbers of horses to run away from the field, slaughtered some of them with their tusks, and crushed down others most severely.

21. Thereupon some of the elephants pierced numerous horses along with their riders with great wrath; while others, again, that were possessed of extraordinary strength, seized them and dragged them down upon the ground with great force.

22. The elephants, struck from all sides in the different vital parts by the footsoldiers, uttered very dreadful cries of pain, and ran away towards the ten points of the compass.

23. Many of the foot-soldiers, who were all on a sudden running away in that dreadful battle, leaving behind their ornaments, were immediately hemmed in upon the field.

24. Then, indeed, the most powerful elephant-warriors, having considered the indications of victory, caused their elephants to take up those handsome ornaments, and penetrate the fallen warriors with their tusks.

25. Then also the foot-soldiers, that were possessed of immense force and endued with extraordinary strength, after having encircled those riders of elephants, who were engaged in the massacre there (in the battle), slaughtered them.

26. In that dreadful battle, others were hurled up into the atmosphere by the elephants with their trunks; and while falling down they were deeply pierced by those well-trained beasts with the points of their tusks.

27. Other foot-soldiers were deprived of their lives with the tusks of the elephants, that had suddenly seized them. And some, again, O great monarch, who had been thrown into the midst of other soldiers, were cut off into pieces by those huge elephants, after they had rolled them over and over again upon the ground.

28. And others also, that were tossed in the air like the fans, were slaughtered in the battle. O ruler of earth, those (of the foot-soldiers), who stood in front of other elephants, had their bodies deeply penetrated (by the elephants) on all sides of the field of battle.

29. Many other elephants were very severely struck in their cheeks, the frontal globes, and the parts between their tusks with spears, lances and shafts, called Shakti.

30. Moreover some other elephants, that were fearfully wounded by the most formidable warriors, posted on their sides, as well as by the car-warriors and horsemen, being cut off by them, fell down upon the ground.

31. There in that dreadful battle, numerous horsemen had all on a sudden struck down with great violence upon the field the foot-soldiers, that had their arrows on, by means of their lances.

32. So also, O ruler of earth, O sire, the mighty elephants, having advanced before some of the car-warriors, that had their armours on, and slso having seized them well dragged them down most suddenly on all sides of that dreadful field of battle, that presented a very awful aspect.

33. Many mightiest elephants, that were slaughtered with the shafts, fell down upon the ground even as the summits of a mountain drop down upon the surface of the earth, when broken down by thunder.

34. In that battle, the warriors, battling with their combatants, struck them with their fists; and, having dragged each other with their hairs, hurled down and cut off each other.

35. Some other combatants, having stretched their arms, hurled down their antagonists upon the ground, placed their feet upon their breasts and with great pleasure severed their heads.

36. Some one of the combatants, O great king, smote down with his feet the dead antagonist; while some other, O monarch, severed the head of a falling enemy by means of his scimitar; and while some other combatant, again, directed his weapon at the body of another, who was still living.

37. Thus, O descendant of the Bharata race, the most dreadful encounters between heroes took place there,—some striking one another with their fists; and some also fiercely seizing one another with their hairs; and some, again, wrestling with one another with their arms most fearfully.

38. Under various circumstances, some one of the combatants deprived the lives of many in the battle, who were engaged with others, and were quite unconscious of the slaughterer, by means of several sorts of weapons.

39. In that general encounter, while the warriors were engaged in the battle, and continued to be mangled, hundreds and thousands of headless bodies (of the fallen warriors) stood upon the field.

40. Diverse kinds of weapons and armours, that were drenched in blood, blazed forth like pieces of cloth, that are dyed with deep red.

41. Thus this most dreadful and extraordinary battle, that was characterised by a confused din of diverse kinds of weapons, filled the entire universe with a noise even as the furious Ganges fills the earth with the roar of her currents.

42. O monarch, the combatants, being highly oppressed with the shafts, could not make out their friends from the antagonists and the assembled princes, who were all very desirous of victory, continued to battle, considering (the fact) that they should fight.

43. O great monarch, the warriors began to slaughter both the friends and foes, who nad assembled in that dreadful battle; and the warriors, belonging to both the forces, were rendered restless by the heroes, who engaged them.

44—45. Within a very short time, the earth, that was covered with a mire consisting of flesh and blood, and also by which the currents of blood flowed continuously, became, O lord of earth, impassable with the shattered cars, and with the fallen elephants, and the horses lying thereabout, and also with men slaughtered (in the battle), O great monarch.

46. So Karna slaughtered the Panchala warriors, and Dhananjaya slew the Kuru troops along with all their elephant forces.

47. Thus the great destruction had taken place of all the forces of both the Kurus and Pandavas. Both the parties were most desirous of gaining fame, when the sun had passed the other side of the meridian.

Thus ends the twenty-eighth chapter, the general encounter of several heroes, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, I have heard from you of great and intolerable griefs of fierce character as well as of the destruction of my sons.

2. O Suta (charioteer), from what you describe to me, and also from how the battle was faught, my certain conclusion is that the Kauravas are not alive.

3. In that fierce battle, Duryodhana was deprived of his car. How did the son of Dharma fight: and how also did that prince (Duryodhana)?

4. How did take place the battle, that made the hairs to stand on points, in the afternoon? O Sanjaya, relate to me all these in detail; for you are an expert in this.

Sanjaya said :—

5—6. While the soldiers on both sides were thus engaged in fighting in their respective divisions your son, king Duryodhana, O lord of earth, ascending upon another car, and being filled with great wrath, like a snake possessing virulent poison, addressed his charioteer, saying,—Do you proceed, do you proceed, quickly. After he, O descendant of the Bharata race, had beheld Yudhishthira, the king of righteousness, he said :

7. "O charioteer, most speedily do you lead me to that place, where the royal son of Pandu, having been clad in armour, looks most resplendent with the umbrella held over his head."

8. Then the charioteer, being thus urged by the king, led the foremost of cars belonging to the king, to the presence of king Yudhisthira in the battle.

9. Thereupon Yudhishthira, being filled with wrath, and resembling an infuriate elephant, urged his charioteer, asking him to proceed to the place, where Suyodhana took his stand.

10. Those two heroic warriors, who were brothers to each other, and who were the best of car-warriors, and who were possessed of immense prowess, and who also were invincible in battle, coming in contact with each other, engaged themselves in an encounter. More-over these two mighty bowmen began to strike each other with numerous shafts in that battle.

11. Thereupon, O sire, the king Duryodhana severed the bow of that righteous one (Yudhishthira) by means of a broad-headed arrow, sharpened on a stone, in the battle.

12. Yudhishthira, who became highly enraged, did not, indeed, care that insult.

13. Then the son of Dharma, whose eyes became red with wrath, throwing aside his severed bow, and grasping another bow, stood at the head of his army and cut off the standard and bow of Duryodhana.

14. Then, having taken up another bow, he (Duryodhana) pierced the son of Pandu in return.

15. Those two heroic warriors, who like two lions filled with great rage, were highly enraged, and who also were most desirous of defeating each other in the battle, poured forth showers of arrows upon each other.

16. In that battle, those two most powerful car-warriors smote down each other like two roaring bulls: and also they wandered over the field, expecting to catch each other on their weak points.

17. Thereupon the two heroes, who were wounded by the arrows shot from bows stretched to their fullest length, looked most handsome, O great monarch, resembling two flowering Kingshukas.

18. Then, O monarch, those two rulers of men uttered roars of a lion in order to terrify each other; as also they made sounds with their palms, and with their bows; and, again, sent forth the loudest sound with their conches in that dreadful battle.

19. O great king, those two oppressed each other very greatly.

20. Thereupon king Yudhishthira, who became very angry, struck your son on the chest with arrows, that were very irresitible, having had the impetuosity of thunder.

21. Your son, that ruler of earth, most quickly pierced him (Yudhishthira) in return with five keen arrows, that were equipt with the wings of gold, and sharpened on a stone.

22. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race, the king Duryodhana shot an arrow, called Sakti, that was capable of slaughtering all creatures, and was sharp-edged, and also that looked like a large, resplendent brand.

23. Then the king of righteousness (Yudhishthira) severed into three fragments that arrow, which coursed towards him suddenly by means of numerous sharp shafts; and, again, he, all on a sudden, pierced the prince himself (Duryodhana) with five others.

24. Thereupon that arrow, which was furnished with a golden staff, and that was capable of producing a lould whizz, dropped down (upon the ground); and its falling, like a great brand attended with the blazing flames, looked most resplendent.

25. O ruler of earth, your son, beholding that Shakti-arrow thus severed into pieces, struck Yudhishthira with nine whetted and sharp-pointed arrows.

26. That scorcher of antagonists, being thus deeply penetrated by the most powerful enemy, quickly equipped himself and took up an arrow, aiming at Duryodhana.

27. O mighty monarch, thereupon that hero, possessed of immense strength and great prowess, being greatly wrathful, put that arrow upon his bow-string and directed it (at his antagonist).

28. Indeed, that arrow, approaching towards your son, that powerful car-warrior stupified that prince and then went down the earth.

29. Thereupon Duryodhana, who was filled with wrath, most quickly raising his mace, afflicted the king of righteousness (Yudhishthira) with the desire of piercing him through, in order to put an end to all hostilities (between the Kurus and the Pandavas).

30. Beholding him thus raising his mace like Death himself armed with his rod, the king of righteousness (Yudhishthira) shot that mighty Shakti-arrow at your son, that blazed forth most brilliantly, and was endued with great impetuosity, and also that resembled a large and resplendent brand.

31. Then he(the Kuru prince), who stayed on his car, having been pierced on the chest by that arrow, first piercing his vitals, and also having been greatly pained at heart, fell down and became senseless.

32. Thereupon Bhima, recollecting his own vow, uttered these words: 'O prince, (Yudhishthira), this one is not to be slaughtered by you.' Being thus addressed Yudhishthira abstained (from slaying him).

33. Thereupon Kritavarman, most quickly approaching towards your son, got near that prince, who was then drowned in the great ocean of calamity.

34. Then Bhima, too, grasping his mace, that was equipt with gold and flaxen chords, proceeded with great violence against Kritavarman in that dreadful battle.

35. O great king, thus took place the battle between the forces on your side and their antagonists, in that afternoon while the parties were most desirous of victory in the battle.

Thus ends the twenty-ninth chapter, the general encounter, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thereupon the troops on your side who were most invincible in battle, having placed Karna in the front part (of the army), and returning back, engaged in a battle that looked like the war between the celestials and the Asuras.

2. Then the multitudes of elephant-warriors, the car-warriors, the foot-soldiers and the horsemen, who were roused by the sound of conches, as well as by the roars of elephants, men, cars, and horses, and filled with great rage, stood on the face of the antagonists, and continued to slaughter them.

3. In that fierce battle, numerous elephants, cars, and horses, as well as men were slaughtered by the foremost of horses with their sharp battle axes, scimitars, axes, and several sorts of shafts, as also with their conveyances.

4. The earth looked most resplendent with the severed heads of persons scattered over her, that resembled either the lotus, or the sun, or the moon in splendour, and also that were furnished with the white teeth, excellent faces, eyes and noses, and that were crowned with the handsome diadems, and ornamented with beautiful ear-rings upon their ears.

5. Thus thousands of elephants, and men, and horses were slaughtered by means of hundreds of spiked maces, short bludgeons, arrows, called Shakti, and lances, as also by the hooks, Bhushandis, and clubs which caused the torrents of a river of blood flow down.

6. Then that entire body of slain car-warriors, men, horses and elephants, that were all slaughtered by the antagonists, and thus were most terrific to look at, lying (upon the field) with their gaping wounds, seemed to be like the kingdom of the prince of the Dead at the time of the utter destruction of all creatures.

7. Thereupon, O god among men, your troops, and your sons, those foremost of the Kuru race, who are like the sons of the celestials, having placed at the front of the battle the heroes of immeasurable prowess, all rushed against that descendant of the Shini race (Satyaki).

8. Then that force, which was filled with men, the best of horses, cars, and innumerable elephants, and that sent forth an uproar resembling the roar of a vast ocean of salt, and also that looked like the army of the Asuras or of the celestials, and, again, that was most terrifying to look at, looked most resplendent with extraordinary beauty.

9. Thereupon the son of Ravi (Sun), who was like the chief of the celestials (Indra) in prowess, struck that best of the Shini race, who also resembled the younger brother of the Tridashas (celestials), by means of arrows, that had the splendour of the rays of the sun, in the field of battle.

10. Thereafter that foremost one of the Shini race, with great activity, wholly covered, in the field of battle, that chief among men, along with his car, horses and charioteer, with numerous arrows, that were as fierce as the virulent poison of the snake, in that dreadful field of battle.

11. Then the most expert car-warriors, who are your friends, being attended by their elephants, cars, horses and the foot-soldiers, with immense activity, rushed against Vasusena, that foremost of car-warriors, who was then highly oppressed with the shafts, shot by that chief of the Shini race.

12. That army, which was like a vast ocean, and dispersed in all directions, was wholly made to run away from the battle by the Pandava heroes, headed by the sons of Drupada, with extraordinary quickness. On this occasion, a great slaughter of men, cars, horses, and elephants took place.

13. Thereupon those two best of all persons, Arjuna and Keshava, who were resolved upon slaughtering all their antagonists, after having finished the worship of lord Bhava, according to the ordained rites, and also having performed their daily prayer ceremonies, with great rapidity proceeded against your force.

14. Then their antagonists, namely the Kuru warriors, highly gratified at heart, looked upon that car, that had its rattle resembling the uproar of the masses of clouds, and also whose banners and standards were being by the air, and to which again, beautiful white horses were yoked and, moreover, that was proceeding towards them like the very Death himself.

15. Thereupon Arjuna, after having stretched his bow, called Gandiva, as if dancing upon the car, spread showers of arrows all over the firmament, and the different points of the horizon, as well as all the subsidiary points of the compass.

16. After this, he (the son of Pandu, Arjuna) smote down numerous cars, that resembled the celestial baloons, and that were furnished with all their equipments, and also that were adorned with the weapons and standards, along with the charioteers themselves, by means of diverse kinds of arrows even as the great tempest disperses the congregated masses of clouds.

17. He then led, to the abode of Death by means of his numerous arrows, large numbers of elephants, along with their riders, that were equipt with the most beautiful flags, weapons, and standards, as also numerous horsemen and horses, and many foot-soldiers.

18. Thereupon Duryodhana, unattended by any body else, rushed against that most powerful car-warrior, who was like the very Death himself, and who was filled with great wrath, and who, again, was most invincible in battle, smiting him with his numerous straight arrows.

19. Arjuna, on the other hand, after having destroyed his (antagonist's) bow, charioteer, horses, and the standard by means of seven sharp shafts, severed his (foe's) umbrella by means of another winged arrow.

20. Then he (Arjuna), finding an opening in his antagonist, shot the foremost of his arrows, that was powerful enough to take away the very life itself (of the person struck with it), at Duryodhana. This the son of Drona severed into seven fragments.

21. Thereupon the son of Pandu, having first cut off the bow of the son of Drona and slaughtered his horses, that were the best of their species, by means of his arrows, again, shattered that formidable bow belonging to Kripa.

22. Then he (the son of Pandu), having severed into pieces the bow, owned by the son of Hridika, cut off his standard, and slaughtered his horses. Again, he, cutting off the bow of Dushasana, rushed against the son of Radha.

23. Thereupon Karna, having abandoned Satyaki and penetrated Arjuna with three sharp shafts most actively, pierced Krishna with twenty other arrows; and, again, penetrated the son of Pritha often and often.

24. Karna, resembling Indra himself, when he is greatly filled with wrath, felt no fatigue while he was shooting large numbers of arrows in the field of battle, slaughtering the antagonists.

25. Thereupon Satyaki, having advanced to him, pierced Karna with ninety-nine sharp-headed and dreadful arrows and, again, struck him with one hundred others.

26. Afterwards all the best heroes among the Parthas continued to oppress Karna greatly. Thus Yudhamanyu, Shikhandin, the sons of Draupadi, as well as all the Provadrakas,

27. And also Uttamanjas and Yuyutsu along with the twin brothers, and the several divisions of the Chedis, the Karushas, the Matsyas, and the Kakeyas,

28. And Chekitana, who was possessed of immense prowess, and the king of righteousness (Yudhishthira), observing the most excellent vows,—all these heroes, perfectly aggrandised them by their cars, horses and elephants, as well as by their foot-soldiers, possessing fierce strength.

29. They all, having surrounded Karna on all sides, poured forth showers of numerous kinds of arrows upon him; and they, then having addressed him in a very harsh language, all determined to bring about the fall of Karna.

30. Then Karna, having severed into several fragments that shower of weapons by means of his sharp-headed arrows, cast away his foes with the help of his prowess in the use of weapons even as the wind uproots the tree that stands in its way.

31. Karna, who was highly enraged, was found to slaughter large numbers of car-warriors, elephants along with their riders, horses with men riding upon them, as well as throngs of foot-soldiers.

32. Then the entire army of the Pandavas, being thus slain by the prowess of those weapons belonging to Karna, and being deprived of weapons, and also having had their limbs torn and shattered, almost fled away from the field of battle.

33. Thereupon Arjuna, smiling for a time and smiting down in return the weapons of Karna by means of the weapons of his own, shrouded the different points of the horizon, the entire firmament, and the earth with the showers of arrows.

34. Some of the arrows, shot by Arjuna, dropped down upon the earth like the maces; and some, like the spiked clubs; and others fell like the Shataghnis; whereas several other shafts fell down upon the ground like the most dreadful thunderbolts.

35. That force, belonging to the Kauravas, that consisted of numerous foot-soldiers, horses, cars and elephants, and that were being slaughtered with the above weapons, that seemed to shut up the eyes, roved about (in the field of battle) ceaselessly, and roared most loudly.

36. Thereupon the battle became most dreadful, as numerous horses, men, and elephants were continually slaughtered. Then, again, a large number of them, highly afflicted with the arrows, and struck with terror, fled away from the field of battle.

37. Thus whilst the battle raged most fearfully amongst your troops, who were most enthusiastic with the desire of victory, the Sun, approaching the setting mountain, entered into it.

38. O great monarch, we could not behold anything in the field, either favourable or unfavourable, owing to the thick darkness, and especially on account of the dust.

39. O descendant of the Bharata race, then the most powerful bowman (belonging to the Kuru army), being afraid of a battle that would take place in the night, made retreat from the field of battle, accompanied by all their combatants.

40. Thereupon, O monarch, at the fall of night when the Kaurava divisions had all fled away (from the field), the sons of Pritha, highly gratified to attain the victory, retired to their own camps.

41. And they (the Pandava troops) continued to mock at the antagonists by raising various sorts of sounds with all their musical instruments, and also by sending forth leonine-roars and uproars; and moreover, they praised both Achyuta and Arjuna.

42. Thus when that force of the Kauravas was routed by those heroic warriors, all the troops, as well as the lords of men, began to utter benedictions upon the Pandavas.

43. Thereupon, when the hostile army had made their retreat from the field, the Pandava warriors as well as the lords of men, became highly gratified and having retired to their camps, passed the night most cheerfully.

44. Thereafter large numbers of Rakshashas and Pisachas, as well as numerous other beasts, came to that dreadful field of battle, that looked like the sporting ground of Rudra himself.

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, the battle on the first day, in the Karna Parva.

CHATER XXXI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. It is told that Arjuna slaughtered all belonging to your side, according as he wished. Really even if the very Destroyer himself had come to battle, he could not escape Arjuna, when he took up arms against him.

2. Thereupon the son of Pritha, unassisted by anybody, ravished Vadra. And again, he, being solitary, gratified Agni. Then he, having subjugated this entire earth, compelled all the monarchs to pay him tribute.

3. Moreover he, being unassisted, slaughtered the whole force of the Nivatakavachas. And also having taken up his celestial bow, and without any help from other hands, he (Arjuna) battled against the God, Mahadeva, who stayed before him in the guise of a hunter.

4. Again, single-handed, he protected the entire race of the Bharatas; and similarly single-handed he gratified Vava. Also all the monarchs of the earth were defeated by him alone, who was possessed of fierce strength.

5. They, that is the Kuru warriors, are not to be blamed; rather they should be praised for the reason of their having fought with such a great warrior. Then, O Suta, what did Duryodhana do afterwards? O Sanjaya, do you relate to me all these in detail.

Sanjaya said :—

6—7. The Kourava warriors, who now resembled the serpents deprived of their fangs and poison, and trodden over by the feet, and some of whom were struck and wounded, and some, again, were deprived of their armours, weapons and proper conveyances, and some of whom were thrown down, and who all, again, uttered very plaintive voices, and who were scorched by the fire of grief, and who merely made a parade of their knowledge in arms, and who were all defeated by the antagnists, and who now repaired to their encampment, had been counseling with one another.

8. Thereupon Karna, who was filled with wrath, and who sighed heavily like a serpent, and who squeezed his hands and who looked at your son, addressed them saying :—

9. 'The thing is that Arjuna is always very persevering, skilful, and intelligent. And, again, when the first time (for any thing to be done) comes, the Eternal One (Vasudeva) awakes him to his duties.

10. To-day we were all deceived by him (Arjuna) by the shower of weapons poured forth all on a sudden. But to-morrow, O ruler of earth, I will baffle all his attempts.'

11. Having been thus addressed (by Karna), and saying—so be it, he (Duryodhana) commanded all the best of monarchs to dissolve. All these kings, being thus ordered, repaired to their respective abodes.

12. Having passed that night most happily, they (those monarchs), with ample gratification, proceeded out for battle (the following morning).

13. They then saw a very invincible array of army, that was constituted by the King of Justice (Yudhisthira), who was the greatest of the whole Kuru race, with the greatest care, and quite in accordance with the advices of both Vrihaspati and Ushanas.

14. Thereupon Duryodhana, that smiter of enemies, called to his memory, Karna, who baffled the attempts of his antagonists, and who was the foremost of all heroic warriors, and who was the slayer of his foes, and who had the neck like that of a bull.

15. The king's (Duryodhana's) mind was now constantly directed towards Karna, who-resembled Purandara in battle, and who was like the Murutas in prowess, and who also was equal to Kartavirya in prowess.

16. As also the hearts of all the troops turned towards Karna, who was the son of the charioteer, and who, again was a great bowman, even as the heart of a person always turns towards his friends, whilst he falls in some great danger.

Dhritarashtra said :—

17. Thus when the minds of all you were turned towards Karna the son of Vikartana, did the warriors on my side look at the son of Radha, even as persons, oppressed with cold, look at the sun?

18. O Sanjaya, how did Karna, the son of Vikartana, fight there (in the field of battle), when my troops had first reretreated, and again engaged themselves in the battle.

19. And how also did the sons of Pandu fight in the field with the son of Suta? Indeed, Karna that mighty-armed warrior, would have slaughtered all the sons of Pritha along with the whole lot of the Srinjayas, although he was alone.

20. In the field of battle, the strength of the arms of Karna was similar to the prowess of both Shakra and Vishnu; and the weapons, as well as the prowess of that lofty-minded warrior were very fierce.

21. Hoping to be under the protection of Karna, king Duryodhana was most eager for the battle. Then what did that very powerful car-warrior do after seeing Duryodhana very highly oppressd by the son of Pandu, and also after witnessing all the sons of Pandu to display their prowess in arms?

22. Relying upon Karna, the foolish prince Duryodhana, again, aspired to defeat the sons, of Pritha along with their sons, as well as Keshava in the field of battle.

23. Alas, this is a matter of great grief that in the field of battle Karna, possessed of immense strength, could not defeat the sons of Pandu! It is certain that Destiny holds the foremost position in all affairs.

24. Alas, the most dreadful result of gaming at dice has now been visible! Alas, O Sanjaya, I now hear of the greatest sorrows, that had been brought about by foolish Duryodhana, and also that resemble a large number of deadly arrows!

25. O Sire, the son of Suvala was considered to be possessed of great policy; as also Karna was always extremely attached to the prince (Duryodhana).

26. O Sanjaya, when such is the matter with the battle which is most dreadful I have often heard that my sons were being constantly defeated, and slaughtered.

27. There exists no one who can restrain the Pandavas in the battle; and they enter into my whole force, even as one penetrates into the midst of a throng of women. It is sure that Destiny is the most supreme.

Sanjaya said :—

28. O monarch, do you now reflect upon your past actions, that were most righteous (the game at dice and others of the kind).

29. Man afterwards reflects upon all actions that had past away. But that however, one should not do. For, one is destroyed by that sort of reflection.

30. That act of yours has been far from bringing out the desired end. Although you are possessed of knowledge, yet you did not consider before hand the propriety and impropriety of your actions.

31. O monarch, it was several times told to you, that you should not fight with the, Pandavas. But, O ruler of earth, that advice you did not accept out of foolishness.

32. The most horrible deeds of sin had been perpetrated by you in respect to the Pandāvas. And only for those acts of yours that this terrible destruction of kings takes place now.

33. O foremost of the Bharata race all has now passed away, do not grieve for them. O you of everlasting fame, do you now hear of all that had taken place, namely the details of that awful slaughter.

34. Thus when the night dawned, Karna went to the king. And having approached him that hero of very powerful arms then addressed Duryodhana.

Karna said :—

35. To-day, O monarch, I will go forth for battle with the famous son of Pandu. Either I shall slay that hero, or he will slay me.

36. O descendant of the Bharata race, O monarch, on account of the innumerable acts of both myself as well as of the son o

Pritha, that this encounter between me and Arjuna had taken place; else this would not have occurred.

37. O ruler of earth, do you listen to my speech, uttered in accordance with my wisdom. O descendant of the Bharata race, if I can not slay the son of Pritha in battle, I will not return from the field.

38. For the reason of this army on over side having had the best of its warriors all slaughtered, that I will myself stand in the field: the son of Pritha will proceed against me, who am deprived of the Sakti-arrow given to me by Shakra (Indra).

39. O lord of men, then be you conscious of what proves beneficial to you. The strength of my celestial weapons is similar to the strength of Arjuna's weapons.

40. As regards the baffling of attempts of the most powerful antagonists, and as to the lightness of arms, and the range of arrows shot, and in respect to skillfulness, as also in the management of weapons, Suvyasachin is never my peer.

41. Again, O descendant of the Bharata race, either in physical strength, or in heroism, or knowledge (in the management of arms), or in prowess or in hitting the mark Savyasachin is never my peer.

42. My bow, that was known by the name of Vijaya, was the most supreme of all weapons. It was made by Vishwakarman with the object of performing what was agreeable to Indra.

43. O monarch, Shatakratu (Indra), indeed, subdued all the Daityas by means of that bow. And, again, at the twang of that bow, the whole body of the Daityas supposed the ten points of the compass to be empty.

44. And formerly Shakra (Indra) gave away to the son of Bhrigu that excellently equipt and best of the celestial bows, which was highly respected by all; and afterwards the son of Bhrigu gave it to me.

45. I will battle with that foremost one amongst the victorious warriors, the mighty-armed Arjuna, in the field; even as Indra fought with all the Daityas, who had assembled against him.

46. That fierce bow, given away by Rama, is in every way superior to the Gandiva bow; with that bow the entire earth was conquered twenty-one times (by Bhargava).

47. The son of Vrigu speaks of the celestial deeds of that formidable bow. As Rama has given it to me I will surely fight with the son of Pandu with that bow.

48. To-day, O Duryodhana, I will gratify your heart, along with that of your friends by slaughtering in the field of battle the heroic Arjuna that foremost one amongst the victorious warriors.

49. O lord of earth, the whole kingdom of earth, along with the oceans, the mountains, the forests and the islands, with all her heroes slaughtered, will be your own; and over which you will be established with your sons and grandsons.

50. There exists nothing that I cannot perform to-day, especially for gratifying you; even as success (ascetic) does surely exist in respect to a person, who is passionately attached to virtue, and who also has controlled his soul.

51. There is no one, who, coming in contact with me, is able to bear me in the battle; even as the tree, coming in contact with the fire, is able to bear it. Indeed this must be told by me that in what respect I am inferior to Phalguna (Arjuna).

52. The string of his bow is celestial; as also he (Ajruna) has got two inexhaustible quivers. His charioteer is Govinda. But I have got nothing like all these.

53. His Gandiva bow is celestial, and one of the best; as also it is indestructible in battle, whereas my bow, called Vijaya, is also divine, and formidable, as it is also the foremost of its kind.

54. Thus O monarch, as regards the bow I am superior to the son of Pritha. But in what respect the son of Pandu (Arjuna), that heroic one, is superior to me, do you now listen to.

55. That one, born in the Dasharha race, is the holder of the reins (of his horses), who is revered by all people; as also his car, that is ornamented with gold, is celestial, and the gift of Agni (the god of fire).

56. That hero is impenetrable in all his parts. His horses are possessed of the speed of the mind. His standard is also celestial, and most resplendent, bearing an Ape, exciting the greatest wonder.

57. Moreover Krishna, who is the creator of the universe, most carefully guards that car. I am destitute of all these equipments, yet I wish to fight with the son of Pandu.

58. Indeed, this Shalya, who is the ornament of all assemblies, resembles Shauri. Should he perform the duties of my charioteer, the victory will surely be yours.

59. Let Shalya, therefore, who is irresistible by the antagonists, act as my charioteer. And let the carts also convey my long shafts, as well as the arrows furnished with the feathers of vultures.

60. Let, O lord of kings, the best of horses be yoked to my excellent cars; and let them, O foremost of the Bharata race, follow me without exhaustion.

61. Thus I will be superior to the son of Pritha in respect to these (the above mentioned) qualities. And thus, again, Shalya is superior to Krishna; and I am superior to Arjuna.

62. Even as that one, of the Dasharha race, who is the slayer of the hostile heroes, is thoroughly versed in the knowledge about horses, so Shalya, that most powerful car-warrior, is also acquainted with the science of horses.

63. In respect of the strength of arms there exist none who is equal to the prince of Madras.

64. Even as there exists not a single bowman, who is my peer in respect to the management of arms, so there is no one, who resembles Shalya as to the knowledge of horses.

65. Thus my car, which is attended with all these surroundings, will, indeed, be superior to that of the son of Pritha. Even the very celestials, accompanied by Vasava, will not be capable of proceeding against it (my car).

66. Thus having performed all these, when I take my stand upon the car, I should surely be superior to Arjuna in respect of these (the above mentioned) qualities; and also I should, O foremost of the Kuru race, subdue Phalguna.

O mighty king, O searcher of enemies, I desire that all this should be done by you. Also this my desire should be fulfilled by you; and the time in doing it should not pass away for nothing.

68. Having performed all this, there will be enough help to me on all desirable points. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race, you will witness whatever I will achieve in the field of battle.

69. By all means I will subdue all the assembled Pandavas in the field of battle. Even the very celestials and the Asuras will not be able to proceed against me in the field. O monarch, what should I say of the sons of Pandu, who are of human origin, and who will not be capable of withstanding me in the battle?

Sanjaya said :—

70. Thereupon your son, having been thus addressed by Karna, who was the ornament of battle, and also having adorde the son of Radha, told him these words with a highly gratified heart.

Duryodhana said :—

71. I will perform all this, that you, O Karna, desire. Numerous cars, furnished with the excellent quivers, and yoked to the foremost of horses, will follow you in the field of battle.

72. And let the long shafts, and the arrows furnished with the wings of vultures, be conveyed to you in innumerable carts; and, O Karna, all of us, namely the princes, will follow you into the field.

Sanjaya said :—

73. O mighty monarch, your son, who is possessed of immense prowess, after having thus addressed, and also having advanced before the prince of Madras, spoke these words to that chief, O monarch.

Thus ends the thirty-first chapter, the parley between Karna and Duryodhana, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O great king, your son, approaching the prince of Madras, that very powerful car-warrior, with enough of humility, spoke these words to him out of affection.

2. O you of truthful vows, O greatly fortunate one, O you who increase the sorrows of the antagonists, O lord of the Madras, O hero in battle, O you who instill terror in the hostile forces,

3. O best of speakers, you have heard what Karna had said, namely that this hero (Karna) chooses you amongst all the foremost of princes.

4. When such you are, O you of invincible prowess, O prince of the Madras, I solicit you to-day with enough of humility and bowing down my head in order to bring about the destruction of my enemies.

5. In consequence thereof, O best of car-warriors, it is necessary that you should serve me, out of affection, as my charioteer in order to bring about the death of the son of Pritha, as also to render me a real good.

6. Having had you for his charioteer, the son of Radha will surely vanquish my antagonists.

7. Indeed, O greatly fortunate one, there exists no one, who can restrain the horses belonging to Karna, excepting yourself, who are cruel to Vasudeva in battle. So do you protect Karna by all means, even as Brahma protects Maheshwara.

8. Even as that descendant of the Vrishni race protects the son of Pandu by all means in all his difficulties, so, O chief of the Madras, do you support to-day the son of Radha.

9. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, yourself, and the most energetic king of the Bhojas as well as Shakuni, the son of Suvala, the son of Drona, and myself too, all had formed our army.

10. O ruler of earth, thus nine divisions had been made of the army, but no such division or allotted share does yet exist of either Bhishma or lofty-minded Drona.

11. By those two (Bhisma and Drona), who had gone beyond their respective divisions, all my enemies were slain.

12. Those two foremost of persons, who were very old, were slaughtered by stratagem in the field. O sinless one, they repaired to heaven from here, after having performed the most arduous tasks; as also other foremost of men, having been slain by the enemies in battle, departed to paradise.

13. So again numerous other heroes, all belonging to our army, after having achieved the most difficult attempts to the best of their powers, and also having abondoned their lives in the battle, at last departed to heaven.

14. O lord of men, this our army, the large part of which has been slain, have already been massacred by the sons of Pritha, who were at first very few in number. What should be done now?

15. The sons of Kunti are all possessed of immense strength; they are lofty-minded; and also they are endued with undaunted course. O lord of earth, now act up in such a way that they may not slaughter the rest of my army.

16. O lord, this my force has lost the most heroic warriors, who were all slain by the sons of Pandu in the field of battle.

17. Inded, Karna alone, that mighty-armed hero, is dear to us, and attached to our good; as also, O foremost of persons you are, who are the mightiest car-warrior throughout the entire world.

18. O Shalya, Karna desires to engage in battle to-day with Arjuna. But O chie of the people of Madras, I entertain very great hopes in that dreadful battle.

19. There does none exist in the whole world, who can act as the best holder of the reins of Karna's horses; even as Krishna makes the foremost holder of reins of Partha's horses in the field of battle, so, O monarch, should you be the holder of reins of the car belonging to Karna.

20. O sire, having been attended by him (Krishna), and also well guarded in battle, whatever deeds that the son of Pritha performs, will all be consequently done before your eyes.

21. Formerly Arjuna, indeed, never slaughtered his enemies in battle; but now, as he is always attended by Krishna, he shows forth such a prowess.

22. And now, O lord of the Madras, it is witnessed that day after day the son of Pritha causes the vast army of Dhritarashtra to retreat, because he is ever attended by Krishna in the field of battle.

23. O most resplendent one, the rest of the share given to Karna as well as to yourself still remains. Being accompanied by Karna, do you at once proceed to the field of battle.

24. Even as the Sun, being attended by the Aruna, disposses the darkness, so you, being united with Karna, slaughter the son of Pritha in this dreadful battle.

25. Let the greatest car-warriors, belonging to the hostile force, run away from the field, after seeing in the battle both Karna and Shalya, who are like two risen suns, and who also are possessed of the splendour of the rising sun.

26. As, O sire, the thick gloom is destroyed at the very view of both the Sun and Aruna, even so let all the descendants of Kunti along with the Panchalas and the Srinjayas be destroyed (at the sight of Karna and Shalya in the battle).

27. Karna is superior to all the car-warriors, as also you are the foremest of all the charioteers; and there exists no one in the whole world, who is your peer in the field of battle.

28. Even as that descendant of the Vrishni race protects the son of Pandu in all his vicissitudes, so do you guard Karna the son of Vikartana, in the battle.

29. O ruler of earth, when you are his charioteer, this hero (Karna) will surely be invincible even in the war with all the celestials, headed by Shakra (Indra); and what again, need be said with all the Pandavas. O, do not doubt my sayings!

Sanjaya said:—

30. Having heard the words of Duryodhana, Shalya, who became highly enraged and who was stretching his bow to its extent, and who, again, was waving his two arms often and often,

31. And who, moreover, was rolling his two expansive eyes reddened with great rage, and who himself was endued with the mighty arms, and who also was greatly proud of the possession of his high-birth, properties, vast learning and physical capability,—Shalya uttered these words.

Shalya said :—

32. O son of Gandhari, you are offending me; and also surely you are suspecting my conduct, when you ask me without hesitation by saying,—Do you act as my charioteer.

33. You praise Karna by considering that he is superior to ourselves. But I never reckon the son of Radha to be equal to myself in the field of battle.

34. O ruler of earth, let a much greater share be permitted to me in the battle. Having slaughtered him in the field, who has come to contend with me, I will repair to the place wherefrom I came.

35. O descendant of the Kuru race, if it be desirable, I will fight alone. Do you witness to-day my energy in the field of battle, whilst I will engage in scorching the enemies.

36. O descendant of the Kuru race, no person, who is like ourselves, ever engages himself in the execution of my duties, after having reflected in the heart such an insult. Do not doubt me (my prowess). In the battle, you should not at all attach such a great insult to me.

37. See these two my mascular arms, that can smite down like thunder; as also do you behold my bow that is variegated with the excellent colors, as well as my shafts that are like snakes possessing virulent poison.

38. See again, my car, to which are yoked the most beautiful horses endued with the swiftness of the wind. And O son of Gandhari, see my mace, that is ornamented with gold and threads of hemp.

39. O lord of earth, when I am angry I can split up the very earth; and I can break asunder the mountains; as also I can soak up even all the oceans by means of my own energy.

40. Why do you, O king, being conscious of the fact that I am thus capable of striking down the enemies, employ me to the office of the charioteer in the field of battle to the son of Adhiratha, who is born of such low parentage.

41. O lord of kings, you should not appoint me to this menial service. Having been indeed, thus superior to him, I cannot dare obey the commands of that sinful person.

42. That person, who makes one, who is a guest out of love, and who is most supreme, and who, again, is already very obedient, submissive to a very sinful man, surely becomes subject to that sort of crime which is similar to one of confusing the superior with the inferior.

43. This is a truth that Brahma created the twice-born persons from his mouth; and the Kshatriyas (or the people of the warrior class) from his arms; and also he created the Vaisyas (or the merchant class) from his thighs; and the Sudras (or the people of the servile class) from his feet.

44. Thereupon, O descendant of the Bharata race, the particular classes of persons, that is these born of (superior father marrying an inferior mother, or of a inferior father marrying a superior mother), have all originated from these four classes by means of their union with one another.

45. It has often been told that the Kshatriyas are the protectors of the rest of the classes, as also they are the possessors and givers of wealth. The Brahmana, or the regenerate persons, are characterised as presiding at sacrifices, teaching, and also by the acceptance of pure gifts. and again, the Brahmans, that is, the twice-born persons, were established upon the earth inorder that they would shower forth blessings upon all the people.

46. According to the Dharma-shastras the occupations of the Vaisyas are agriculture, the rearing of cattle, and gift; whereas the Sndras are ordained to be the servants of the Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, and Vaisyas.

47. Then, again, the charioteers, indeed are servants to the Kshatriyas; but never the Kshatriyas, O sinless one, are serverntss to the charioteer class. Do you, therefore, listen to these my words.

48. I am that person, who have his head (or hairs) washed off with sanctity, and I am born of a high family of royal sage, and I am a mighty car-warrior, and I am person of great note; as, again, I am worshipped and praised by the eulogists.

49. O slayer of the hostile force, when I am such a person as described, I can not dare act as the charioteer of the son of Suta in the field.

50. Thus having obtained this insult I will never battle in the field, O son of Gandhari, to-day. I ask your permission, as I am really willing to return home.

Sanjaya said :—

51. Having thus addressed, that foremost of persons, Shalya, who was the ornament of assemblies, and who also became highly enraged, immediately went away from the midst of the kings, after having stood up.

52. Then your son, having received him (Shalya) with great affection and high respect, addressed him in a friendly manner these sweet expressions, pregnant with very grave ideas.

53. O Shalya, this what you utter is doubtlessly true. In this, I have some object in sight. Be you, therefore, O lord of men, acquainted with this.

54. O lord of earth, Karna is in no way higher than what you are ; nor that I doubt your conduct. It is sure also that the royal chief of the Madras will not achieve what should be unreal.

55. Indeed, your ancesters, who were the best of persons, always told the truth : and hence it is my opinion that yourself is said to be the descendant of the truthful persons.

56. O you who confer honors, you are like a barbed shaft to your enemies upon this earth. In consequence thereof you are called by the name of Shalya on the surface of the world.

57. O you who award ample gifts (to the regenerate persons), O you who are acquainted with virtue, you now achieve for my sake what was told by you before, saying that you would achieve.

58. Really neither the son of Radha, nor I am more powerful than you. Hence I solicit you to be the driver of these horses of the best species (yoked to the car of Karna) in this dreadful battle.

59. O sire, even as Karna is reckoned to be superior to Dhananjaya regarding innumerable qualities, so this whole world is of opinion that you are superior to even Vasudeva.

60. O foremost of persons, Karna is, indeed, far superior to the son of Pritha respecting the management of weapons ; and you, too, are superior to Krishna both in the horse-lore and physical power.

61. As that high-souled Vasudeva is thoroughly versed in the knowledge about horses, even so you, O royal chief of the Madras, is twice acquainted with that knowledge. There is no doubt about it.

Shalya said :—

62. O son of Gandhari. O descendant of the Karu race, as you tell me that amongst all these troops there is none more accomplished than the son of Devaki, even so I am highly gratified with you.

63. Thus I will act as the charioteer of that greatly famous son of Radha, while he will engage in battle with that foremost of the sons of Pandu, even as you, O hero, desire me.

64. But O hero, this should really be my provision towards the son of Vikartana that I will send forth in his presence such utterances as I will desire.

Sanjaya said :—

65. O king, O descendant of Bharata, O best of the Bharata race, your son, accompanied by Karna, replied to the son of the king of the Madras, saying—so be it.

Thus ends the thirty-second chapter, Shalya's acceptance of the charioteership of Karna in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Duryodhana said :—

1. Do you, again, O chief of the Madras, O lord, hear all that I will relate to you, namely what had taken place in the days of old in the great war between the celestials and the Asuras.

2. O foremost of the royal sages, do you now listen to what the great sage Markandeya had related to me as well as to my father which I will, again describe to you in detail. No doubt should be made by you in this.

3. O monarch, there had taken place a dreadful battle, that had its root in Taraka, between the celestials and the Asuras, each of which parties was most desirous of defeating the other. Then it has been heard by us that the Daityas were subdued by the celestials.

4. O monarch, when the Daityas were thus defeated by the celestials, the three sons of Taraka, named Taraksha, Krimmulakshu, and Vidyunmalin,

5. Who had placed themselves under severe devotion, and who, also, had submitted themselves to the strictest rules, liberated their bodies by means of that austere devotion, O scorcher of enemies.

6. My grandsire, who was ever the giver of boons, became highly gratified with them on account of their devotion, self-restraint, observance of strict rules, and also of divine contemplation and offered them numerous boons.

7. O monarch, they, having united with one another, asked of the great grandsire of all the worlds that boon, namely that they would not attain death from all creatures always.

8. Threreupon the lord, the God, that divine master of all the worlds, addressed to them, saying: "O Asuras, there exists no such thing, namely the freedom from death at the hands of all creatures; and, therefore do you refain from such a solicitation. Indeed you ask another boon, that you like most.'

9. Thereafter, O monarch, those Asuras after having brooded over the matter conjointly for a long while, and settled amongst themselves, and also having bowed down to that Lord of all the worlds, addressed him with these words: 'O God, O grandsire, do you give us this boon.'

10. "In this world having kept your grace always in the front we will, living in three different cities, wonder over this entire earth.

11. Then after one thousand years we will again unite together; and, O faultless one, these three cities, belonging to ourselves, will also attain the similar condition once more.

12. Whenever, O lord, any one of the celestials will penetrate with a single arrow those cities united into one then that most excellent of celestials will become the cause of our death."

13. Then that god, having replied to them, saying—So be it, ascended to heaven.

14. Thereupon they (the three Asuras), being highly gratified for having obtained the boons, and also having settled everything amongst themselves, called Maya, who was a mighty Asura and who was the celestial architect, and who was also without decay or death, and highly respected by the whole lot of the Daityas and the Danavas with a view to have those three cities constructed.

15. Thereupon Maya, who was of superior intelligence, constructed the three cities with the help of his own asceticism,—the one of the three was made of gold, the second of silver, and the third of black iron.

16. The city that was constructed of gold rested in the heaven; and that one of silver was placed in the farmament; and whereas the third, that was made of black iron, was established upon the earth. But, O lord of earth, they all were made to rest upon a wheel.

17. Each one of them (the three cities) were measured to be one hundred Yojanas long and one hundred Yojanas broad; and contained numerous buildings and houses, as also lofty walls and perches.

18. Although the foremost of the buildings in them were very closely situated to one another yet the high roads were very spacious and far off from one another. They also were very excellently furnished with the diverse kinds of palaces, and beautiful perches.

19. O monarch, separate kings lived in those cities.

20. The one of gold that was most beautiful had been in the possession of the high-souled Tarakaksha; and the other made of silver had been in the possession of Kamalaksha; and the third of black iron belonged to Vidyunmalin.

21. And those three Daitya monarchs immediately attacked the three worlds with the aid of their prowess and continued to reside; they said also these words,—who is that one called Prajapati (or the creator).

22. Thereupon millions and millions of persons from all directions proceeded against those best of the Danavas who had no hordes to come against them.

23. The greatly hanghty and flesh-eating Danavas, who were in the days of yore vanquished by the celestials, now having dwelt in those three well fortified cities, became highly desirous of obtaining immense prosperity.

24. Now Maya had became the supporter of them all, who have thus united together. Indeed, all of them having been under his protection (Maya's) lived there with perfect fearlessness.

25. Thenceforth whoever amongst those dwelling in those cities entertained whatever wish in his heart it was then Maya who fulfilled their desires by the aid of his illusory energy.

26. The heroic and the most powerful son of Tarakaksha, who was known by the the name of Hari, practised the most severe devotion, in consequence of which the Grandsire became highly satisfied with him.

27. Thus when the God was satisfied with him, he (Hari) asked him the following boon: 'Let there be a lake in our city, in which the persons, greatly struck by the weapons, having been dipped, will revive with resembled vigor.

28. O lord, after having obtained the boon, that warlike son of Tarakaksha, named Hari, created a lake in that city, which possessed the power of reviving the dead.

29. Indeed, the Daityas, in whatever form and whatever guise they were slaughtered, after having been dipped into that lake, had come back to their life in the same form and guise.

30. Thus after having regained their dead, they (the Daityas), who attained to their ascetic success by means of great devotion, and who also enhanced the terrors of all the celestials, now began to oppress all the different worlds.

31. O monarch, there had never been the slightest diminution of their number in the field of battle.

32. Thereupon they, who had been involved both by covetuousness and insensibility, and who also were deprived of their sense, now began to destroy the cities and the towns, that were settled upon the whole universe.

33. Having routed all the celestials, along with their attendants, at all times and in all places, those Danavas, who had been rendered haughty by the attainment of the boons, wandered, according to their option,

34. All over the celestial forests and different other regions that had been very dear to the celestials themselves, and the s cred asylums belonging to the sages, as also the most excellent abodes of men. Moreover these Danavas, who behaved most cruelly, had damaged the honor of all.

35. While thus all the worlds were very greatly oppressed (by the Danavas), th n Shakra (Indra), who had been encompassed by all the Maruts, fought against those cities by hurling his thunder (upon them) from all sides.

36. When, O foremost of monarchs, Purandara became incapable to pierce cities, which had been made impenetrable by that creator, and which also had received the boons.

37. Then, O subduer of enemies, the terror-struck lord of the gods, abandoning these cities, and celestials, went to the Grandsire with a view to relate to him the great insults wrought out by the Asuras.

38. They then, having described the whole history, and also having bowed down to him with their heads, asked the lord grand sire the fitting means of their destruction.

39. Having listened to all that, the lord god addressed all the celestials, saying this. 'That injurious fellow, who offends you, does surely offend me too.'

40. Indeed the Asuras are all very wicked-souled: and also they are dead against the celestials. And when they commit oppressions against you; they thus afflict me always.

41. I am, indeed, equally disposed towards all the creatures. There is no doubt about it. My fixed vow is that the unrighteous ones should ever be slaughtered.

42. Those three fortresses can only be penetrated by means of a single shaft; but in no other way can they be pierced. There exists no other person except Stana, who is able to pierce them with a single arrow.

43. Then you, O Adityas, select that heroic warrior Stana, also called Ishana, as well as Jishnu, who ean hardly bo afflicted in the battle. He will surely slaughter these Asuras.

44. Hearing this speech of his, all the celestials, under the leadership of Shakra, placing Brahman at their front, went to seek shelter of that god, who had a bull for his symbol.

45. Being accompanied by these Rishis (sages), who practised severe devotion, and who also uttered the eternal words of the Vedas, all these rightious gods repaired to Bhava with their whole soul directed towards him.

46. Then, O monarch, they began to satisfy him with the high speeches (as found in the Vedas), who is the giver of fearlessness in all fears, and who is the soul of all, and who himself is high-souled, and by whom, again, the entire universe is pervaded through with his eternal soul.

47. That one, who knows how to meditate upon the Soul by means of special devotional performances, and who also knows the capability of the soul, that is, the difference between soul and matter, as also whose soul is ever under his control.

48. That one, named Ishana, that mass of fiery energy, that lord of Uma, that one having had no equal in the world, that cause of all causes, that faultless one, they (the celestials) saw.

49. Then there lords conceived innumerable forms in him, although he was but one. Thereafter they all, after having found out all these numerous forms as each of them had respectively conceived in their minds, became highly astonished.

50. All the celestials, as well as all the regenerate sages, after having seen that embodiment of all creatures, that unborn person, who was the most supreme of the entire universe, touched the earth with their heads.

51. Then having received them by uttering the worlds you are welcome, and also having raised their heads, Lord Shankara smilingly addressed them, saying—do you tell me the purpose of your coming here.

52. Thereupon having been commanded by the three-eyed deity, the celestials, who became highly gratified, uttered these words to him: O lord, let our repeated sulutations be to you.

53. Let our salutations be to you, who are the lord of all the celestials; let our salutations be to you, who are mighty bowman, and to you, who are subject to great rage, and also to you, who are the destroyer of the sacrifices of the creater; and to you, again, who are worshipped by all the lords of the creatures.

54. Let our salutations be to you, who are ever present; and to you, who are worthy to be prayed; and to you, who are continuously praised; and to you, who, are the death himself; and to you, who are possessed of red splendour; and to you, who are dreadful; and to you, who are endued with blue throat; and to you, who are furnished with the symbol of a trident.

55. And to you, who are never to be prostrated; and to you, who are furnished with the eyes of a yazelle; and to you, who battle with the best weapons; and to you, who are worthy of all praises; and to you, who are pure; and to you, who are the very death himself; and to you also, who are the destroyer of all.

56. And to you, who can with difficulty be resisted; and to you who are Shakra himself; and to you, who are also Brahman; and to you who behave like a Brahmachari; and to you who are Ishana; and to you, who are immeasurable; and to you, who are the leader of all; and to you, who are dressed with rags.

57. And to you, who practise eternal vows; and to you, who are tawny-colored; and to you, who carry on severe vows; and to you, who are dressed with the skins of animal; and to you, who are the father of Kumara; and to you, who are furnished with the three eyes; and to you, who are armed with the best of weapons.

58. And to you, who destroy the afflictions of those who have sought your protection; and to you, who bring about the death of those who are enemies to the regenerate persons; and to you, who are the lord of the forest trees. Let our salutations be to you, who are the lord of all persons; and let our eternal salutations be to you, who are the lord of all kine; and to you who are the lord of all sacrifices.

59. Let our salutations be to you, who are the leader of the troops; and to you, who are furnished with three eyes; and to you, who are possessed of fierce energy; O god, let our salutations be to you with our whole heart, speech and acts. Be you kind to us, who seek your shelter.

60. Thereupon the lord, who became highly gratified, having received them with the words you are welcome,—addressed them, saying let your fears be all gone; tell me what am I to do for you all.

Thus ends the thirty-third chapter, the history of the three cities of the Danavas, in the Karna Pava.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continuod

Duryodhana said :—

1. When fearlessness was given to the whole class of the Pitris, the celestials, and the Rishis by that high-souled one (Brahman), he (Brahaman), after having adored Shankara properly uttered these words beneficial to the people of the entire universe.

2. O lord of all, through your grace I have been established in this high situation, namely the creatorship of all creatures. Holdinng this, a very great boon was given by me to the Danavas.

3. O Lord of the past and the future, there exists no one, excepting yourself, who is fit to slaughter these who have gone beyond paying proper respects. Indeed, you are the only person, who can slay these antagonists.

4. O God, when you are such, do you, therefore, achieve good to the celestials who have fallen into imminent danger, and, who also solicit your grace. O lord of the celestials, O wielder of the trident, slaughter these Danavas.

5. O you, who give honor to all, through your kindness let the entire univeres attain bliss. Indeed, you are worthy to be taken protection of. O lord of the universe, we all seek your protection.

Stana said :—

6. My opinion is that all your enemies should be slain. Being unassited, I can not dare slaughter them; for really the antagonists of the celestials are all very powerful.

7. Having been united together, all of you, therefore, destroy these enemies in the field of battle with one-half of the strength possessed by me. For union is, indeed, an immense strength.

The celestials said :—

8. I have observed energy and prowess of them (the Danavas). From this I am of opinion that the amount of energy and strengh possessed by them, is twice the energy and prowess possessed by us.

The auspicious god said :—

9. These sinful persons, who have insulted you, all should be slaughtered. Do you kill all these antagonists with one-half of my energy and prowess.

The celestials. said :—

10. O Maheshwara, we are not capable of bearing half of your energy. Do you slaughter the antagonists with one-half of the entire strength, possessed by all of us.

The auspicious god said :—

11. If you have not really got the power of bearing my whole force, then I, endued with only one half of your united energy, slay them all.

Duryodhana said :

12. Thereupon, O foremost of monarchs, the chief of the celestials was thus addressed by the gods, saying—so be it; and he in this way became superior to all, after having added to his own one-half of the entire energy possessed by them (the celestials) all.

13. That god had really become much more powerful than all others in strength. Thereupon Shankara came to be celebrated under the title of Mahadeva from that time forward.

14. At this Mahadeva, who was armed with the bow and arrow, uttered these words; 'O celestials, mounted upon the car, I shall slaughter those enemies of yours in the field of battle.'

15. Do you all now behold my car, the bow and arrow, as also how I cast down to-day these antagonists upon the surface of the earth.

The celestials said :—

16. O Lord of the celestials, having taken up all forms of the three worlds, we will construct a car for you, that will be endued with immense energy.

17. Thereupon the foremost of the celestials began to construct that car, which was conceived to be a very gigantic cue and also that was, with great intelligence designed by Vishwakarman himself (the celestial artificer).

18. Then they prepared arrows for him, that were identical with Vishnu, Shoma and Hutasha. Agni became the staff of his arrow; and Shoma became its head. And, O ruler of earth, then again Vishnu constituted the point of that best of arrows.

19. Then they made his car to be the same as the goddess earth, that is adorned with garlands of magnificent towns and cities, and that is furnished with the mountains, forests and islands, and that contain-ed creatures, and also that is ornamented with innumerable ups and downs.

20. The Mandara mountain was made the axle of that car; and the great river (the Ganges) constituted its Jangha; and the different directions and the subsidiary points constituded its several ornaments.

21. The constellations constituted its shafts; and the Krita yuga constituted its yoke; and Vasuki, (the foremost of all snakes, constituted the Kuvara of that car.

22. Then the best of the celestials made the Apaskora and Adhistana of that car to be the same as the Himavat and the Vindhya mountains; and also made the Udaya and Asta mountains to be the wheels of that car.

23. The ocean, that was excellent abode of the Danavas, was made to be the other axle of the car; as also the body of the seven Rishis became the protectors of the wheels of that car.

24. The Ganga, the Saraswati, and the Sindhu, as well as the firmanent constituted the Dhara of that car; and the water (on the surface of the earth), as also all the other rivers became the Uparkaga of the car (the chains binding its several limbs).

25. The whole day and night, and several other divisions of time, namely the Kalas and Kushtas, as also the different seasons of the year constituted the Anakarsha of that car; and, again the most resplendent planets and stars constituted its Varatha (the wooden fences).

26. Virtue, profit, and desire, united together constituted its Trivena. And there the herbs, containing innumerable flowers and fruits, formed its rows of bells.

27. The Sun and the Moon, having been made equal, were constituted to be the two other wheels of that foremost and most excellent car. The day and the night were made to be the two auspicious wings on the right and left in that car.

28. The ten princes of elephants, headed by one, named Dhritarashtra, that were all very powerful, constituted the shafts of that car. The sky was made to be its yoke; and the clouds, known by the names of Somvartakas and Valuhakas, were made its leathern strings. And, again, the twilight hours, the Dhriti the Mèdha, the Sthiti, and the Shannati,

29. And the firmament, coverd over with the planets, constellations and stars, were made its variegated leathern covers. And the Lords of the worlds, that is, the lords of the celestials, the waters, the dead, and the riches, formed its horses.

30. Then also Kuluprishta, Nahusha, Tarkatuka and Dhananjaya, as also several other snakes became the chords for binding the manes of those horses.

31. The cardinal points and the subsidiary directions constituted the reins of those horses yoked to that car. The Vasatkara (the chief Vedic sound) formed the goad; and Gayatri formed the chord attacked to the goad.

32. The traces of the horses yoked to the car were made with the four auspicious days, namely the days of the full moon and new moon with portion of the previous days of the full moon and new moon by themselves. And the Pitris were made the hooks and pins.

33. The chords of that car were constituted by Action, Truth, Devotion and Profit. The mind was the situation upon which the car rested; and speech formed its tracks.

34. The beautiful flags of diverse colors undulated in the air; and both the lightening and the Indra's bow (the Rainbow) enlightened that resplendent car.

35. That entire year, which was formerly fixed in the sacrifice of that high-minded Ishana, now constituted the bow of the car; whereas Shavitri formed the high sounding bow-string.

36. A celestial coat of mail was constructed, that was adorned with the most valuable gems, and that was impenetrable, and that was most resplendent, and also that had arisen from the wheel of time.

37. That handsome mountain of gold, called the Meru, formed the flag staff; and the chords, that were ornamented with the lightning, became the banners of that car.

38. That car, being thus furnished with all its equipments, looked most resplendent like the blazing fire in the midst of the priests attending a sacrifice. The celestials also, after having looked at that excellently equipt car, became greatly astonished.

39. O Sire, the celestials, after having seen that the energies of the entire universe were united together in one place, informed that high-souled one (Brahman) that the car was ready.

40. O great monarch, O foremost of persons, when that best of cars was thus prepared by all the celestials with a view to crush down their antagonists (the Danavas).

41. Shankara then placed his celestial weapons upon the car; and, also having made the entire farmament to be his flag-staff, he placed his bull (the symbol of the Deity) upon it.

42. Then the rod of Brahman, the rod of Death, and the rod of Rudra, as also Fever formed the guards on the sides of that car, that were pointed towards all directions of the horizon.

43. The protectors of the car-wheels of that high-souled personage were the Athurvan and Angiras; and Rigveda, Shamaveda, and Purana stood at the front of that car.

44. All histories and the Yajurveda became the guards of the back of the car; and all divine speeches and the different branches of knowledge placed themselves on all sides of the car.

45. O king, the hymns and others, as also the principal Vedic sounds, namely, Vashatkara, stood round the car. And O monarch, the syallable Om, having placed at the front of it, became greatly handsome.

46. Then having made the year, looking exceedingly beautiful with the six seasons, to be his bow, he prepared the string with his own shadow, that was indestructible in the field of battle.

47. Indeed, that illustrious Rudra is the same as Death himself. The year was his bow; and accordingly the death-night, which was but the shade of Rudra himself, was constituted to be the indestructible string at that bow.

48. Vishnu, Agni (the god of fire), and Shoma formed the shaft of that bow. The entire universe is nothing but Agni and Shoma. The universe is also said to consist of Vishnu.

49. The soul of that illustrious and highly energetic Vava is identical with Vishnu. They (the Asuras), therefore, could not bear the touch o the bow-string of Hara (Vava).

50. Then the fiercely wrathful Lord cast his fire of anger upon that arrow, which anger was most irresistible, and also which had sprung from the very wrath of both Vrigu and Angiras, and which, again, was most intolerable

51. That dreadful God, dressed in skins, who was blue, red, and of smoke color, and who also resembled ten thousand suns in splendour, and who again was shrouded over with the flames of energy, and blazed forth most brightly.

52. Then that subduer of those, who can with difficulty be subdued, that victor, that slayer of the antagonists of Brahman, that universal protector, that slayer of persons, with whom rest both righteousness, and unrighteousness that One named Hara,

53. Then having been surrounded by innumerable beings, who were all very powerful to crush the enemies, and who were possessed of fierce prowess and dreadful appearances, and who, again, were fleet as the mind, and who, at last, were endued with the different (fourteen) physical faculties, illustrious Sthanu blazed forth with great splendour.

54. Then having taken refuge under the different phases of his body, this entire universe, both mobile and immobile, standing beside him, blazed forth and presented a very extraordinary appearance, O monarch,

55. Seeing that car furnished with all its equipments, he, coated himself with the armour, and armed with the bow, took up that celestial arrow sprung from the deities, Shoma, Vishnu, and Agni.

56. Thereupon, O monarch, O king, all the celestials ordered Wind, that foremost of the gods, to carry to that highly powerful Deity his pure and fragrant breeze.

57. Then having taken hold of the car, Mahadeva mounted upon it, thus trrifying even the very celestials; and therefrom he caused the whole earth to tremble with dread.

58. The great Ŕishis, the Gandharvas, the whole body of the celestials, as well as the different tribes of the Apsąras praised that Lord of the gods, when he was desirous to ascend the car.

59. Then the Lord was highly praised by the Brahmanical sages; and he was worshiped by the eulogists; as also he was pleased with the dance of numerous Apsaras, who were all very well-acquainted with the art of dancing.

60. Thereupon that beautiful boon-giver, who was excellently armed with the sword, arrow and bow, smilingly addressed the celestials saying—"Who will become my charioteer"?

61. The celestials replied him, saying—"O Lord of the gods, he will be your charioteer, whomever you will be pleased to appoint. There is no doubt about it."

62. Then the God, again, replied them (the celestials), saying, "Having meditated upon the matter yourselves without the least hesitation, do you appoint him as my charioteer, who will prove himself superior to myself."

63. Thereupon the celestials, after having listened to these speeches uttered by that high-souled God, and also having repaired to the Grandsire, propitiated him and said to him these words.

64. O "God, what instruction, imparted by you as regards the destruction of the antagonists of the celestials, was thoroughly acted up to by all of us. That Deity having the bovine bull for his symbol, was gratified with us.

65. Also a car had been constructed by us, that was furnished with the most beautiful and diverse kinds of weapons. But we do not know who will make the best charioteer in this foremost of cars.

66. In consequence thereof, do you appoint some such best of the celestials as the charioteer. O illustrious one, it is necessary for you to make good of that word said to us.

67. O illustrious one, you have said to us before to this effect that you would do us some good. Now it is necessary for you to fulfil that promise.

68. That most invincible and foremost of cars was constructed by us with the best parts of all the celestials in such a way that it was capable of routing our enemies; and that Deity, having Pinaka in his hand, was made the warrior to fight upon it. This One, having terrified the Danavas, is now ready for battle.

69. So also, the four Vedas have become the four horses, the best of their species, of that high-souled Deity; and the Earth, along with the numerous mountains, has become his car. The equipments of that car were the constellations. The warrior (who will fight from that car) is Hara. But who will be the charioteer, is still unfound.

70. For that car a charioteer is to be sought, who will prove himself a specialist amongst all these (celestials). O Lord, this car is constructed to such an importance, as also Hara is the warrior who will fight from it. O Grandsire, armours, along with the weapons and the bow, have already been obtained.

71. Save yourself, there exists no other charioteer, whom we can find out. O illustrious one, you are, indeed, attended with all accomplishments; and you are superior to all the celestials.

72. Having immediately mounted upon that car, do you guide the horses of the best species with the object of bringing about the victory of the celestials, and the destruction of their antagonists."

73. It has been heard by us that after bowing down with their heads to the Grand Sire, who is the lord of the three worlds, all the celestials began to appease him in order to appoint him as the charioteer (of that car).

The grand sire said :—

74. O dwellers of heaven, there is nothing like untruth in this speech uttered by you. While, indeed, Kapardin will engage in battle, I will surely hold the reins of his horses.

75. Thereupon that illustrious personage, that God, that creator of all creatures, the Grandsire was appointed to the charioteership of high-souled Ishana by the celestials.

76. Thus while he was immediately ascending that car, which was revered by all persons, those horses, that were as fleet as the wind, bowed down upon the ground with their heads.

77. Having mounted upon that car, the illustrious Grandsire, that God who blazed forth with the splendour of his own, then indeed took up the reins of the horses, as well as the goad.

78. Thereupon that illustrious God, after having lifted those horses, that resembled the wind in swiftness, they addressed the foremost of the celestials Sthanu saying "Do you ascend."

79. After this, Sthanu, after having taken up that shaft, which was born of Vishnu, Shoma and Agni, and then also having caused by his bow the numerous enemies to tremble, mounted upon that car.

80, The great Rishis, the Gandharvas, the whole of the celestials, as also large numbers of the Apsaras, uttered prayers to that Lord of the gods, who had already mounted upon that car.

81. That handsome personage, that giver of boons, that holder of the sword, arrow and bow, rested upon that car, and looked most resplendent with his own energy, shedding lustre upon the three worlds.

82. Thereupon the God once more addressed all the celestials, headed by Indra himself, saying—"Grief should never be felt by you considering that I shall not slaughter the Asuras.

83. Now do you understand that the Asuras have already been slaughtered by this arrow." Thereupon those gods considered it to be true; and uttered those words 'That they (Asuras) have been all slaughtered."

84. Then, indeed, those celestials, considering that the speech what the illustrious Lord had uttered could not be untrue, attained to the highest gratification.

85. Thereupon, O monarch, that lord of the celestials, riding upon that mighty car, which had no equal, proceeded on, having been encompassed by the whole lot of the celestials.

86. Then that highly famous God was worshipped by all his companions, as well as by others, who were dancing in his front, and who lived on meat, and who were invincible in battle and who also were running on all sides of that God, and who again shouted with joy at one another.

87. Thus the great Rishis, who were highly fortunate, and who were endued with ascetic merit and best qualities, as well as all the celestials, blessed in every way Mahadeva with success.

88. O foremost of persons, when that boon-giving Lord, who destroys the terrors of all creatures of the entire universe, was thus proceeding onwards; the whole universe, as also all the celestials became highly satisfied.

89. There the great Rishis began to praise that Lord of the celestials with numerous kinds of hymns; as also they were repeatedly increasing His energy and stood up there, O monarch.

91. While the Lord was proceeding; millions and millions of the Gandharvas began to play innumerable kinds of musical instruments.

91. Thereupon when the boon-giving Lord, after mounting upon the car, was advancing towards the Asuras, the Lord of the universe smilingly addressed him saying—"Most excellent! Most excellent!!

92. O Lord, do you advance to the spot where the Daityas are waiting. Being highly enlivened, do you urge the heroes.

Do you observe the strength of my arms to-day, while I will slaughter the antagonists in the field of battle."

93. Thereupon, O monarch, the Lord urged those horses, that were possessed of the fleetness of wind or mind, towards that triple city, which was excellently protected by both the Daityas and the Danavas.

94. Accompanied by those horses, that were highly revered by all the three worlds, and also that seemed to drink the skies by their speed, the Lord, endued with great lustre, started immediately with a view to secure victory for the denizens of heaven.

95. When Bhava, riding upon that car, proceeded towards that triple city, his bull (symbol of Bhava) uttered a very excellent and loud roar, filling thereby the different directions with the noise.

96. Having heard that dreadful and loud roar of his (Lord's) bull, there the descendants of Taraka, who were all the enemies of the celestials, attained to their destruction (died).

97. Then others also took their stations there in his front with the object of battle. Upon this Sthanu, O mighty monarch, that wielder of the trident, became senseless with rage.

98. All the creatures were filled with terror; and the three worlds began to tremble. And while he was aiming that shaft, numerous dreadful omens appeared there.

99. On account of the pressure of Shoma Agni, and Vishnu in that shaft and that caused by both Brahman and Rudra, as also of the great weight of that formidable bow, that car began to sink.

100. Thereupon Narayana came out of the pointed head of that arrow; and then having taken up the form of a bull, lifted up that huge car.

101. While, indeed, that car was going down, and the enemies were uttering loud roars, then the illustrious lord, who was possessed of immense prowess, made a very tremendous roar out of rage.

102. O giver of honors, while that illustrious lord Rudra was thus standing at the head of his bull, and on the back of his horses, then he beheld the city belonging to the Danavas.

103. O foremost of men, while Rudra was thus standing upon his bull and horses, then he severed the tents of his horses, and separated into two parts the hoofs of his bull.

104. May you be blessed; From that time forward the hoofs of all animals belonging to the bevine species came to be cloven (into two parts). O monarch, from that time also the teats of horses, that were highly oppressed by that most powerful Rudra, performing miraculous deeds, ceased to appear.

105. Then having filled his bow with the string, and also having aimed that arrow, and again having united his Pashupata weapon with that shaft, Hara reflected for a while that triple city.

106. O most powerful monarch, while Rudra was thus standing, grasping his bow, then by that time, those three cities became united together.

107. Thus when the three cities had come to be of similar character after having lost their individual features, there had taken place loud shouts of joy amongst the high-souled celestials.

108. Thereupon all the celestials, the Siddhas, and the high-class Rishis uttered the word, success, whilst thus praying Maheshwara.

109. Thereafter that triple city appeared just at the front of that slayer of the Asuras, that diety of dreadful and indescribable form, that god who was endued with energy that he bore with great difficulty.

110. Then that illustrious lord of the three worlds, after having stretched that celestial bow, shot that arrow, which was made of the essence of the three worlds, at that triple city.

111. O highly fortunate one, when that best of arrows was shot at the triple city, there had arisen loud wails of griefs as those three cities were trembling down upon the earth. Then having burnt those Assuras, he cast them down in the western ocean.

112. Thus three cities were burnt, and the Danavas were all destroyed by wrathful Maheshwara, who had wrought it having the desire for benefitting the three worlds.

113. That fire, springing from his own wrath, was soon quenched by the god, saying stop, stop. Then three-eyed deity addressed the fire, saying—O, do you reduce to ashes three worlds :—

114. Thereupon all the celestials, the entire universe, and the great Rishis, who had now attained to their natural conditions, began to gratify Sthanu, who is endued with unequalled prowess, with the most excellent speeches.

115. When their desires were all fulfilled by such great efforts; all the celestials, headed by the creater, having been permitted by that illustrions lord, went to their respective abodes, they came from.

116. Thus the illustrious god, that creator of the universe, that superior lord of the gods and the Assuras Maheshwara achieved good for all the worlds.

117. Even as the illustrious Brahman, the creator of the universe, the Grandsire, that supreme Being, that celestial one, acted as the charioteer of Rudra.

118. So do you hold immediately the reins of the horses, belonging to that high-souled son of Radha, like the Grandsire holding the reins of horses belonging to Rudra.

119. Chiefly you are, indeed, superior to Krishna, and to Karna, as well as to Phalguna. O foremost of monarch, there is no doubt about this.

120. In the field of battle, this one does really resemble Rudra; and in policy you resemble Brahman. In consequence of this you two, united together, are capable of vanquishing our enemies, who are like those Assuras.

121. O Shalya, even this should immediately be performed, by following which this Karna to-day, having crushed the son of Kunti, who possesses white horses, and has Krishna for his charioteer, should slaughter him.

122. The fate of Karna, our kingdom, and we ourselves, as well as our victory in the field, rest entirely upon you. Do you, therefore, hold the reins of the foremost of horses belonging to this warrior.

123. Do you listen to another story, which I will once more relate to you. This (story) a virtuous regenerate person told in the presence of my father.

124. O Shalya, having listened to that beatiful story, which is full of causes and consequences of actions, and also having settlled all, do this immediately. There should be made no doubt about this.

125. There was one, named Jamadagni, born in the race of Vrigu, and pratctising severe asceticism. He had a son, celebrated by the name of Rama, and who also was endued with energy and excellent qualities.

129. Having practised the most severe asceticism, that cheerful souled personage, who always observed strict vows, and who also had his soul under control, began to gratify Bhava in order to obtain weapon.

127. Mahadeva became highly gratified with him for his devotional performances and coolness of mind, and Shankara, becoming conscious of the object in his mind, showed himself to him.

Mahadeva said :—

128. O Rama, are you happy? I am exceedingly satisfied with you; and what you desire is known to me. Do you make your soul sanctified. You will obtain all your desire.

129. I will give you all these weapons, when you will become pure. For, O son of Vrigu, these weapons burn that person, who is incompetent and incapable.

130. The son of Jamadagni, having been thus addressed by the lord of the celestials, that wielder of the trident, replied to that lord, who was endued with a lofty soul, after bowing down his head to him.

131. When I worshiped you always, then you, the lord of the celestials, know it very well that I am competent to wield those weapons. So it is necessary for you to give me these weapons.

Duryodhana said :—

132. Thereupon he, by means of severe penances, by subduing his souls and by the observance of vows, as also by means of performing worship, offerings and sacrifices, followed by the performance of Homa, attended with the utterance of the Mantras, began to worship Bhava through many long years.

133. Then Mahadeva, who became highly gratified with that lofty minded descendant of Vrigu's race, enumerated the innumerable virtues of him just in the presence of his divine wife.

134. This Rama is always very devotional towards me, and is of firm vows. The lord, therefore, being thus satisfied with him, enumerated his several virtues in the presence of all the celestials and the Pitris, O slayer of enemies.

135. During this time, all the Daityas had really become very powerful. By them who were darkened with pride and senselessness, all the dwellers of heaven were greatly oppressed.

136. Thereupon all the celestials, having united together, were determined upon to slaughter them; and also made attempts to bring about the destruction of these antagonists. But they, however, were incapable of vanquishing them.

137. Thereupon that god Shankara, after haviug promised all the celestials the destruction of their enemies, and also having called Rama, that descendent of Vrigu's race before him, addressed him in the following language.

Rudra said :—

138. O descendant of Vrigu race, do you slaughter all the antagonists of the celestials, who have assembled here, out of desire for benefiting all the worlds, as also for the satisfaction of myself. Being thus addressed, he (Vargava) replied to that boon-giving and three-eyed Lord.

Rama said :—

136. O Lord of the celestials, what might have I got, who am quite unfit for the management of all weapons, that I may slaughter all the Danavas, who are very well-acquainted with the use of weapons, as also who are most invincible in the field of battle.

Maheshwara said :—

140 Being commanded by me, do you start at once. You will slaughter these enemies. Having thus subdued all these enemies, you will surely gain innumerable excellent virtues.

141. Hearing these words, and also accepting them in all ways, Rama performed all the propitiatory ceremonies; as also he advanced against the Danavas.

142. Then he addressed those enemies of the celestials, who were possessed of insensibility, pride and enormous strength, saying—"[most invincible in battle as you are, O Daityyas, do you give me battle.

143. I had been sent by the lord ot the celestials to subdue the mighty Asuras." Having been thus addressed by that descendent of Vrigu's race, all the Daityas began to fight with him (Vargava).

144. Then that descendant of Vrigu's race, that delighter of the race of Vrigu, after having slaughtered those Daityas in the field of battle by means of strokes, that were like the touches of the thunder belonging to Indra,

145. Was greatly wounded in the body by the Danavas. But thereafter that son of Jamadagni, that foremost of regenerate persons, being immediately touched by Sthanu, became wholly freed from these wounds.

146. Thereupon the illustrious lord, being gratified by that deed of his, gave to that high-souled descendant of Vrigu's race various kinds of boons.

147. He was then addressed by that lord of the celestials, that wielder of the trident, who became highly gratified with him in the following way.

148. The wounds, caused upon your body by the falling of innumerable weapons testify to the superhuman act performed by you. O delighter of Vrigu's race, do you, therefore, accept these numerous celestial weapons from me, according to your desire.

Duryodhana said :—

149. Thereupon, having obtained all the diverse kinds of weapons and boons desired in his heart, Rama performed the ceremony of bowing down his head to Shiva.

150. Thus having recieved the command from the lord of the celestials, that great devotee went away. This is the old story, which then the Rishi narrated (to my father).

151. O foremost of persons, the son of Vrigu handed over all that knowledge of archery to the high-souled Karna, being gratified in his inner heart.

152. O ruler of earth, if Karna had the slightest fault, in that case the descendant of Vrigu's race would not have given him these celestial weapons.

153. I do not think that Karna was ever born in the family of a charioteer. Rather I think that he is the son of a god, or he is come of the race of the Kshatriyas.

154. My opinion is that he was abandoned (in his infancy), lest his race be ascertained. O Shalya, this one, namely Karna, is, indeed, by no means born of the family of a charioteer.

155. This mighty car-warrior resembling the very Sun, is furnished with the (natural) ear-rings, armour, and long arms; could is be possible that the she deer had given birth to a tiger;

156. Indeed, his two arms are very massive; and they are like the trunk of the prince of elephants. Do you behold his broad chest, which is powerful enough to resist all sorts of enemies.

157. O monarch, this Karna, the son of Vikartana, can never be an ordinary individual. O lord of kings, this high-souled disciple of Rama is really a very powerful warrior.

Thus ends the thirty-fourth chapter, the history of destruction of the triple city belonging to the Asuras in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Duryodhana said :—

1. Thus that illustrious god, Brahman, that Grandsire of all the worlds, acted as the charioteer on that occasion ; while Rudra acted as the car-warrior.

2. That hero, who is superior to the warrior on the car, should be made to act as the charioteer. You do, therefore, hold the reins of the horses in the field of battle, O foremost of persons.

3. Even as, on that occasion, the Grandsire was elected by all the celestials with great care, so you, who are superior to Karna, are selected with great care by us.

4. As he (Gradsire), O great monarch, was chosen as one superior to the lord (Shankara) by all the celestials, even so do you immediately restrain the horses of Rudra.

Shalya said :—

5. O best of persons, this celestial and most extraordinary history regarding those two foremost of immortals, narrated several times, was heard by me also.

6. O descendant of the Bharata race, I have also heard how the great Grandsire acted as the charioteer of Bhava, and how the Asuras were all slaughtered with a single arrow.

7. All this, namely how the Grandsire, that illustrious one, acted as the charioteer on that occasion, had fully been known to Krishna beforehand. Again, Krishna knows very well in all their details what had already taken place, and what will take place hereafter.

8. O descendant of the Bharata race, knowing the import of all this, Krishna took up the charioteership of the son of Pritha, even as the Self-create One took up the charioteer-ship of Rudra.

9. If it be possible that the son of charioteer (Karna) should ever slay the son of Kunti, beholding the son of Pritha slaughtered, Keshava himself will surely engage in battle. And that holder of the conch, the discus, and the mace will destroy your whole race.

10. There exists no king in our whole army, who will be able to stand in the front of that high-souled descendant of Vrishni's race, when he will be filled with wrath.

Sanjaya said :—

11. Your son, who was a chastiser of enemies, and who was endued with mighty arms, and who also had a very cheerful heart, now replied to the king of the Madras, who was speaking in such a tone.

12. In the field of battle, O mighty-armed warrior, you do not under-mine the value of Karna, the son of Vikartana, who is most supreme of all that are versed in the management of arms, and who, again, has crossed the great ocean of all Shastras.

13. Hearing the most tremendous and very high twang of his bow-string and the sound of his palms, even the troops of the Pandavas run away in different directions.

14. O mighty-armed heroe, you have witnessed it with your own eyes, and Ghatotkacha, who dreamed innumerable dreams, was slain by (Karna) in that night with several other illusions before him.

15. Having been encompassed with very great terrors during all these days, Vibhatsu could never stay in the ranks facing against him (Karna).

16. Then, O monarch, the very powerful Bhimasena, who was hemmed in on all sides by the horns of the bow (belonging to Karna), was addressed in these terms namely Fool and Glutton.

17. So also, O sire, the two war-like sons of Madri, having been first vanquished by him in that dreadful battle, were not slain by him in the field having some motive in view.

18. By him (Karna) also that most heroic warrior of the Vrishni race, that chief of the Satwata clan, Satyaki, who was a mighty warrior, was vanquished in the battle; as also he was deprived of his car.

19. And several other heroes, namely all the Srinjayas, who were headed by Dhrishtadyumna, were often and often vanquished in the field by him, who felt the greatest ease in the battle.

20. How will it be possible then that the Pandavas will defeat that great car-warrior in the field of battle, who, when enraged, can slaughter even Purandara, that wielder of the thunder bolt, in battle.

21. O heroic warrior, you are wel versed in diverse kinds of weapons, andl you have crossed over the ocean of all branches of knowledge. And there exists none else in this world, who is equal to you in the strength of arms.

22. O monarch, you are made up of shafts; and you are invincible in respect to your antagonists in prowess. O slayer of enemies, you are, therefore, called Shalya (shaft).

23. All the warriors of the Shatwata race are not able to stand, encountering the strength of your arms. O monarch, is the highly powerful Krishna superior to you in the strength of your arms?

24. Even as, indeed, the whole force (belonging to the Pandavas) is supported by Krishna upon the fall of Phalguna, so should this vast army (of the Kurus) be supported by you upon the death of Karna.

25. O sire, for what reason should Vasudeva restrain your forces in the field of battle; and for what reason also you will not slaughter the hostile army.

26. Now, O sire, for your sake I wish to go in the way in this field of battle, that had already been trodden by my heroic brothers (slain), as well as by all the rulers of the earth.

Shalya said :—

27. O son of Gandhari, O bestower of honors, when you describe me in the presence of your troops to be superior to the son of Devaki I am highly satisfied with you.

28. O hero, even as you desire, so now I accept the charioteer-ship of that highly illustrious son of Radha, while he will engage in fight with that foremost one of the sons of Pandu.

29. But O warlike one, I must have a condition in respect to the son of Vikartana, namely that I may be allowed to utter any words, I like, in his presence.

Sanjaya said :—

30. Then, O monarch, O sire, your son, attended by Karna, addressed the king of the Madras, in the presence of all the Kshatriyas, saying—So be it.

31. Having been thus assured by Shalya's accepting the office of charioteer-ship (of Karna), Duryodhana, being highly gratified, embraced Karna.

32. Morever your son, being greatly praised (by the bands around him), addressed Karna, saying—do you slaughter all the sons of Pritha in the field of battle, even as Mahendra (Indra) slaughtered all the Danavas in the battle of old.

33. When the driver-ship of his horses was accepted by Shalya, Karna became highly gratified, and once more addressed Duryodhana, saying.

34. Indeed, this king of the Madras does not say this in a cheerful spirit. Therefore, O monarch, do you request him once more (for the charioteership) in sweeter words.

35. Thereupon king Duryodhana, who was very learned, and versed in all objects, and who also was possessed of great strength, once more addressed that ruler of earth, Shalya, the chief of the Madras, in a voice as deep as the rumbling of the clouds, filling the whole region with the echo of his voice.

36. O Shalya, Karna thinks that he should fight with Arjuna to-day. So you, O foremost of men, restrain his horses in the field of battle.

37. Karna is most willing to slaughter Phalguna (Arjuna), after having slain all the other heroes inferior to him. In consequence of this, O monarch, I repeatedly entreat you to hold the reins of his horses.

38. Even as Krishna, that foremost one amogst all the charioteers, is the adviser of the son of Pritha, so you would support the son of Radha in all ways.

Sanjaya said :—

39. Thereupon shalya, that king of the Madras, being highly gratified, after having embraced your son, Duryodhana, that slayer of enemies, addressed him, saying.

Shalya said :—

40. O monarch, O son of Gandhari, O handsome-looking one, if you so desire, I will perform all that you consider to be dear to you.

41. O foremost of the Bharata race, for whatever acts I am competent, there I will engage myself with the whole of my heart; and I will bear the burden of all your acts.

42. Whatever, either agreeable or disagreeable, I will order to Karna, who are willing to do you good, for all that you, as well as Karna, should excuse me in every way.

Karna said :—

43. Even as Brahma is to Ishana, or as Keshava is to the son of Pritha, so you, O king of the Madras, should ever be engaged in rendering us good.

Shalya said :—

44. The most respectable personages believe in these four different ways, which are enumerated thus: self-blame, or self-praise, and speaking ill or well of others.

45. O wise one, whatever I will speak with a view to draw out your confidence, all that is full of self-praise. Be what it may, do you listen to it properly.

46. O illustrious one, I am, like Matali, competent to act as the charioteer of Indra.

And careful as I am, I am also versed in the management of horses, as, again, I am acquainted with all sorts of knowledge and learning, conscious of the means of avoiding all future dangers.

47. Then, O sinless one, I will drive your horses, whilst you will be engaged in battle with the son of Pritha in the field. O son of a charioteer, be you free from all anxieties and troubles.

Thus ends the thirty-fifth chapter, Shalya's accepting the charioteership of Karna, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. O Karna, this king of Madra, superior even to Krishna, will act as your driver, like Matali, the driver of the king of gods.

2. As Matali manages his car drawn by the horse of Hari so will Salya manage today your car and horses.

3. With you as the warrior on that car and the king of Madra as the charioteer it will,, forsooth, defeat the Parthas in battle.

anjaya said :—

4. Thereupon again in the morning Duryodhana addressed the active king of Madra in the battle field saying :—

5. O king of Madra, manage in battle the excellent horses of Karna. Protected by you Karna will defeat Arjuna. Thus addressed he expressed his consent and got upon the chariot, O Bharata.

6. When Salya went there, Karna, in good spirits, addressed his driver saying, O charioteer, quickly equip' this car for me.

7. Having duly equipped that victorious car the best of its kind, which resembled the city of Gandarvas Salya presented it to Karna, saying "May good betide you and may you come off victorious !"

8—9. Duly worshipping that car which had formerly been sanctified by a priest conversant with Brahma,going round it and worshipping the sun, Karna, the foremost of car-warriors, addressed the king of Madra, standing near him, saying "get upon the chariot."

10. Then like a lion ascending a hill the highly energetic Salya got upon the strong built car of Karna,

11. Beholding Salya stationed there Karna got upon his most excellent car like the sun riding on a mass of clouds charged with lightning.

12. Seated on the same car those two horses, effulgent like the sun and fire, shone there like the sun and fire sitting together on a cloud in the sky.

13. Eulogised those two highly effulgent heroes shone like Indra and Agni (fire-god) adored with hymns in a sacrifice by Ritwikâs and Sadasyas.

14. Salya holding the reins of the horses Karna stood on that car stretching his dreadful bow like the sun enveloped with a circular light.

15. Stationed on that best of cars Karna, the foremost of men, with the rays of his shafts, looked like the sun on the mount Mandara.

16. Duryodhana invited to battle that mighty armed son of Radha of incomparable energy stationed on the car saying,

17. O hero, O car-warrior, do you perform in the presence of all bond men an action, hard of accomplishment which had not been performed even by Bhishma and Drona.

18. I had always thought that those two mighty car-warriors Bhishma and Drona would kill, without any doubt, Bhima and Arjuna.

19. Like the second wielder of thunderbolt do you accomplish that heroic feat in the great battle which had not been performed by them.

20. Either attack the pious Yudhisthira or kill Arjuna and Bhima, O son of Radha, and the twin sons of Madri.

21. Many blessings and victory attend you. Start for battle, O foremost of men, consume the army of the Pandavas.

22. Ten thousands of trumpets and ten thousand drums were simultaneously struck and produced a sound resembling the muttering of clouds in the sky.

23. Accepting his words that foremost of car-warriors, the son of Radha stationed on the car, said to Salya, an expert in fighting.

24. Drive the horses on, O great heroe so that I may kill Arjuna, Bhima, the twins and Yudhishthira.

25. O Salya, Arjuna will witness to day the strength of my arms when I will discharge hundreds and thousands of Kanka feathere arrows.

26. I will shoot to-day, O Salya, powerful arrows for destroying the Pandavas and securing victory for Duryodhana.

Salya said :—

27. O son of a charioteer, why do you make light of the sons of Pandu who are all very powerful, great bow men and experts in the use of other weapons.

28. They never retreat from battle, fortunate, unconquerable and are of great prowess. They are capable of striking fear even into the heart of Indra himself.

29. O son of Radha, when you will hear the twang of his Gandiva bow in battle like the peal of the thunder itself you will not give vent to such words.

30—31. When you will see Yudhishthira and the twins making a canopy with their sharpened shafts like that of clouds in the sky and other irrepresible kings all light-handed, shooting arrows reducing the number of their enemies you will not speak such words.

32. Disregarding the words spoken by the king of Madra Karna said to him who was greatly active "go on"

Thus ends the thirty-sixth chapter, the conversation between Karna and Salya in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Beholding the great bowmen Karna stationed for battle all the Kurus began to utter loud cries of joy from all sides.

2. Thereupon with the beatings of cymbals and drums, the sound of all sorts of weapons and the war-cries of the greatly active heroes all your soldiers proceeded to the battle-field, making death the final point of stoppage.

3. When Karna went all the soldiers, were filled with joy. The earth, O king, trembled and created a loud noise.

4. All the great planets including the sun seemed moving about. And the meteors were seen blazing up all the quarters.

5. Cloudless thunders fell and fierce winds blew.

6. A large number of animals and birds kept to the right of your army and emitted noise foreboding a dreadful calamity.

7. After the departure of Karna his horses trembled down on earth. And a dreadful shower of bones fell from the sky.

8. O king, their weapons were as if burning and the flags were trembling. And the horses shed tears.

9. Those and other dreadful portends appeared there presaging the destruction of the Kauravas. Stupified by Destiny they paid no attention to them.

10. Seeing the departure of the chariot teer's son all the kings cried out victory. The Kouravas then thought that the Pandavas had been defeated.

11. The king Vikartana, the subduer of hostile heroes and the foremost of car-warriors, stood on the car, thinking of the death of Bhishma and Drona. He shone there like the sun or fire.

12. Thinking of the powerful feats of Arjuna, elated with self conceit and pride, worked up with anger and breathing hot and hard, said to Salya.

13. When I am with my bow I do not fear even the angry Mahendra with thunderbolt in his hand. Beholding Bhishma and other leading heroes lying on the battle field I do not feel the least anxiety.

14. Seeing the immaculate Bhishma and Drona equal to Indra and Vishnu, the grinders of the best of cars, elephants and horses and who are not to be killed by any, slain by the enemy I do not feel any fear in battle today.

15. Well-versed in the use of powerful weapons and himself the foremost of Brahmanas why did not the preceptor kill in battle all the enemies who killed the most powerful of our heroe with their drivers, elephants and chariots.?

16. Listen to me, O Karna, I tell you the truth, thinking of this Drona in battle that there is none amongst you excepting myself who can withstand the advancing Arjuna the heroes who resembled the most dreadful Regent of Death.

17. In Drona were skill, practice, strength, patience, the greatest of weapons and policy. While that high-souled one has come by death I think all others, shorn of strength, on the point of death.

18. Even on reflection I do not find any thing permanent in this world on account of the eternal connection of acts. When the preceptor himself is no more who can expect that he will surely live till even today's sun-rise.

19. While preceptor has been slain in battle by the enemies, weapons, strength, prowess, actions and wise policy cannot forsooth conduce to the happiness of a man,

20. In energy Drona equalled the sun or fire; in prowess he was like Vishnu or Indra, in policy he was like Vrihashpati or Ushanas; invincible though he was even weapons could not protect him.

21. Our women and children are weeping and bewailing, the manliness of the sons of Dretarashtra has been defeated. I know therefore, O Salya, that it is I who am to fight; proceed therefore against the array of our enemies.

22. Save me who can withstand the army in the midst of which is the truthful Pandava king Bhimasena, Arjuna, Vasudeva, Satyaki, Srinjaya and the twins.

23. Therefore, O king of Madra, move on quickly in this battle towards the Panchalas, Pandavas and Srinjayas. Encountering them either I will kill them or will myself go to the abode of death by the road followed by Drona.

24. Do not think, O Salya, that I will not enter into the heart of their army. I cannot tolerate such dissensions amongst the kith and kin. I will even follow Drona, renouncing my life.

25. A wise man or an ignorant person, none can escape death, when the lease of his life expires. Therefore, O learned one. I shall proceed against Partha. I cannot transgress my destiny.

26. O king, the son of Chitravirya's son always does me good. For the accomplishment of his object I will give up this dear life which it is so very difficult to renounce.

27. Rama conferred upon me this best of cars covered with tiger-skins, with axle producing no sound, equipped with a golden seat, having a trivenu made of silver and drawn by best of horses.

28. Behold, O Salya, these beautiful bows, these flags, these maces, these dreadful arrows, this shining sword, this powerful weapon, this white conch of dreadful and loud blare.

29. Mounted upon this chariot with banners, its wheels producing a sound like that of a thunderbolt drawn by white horses and adorned with beautiful quivers I shall, with all my might, destroy that best of car-warriors, Arjuna.

30. Even if death himself, the destroyer of all, protects vigilantly the son of Pandu, in battle I will either kill him or go myself to the abode of death following Bhishma.

31. If Yama, Varuna, Kuvera, and Vasava with all their followers come here and unitedly protect the son of Pandu in battle, I will even then defeat him with them all. What is the use of speaking more?

Sanjaya said :—

32. Hearing those words of Karna who was delighted at the prospect of the battle, the powerful king of Madras laughed at him and said the following to check him.

33. Do not brag thus, do not brag thus, O Karna; you are so much transported with joy that you are speaking what you should not do. Who is that Dhananjaya, the best of men, and who again are you the vilest of men?

34. Who else save him the foremost of men (Arjuna) could carry away by force the younger sister of Keshava, having made a confusion in the capital of Yadus that was protected by the younger brother of Indra and that resembled the celestial region protected by the king of gods.

35. Who else save, Arjuna, powerful like the king of gods, could on the occasion of a quarrel brought about by the slaughter of an animal, summon Bhaba, the lord of lords, the creator of the worlds, to battle?

26. To honor the god of fire Jaya, (Arjuna) vanquished the Asuras, gods, great snakes, men, birds, Pishacas, Yakshas and Rakshasas with his arrow and gave him the food he wanted.

37. Do you remember, O Karna, the occasion when killing the large unmber of enemies with this arrows effulgent like the sun Arjuna liberated the son of Dhritarashtra himself among the Kurus?

38. Do you remember the occasion when you yourself were the first to take to your heels and the Pandavas, having defeated the Gandharvas headed by Chitraratha, liberated the quarrelsome sons of Dhritarashtra?

39. When Virata's kine were siezed by them, the Kauravas, overwhelming in number both as regards men and animals and having the preceptor, the preceptor's son and Bhishma amongst them, were defeated by that foremost of men. Why did you not defeat Arjuna then?

40. Another battle has presented itself to-day for your destruction. If you do not fly from the battle in fear of your enemies you will be killed, O charioteer's son, as soon as you will go to the battle.

Sanjaya said :—

41. When the king of Madra was thus, in all sincerity, addressing these harsh words to him and singing the glories of his enemy, that slayer of foes, the commander of the Kuru army, excited with anger, said.

Karna said :—

42. Let it be so. Why do you praise Arjuna so much. A battle will soon take place between him and me. If he defeats me in battle then thine praises will be considered as well said.

Sanjaya said :—

43—44. The king of Madra said 'let it be so,' and gave no reply, when Karna desirous of fighting, said to Salya 'go'. Then that car-warrior, having white horses and Salya as his driver, dashed against his enemies killing a number of enemies in battle like the sun destroying darkness.

45. Then in that car covered with tiger-skins and white horses yoked to it, Karna went on cheerfully. And seeing the armies of the Pandavas he immediately enquired after Arjuna.

Thus ends the thirty-seventh chapter, the conversation between Karna and Salya on the eve of the battle in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After Karna, gladdening your army, had started for battle he addressed to every Pandava soldier he met with these harsh words.

2. I shall give him whatever riches he will want who will point out to me to-day the high-souled (Arjuna) of white horses.

3. I shall further more confer upon him, if he is not satisfied, a cart-load of jewels who will tell me where Dhananjaya is.

4. If the person who will point out Arjuna be not contented with it, I shall give him a hundred kine with an equal number of brass vessels for milching them.

5. I will confer one hundred prosperous villages upon the man who will find out Arjuna for me. I will also give him who will point out Arjuna a number of damsels having long tresses and black eyes and a car drawn by white mules.

6. If the person, who will point out Arjuna, be not contented with it I shall give him another best of cars made of gold and drawn by six bulls as large as elephants.

7. I shall furthermore confer upon him one hundred well-adorned females wearing golden necklaces, fair and accomplished in singing and dancing.

8—9. If the person, who will point out Arjuna, be not contented with it I shall give him a hundred elephants, a hundred villages, a hundred cars, ten thousand horses of most superior breed, fat, docile, gifted with other qualities, capable of dragging cars and well-trained.

10. I shall also give the person who will point out Arjuna four hundred kine, each with golden horns and her calf.

11—12. If the person, who will find out Arjuna for me, be not satisfied with it I shall give him a more valuable present, namely five hundred horses—with gold-trappings and jewelled ornaments. I shall also give him eighteen other tame horses.

13. I shall give him, who will point out Arjuna to me, a golden car adorned with various ornaments and drawn by best Kamvoja horses.

14. I shall give him who will find out Keshava and Arjuna all the riches that will be left by them after slaying these two.

15. Having expressed himself thus in the battle Karna blew his excellent conch sea-born and making sweet blare.

16. Hearing the words of the charioteer's son, which seemed proper to him, the great king Duryodhana, with all his followers, became filled with delight.

17—18. Then there arose in the midst of the army, O king, O foremost of men, the beat of cymbals and drums, leonine roars of the elephants and the sounds of the various musical instruments as well as war-cries of the heroes filled with joy.

19. When the Kuru army was thus filled with joy the king of Madra said in derision the following words to the subduer of foes, the son of Radha, the powerful car-warrior who was thus bragging and about to plunge himself into that ocean of battle.

Thus ends the thirty-eighth chapter, Karna offering to give rewards, in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Salya said :—

1. O son of a charioteer, give away to any man a golden car with six bulls as large as the elephants you will see Dhananjaya to-day.

2. Foolishly you are giving away your wealth as if you are Vaisravana, the king of riches. Without any trouble, O son of Radha, you will see Dhananjaya to-day.

3. You are giving away your riches as if they are nothing like a highly ignorant man. You do not out of ignorance percieve the demerit attached to gifts made to unworthy persons.

4. You may perform many Yajnas with the immense wealth that you are thus distributing. Therefore, O charioteer's son, do you perform Yajnas.

5. But vain is the desire that you cherish out of folly, for destroying Krishna and Arjuna. We have never heard of a couple of lions overthrown by a fox.

6. You seek what you should never do. You have no such friends as will prevent you from immediately falling into fire.

7. You are unable to distinguish between what you should do and should not. Forsooth, the lease of your life has run out. What man, desirous of living, would give vent to such incoherent words unworthy of being listened to.

8. This your attempt is like that of a person, who, having tied round his neck a heavy stone, wishes to cross the ocean with his two arms or like that of a man who wishes to leap down from the summit of a mountain.

9. If you wish to secure your well-being, fight with Dhananjaya from the division of your own army well protected and aided by your warriors.

10. I tell yau this for the well-being of Duryodhana and not out of any ill will for you. If you wish to preserve your life obey my words.

Karna said :—

11. Depending on the strength of my own arms I wish to meet Arjuna in battle. You are an enemy with the look of a friend and wish to frighten me.

12. No one will be able to make me change this resolution, not even Indra taking up his thunderbolt, what to speak of an insignificant mortal ?

Sanjaya said :—

13. After Karna had had his say, Salya the king of Madra, with a view to provoke him greatly, said in reply.

14. When keen edged and Kanka feathered arrows, shot off his bow by the powerful Phalguna with all his energy, will come upon you, you will repent for your encounter with that heroe.

15. When Partha, otherwise called Savyasachin, taking up his celestial bow, will scorch the Kuru army and assail you greatly with his keen edged arrows then O charioteer's son, you will repent for your folly.

16. Like a child, on mother,s lap seeking to catch hold of the sun, you, out of your folly, wish to defeat the effulgent Arjuna stationed on his car.

17. By desiring to fight, O Karna, to-day with Arjuna of illustrious feats, you have addressed yourself to rule your body against the keen edges of a trident.

18. O charioteer's son, your challange of Arjuna is like that of an over active little deer against a huge angry lion.

19. O charioteer's son, do not challenge that highly energetic prince like a fox, gratified with meat, challenging a lion. Do not be slain by encountering Arjuna.

20. O Karna, your challenge of Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, is like that of a hare challenging a powerful elephant with tusks large as plough-shares and with temporal juice trickling out of its mouth and temples.

21. By wishing to fight with Partha you are, out of folly, striking with a piece of wood the black cobra of deadly venom furiously excited within its hole.

22. You are a fool to yell at Arjuna, the best of men, disregarding him like a jackal yelling at an excited lion.

23. As a snake, for its own destruction, encounters the best of birds Garuda, highly active and of beautiful feathers, so do you O Karna, challange Dhananjaya the son of Pritha.

24. You wish to cross, without a raft at the rise of the moon, the ocean, the receptacle of all waters with dreadful huge waves and teeming with acquatic animals.

25. O Karna, your challenge of Dhananjaya is like that of a calf against a fearful bull of sharpened horns and with a neck thick as a drum.

26. Your roaring at Arjuna, the deity of clouds among men, is like that of a frog at a dreadful huge cloud discharging copious showers of rain.

27. Like a dog barking from within his master's house at a forest-ranging tiger you bark at Dhananjaya, the foremost of men.

28. While living in the forest in the midst of hares a jackal, O Karna, considers himself a lion till he actually sees the latter.

29. So do you, O son of Radha, consider yourself a lion for you do not see that subduer of foes, that foremast of men, Dhananjaya.

30. You consider yourself a lion for you have not seen Krishna and Arjuna stationed on the same car like the sun and moon.

31. As long as you do not hear the twang of Gandiva in battle, so long you are able to do what you please.

32. Beholding the ten quarters filled with the sound of his car and the twang of his bow, and him roaring like a tiger you will become a jackal.

33. You are always a jackal and Dhananjaya always a lion. On account of your envy and hatred for heroes, you appear like a jackal.

34. As a mouse and a cat are to each other in strength, or a fox and a lion or a hare and an elephant, as falsehood and truth, ambrosia and poison so you and Partha are known to all by your respective deeds.

Thus ends the thirty-ninth chapter Salya reviling Karna in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Thus reviled by Salya of incomparable energy the son of Radha understanding the meaning of the word Salya by his words said to him in great anger.

Karna said:—

2. O Salya, the meritorious only appreciate the merits of those who possess them, and not one who has none. You are destitute of all merits. How can you understand what is merit and what is demerit.

3. O Salya, I know the powerful weapons of Arjuna, his anger, energy, bow, arrows and as well as the prowess of that high-souled one.

4. O Salya, you do not know, so well as I do, the greatness of Krishna, the foremost of kings.

5. Knowing my own strength as well as that of Pandava I have challenged him in battle, O Salya. I shall not fall into fire like an insect.

6. I have this arrow, O Salya, keen edged, blood-drinking, occupying alone one quiver, furnished with wings, well-steeped in oil and well-adorned.

7. It lies in sandal dust and is being adored by me from a long time. Having the shape and nature of a serpent it is poisonous and dreadful and capable of killing a great many men, horses and elephants.

8. Highly dreadful in form it can go through coats of mail and bones. When worked up with anger I can perforate with it even the huge Meru mountain.

9. I will not discharge this arrow at any other person excepting Arjuna or Krishna, the son of Devaki. Listen, I tell you the truth.

10. Worked up with anger, I shall with that arrow, O Salya, fight with Vasudeva and Dhananjaya. That will be a deed becoming me.

11. Of all the heroes of the Vrishni race in Krishna only prosperity exists eternally. Of all the sons of Pandu, Partha is the one who comes off invariably victorious.

12. Those two foremost of men, seated on the same car, will encounter me single in battle. you will, O Salya, witness to-day the nobility of my birth.

13. You will see that (with one shaft) I will kill those two cousins, one of whom is the son of the aunt and the other the son of the maternal uncle—those two invincible warriors. They will look like two pearls strung together in the same string.

14. The Gandiva of Arjuna, the discus of Krishna and their two banners having the emblems of a monkey and Garuda strike terror into the timid. But they are sources of delight to me.

15. You are a fool, a bad character and do not know the mode of a true war-fare. Possessed by fear you are giving vent to these ravings.

16. Or you are praising them for some thing which is not known to me. Having killed those two first I shall kill you to-day with all your relatives.

17. Born in a sinful country you are wicked, mean and a wretch of a Kshatrya. Being a friend why do you frighten me with (the praises of) those two Krishnas?

18. Either they will kill me today or I will kill them both. I know my strength well and I do not fear the two Krishnas.

19. I will kill single handed a thousand Vasudevas and hundreds of Phalgunas. Hold your tongue, O you born in a sinful country.

20—21. Hear from me, O Salya, the sayings that have already passed into proverbs, that men young and old and women, persons while sporting utter as if they are their studies about the wicked Madrakas. The Brahmanas also recounted them formerly in the courts of kings. Hearing them, O fool, you may forgive or give a reply.

22. Madraka is always a hater of friends. He who hates us is a Madraka. There is no good feeling in a Madrka who is the vilest of men and gives vent to mean words.

23. The Madraka is always wicked, untruthful and crooked. We have heard that the Madrakas are wicked till the hour of their death.

24.—25. Amongst them the father, the son, the mother, the mother-in-law, the father-in-law, the maternal uncle, the son-in-law, the daughter-in-law, the brother, the grandson, other relations and guests, slaves, male and female mingle together. Thus women freely mix with men, known and unknown.

26. Dishonest as they are they live upon fried and powdered corn and fish in their homes and laugh and cry being drunk; they also eat beef.

27. They sing unconnected songs and move about lustfully. They indulge in free speeches amongst themselves. How can virtue find a room among them?

28. No one should make friends with a Madraka or enter into hostilities with him. There is no feeling of friendship in him. The Madraka is always impure,

29. Friendship is lost on a Madraka as purity in Ghandarakas and as oblation offered in a sacrifice where the king is both the sacrificer and the priest.

30. As a Brahmana performing the initiation ceremony of a Sudra meets with deterioration, as one who hates a Brahmana, meets with deterioration so a person, forming alliance with a Madraka, is deteriorated.

31. As there is no friendship in a Madraka, so is your poison is powerless, O Scorpion; with this Mantra of Atharvan I have duly performed the ceremony of peace.

32. It is seen that with these words the wise treat a person bitten by a scorpion and affected by its poison.

33. Thinking of this, O learned one, either hold your tongue or hear something more that I will say.

34. (The Madraka) women, influenced by liquor, throw off their robes and dance; they do not observe control in intercourse and do whatever they like.

35—36. Being the son of one of those women, how can you, O Madraka, dictate duties unto a man? Being the son of one of those women who live and answer calls of nature like camels and asses, sinful and shameless as they are, how can you wish to dictate the duties of men?

37. When a Madraka woman is requested to give a little bit of vinegar she scratches her hips and reluctant to give it gives vent to harsh words.

38. "Let no one ask of me vinegar which is so dear to me. I would give him my son, I would give him my husband but I would not part with my vinegar.

39. The Madraka maidens, I am informed, are generally shameless, have profuse hairs, are gluttonous and impure.

40. These and such like many other things of their evil acts beginning with the tip of their hair to that of their nails I can recount.

41. The Madrakas and Sindhu Souviras are born in a sinful country, are Melechas and innocent of duties. How can they know them?

42. We have heard that this is the prime duty of the Kshatriyas that when slain in battle he would lie down on earth being spoken highly of by the pious.

43. This is my first resolution, desirous of heaven after my death as I am that I will lay down my life in this clash of arms.

44. I am the dear friend of the intelligent son of Dhritarashtra. For him are my vital airs and the wealth that I possess.

45. As for you, born as you are in a sinful country it is clear that you have been bribed by the Pandavas as because you behave towards us in every thing like an enemy.

46. As a pious man is not to be easily pursuaded by atheists so I am not to be dissuaded from this battle by hundreds of persons like you.

47. Like a deer perspiring, you may either bewail or pant; observant of the duties of a Kshatriya I am incapable of being frightened by you.

48. I remember the end, described to me formerly by my preceptor Rama, which befell those foremost of men who laid down their lives and did not return from the field of battle.

49. I am bent upon rescuing the Kouravas and killig my enemies; know that I am determined upon imitating the excellent conduct of Pururavas.

50. I do not, O king of Madraka, see a man in the three worlds who can shake this resolution of mine.

51. Do not speak more. Knowing this Why do you rove in such a way from fear? O wretch of a Madraka, I shall not kill you now and offer your dead body to the carnivorous animals.

52. Out of regard for a friend, O Salya, for the sake of Dhritarashtra's son and for avoiding blame—for these three reasons, you will live.

53. O king of Madras, if you speak again in this strain I will crush down your head with my mace, as hard as the thunder.

54. O you born in a sinful country, people will either see or hear to-day that either the two Krishnas have slain Karna or Karna has killed the two Krishnas."

55. Saying this the son of Radha, O king, once more addresesd the king of Madras, saying "go on! go on."

Thus ends the fortieth chapter, the discourse of Karna and Salya in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hearing the words of the great car-warrior Karna who took delight in battle Salya again said to him, citing an example.

2. I am born in a family the members of which performed sacrifices, never fled away from the field of battle and who were kings whose heads were sprinkled with the water of coronation. I am also devoted to virtue.

3. O Vrisha, you appear like an intoxicated man. For all that, out of friendship I will try to cure you of your mistakes.

4. Hear, O Karna, this allegory of a crow that I will relate. Hearing this, you may do whatever you like, O you shorn of intelligence and the wretch of your family.

5. O Karna, I do not remember a single sin in me for which you desire to kill me innocent as I am.

6. I must tell you what is good for you and what is bad. I know both, and besides I am the driver of your car and wish good to the king Duryodhana.

7—9. (I know) what land is even and what is uneven—the strength and weakness of the car-warrior (on my chariot) the fatigue and perspiration of the horses along with the car-warrior; (I have) a knowledge of the weapons, of the cries of birds and animals, of what would be heavy for the horses and what would be exceedingly heavy for them, of the taking out of the arrows, of the wounds, of the weapons counteracting each other, of the diverse modes of fighting and of all kinds of omens and indications. I know all this who am so familar with this car. I therefore describe to you this incident once more.

10. There lived on the other side of the sea a Vaishya who rolled in wealth and corn. He performed Yajnas, made liberal gifts, was quiet, observant of the duties of his own order and pure in habits and mind.

11. He had a number of sons of whom he was fond and kind to all creatures. He lived without any fear in the kingdom of a pious king.

12. There was a crow who lived upon the leavings of the food of the well-behaved children of the Vaishya.

13. His children always gave the crow meat, curds, milk, pudding, honey and butter.

14. Thus fed with the leavings of the food by those sons of the Vaishya the crow became arrogant and began to think light of all birds who were equal to him or even superior.

15. It so happened that once on a time several cheerful swans, quick-coursing, capable of going every where at will, equal to Garuda in flight and speed, came to that side of the ocean.

16. Seeing those swans the Vaishya boys said to the crow:—"O ranger of the sky, you are superior to all winged creatures."

17. Thus imposed upon by the little-witted children, the bird, out of folly and arrogance, took their words as true.

18. Proud of the leavings on which he fed the crow, approaching the swans who were capable of traversing a great distance, desired to enquire who amongst them was the leader.

19. That foolish crow challenged him whom he considered as the leader amongst those swans capable of going to a great distance, saying "Let us compete in fight."

20. Hearing the words of the arrogant crow, the swans, that had come there, the foremost of birds gifted with great strength, began to laugh.

21. The swans, who were capable of coursing everywhere at will then, addressed the crow saying,

22. "We are swans and live in the Manasa lake. We range over the whole earth and amongst the winged creatures we are always spoken high of for the length of the distances we traverse.

23. A crow as you are, how do you, O fool, challenge a mighty swan coursing every where at will and traversing over a great distance. Tell us, O crow, how you will fly with us."

24. Finding fault repeatedly with the words of the swans, the vain crow, on account of the foolishness of its species, at last gave this answer.

The crow said :—

25. Forsooth shall I fly displaying a hundred and one dlfferent kinds of motion. I shall show them traversing every hundred Yojanas with each separate and beautiful motion.

26—29. Rising up, swooping down, whirling around, going straight, proceding gently, coursing aslant up and down, going still, wheeling around, going back, sowing high, darting forward, sowing higher up with greater velocity more, moving on gently—and going on in various ways. These various motions I shall display before you. You will see my strength.

30. With one of these diverse kinds of motions I shall immediately soar into the sky. Tell me, O swans, by which of these motion shall I course through the sky.

31. Settling your course you shall have to fly with me. Adopting all these motions you shall have to course with me through the sky having no support."

32. Having been thus addressed by the crow, O son of Radha, one of the swanss said to him laughing. Hear from me (what he said).

The Swan said :—

33—34. Forsooth O crow, you will course in hundred and and different ways. I shall however fly in one kind of motion which all other birds know; for I do not know any other, O crow. As for yourself, O you of red eyes, you may fly in any kind of way you like.

35. Thereupon all the crows that had assembled there laughed saying "How will the swan with one kind of flight beat down a hundred flights?

36. The powerful and the quick-coursing crow will beat down the swan with one flight.

37. Then those two, the swan and the crow, rose into the sky challenging each other—the swan coursing in one motion and the crow in a hundred different ways.

38. The swan flew and the crow flew, making each other to wonder and speaking highly of their respective feats.

39. Seeing the various kinds of motions at every moment the crows that were there were filled with delight and began to caw loudly.

40. The swans also laughed aloud making many unpleasant remarks. They began to rise up and alight repeatedly.

41. They came down and rose up from the tops of the trees and the surface of the earth; they began to emit cries bespeaking their respective victories.

42. With one kind of gentle motion the swan began to roar up. For a moment, O Marisha, the crow seemed to have defeated him.

43. Thereat disregarding the swans the crows said :—"That swan amongst us who has soared high up is evidently defeated."

44. Hearing this the swan with great velocity began to move westwards towards the ocean abounding in Makaras.

45. Then the crow became afraid who was almost besides himself at not seeing any island or trees whereon to perch when tired. (He then thought) "where shall I alight on this vast ocean when tired?"

46. Irrepressible is the deep the abode of numberless creatures. Inhabited by hundreds of monsters it is greater than the sky.

47. O you wretch, none can exceed the ocean in depth. O Karna, the men know that the waters of the ocean are equally boundless like the sky. What is crow to it considering its extent?

48. Doing a great distance in a moment the swan looked back at the crow and could not leave him behind.

49. Having beaten down the crow the swan looked at him and waited thinking 'Let the crow come up.'

50. Thereupon greatly exhausted the crow came up to the swan.

51. Thereupon beholding him about to sink and with a view to rescue him the swan, remembering the good offices of the pious, said to him

52. "While speaking about flight you again and again mentioned about a goodly number of them. You should not mention this your flight which is a mystery to us.

53. What is the name of this flight, O crow, which you have followed now? You repeatedly touch the waters with your wings and beak.

54. Which amongst those many kinds of flight, O crow, that you are now following? Come quickly, O crow, I am waiting for you.

Salya said :—

55. O wicked one, greatly tired and touching the water with his wings and beak and seen by the swan the crow said to him.

56. Not beholding the limit of the ocean, fatigued and broken down with the exertion of fight the crow said to the swan.

57. "We are crows, we move about here and there crying caw, caw. O swan, I lay my life at your hands and seek refuge with you. Take me to the bank of the ocean."

58. Greatly tired and touching the ocean with his wings and beak the crow all on a sudden fell down.

59. Beholding him thus fallen into the ocean with a sorry heart the swan addressed the crow who was on the verge of death saying :—

60. "O crow, how did you praise yourself. Remember, you said that you would course through the sky in a hundred different ways.

61. You, who would fly in a hundred different ways, are superior to me; why are you then tired and fallen on the ocean?"

62. Overcome with weakness, the crow, casting his looks up at the swan and trying to please him said.

63. "Rendered arrogant by feeding upon the leavings of others' food I thought myself as equal to Garuda and did not care for crows and other birds.

64. I now seek refure with you and place my life at your disposal. Oh, take me to the shore of some island.

65. If I, O swan, O lord, return safely to my country I will never disregard any body'; Oh, save me from this calamity."

66—67. Without a word the swan took him up with his foot and placed him slowly on his back, who said so, was melancholy, weeping, deprived of his sense, was sinking in the ocean, was crying caw! caw, was drenched with water, hedeous to look at and trembling in fear.

68. Having placed speedily the crow who was beside himself on his back he came to the island from which they had started challenging each other.

69. Putting that ranger of the sky down (on the land) and comforting him the swan repaired quickly to his wished- for region with the mind.

70. Thus the crow, fed fat with the leavings, was defeated by the swan. Then casting off the pride of strength and prowess the crow, O Karna, led a peaceful and quiet life.

71. As that crow, fed upon the refuses of the food of the Vaishya children, did not care his equals and superiors, so do you, O Karna, fed by Dhritarashtra's sons, with the leavings of their food, disregard your equals and superiors.

72. Why did you not kill Partha at Virata's city when you were protected by Drona and his son Kripa, Bhishma and other Kouravas?

73. What became of your prowess there when defeated by Kiriti you all fled away like a pack of jackals?

74. Seeing your brother killed by Savya Sachin in the very presence of the Kuru heroes it was you who fled away first.

75. When you were assailed by the Gandharvas in the Dvaita forest it was you who, leaving behind the Kurus, did run away from the forest.

76. Having defeated in battle the Gandharvas led by Chitrasena with a great slaughter it was Arjuna, O Karna, who rescued Duryodhana with his wife.

77. Rama himself, O Karna, before the assembly of the Kuru heroes spoke of the prowess of Arjuna and Kesava.

78. You have always heard Drona and Bhishma speaking before all the kings of the two Krishnas as being unslayable.

79. I have told you only a bit about this that Dhananjaya is superior to you as a Brahmana is to all creatures.

80. You will soon see stationed on that best of cars the son of Vasudeva and the son of Kunti and Pandu.

81. As the crow intelligently sought the protection of the swan so do you seek the shelter of the Vrishni heroe (Krishina) and of Pandu's son Dhananjaya.

82. When you will see in battle the highly powerful Vasudeva and Dhananjaya stationed in the same car, you will not utter such words, O Karna.

83. When Partha with hundreds of shafts break down your pride you will then see the difference between yourself and Dhananjaya.

84. Those two best of men are well-known among the gods, Asuras and men; you are a fire-fly, do not foolishly disregard those two bright luminaries.

85. Like the sun and the moon Kesava and Arjuna are famous for their effulgence; you are but a fire-fly among men.

86. O learned one, O son of a charioteer, do not make light of Arjuna and Achuyta; those two high-souled ones are best of men. Do not make such vaunts.

Thus ends the forty-first chapter, the story of the swan and crow in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Listening to those unpleasant words and not being convinced the high-souled car-warrior, the king of Madra, said to Salya "I know well what Vasudeva and Arjuna are.

2. Even now I know well the skill of Shouri in the management of cars and the power and great weapons of Arjuna, the son of Pandu. But you have no practical knowledge of them, O Salya.

3. I shall fearlessly fight with those two Krishnas, the foremost of the weilders of weapons. The curse of Rama, the foremost of Brahmanas, pains me greatly.

4. I lived formerly with Rama in the disguise of a Brahmana with a view to obtain the celestial weapons from him. At that time, O Salya, the king of gods, wishing to do a good office by Phalguna, put in an impediment by approaching my thigh and piercing it in the form of a dreadful worm.

5. When my preceptor slept placing his head on my thigh that worm began to bore it through; on account of this boring of my thigh a pool of thick blood gushed out of my body.

6. For fear of my preceptor I did not move my limb. The Brahmana, on waking, saw it. Beholding my patience he said "you are never a Brahmana. Tell me truly who you are."

7. O Salya, I then gave him the true information about myself and said that I was a Suta. Hearing this the great ascetic, worked up with anger, imprecated a curse on me, saying.

8. "On account of the deception O charioteer, by which you have got this weapon it will never come to your mind at the time of necessity when the hour of your death will arrive. Brahma can never live in one who is not a Brahman.

9. I have forgotten that great weapon in this fierce and dreadful encounter.

10. O Salya, that descendant of Bharatas who is highly dreadful, the destroyer of all the grinders of foes and powerful, will, me-thinks, grind many Kshatriya heroes.

11. Know however, O Salya, I will kill in battle to-day that terrible bowman and the foremost of warriors, the son of Pandu, Dhananjaya, who is highly energetic and ascetic—a heroe whose promises are always carried out.

12. I have at least that weapon with me with which I will be able to kill a goodly number of enemies. I will kill in battle, that grinder of weapons, that powerful heroe, the master of weapons, that dreadful bowman of incomparable energy, that ruthless and dreadful heroe who can resist his enemies—(I mean) Dhananjaya.

13. The limitless deep, the king of waters dashes on impetuously for overwhelming numberless creatures. The continent however holds and restrains him.

14. I will to-day, in this world, withstand in fight the son of Kunti the foremost of archers while he will ceaselessly discharge his winged arrows capable of killing heroes and penetrating into every limb and none of which becomes futile.

15. Like the bank of an ocean restraining it I will withstand Partha that strongest of the strong the great heroe owning many weapons, resembling the ocean itself and having many dreadful and far-reaching arrows like unto the waves of the ocean while he will be engaged in assailing the kings.

16. Witness my highly dreadful encounter with him to-day in battle, who, methinks, has not equal amongst men, using bows and who vanquished the gods and demons in battle.

17. The Pandava is exceedingly haughty. Desirous of fighting he will approach me with superhuman and powerful weapons. Counteracting his weapons with mine in battle I will fell Partha with my excellent arrows.

18. He burns down his enemies like the sun of fiery rays and shines in his fame. As the clouds gather round the dispeller of darkness, so I shall cover Dhananjaya with my shafts.

19. As the clouds with showers extinguish the powerful fire burning with smoking flames and as if consuming the whole world, so I will, with showers of my arrows, put down the son of Kunti.

20. With my darts I will put down the son of Kunti in battle who is like a dreadful and fierce snake of sharpened fang, who burns in effulgence and anger and consumes those who work him evil.

21. As the Himalya holds the powerful, crushing and all-striking wind-god so I will, without perturbation, withstand the angry and vindictive Dhananjaya.

22. I will withstand in battle Dhananjaya the foremost of all the archers in the world who knows well all the car-tracks, who is always in the van, competent and heroic in battle.

23. To-day, I will encounter in battle the man, who, in my view, is non-pariel amongst the archers and who conquered the entire earth.

24. What man, save me, who wishes to keep his life, will fight with Savyaachin who defeated all creatures, including even the celestials in the country called Khandava.

25. He is proud, holds his weapons firmly, is light-handed, knows the use of celestial weapons, has white horses and is capable of smiting all. To-day shall I with sharpened shafts sever the head of such a great warrior from his body.

26. O Salya, keeping either death or victory before me, I will fight with Dhananjaya to-day. There is none else but me who can fight on a single car with that Pandava resembling Death himself.

27. I will myself with pleasure speak of the prowess of Pandava in battle before the assembly of the Kshatriyas. Why do you, a fool as you are, speak of the prowess of Phalguna to me ?

28. The forgiving always forgive a mean and a cruel person who performs unpleasant deeds. I can slay a hundred like you, but I forgive you for my forgiving nature and the necessity of the time.

29. You are the perpetrator of evil deeds. You have, like a fool, for the sake of the Pandavas, remonstrated with me and spoken many unpleasant things. You have said these to me who am innocent. Cursed you are, an injurer of friends for friendship is seven paced.

30. The present moment, that has arrived, is really dreadful for Duryodhona has come to battle. I always wish to see his ends accomplished. But you are acting in such a way that it appears you have no friendship for the Kuru king.

31. He is a friend who gladdens his friend, pleases him, protects him, honors him, and shares in his joy. I have got all these qualities; the king himself knows it.

32. Whereas he who destroys, remonsstrates with, sharpens his weapons, makes us to sigh and cheerless and wrongs us in many ways is our enemy. All these marks are to be seen in you, and you display them all against us.

33. For the sake of Duryodhana, for the sake of doing what is agreeable to you, for the sake of fame, for the sake of myself, and the God, I will vigorously fight with Partha and Vasudeva. Behold to-day my feats.

34. Behold to-day all my excellent weapons, Brahma, celestial and human, I will kill to-day that highly powerful heroe like an infuriate elephant slaying another such.

35. For my victory I will hurl to-day that highly powerful Brahma weapon at Partha with my mind alone. Arjuna will never be able to escape that weapon if only the wheels of my car do not sink in the earth in battle to-day.

36—37. Know this, O Salya, that I will not even fear Yama armed with his rod or Varuna armed with his noose, or Kuvera armed with his mace, or Vasava armed with his thunder-bolt or any other enemy who may come forward to kill me.

38. Therefore I have no fear from Partha or Janarddana. There shall take place an encounter between me and them both in the battle.

39—40. O king, while wandering about to set arrows on my Vijaya bow I myself unconsciously killed with an arrow the calf of a Brahmana's Homa cow as I began discharging dreadful shafts while it was roaming in the dense forest. The Brahmana then addressed me, saying :—

41. Since you have carelessly killed the offspring of my Homa cow, the wheel of your car will sink into the earth and at the time of war your heart will be possessed by fear.

42—43. I always stand in great fear of these words of the Brahmana. The kings of the Lunar dynasty, the lords of people's happiness and misery, offered him a thousand kine and six hundred bovine bulls. Still with such a gift O Salya, O king of Madras, the Brahmana was not gratied.

44. I then offered him seven hundred elephants of huge tusks and many hundreds of male and female slaves. And still that best of Brahmanas was not satisfied.

45. Offering him then full fourteen thousand black kine each with a white calf I could not obtain the grace of that best of Brahmanas.

46. Then I offered him a beautiful palace abounding in all objects of desire, in fact, whatever riches I had but still he refused to accept the gift.

47. He then said to me who had offered him and thus implored his forgiveness." What I have said, O Suta, will surely take place. It can never be otherwise.

48. False words will destroy creatures and the sin will come upon me. Therefore for preserving virtue I dare not speak an untruth.

49. You shall not destroy the means of a Brahmana's livelihood. There is none on earth who can falsify my words. Accept my words and this will be an atonement for your sin.

50. Although chastised by you still for your friendship I have spoken out all this to you. I know you who are chastising me thus. Be silent and hear what I will speak now.

Thus ends the forty-second chapter of the conversation between Karna and Salya in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Once more, O great king, thus silencing the king of Madras, the son of Radha, the chastiser of foes, said to him.

2. As a rejoinder to what you have said to me, O Salya, by way of examples I tell you that I am not to be frightened by you in battle with your words.

3. If all the gods with Vasava come to fight with me I will not fear them what to speak of my fear from Partha and Kesava.

4. I am not to be frightened by mere words. O Salya, he, whom you will be able to frighten in battle, is some other person.

5. You have addressed many unpleasant words to me. Therein lies the strength of a mean person, O you of wicked soul; you can speak of my merits and so you say many unpleasant words.

6. Karna is not born for fear in battle, O Madraka. I am rather born to display my valour and achieve glory for my own self.

7. Out of friendship for you, out of my affection and on account of your being an ally—for these three reasons, you still live, O Salya,

8. A great work is now to be done for the king Dhritarashtra. This work depends on me, O Salya, and therefore you live for a moment.

9. I made this agreement with you formerly that I would forgive you for all your unpleasant words. This agreement I will observe and for this you still live.

10. Without a thousand Salyas I will vanquish my enemies. The injurer of a friend is sinful. It is for this you live for the present.

Thus ends the forty-third chapter the conversation between Karna and Salya in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Salya said :—

1. These are but your ravings, O Karna that you give vent to with regard to your enemies. But I can without a thousand Karnas defeat my foe in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

2. To the king of Madras, who was speaking such harsh words Karna, of unpleasant looks, spoke words again twice as harsh.

Karna said :—

3. O king of Madras, listen attentively to what I heard recited in the presence of Dhritarashtra.

4. In Dhritarashtra's house the Brahmanas used to describe many pleasant regions and the lives of many ancient kings.

5. One aged and leading Brahmana among them, while recounting the ancient historian, said thus blaming the Valhikas and Madrakas.

6—7. One should always avoid the impure and impious Valhikas who live away from Himavat and Ganga, Saraswati, Yamuna and Kurukshetra and the Sindhu with its five tributaries.

8. I remember from my youth that a slaughter ground for kine and the cellars for wine mark out the gates of the palaces of Valhika kings.

9. For some secret work I had to live with them. On account of this living I know them very well.

10. There is a town of the name of Shakala, a river by the name of Apaga and a clan of the Valhikas known as Jarttikas. Their conduct is very reprehensible.

11. They drink the liquor Ganda and ea fried barley with it. They also eat beef with garlics. They also take flour with meat and boiled rice that is bought of others. They are shorn of all good practices.

12—13. Their women all drink and are nude, and laugh and dance, outside the walls of the houses in cities, with garlands and unguents, singing under the influence of liquor various obscene songs like the bray of the ass or the bleat of lambs. They freely mix and intercourse with all. Inebrite they address one another with endearing terms.

14. The fallen Valhika women, unobservant of restrictions even on sacred days, dance and exclaim "Alas! our husband, our lord is dead!"

15. One of those wicked Valhikas who lived amongst them and for some time in Kurujangala burst out with cheerless heart saying—

16. "Surely that big and fair (Valhika maiden) dressed in her blankets is thinking of me her Valhika lover, who am living in Kurujangala at the time of her going to bed.

17—18. Crossing the Sutlej, the charming Iravati and coming to my own country when shall I look at those beautiful women with thick frontal bones, with shining circles of red ar enic on their foreheads, with tinges of red, black collyrium on their eyes and their beautiful forms dressed in blankets and skins and themselves uttering shrill cries?

19. When shall I be happy in the company of those inebriate women amid the sound of drums and kettle-drums and conches sweet as the brays of asses and cries of camels and mules?

20. When shall I be in the midst of those women who live on cakes of flour and and meat and balls of barley and skimmed milk in the forests having pleasant paths of Shami, Pilu and Karira?

21. When shall I, surrounded by my countrymen, muster strong on the high roads, fall upon the passers by, carry away heir robes and attires and beat them repeatedly?

22. What man is there who will live willingly even for a moment in the midst of Valhikas who are so fallen, wicked and of fraudulent conduct?

23. Thus did the Brahmanas describe the vile Valhikas, a sixth of whose merit and demerit, you possess, O Salya.

24. Having said this the pious Brahmana said some thing about the wicked Valhikas. Hear what I say.

25. In the large and populous city of Sakala a Rakshasa woman used to sing on every fourteenth day of the dark half of the month in accompaniment with a drum.

26. When shall I next sing the songs of the Valhikas in this town of Sakala having fed me full with beef and drunk the Gada liquor.

27—28. Decked with ornaments when shall I with these huge women and maidens feed upon a large number of sheep, a quantity of pork and beef and the meat of fowls, asses and camels. In vain do they live who do not eat the sheep.

29. Thus O Salya, the young and old inhabitants of Sakala, sing and cry under the influence of liquor. How can there be virtue among such people?

30. You should know this. I will now recount to you again what another Brahmana said to us in the Kuru court.

31—32. There where the forests of Pilus stand and the five rivers Shatadru, Vipasha Iravati, Chandrabhaga and Vitasta and which have the Sindhu for their sixth flow there in those regions is situated the Province called the Arattas distant from Himavat. This Province is shorn of virtue and religion. No one should go there.

33—34. The celestials, the ancestral manes and the Brahmanas never accept gifts from fallen persons, from those that are begotten by Sudras upon women of other castes and from Valhikas who never perform Yajnas and are greatly irreligious. This the learned Brahmana also said in the Kuru Court.

35. The Valhikas, who have no feelings of revulsion, take their food in deep wooden vessels, earthen plates in vessels that have been licked by dogs and those that have been stained with pounded barley and other corn.

36. They drink the milk of sheep, camels and asses and eat curds and other preparations of those various kinds of milk.

37. There is a number of bastards among those fallen people. There is no food or no milk that they do not take. The ignorant Aratta Valhikas should always be avoided.

38. You should always know this, O Salya. I will now speak to you what another Brahmana said in the Kuru court.

39. How can a man attain to the celestial region having drunk milk in the town called Yugandhara and lived in the place called Achyutastala and bathed in the spot called Bhutilaya.

40. No respectable man should live even for two days where the five rivers flow just after issuing from the mountains and where live Aratta Valhikas.

41. There are two Pishachas in the river Vipasha named Vahi and Hika. The Vahikas are the offsping of those two Pishchas. They are not creatures created by God. Being of such a low brith how can they know the duties laid down in the Scriptures. ?

42. The Karashkaras, the Mahishkas, the Kalingas, the Keralas, the Karotakas, the Virakas and other people who have no religion should always be avoided by men.

43. A Rakshasa woman of huge hips, thus spoke to a Brahman, who once went to that country for bathing in a .sacred water and passed a single night there.

44. This' Province passes under the name of Arattas. And the people who live there are called Valhikas. The Brahmanas of the lowest order also live there from a very ancient time.

45. They are ignorant of the Vedas and void of knowledge. They do not perform Yajnas nor can help others in them. They are all fallen and many of them have been begotten by Sudras upon other caste girls; the gods never accept gifts from them.

46. The Prasthalas, the Madras, the Gandharvas, the Arattas, Khasas, the Vasatis, the Sindhus and the Samviras also follow these reprehensible practices.

Thus ends the forty-fourth chapter, the conversation betweon Karna and Salya in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Karna said:—

1. You should know all this, O Salya, I shall again speak. Hear attentively what I say.

2. Once on a time a Brahmana came to our house as a guest. He was highly pleased with our conduct and said to us:—

3. I lived for a long time alone on a summit of the Himalaya mountain, since then I have seen various countries following various religions.

4. But I have never seen a country where all the people are irreligious. All the races I have met with recognise as religion what has been declared by persons conversant with the Vedas.

5. Wandering through various countries following diverse religions, I came at last O king, among the Vahikas. There I heard,

6. That one at first becomes a Brahmana and then becomes a Kshatriya. A Vahika after that will become a Vaishya, then a Sudra and then a barber.

7. Having become a barber he will again become a Brahmana. Attaining again to the position of a Brahmana he will again become a slave.

8. One member of a family becomes a Brahmana. All others falling off from virtue act as they please. The Gowharas, the Madrakas and the little-witted Vahikas are such.

9. Having wandered over the entire earth I heard of these sinful practices and irregularities amongst the Vahikas.

10. You should know this, O Salya; I will speak to you again these words blaming the Vahikas which another person said to me.

11. In the days of yore a chaste woman of the country of Aratta was abducted by robbers; they violated her, on which she imprecated a curse on them saying—

12. As you have sinfully ravished a girl who has no husband all the women of your families will become unchaste.

13. You villains, you will never escape the consequences of this great iniquity. It is for this, O Salya, that the sisters' sons of the Arattas become their heirs and not their own sons.

14—15. Kauravas with the Panchalas, the Shalyas, the Matsyas, the Naimishas, the Koshalas, the Kashapaunctras, the Kalingas, the Maghadas, and the Chedis, who are all blessed, are conversant with the eternal religion. Even the wicked of every country know what religion is; the Vahikas are however divested of piety.

16. The Matsyas, the Kurus, the Panchalas, the Naimishas and all other respectable races know the eternal truths of religion. This cannot be said of the Madrakas and the wily people that live in the land of the five rivers.

17. Knowing all these, O Salya, O king, you should hold your tongue like one of base words in all matters connected with religion and virtue. You are the guardian and the king of this race and therefore pertake of the tenth part of their virtue and sin.

18. Or perhaps you pertake of the sixth portion of their sins only for you never protect them. A king who protects his people is only entitled to the sixth portion of their virtue. You are not a sharer of their virtue.

19. In the days of yore when the eternal religion was held in reverence in all countries, the grand-father, marking the conduct of those living in the land of five rivers, denounced them.

20. When even in the golden age the Brahman had consumed those fallen men of evil deeds who were begotten by Sudra on others' wives who can put them to shame?

21. Thus did the grand-father condemn the practices of the land of five rivers. When all the people observed the duties of their respective orders he had to find fault with those people.

22. You should know all this, O Salya, I will speak again to you. A Rakshasa by the name of Kamalashapada, while bathing in a tank said,

23. Begging is a Kshatriya's dirt, the non-observance of vows is that of Brahmana. The Vahikas are the dirt of the earth and the Madra women are the dirt of the whole female sex.

24. While goining down the stream a king rescued the Rakshasa. Asked by the former the latter gave this answer. I will recite it to you, listen.

25. The Mlechas are the dirt of the humanity, the oil-men are the dirt of Mlechas; eunuchs are the dirt of oilmen. And they who appoint Kshatriyas as priests in their yagnas are the dirt of eunuchs.

26. The sin of those persons who appoint Kshatriyas as their priests as well as that of the Madrakas will visit you if you do not abandon me.

27. This was declared by the Rakshasa as the Mantra that should be used as a remedy for curing a person possessed by a Rakshasa or one killed by poison.

28. The Panchalas observe the duties laid down in the Vedas; the Kauravas observe truth; the Matsyas Surasena perform Yajnas; the people of the east follow the conduct of the Sudras. Those of the south are fallen; the Vahikas are thieves, the Saurashtras are bastards.

29. They are defiled by ingratitude, theft, drunkenness, adultery with the wives of their preceptors, harshness of speech, slaughter of kine, absence from house during night for bad purposes, the using of other people's ornaments. What sin is there that they cannot commit? Fie on Arathas and the people of the land of the five rivers.

30. The Panchalas, the Kauravas, the Naimishas, the Matsyas all these are conversant] with religion. Even the old people of the North, the Angas and Magadhas follow the practice of the pious.

31. Many gods, led by Agni, reside in the East. The ancestral manes live in the South presided our by Yama the just.

32. The West is ruled over by the powerful Varuna, who is superior to all the gods there. The North is guarded by the Divine along with the Brahmanas.

33. The Rakshasas and Pichashas protect Himavat, the best of mountains. The Guhykas protect, O great king, the mount Gandhamadana. Forsooth does Vishnu otherwise called Janarddana protect all creatures.

34. The Magadhas are conversant with hints, the Koshalas can understand what they see. The Kurus and Panchalas can understand half-expressed words. The Salyas cannot understand till the whole thing is expressed.

35. The mountaneers like Sivis are very dull. The Yavanas are omniscient, O king and the Suras are particularly so.

36. The Mlechchas are steeped in their own fanciful creations—other inferior people cannot understand any thing. Vahikas never accept good counsels and Madrakas are none amongst them. You are such, O Salya, you should not give me any reply.

37. Madras are called the dirt of all nations on earth so the Madra woman is called the dirt of the entire female sex.

38. There is none more wretched than he whose duty consists in drinking wine, violating the bed of his preceptor, destroying the embryo by miscarriage and robbing other people of their riches. Oh fie on the Arthas and the people of the land of five rivers.

39. Knowing this, be silent. Do not try to contradict me. Do not make me kill Keshava and Arjuna after having killed you first.

Salya said :—

40. To forsake the distressed and sell children with wives are the practices of Angas whose king you are, O Karna.

41. Remembering your faults that were recited by Bhishma before the assembled car-warriors and mighty car-warriors drive away your anger and be not angry.

42. In every country, O Karna, there are Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas, the Vaishyas, the Sudras and the chaste women observant of good vows.

43. In every country, men jest with men and wound each other, and there are lustful men.

44. There is in every country and every moment men who are experts in speaking of the faults of others. There is none who knows his own faults and knowing them becomes ashamed.

45. In every country there are kings observant of their own religions and engaged in repressing the wicked. And in every country there are virtuous men.

46. There is no country, O Karna, where every one is sinful. There are men in many countries who excel even the gods by their good conduct.

Sanjaya said :—

47. Thereupon the king Duryodhana stopped Karna and Salya, addressing the son of Radha as a friend and requesting Salya with joined hands.

48. Karna was pacified, O Sire, and did not speak anything more. Salya, then advanced against his enemies.

49. Thereupon smilingly Karna once more excited Salya saying "go on."

Thus ends the forty-fifth chapter, the end of wordy war-fare between Karna and Salya in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon beholding that unrivalled arrangement of the army of Partha protected by Dhristadyumna who was capable of resisting all hostile armies Karna,

2. Proceeded sending up leonine shouts and making his chariot produce a loud rattle. He made the earth tremble with the loud din of musical instruments.

3. That chastiser of foes, irrepressible in battle, seemed to tremble in anger. Then arranging his own army in counter array, that heroe of great energy, O best of Bharatas,

4. Made a great havoc of the Pandava army like Indra killing the Asura army. Then wounding Yudhishthira with many arrows he placed the son of Pandu to his right.

Dhritarashtra said :—

5. How did, O Sanjaya, the son of Radha arrange his army against the Pandavas led by Dhristadyumna and protected by Bhimasena—all those great bowmen invincible even to the very gods.

6. Who stood, O Sanjaya, at the one wing and at the other of my army? Dividing themselves duly how were they stationed?

7. How did also the sons of Pandu arrange their army against mine? And how did that great and dreadful battle begin?

8. Where was Vibhatsu when Karna proceeded against Yudhishthira? Who could successfully assail Yudhishthira before Arjuna?

9. Who else except the son of Radha, who wishes to keep his life, would fight with Arjuna who had defeated single-handed formerly all creatures at Khandava?

Sanjaya said :—

10. Hear now of the arrangement of the army and how Arjuna came and how the battle was fought by both sides encircling their respective kings.

11. O king, Saradwata's son Kripa, the highly active Magadhas and Kritavarma of the Satwata race stood at the right wing.

12—13. Standing at the right of these and accompanied by many dauntless Gandhara horse-men armed with bright lances and many invincible mountaneers numerous as the swarms of locusts and grim-visaged as the Pishachas, Shakuni and the powerful car-warrior Uluka protected the Kuru army.

14. Thirty-four thousand cars of the Samsaptakas, never to come back from the battle-field mad after fight, encircling your son and desirous of killing Krishna and Arjuna, protected the left side.

15. The Kamvojas, the Sakas, the Yavanas, with their cars, horses, and infantry stood on this left challenging Arjuna and the powerful Kesava.

16. In the centre, stood Karna at the head of the army, clad in armour and a beautiful coat of mail and adorned with bracelets and garlands, for protecting it.

17. Protected by his greatly angry sons, that heroe, the foremost of the wielders of weapons, shone at the head of his army drawing his bow.

18—19. The mighty-armed Dussasana, endued with the effulgence of the moon and fire, beautiful to look at and with twany eyes, encircled by his soldiers, stood at the back of the army on a huge elephant and proceeded therefrom. Then followed him, O emperor, the king Duryodhana himself protected by his own brothers, clad in beautiful mails and riding on beautiful horses.

20. Protected by the highly energetic Madrakas and Kekayas the king shone there like the performer of hundred sacrifices surrounded by the celestials.

21. Ashwathama and other leading car-warriors, and many infuriate elephants sheding temporal juice, resembling a mass of clouds and driven by brave Mlechchas followed that car force.

22. With Vaijayanti flags, shining weapons and riders they appeared like hills filled with trees.

23. The rear of that elephant army was protected by thousands of horses with swords and Patticas never to return back from battle.

24. Brilliantly adorned with cavalry, car-warriors and elephants that best of armies looked exceedingly picturesque like that of the gods or of the demons.

25. That army arranged after the plan of Vrihaspati by its expert commander appeared to dance and strike terror into the hearts of the enemies.

26. Like the continual clouds of the rainy season, the infantry, cavalry, car-warriors and elephants, desirous of battle, began to issue from all the wings.

27. Beholding Karna at the head of the army Yudhisthira addressed the following words to Dhananjaya, that slayer of foes, the one heroe in the battle.

28. Behold, O Arjuna, the great army arranged by Karna. The enemy's army shines with all its wings.

29. In the face of such a huge army you should take such precautions as we may not be defeated.

30. Thus accosted by the king, Arjuna replied with joined hands "Every thing will be done as you say. Nothing will be otherwise."

31. I will bring about the destruction of the enemy, O Bharata. By killing the head of this army, I will encompass their destruction.

Yudhisthira said :—

32—33. Having this in view you yourself proceed against the son of Radha ; let Bhimasena proceed against Sujodhana; Nakula against Vrihsena, Sahadeva against the son of Suvala, Sasanika against Dussasana the best of Sinis; Salyaki against the son of Hridika, and Pandya against the son of Drona. I myself will fight with Kripa.

34. Let the sons of Draupadi, with Shikandin proceed against the remaining sons of Dhritarastra. Let the other heroes proceed against the rest of our enemies.

Sanjaya said :—

35. Thus addressed by the pious Yudhisthira, Dhananjaya said 'so be it,' and ordered his army. He then himself proceeded to the head.

36—37. Keshava and Arjuna preceeded to battle on that prime car, for which the leader of the universe Agni who derives his effulgence from Brahman became the horses and which in the days of yore had successively carried Brahma, Siva, Indra and Varuna one after another.

38. Beholding that wonderful car advance Salya once more addressed the following words to that highly energetic warrior the son of Adhiratha.

39. There comes the car drawn by white horses and having Krishna as its driver, the car which even all the soldiers cannot resist as the fruit follows the work. There comes the son of Kunti slaying all his foes along the way, he of whom you were enquiring.

40. Undoubtedly they are the great Vasudeva and Arjuna as a tremendous uproar deep as the muttering of clouds is being heard.

41. A cloud of dust is overspreading the welkin like a canopy. The whole earth, O Arjuna, is shaking cut deep by the wheels of Arjuna's cars.

42. Violent winds are raging on both the sides of the army. The carnivorous animals are yelling aloud and the animals are emitting dreadful cries.

43. Behold, O Arjuna, the dreadful and evil Ketu of vapoury form, capable of making hairs erect. It has appeared covering the sun.

44. Behold various sorts of animals in large numbers and many powerful wolves and tigers are looking at the sun.

45. Behold those terrible Kankas and vultures in thousands sitting with faces towards one another as if holding a conversation.

46. O Karna, the coloured chowries attached to your huge car are waving roughly and your pennon is also trembling.

47. See, your beautiful and large horses endued with great speed resembling the beautiful Garuda in the sky, are also trembling.

48. It is evident from these evil omens O Karna, that hundreds and thousands of kings, deprived of their lives, will sleep the eternal sleep in the field of battle.

49. There is being heard the hair-stirring and loud sound of the conch. The sound of drums and cymbals, O son of Radha, is being also heard on all sides.

50. The whizz of the various sorts of shafts and the noise of chariots, horses and men is also being heard. Listen, O Karna, to the twang of the bows of the various warriors.

51. Many flags of diverse colours and embroidered with gold, made by skiful artizens, are shining on Arjuna's car shaken by the wind.

52. See, O Karna, also the banners of Arjuna, adorned with rows of bells and golden moons and stars, like lightning on the clouds.

53. Those banners, producing a sound, are being shaken by the wind; the high-souled Panchalas with their cars decked with flags look like the gods on their cars.

54. Behold the heroic Vibhatsu, the son of Kunti, invincible in battle and having a flag with the emblem of a monkey, is coming forward to assail his enemies.

55. On the top of Partha's banner a dreadful monkey is being seen capable of increasing the anger of the enemies.

56. These are the discus, club, Sranga bow and the conch of the intelligent Krishna. The Kaustava jewel appears beautiful (on the breast of) Krishna.

57. The highly energetic Vasudeva with club and Sranga bow in his hands is driving the yellow horses endued with the speed of the wind.

58. This is the twang of the bow Gandiva drawn by Savyasachin. These sharpened arrows discharged off his hands will kill the enemies.

59. The earth is strewn with the heads of the kings who never come back from the battle-field, having expansive coppery eyes and faces like the full moon.

60. There are falling, the arms, resembling the spiked maces, with weapons and smeared with scents, of warriors taking delight in fight and contending with uplifted weapons.

61. Horses with eyes, tongues and entrails drawn out, with their riders are falling, fallen and lie dead on earth.

62. Wounded, mangled and pierced by Partha, lifeless elephants, huge as mountain tops, are falling down like hills.

63. The cars, resembling the cities of the Gandharvas, with the kings slain are falling down like the celestial cars, on the wane of the piety of the inhabitants of heaven.

64. Behold, the army has been greatly assailed by Kiritin as various animals are by a lion.

65. Coming forward the heroic Pandavas are killing the kings, a good many elephants, horses, car-warriors and foot soldiers of your army engaged in battle.

66. Partha is not visible like the sun covered with clouds. The top of his car is being seen and the twang of his bow is being heard.

67. You will see him to-day, O Karna, about whom you are enquiring—that heroe, with white horses and Krishna as his driver engaged in killing the enemies in battle.

68. You will see today, O Karna, stationd on the same car in battle those two foremost of men with coppery eyes—the subduers of enemies—Krishna and Arjuna.

69. O son of Radha, you will be our king if you can slay him to-day who has Krishna for his driver and Gandiva for his bow.

70. Challenged by Samsaptakas Partha proceeds against them; the powerful warrior is making a great havoc of his enemies in battle.

71. Thereupon Karna in anger said to the king of Madras who had spoken thus. "See Partha is being assailed on all sides by the Samsaptakas.

72. Like the sun covered by cloud Parth is no longer visible. Plunged into the deep of warriors O Salya, Partha is sure to die."

Salya said :—

73. Who is there who can slay the god of water with water and fire with fuel? Who is there who can get hold of the wind or drink off the ocean?

74. Methinks, to assail Partha is just like this. Even the very gods and demons united together with Indra at their head cannot discomfit Arjuna in battle.

75. Better satisfy yourself and make your mind comfortable by saying this. Partha is not to be conquered in battle. Better fulfill some other object you may have in view.

76. He who will lift up the earth on his two arms, or consume all creatures with his wrath or hurl down the gods from heaven, may defeat Arjuna in battle.

77. Behold Bhima, the other heroic son of Kunti who is never worn out with fatigue, shining in his native lustre, mighty armed and is like the second Meru.

78. With his anger always burning, bent on wrecking revenge the highly energetic Bhima stands there with a view to acquire victory, remembering all his wrongs.

79. There stands the impartial king Yudhisthira, the foremost of the pious and the conqueror of enemies' cities. The enemies can never resist him in battle.

80. There stand the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, the two Ashwinis, the two foremost of men, invincible in battle.

81. There stand the five Vrishni heroes like five mountains desirous of fighting all equal to Arjuna in battle.

82. There stand the proud, beautiful heroic and highly energetic sons of Draupadi headed by Dhristadyumna.

83. There advances against us Satyaki, the foremost of the Satwatas, irresistible like Indra, with a view to fight like Death himself in anger.

84. While these two best of men were thus speaking to each other the two armies encountered in battle like the streams of Ganga and Yamuna.

Thus ends the forty-sixth chapter, the beginning of battle in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. While armies thus encountered each other, did Partha, O Sanjaya, assail the Samsaptakas and Karna the Pandavas.

2. Skilled in narration as you are, recount at length the incidents of the battle to me. I am never satiated with listening to the accounts of the prowess of heroes.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Disregarding the huge hostile array arranged in that way Arjuna arrayed his force in proper form on account of the evil policy of your son.

4. The huge army of the Pandavas, abounding in infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars and led by Dhristadyumna, looked magnificient.

5. With his horses white as the pigeons and endued with the effulgence of the sun or the moon the son of Prishata, with bow in hand, shone like Death himself in body.

6. The sons of Draupadi desirous of fighting stood by the side of the son of Prishata. They had celestial coats of mail and weapons and were powerful like tigers. They followed him like stars following the moon.

7. Beholding the Samsaptakas in battle array, Arjuna, worked up with anger, rushed against them, drawing his Gandiva bow.

8. With a view to kill Arjuna the Samsaptakas bent upon acquiring victory, advanced against him, making death their end.

9. Those brave warriors with men, horses, infuriate elephants and cars began quickly to assail Arjuna.

10. Furious was their encounter with Kiritin. It resembled that between Arjuna and Nivata Kavachas, as we have heard.

11—12. Thousands and thousands of cars, horses, flags, elephants, foot-soldiers engaged in fighting, arrows, bows, swords, discus, battle-axes, uplifted arms holding weapons and heads of enemies were cut by Partha.

13. Considering his car drowned into that whirlpool of warriors resembling the bed of the nether region the Samsaptakas sent up loud war-cries.

14. Slaying all his enemies in front Partha killed those that stood at a distance, then those that were on his right and back like Rudra himself killing in anger the entire animate creation.

15. And exceedingly dreadful was the encounter of your army with the Panchalas, Chedis and Srinjayas.

16—17. Kripa, Kritavarma, Sakuni, the son of Suvala, with cheerful soldiers, all greatly worked up with anger and capable of striking the car-warriors fought with Koshalas, the Kachis, Matsyas, Karushas, Kekayas and Surasenas all of whom were highly terrible in battle.

18. That great battle, destructive of life, body and sins, brought on fame, virtue and heaven for all the Kshatriya, Vaishyas and Sudra heroes that engaged in it.

19—20. O best of Bharatas, meanwhile, the king Duryodhana, with all his brothers and Kuru heroes and many powerful Madraka car-warriors, protected Karna while he fought with the Pandavas, the Panchalas, the Chedis and Satwaki.

21. Destroying that huge army with his sharpend arrows and assailing many leading car-warriors Karna afflicted Yudhishthira.

22. Sundering the armour, weapon and bodies of thousands of his enemies, killing them by thousands and sending them to heaven to earn fame Karna gave great delight to his friends.

23. Thus, O father, the battle, putting an end to men, horses, and cars, between the Kurus and Srinjayas resembled that between the gods and demons in the days of yore.

Thus ends the forty-seventh chapter, in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(KARNA PARVA).—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. Tell me, O Sanjaya, how Karna, having caused a great carnage and entered into the midst of the Pandavas assailed the king Yudhisthira.

2. What leading warriors amongst the Pandavas resisted Karna? Whom did Karna crush before he could assail Yudhishthira?

Sanjaya said :—

3. Seeing the followers of the Pandavas led by Dhristadyumna stationd for battle, Karna, the subduer of foes, rushed furiously against the Panchalas.

4. The Panchalas, desirous of victory, advanced against that high-souled one who came quickly as the swans go to the ocean.

5. Then there arose from both the armies the sound of a thousand conches capable striking terror into hearts as well as that of bugles.

6. Then there arose the dreadful sound of various other musical instruments, the noise of the elephants, horses and cars and leonine shouts of the heroes.

7. The entire earth with her mountains, trees and oceans, the sky enshrouded with clouds driven by the wind and the whole firmament with the sun and the moon, seemed to tremble.

8. So dreadful appeared the noise to all creatures and they became all agitated. The weak amongst them fell dead.

9. Then worked with great anger and invoking speedily his weapons Karna began to assail the Pandava host like Indra grinding the army of the demons.

10. Entering into the midst of the Pandava army and discharging his arrows Karna killed seventy seven leading warriors among the Prabhadrakas.

11. Then the twenty five sharp arrows furnished with beautiful wings of that best of car-warriors killed twenty five Panchalas.

12. With many gold feathered Narachas capable of piercing others' bodies the heroe killed hundreds and thousands of the Chedis.

13. While he was performing those superhuman feats in battle a large number of Panchala cars surrounded him quickly on all sides, O king.

14. O Bharata, then setting five dreadful arrows Karna, the son of Vikartana, killed five Panchalas.

15. He killed in battle the Panchalas—Bhanudeva, Chitrasena, Senabindha, Tapana and Soorasena.

16. The heroic Panchalas being thus killed with arrows there arose lamentations Alas! and Oh of the Panchalas in that great battle.

17. Then ten car-warriors amongst Panchalas surrounded Karna whom all he quickly killed with arrows.

18. Then the two protectors of Karna's car-wheels, his two invincible sons, Sushena and Satyasena began to fight reckless of their lives.

19. The powerful car-warrior Vrishasena, the eldest son of Karna, himself protected his father's rear.

20—21. Thereupon, Dhristadyumna, Satyaki, the five sons of Draupadi, Vrikodara, Janmejaya, Shikhandin and many leading warriors among Probhadrakas, and many amongst the Chedis, the Kekayas and the Panchalas, the twins, the Matsyas, all clad in mail rushed upon Karna to kill him.

22. Showering upon him various kinds of weapons and arrows they began to assail him like the clouds striking the mountain breast during the rainy season.

23. To rescue their father, the sons of Karna all of whom were sinless and many heroes of your army resisted them.

24. Cutting off with a broad headed bow, that of Bhimasena, Sushena pierced him on the breast with seven Narachas and made a loud war-cry.

25. Thereupon taking up another strong bow and setting it right in haste the highly powerful Vrikodara cut off Sushena's bow.

26. Worked up with anger and as if dancing on his car he quickly bored through Sushena with ten arrows and pierced Karna himself with seventy sharp arrows within the twinkling of an eye.

27. Then with ten other arrows Bhima struck down Bhanusena, another son of Karna, with horses, drivers, arms and flags before the eyes of his friends.

28. Sundered by a razor-headed shaft the beautiful head of the youth with a moon-like countenance appeared like a lotus plucked from its stalk.

29. Having killed Karna's son Bhima began to assail your army once more; sundering the bows of Kripa and Hridika's son he began to assail those two heroes.

30. Striking Dussasana with ten iron arrows and Sakuni with six he deprived both Uluka and Patatri of their cars.

31. Then saying to Sushena "you are killed" Bhima took up another arrow. Karna cut it off and pierced Bhima himself with three arrows.

32. Bhima then took up another powerful arrow and discharged it at Sushena. Karna cut off that too.

33. With a view to save his son and kill the ruthless Bhima Karna struck the former with seventy-three dreadful arrows.

34. Then taking up an excellent bow capable of bearing a great strain Sushena struck Nakula on the arms and the chest with five arrows.

35. Striking his antagonist with twenty strong arrows capable of bearing a strain Nakula too sent up a loud wa-cry and struck terror unto Karna.

36. Then striking Nakula with ten arrows, the powerful car-warrior Sushena, quickly cut off his bow with a razor headed arrow.

37. Then Nakula, beside himself with anger, took up another bow and withstood Sushena with nine arrows.

38. Then, O king, covering all the quarters with arrows that subduer of hostile heroes killed Sushena's driver, striking Sushena himself with three arrows and then sundered into pieces his highly strong bow with three Bhallas.

39. Then beside himself with anger Sushena took up another bow and pierced Nakula with sixty arrows and Sahadeva with seven.

40. Then there took place a dreadful encounter between those heroes striking one another like that between the gods and demons.

41. Having killed Vrishasena's driver with three arrows Satyaki sundered his bow with a Bhalla and killed his horses with seven arrows.

42. Then crushing down his standard with another arrow he struck Vrishasena himself on the breast with three arrows. Thus struck Vrishasena became senseless on his car but stood up again within the twinkling of an eye.

43. Deprived of his driver, horses, chariot and flags by Yuyudhana, Vrishasena, armed with sword and shield, then rushed against him with a view to kill him.

44. As his antagonist advanced against him Satyaki struck at his sword and shield ten arrows with heads like a boar's ear.

45. Seeing Vrishasena deprived of his car and weapons Dussasana placing him on his own car then speedily put him on another.

46—49. Then riding on another car the powerful car-warrior Vrishasena pierced the five sons of Draupadi with seventy and Yuyudhana with five, Bhimasena with sixty four, Sahadeva with five, Nakula with thirty, Satanika with seven, Shikhandin with ten, and king Yudhishthira with a hundred arrows. O monarch, the great bowman, the son of Karna, continually assailed with arrows those and many leading heroes all having victory in view. The invincible Vrishasena protected the rear of Karna in battle.

50. Having deprived Dussashana of his driver, horses and car, with ninety nine iron arrows the grandson of Sini struck him then on his forehead with nine arrows.

51. Then riding on another car properly equipped once more he began to fight with the Pandavas from within the division of Karna.

52. Then Dhristadyumna pierced Karna with ten arrows, the sons of Draupadi pierced him with seventy three arrows and Yuyudhana with seven.

53. Bhimasena pierced him with sixty four arrows and Sahadeva with seven. Nakula pierced him with thirty arrows and Satanika with seven. The heroic Shikhandin pierced him with ten and king Yudhishthira with a hundred.

54. Worked up with the desire of victory those and other foremost of men began to assail that great man, Suta's son, in that terrible battle.

55. Moving about in his car the heroic son of the charioteer, the subduer of foes, pierced each of them with ten arrows.

56. There, O monarch, we witnessed the wonderful strength in the handling of weapons and the light-handedness of the high-souled Karna.

57. People could not mark when he took up his arrows, when he aimed them and when he discharged them. They only saw his enemies slain by his anger.

58. The sky, the earth and the firmament were filled with his sharpened arrows.

The firmament looked brillant as if covered with clouds smitten with the rays of the sun.

59. The highly powerful son of Radha, with bow in his hand, as if dancing, pierced each of his antagonists with thrice as many shafts as each of them had struck him with.

60. Once more striking each of them and his horses, drivers, car and flag with ten arrows he sent up a loud war-cry. His antagonist then gave him a way.

61. Having crushed those powerful bowmen with showers of arrows, the son of Radha, the subduer of foes, entered unopposed into the thick of the army led by the Pandava king.

62. Having broken down thirty chariots of the Chedis who never return from the battle-field the son of Radha pierced Yudhisthira with many sharp arrows.

63. With a view to rescue the king from the son of Radha many Pandava warriors, with Shikhandin and Satyaki surrounded him.

64. So did the powerful and brave bowmen of your army firmly guard the irresistible Karna in that battle.

65. O king, then there arose the sound of various musicial instruments and the leonine roars of brave heroes rent the sky.

66. The Kurus and Pandavas once more undauntedly met with each other, the former led by Karna and the latter by Yudhisthira.

Thus ends the forty-eighth chapter, the fight between Karna and Yudhisthira in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(KARNA PARVA—Continued.)

Sanjaya said :—

1. Riving through that army Karna encountered the pious king surrounded by thousands of cars, elephants, horses and foot-soldiers.

2. Sundering with hundreds of dreadful shafts the thousands of arms discharged at him by his enemies Karna fearlessly went through the army.

3. The charioteer's son sundered the heads, the arms, and the thighs of his enemies who, deprived of life, fell down on earth. Others, finding their division dispersed, took to their heels.

4. The Dravida, the Andhaka, and the Nishada infantry, excited by Satyaki once more rushed upon Karna with a view to kill him in that battle.

5. Shorn of their arms and head-dresses and killed by Karna with his arrows they fell down all at once on earth like a forest of Sala trees cut down.

6. Deprived of life and filling the heaven and earth with their fame, hundreds, thousands and ten thousands of warriors fell down with their bodies on earth.

7. The Pandus and Panchalas obstructed Karna, the son of Vikartana who proceeded in anger to battle like the destroyer himself even as people seek to obstruct a disease with incantations and drugs.

8. Grinding all those combatants Karna once more rushed upon Yudhisthira like an irresistible disease unchecked by incantations, drugs and rites.

9. Then obstructed by Pandus, Panchalas and Kekayas who were all desirous of rescuing the king he could not overcome them as Death cannot those conversant with Brahman.

10. Thereupon beholding Karna, the slayer of hostile heroes, obstructed at a distance, Yudhisthira, with eyes reddened with anger, said.

11. O Karna, O son of a charioteer, O you of vain seeing, hear my words. You always challenge in fight Phalguna of quick speed.

12. Abiding by the counsel of the son of Dhritarashtra you always obstruct us. You bring all your strength, energy and hatred to bear upon the Pandus.

13. Do you display to-day all your great manliness. I will to-day give battle, and destroy your desire for fight.

14. Having said this to Karna, the monarch, the son of Pandu, pierced him with ten arrows, made of iron and furnished with golden wings.

15. Then that Suta's son, the subduer of foes and a great bowman, pierced him in return as if smiling, O Bharata, with ten arrows furnished with heads like the calf's tooth.

16. Thus placed by Suta's son in contempt the mighty-armed heroe was worked up with anger like fire with oblation.

17. Then stretching his huge bow made of gold he set sharp arrows capable of breaking down the mountains.

18. With a view to kill the Suta's son he drew his bow to its fullest stretch and discharged that fatal shaft as the rod of the destroyer himself.

19. Discharged with great velocity and making a sound like that of a thunderbolt the arrow suddenly pierced the great car-warrior Karna on his left side.

20. Greatly assailed by the violence of that spike the powerful Karna, with weak-ed limbs, swooned away on his car his bow dropping from his hand.

21. Seeing Karna in that state the huge army of Dhritarashtra's son exclaimed Oh! and alas! and the faces of all the warriors became pale.

22. O monarch, witnessing the power of their king the Pandava army sent up leonine roars and cries of joy.

23. Regaining his sense in no time the dreadful son of Radha made up his mind to kill Yudhishthira.

24. Drawing his dreadful bow made of gold, Vijaya, the vailant son of Suta, began to resist Pandu's son with his sharp arrows.

25. Then with two razors he killed in that battle Chandradeva and Dandadhara, the two Panchala princes who guarded the wheels of the high-souled (Pandu king).

26. Each of those heroes stood by Yud-hishthira shining like the constellation Punarvasu by the side of the moon.

72. Yudhishthira again struck Karna with thirty arrows. He pierced Sushena and Satyasena each with three arrows.

28. He also struck every one of Karna's body guards with three straight arrows.

29. Then laughing and shaking his bow the son of Adhiratha wounded the king's body with a Bhalla, then pierced him with sixty arows and then sent up a loud war-cry.

30. Then to rescue the king many lead-ing Pandava warriors fell upon Karna in great anger and began to assail him with their arrows.

31—33. Satwaki, Chekitana, Yuyutshu, Shikhandin, the sons of Draupadi, the Prabhadrakas, the twins, Bhimasena, Shishupala, the Karushas, the Matsyas, the Vhuras, the Kaikayas the Kashis and the Koshalas, all those valiant and highly active warriors assailed Vashusena. The Panchala prince Janamejaya then struck Karna with many arrows.

34—35. Encircling Karna with a view to kill him they all rushed upon him with vari-ous arrows, such as boar-eared, Narachas, Nalika, Nishta, Calf-toothed, Vipata, razor shaped, with diverse other weapons, chariots horses, elephants.

36. Thus assailed on all sides by the leading Pandava warriors Karna invoked the assistance of the Brahma weapon and filled all the quarters with his arrows.

37. Like burning fire having arrows for its scorching flame Karna fought on con-suming that forest of Pandava troops.

38. Aiming some powerful weapons and laughing the noble Karna, the great bow-man, sundered the bow of that best of men, Yudhishthira.

39. Thereupon aiming ninety straight arrows within the twinkling of an eye Karna cut off, with those sharp arrows, the armour of his antagonist.

40. Made of gold and set with jewels that armour looked beautiful as if it fell down like the cloud driven by the wind and smitten by the rays of the sun.

41. The armour, adorned with jewels fallen off the body of that foremost of men, appeared like the sky in the night bespang-led with stars.

42. Having his armour sundered with those arrows the son of Pritha covered with blood, hurled in anger at the son of Adhi-ratha a dart made of iron.

43. He too cut of that (dart) shining in the sky with seven arrows; sundered with shafts by that great bowman it reached the earth.

44. Then striking Karna with four lances on his two arms, forehead and chest Yudhishthira again and again sent up loud shouts.

45. Then blood gushed out from Karna wounds. Then filled with anger breath-ing like a snake he cut off his enemy's standard and struck Pandava with three Bhallas. He also cut off his two quivers and car into pieces.

46. Riding on the car drawn by horses white as teeth and having black hairs which used to bear Partha the king fled away from the battle-field.

47. Unable to stand before Karna thus did the son of Pritha, with his charioteer Parshin slain, cheerlessly fly away.

48. Pursuing him and holding him with his hand, the son of Radha, O king, said, smiling and censuring the son of Pandu,

49. "In what family are you born? You are to observe the duties of a Kshatriya. Why do you leave the battle-field in haste, to save your life?

50. Methinks, you do not know the duties of a Kshatriya. Endued with Brahma force, you are better fitted for the study of the Vedas and sacrificial rites.

51. Do not, O son of Kunti, fight again. Do not approach heroes and use harsh words towards them and do not go to great battles."

52. Having said this and left off the son of Pritha the highly powerful Karna began to slay Pandava like the holder of thunderbolt, the army of Asuras.

53. Then the king Yudhishthira, O king, took to his heels quickly in great shame.

54. Seeing the king take to his heels, the Chedis, the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the powerful car-warrior Satyaki, the heroic sons of Draupadi and the twin sons of Madri followed him of eternal glory.

55. Thereupon beholding the retreat of the army of Yudhishthira the heroes pursued them in great delight.

56. Then there arose the leonine shout of the sons of Dhritarashtra accompanied by the sound of bugles, conch, Mridangas and the twang of bows.

57. Getting upon quickly the car of Srutakirti, Yudhishthira began to witness the prowess of Karna.

58. Then beholding his own army slain the pious king Yudhishthira said to his own warriors "Kill them; why do you sit idle?"

59. Thereupon obtaining the command of the king all the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas headed by Bhimasena rushed upon your sons.

60. O Bharata, then there arose a great tumult of the warriors, chariots, elephants, horses, infantry and weapons.

61. "Rise, strike, face the foe" uttering those words the warriors killed one another in that great battle.

62. On account of the showers of arrows discharged by them a shadow as that of clouds seemed to spread over the field abounding in best of men killing those weaker than they.

63. Deprived of their standards, flags, umbrellas, horses, drivers, weapons, arms, and other limbs, the kings, weakened, fell down on earth.

64. Resembling mountain summits, the best of elephants with their drivers slain, fell down like mountains clapped by thunderbolt.

65. With their armours, and other equipments torn and shattered thousands of horses and warriors fell down.

66. There fell in battle thousands of foot soldiers with their limbs wounded by weapons and deprived by hostile combatants of their elephants, horses and cars.

67. The earth was covered all over with heads of heroes, dreadful in battle, with expansive coppery eyes and with faces resembling the lotus or the moon.

68. People heard on the earth as well as in the sky noise proceeding from the singing and music of the band of Apsaras going in celestial cars.

69. Having placed on their cars thousands of heroes slain in battle the Apsaras went on.

70. Beholding that wonderful spectacle the heroes, desirous of attaining to heaven, quickly and delightedly killed one another.

71. In that battle the car-warriors fought wondrously with car-warriors, the infantry with infantry, the elephants with elephants and horses with horses.

72. When the battle, destructive of elephants, horses and men, thus raged on the field was enshrouded with dust raised by the troops; the enemies then killed enemies and friends killed friends.

73. Then there took place a skirmish destructive of life and sins—the warriors dragging one another by their locks, biting one another with their teeth, tearing one another with their nails and striking one another with their clenched fists and fighting with one another with bare arms.

74. As that battle, destructive of elephants, horses and men, raged on fiercely a river of blood flew from the bodies of men, horses and elephants.

75. That stream carried away many bodies of men, horses and elephants that fell there.

76. In that huge army abounding in men, horses and elephants, the river, formed by the blood of men, horses and elephants, became miry with flesh and that highly terrible river, striking terror into the timid, carried away the bodies of men, horses and elephants.

77. Some, desirous of victory, crossed it. Some plunged into its depths and some rose above its surface.

78. Their limbs, weapons and robes became all besmeared with blood. O foremost of Bharatas, some bathed in it, some drank its liquid.

79. We saw the cars, horses, men, elephants, armours, ornaments, robes, coats of mail, earth, sky and heaven all well-nigh besmeared with blood.

80. With the smell, the touch, the taste the exceedingly redness of the blood and its gushing sound almost all the warriors became very cheerless.

81. The Pandava heroes headed by

Bhimasena and Satyaki once more fell impetuously upon the army aleady beaten.

82. Beholding the irrepressible force of their attack, the army of your sons, O king, turned their back.

83—84. With armours and coats of mail, displaced, weapons and bows loosened frcm their hands, your army, abounding in cars, horses, elephants and men, fled away in all directions, being agitated by the enemy as a herd of elephants in the forest is afflicted by lions.

Thus ends the forty-ninth chapter, the combat fight in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(KARNA PARV)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Beholding the Pandava troops rush upon your army, O monarch, Duryodhana checked his soldiers on all sides, O best of Bharatas. Although your son O king, cried at the top of his voice still his flying troops refused to stop.

3. Then one and the other wing of the army, and Shakuni, the son of Suvala and the Kauravas well-armed fell upon Bhima in battle.

4. Beholding the army of Dhritarashtra, with all the kings flying Karna said to the king of Madras. "Proceed towards the car of Bhima."

5. Thus accosted by Karna, the king of Madras urged those best of horses of the color of swans to where Vrikodara was.

6. Thus urged by Salya, the ornament of battle those horses, approaching the chariot of Bhimasena, mingled in battle.

7. Seeing Karna approach Bhima too was filled with anger and made up his mind to kill him.

8. He then said to the heroic Satyaki and Dhristadyumna, the son of Prishata :— "You two protect the pious king Yudhisthira. With great difficulty he escaped a perilous situation in my presence.

9. Before my very eyes the wicked son of Radha cut off the king's armour and robes for the gratification of Duryodhana.

10. I shall go to-day to the end of that misery, O son of Prishata. I shall either slay to-day in battle Karna or he will kill me with a dreadful encounter. I tell yon the truth.

11. To-day I make over the king to you as a sacred trust; do you all, shaking off lethargy, address yourselves to protect him.

12. Having said these words and made all the quarters resound with a loud and leonine shout the mighty-armed Bhima proceeded towards Adhiratha's son.

13. Beholding Bhima, who takes delight in battle, advance quickly, the king of Madras said to the charioteer's son.

Salya said :—

14. Behold, O Karna, the large-armed son of Pandu, worked up with anger. Forsooth he wishes to discharge at you his anger, accumulated for a long time.

15. O Karna, this form of his, I had never seen before even on the destruction of Abhimanyu and the Rakshasa Ghatotkacha.

16. He bears such a form, burning like the fire of dissolution, as it appears that he, when angered, is capable of resisting the three worlds.

Sanjaya said :—

17. O king, while the son of Radha thus said to the king of Madras, Vrikodara, burning with anger, approached Karna.

18. Beholding Bhima, who takes delight in battle thus approach the son of Radha, as if smiling, said to Salya.

19. "O king of Madras, what you have said to me to-day regarding Bhimasena is all true; there is no doubt about it.

20. This Vrikodara is heroic, brave and wrathful. He does not care for any while protecting his body and is superior to all in vital strength.

21. While living secretly in the city of Virata, he depending merely on the strength of his own arms, slew secretly, to satisfy Draupadi, Kichaka with all his relations.

22. He to-day stands at the head of the battle, clad in mail and is beside himself with anger. He is ready to engage in battle with the destroyer armed with uplifted mace.

23. I have cherished this desire all through my life that either I shall kill Arjuna or Arjuna will kill me.

24—25. That desire of mine may be fulfilled to-day on account of my encounter with Bhima. If I kill Bhima or overpower him Partha may come against me. That will be good for me. Decide without any delay what you think proper for the moment.

26—27. Hearing these words of the highly energetic son of Radha Salya replied :—" O heroe, proceed against the highly powerful Bhimasena. Having overpowered him you may then obtain Phalguna.

28. Your determination, your long-cherished desire, O Karna, will be accomplished to-day. I tell you the truth.

29. Thus accosted Karna once more said to Salya. "Either I will kill Arjuna in battle or he will kill me. Givng your heart to battle, proceed where Vrikodara is."

30. Then, O king, Salya quickly went on his car where that great bowman Bhima, was engaged in belabouring your army.

31. Then there arose, O king, the sound of trumpets and drums when Karna and Bhima met.

32. Worked up with anger the powerful Bhimasena began to rout your army, whom it is so difficult to vanquish, with his sharp and polished arrows.

33. O monarch, that encounter between Bhima and Karna in battle became dreadful and the noise thereof was tremendous.

34. Beholding Bhima approach towards him, Karna, otherwise called Vaikartana or Vrisha, filled with anger, struck him on the chest with an arrow.

35. Once more the highly energetic Karna covered him with a shower of arrows. Thus struck by the charioteer's son Bhima two enshrouded him with Narachas.

36. With nine sharp and bent arrows he struck Karna who again cut off his bow in twain with winged arrows.

37. Sundering his bow he once more struck him on the chest with a highly keen arrow capable of cutting off all kinds of arms.

38. Then, O king, taking up another bow, Bhima, who knew where the vital parts are, pierced the son of the charioteer to the very vitals with sharpened arrows.

39. Then Karna struck him with twenty-five arrows like a hunter striking a proud and infuriate elephant in the forest with a number of blazing brands.

40—41. Thereupon with his limbs mangled by arrows, beside himself with anger and his eyes reddened with pride and ire the son of Pandu set on his bow a highly impetuous and excellent arrow capable of bearing a heavy strain and riving the mountains.

42. Stretching with great force his bow to his cars the Maruti (Bhima), filled with anger and desirous of slaying Karna discharged it.

43. Discharged by the powerful Bhima, that arrow, making a sound like that of a thunderbolt, struck Karna in that battle like the thunderbolt itself clapping a mountain.

44. O descendant of Kuru, thus struck by Bhimsena, the Commander Suta's son sat down senseless on the terrace of his car.

45. Beholding the Suta's son insensible the king of Madras carried him away on his car from the battle-field.

46. After Karna's defeat Bhima began to belabour the huge army of Dhartarashtra like Indra routing the Danavas.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter the defeat of Karna in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER LI.

Dhristarashtra said :—

1. Highly difficult was this feat performed by Bhima, O Sanjaya, by which the mighty-armed Karna was caused to lie down on his car.

2. "There is Karna who alone will kill the Pandava along with Srinjayas"—This my son Duryodhana oftentimes said to me.

3. Beholding the son of Radha vanquished by Bhimsena in battle what did my son Duryodhana do afterwards ?

Sanjaya said :—

Seeing Karana's retreat in that great battle, your son, O king, said to his own brothers.

5. "May good betide you ! Go quickly and rescue the son of Radha who is plunged into the fathomless calamity consequent upon the fear of Bhimasena."

6. Thus commanded by the king those princes, worked up with anger and desirous of killing Bhimasena, proceeded towards him like a swarm of insects,towards a blazing fire.

7—8. They were Srutarvan, Durddhara Kratha, Vivitsu, Vikata, Soma, Nishangin, Kavachin, Pashin, Nawa, Upanedaka Duspradharsha, Savahu, Vatavega, Suvarchas, Dhanurgraha, Durmada, Jalasandha, Shala and Saha.

9. Encircled by large car-force, those highly energetic and powerful princes approached Bhimasena and surrounded him on all sides.

10—11. They discharged at him from all sides showers of arrows of various sorts.

Thus assailed by them, O king, the highly powerful Bhima soon killed fifty leading car-warriors and five hundred from amongst your sons who fell upon him.

12. Worked up with anger, Bhima, O king, with a Bhalla, cut off the head of Vivitsu, adorned with ear-rings and a crown and a face resembling the full-moon. Thus cut off the prince fell down on earth.

13. Beholding their heroic brother slain your other sons, from all sides, rushed upon the terribly powerful Bhima.

14. With two Bhallas Bhima killed two other sons of yours in that great battle.

15. Then Vikata and Saha, looking like two celestial youths, fell down on earth like a couple of trees uprooted by a tempest.

16. Then in a moment Bhima despatched Kratha to the abode of Yama with a long keen arrow. Deprived of life that prince fell down on earth.

17. O king, when those your heroic sons, great bowmen, were being thus killed people began to send loud cries of lamentations.

18. When your army was once more agitated Bhima sent Nanda and Upananda in that great battle to the abode of the Regent of death.

19. Beholding Bhimasena in battle behave like the Destroyer himself at the end of Yuga your sons, worked up greatly with fear, took to their heels.

20. Seeing those sons of yours thus slain Karna once more urged on his swan-like horses to where that son of Pandu was.

21. The horses, driven by the king of Madras, approached quickly the car of Bhimasena and entered into battle.

22. The encounter, O king, that once more took place between Karna and Bhima, was highly dreadful and fierce and accompanid by a loud noise.

23. Seeing, O king, those two powerful car-warriors near each other I became curious to observe the course of fight.

24. Then boasting of his power in battle, O king, Bhima covered Karna with Naracha in the presence of your sons.

25. Then Karna, a master of best weapons, worked up with anger, struck Karna with nine Bhallas purely made of iron.

26. Thus struck by Karna the highly powerful and mighty-armed Bhima struck his antagonist in return with seven arrows shot off his bow-string drawn to his ear.

27. Then sighing like a serpent of deadly venom, O king, Karna covered the son of Pandu with a thick shower of arrows.

28. Then covering the mighty car-warrior Karna with a shower of arrows in return before the very eyes of the Kauravas Bhima sent up a loud war-cry.

29. Then worked up with anger Karna grasped his bow very strongly and struck Bhima with ten Kanka-feathered arrows whetted on stone. With another sharp Bhalla he cut off Bhima's bow.

30. Then taking up a dreadful Parigha adorned with gold resembling the rod of death the mighty-armed Bhima, with a view to kill Karna, hurled it at him making a great roar.

31. Then the serpentine arrow Karna sundered into pieces Parigha that was about to fall making a sound like that of a thunderbolt.

32. Then taking up a bow with grim grasp Bhima, the grinder of enemies, covered Karna with arrows.

33. Then there took place a dreadful encounter between Karna and Bhima desirous of discomfitting each other every moment like that between Hari and Indra.

34. Thereupon O king, drawing firmly to his ear the bow Karna struck Bhima with three arrows.

35. Then pierced by Karna the great bowman, the foremost of the strong, took up a dreadful arrow capable of piercing Karna's body.

36. Piercing his coat of mail and body O king, that arrow entered into the earth like a snake entering into a noble-hill.

37. Then with that heavy stroke Karna trembled on his car, as if bewildered like a mountain at the time of earth-quake.

38. Thereupon O great king, filled with anger and revenge Karna discharged twenty-five Narachas at Bhima.

39. With one arrow he then cut off Bhima's standard, and with another Bhalla he despatched Bhima's driver to the abode of Yama.

40. Then quickly cutting off his bow with another winged arrow Karna deprived Bhima of dreadful feats of his car.

41. O best of Bharatas, deprived of his car the mighty-armed Bhima, who resembled the Wind-God, took up a mace and jumped down from his excellent car.

42. Jumping down furiously from his car Bhima began to kill your troops, O king, like the wind destroying the autumnal clouds.

43. Suddenly the son of Pandu, the consumer of enemies worked up with anger, dispersed seven hundred elephants with tusks as large as plough-shares and all skilled in smiting hostile soldiers.

44. The powerful heroe, conversant with vital parts, killed all those elephants striking them on their temples, frontal globes eyes and in parts above the gums.

45. Then filled with fear those animals ran away. But again urged on by their drivers they surrounded Bhimasena like the clouds covering the sun.

46 Like Indra, striking down mountains with his thunderbolt Bhima, with his mace, struck down those seven hundred elephants with their riders, weapons and standards.

47. Then the son of Kunti, the subduer of foes, struck down fifty two highly powerful elephants belonging to the son of Suvala.

48. Then scorching your army the Pandava killed, in battle, a hundred of cars, and hundreds of powerful foot soldiers.

49. Scorched by the sun and the high-souled Bhima your army began to shrink like a piece of leather spread over a fire.

50. O foremost of Bharatas, filled with anxiety consequent upon the fear of Bhima, your troops avoided him and fled away in all directions.

51. Then five hundred car-warriors, clad in excellent coats of mail, fell upou Bhima with loud shouts discharging a shower of arrows on all sides.

52. Like Vishnu killing the demons Bhima, with his mace, destroyed those valiant warriors with their drivers, cars, banners, standards and weapons.

53. Then three thousand cavalry led by Sakuni, held in esteem by all brave men and armed with darts, swords and lances, dashed on the great Bhima.

54. Advancing impetuously towards them and coursing in various ways that slayer of foes killed them with his mace.

55. While they were thus being assailed by Bhima loud sounds arose among them like those from among a herd of elephants struck with a large piece of rock.

56. Having killed those three thousand excellent horses of Suvala's son in that way he rode upon another car and worked up with anger proceeded against the son of Radha.

57. Karna too, O king, covered with arrows in battle Dharma's son, the subduer of foes and struck down his charioteer.

58. Beholding him thus fly away quickly in battle the mighty car-warrior Karna pursued him shooting staight Kanka feathered arrows.

59. Covering the earth and sky with arrows, the son of the wind-God (Bhima) covered him with a shower of arrows while he pursued the king.

60. Then quickly returning, the son of Radha, the subduer of enemies, covered Bhima on all sides with sharpened arrows.

61. Then placing himself on the side of Bhima's car, O Bharata, the highly energetic Satyaki began to afflict Karna who was in front of Bhima.

62—63. Though greatly assailed by Satyaki Karna still approached Bhima; approaching each other, those two best of archers, the two highly energetic heroes, appeared highly resplendant as they discharged arrows at each other.

64. Spread by them, O king, in the sky those arrows, shining as the backs of crane, looked exceedingly fierce and terrible.

65. On account of those thousands of arrows, O king, neither the rays of the sun nor the cardinal quarters could be seen either by ourselves or by the enemy.

66. The fierceness of the sun's rays burning at midday was removed by those thick showers of arrows discharged by Karna and the son of Pandu.

67. Beholding the son of Suvala, Kritavarma, Drona's son, Adhiratha's son and Kripa fight with the Pandavas the Karuvas rallied and came back to the battle.

68. O king, the army, dashing impetuously against the enemies, caused a tumult resembling the terrible noise made by many oceans swollen with rains.

69. Furiously engaged in fight the two armies became filled with delight as the warriors saw and seized one another.

70. When the sun was at its meridian they engaged in fight the like of which was never seen or heard of before.

71. One powerful division, meeting with another such, rushed upon it with impetuousity like a huge collection of water rushing towards the ocean.

72. The din, caused by the two armies as they roared at each other, was loud and deep like that which is heard when several oceans mingle with one another.

73. That the two furious armies, approaching one another, formed one mass like two furious rivers that run into each other.

74. Then a dreadful encounter took place between the Kurus and Pandavas who were actuated by the desire of gaining glory.

75. O descendant of Bharata, as those warriors called one another by name a regular confusion of voices was heard.

76. In that battle, his antagonist was made to hear by a heroe whatever matter of ridicule he had of his father, mother, conduct or character.

77. Beholding those heroes reviling one another in battle, O king, I thought that the lease of their life had run out.

78. Beholding the bodies of those highly energetic and wrathful heroes my mind was possessed by great fear, and I thought, "what will become of them ?"

79. Then, O king, the mighty car-warriors, Pandavas and Kauravas, began to pierce one another with sharpened arrows.

Thus ends the fifty first chapter, the confused fight in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER LII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Desirous of slaying one another and cherishing hatered, the Kshatriyas, O monarch, killed one another in battle.

2. Cars, horses, men and elephants, O monarch, in large numbers, encountered one another on all sides.

3. We saw the falling maces, Parighas, Kunapas, lances, arrows and rockets discharged at one another in that terrible encounter.

4. Dreadful showers of arrows shot through like locusts.

5. Elephants struck elephants, horses routed horses and the car-warriors fought with car-warriors.

6. There fought foot-soldiers with foot-soldiers, and the infantry with the cars and elephants and horsemen and elephants with the three other kinds of forces. They began to crush, O monarch, and grind one another.

7. On account of those combatants striking one another and shouting at the top of their voices, the battle-field became aweful, resembling the slaughter ground of creatures.

8. Covered with blood, the earth looked like a vast plain in the season of rains covered with red coccinella.

9. The earth assumed, as it were, the form of a youthful maiden of great beauty clad in white robes dyed with deep red, Variegated with flesh and blood the earth appeared as if decked with gold.

10—11. Large numbers of heads, cut off from trunks, and arms and thighs, and ear-rings and other ornaments stripped off the bodies of the warriors, collars, cuirasses, bodies of brave bowmen, coats of mail and banners, lay scattered on the earth.

12. O king, the elephants approaching other elephants tore one another with their tusks. Struck with the tusks of assailing elephants they looked beautiful.

13. Bathed in blood those huge creatures looked resplendent like moving hills covered with metals and streams of liquid chalk.

14. Many of them seized the lances hurled by horsemen whilst others broke and twisted them.

15. Many huge elephants, with their armours cut off with arrows, looked like mountains divested of clouds at the approach of the winter.

16. Many leading elephants, struck with gold-winged arrows, looked beautiful, like mountains whose summits are lighted with torches.

17. Struck by their antagonists some of those creatures, huge as hills, fell down in battle like winged mountains.

18. Others, afflicted with arrows and much pained by the wound, fell down on the earth in that dreadful encounter with their frontal globes or the parts between their tusks.

19. Others roared like lions. And many emitting terrible sounds ran hither and thither, and many, O king, uttered cries of pain.

20. Horses, adorned with golden trappings, killed by arrows, fell down or became weak or ran in all directions.

21. Others, wounded with arrows or dragged, fell down on the earth making diverse kinds of motion in agony.

22—23. Men also slain fell down on the earth uttering many cries. Many beholding their relatives, fathers, grand-fathers,—while others, seeing their retreating enemies called one another by their own and their family names.

24. Cut off by enemies, the arms of many warriors adorned with golden ornaments, fell down on the earth and writhed in agony.

25. Thousands of such arms fell down on the earth and sprang up, and many seemed to dart forward like five-headed snakes.

26. O king, those arms, resembling the bodies of serpents, pasted with gold and besmeared with blood, appeared like little mountains.

27. When such a dreadful battle raged on all sides, people not knowing themselves killed one another.

28. When everything was covered with dust raised by the weapons, they, O king, could not recognise who were their own, and who were their enemies.

29. Then there took place a dreadful encounter and there flew a river of blood striking terror unto all.

30. It was filled with heads forming the rocks. The hairs of the warriors formed the floating weeds and mosses. Bones formed the fishes; and bows, arrows and maces formed the rafts by which to cross them.

31. Flesh and blood formed their mire. Thus dreadful and terrible rivers, with currents swelled by blood, were formed there.

32. They struck terror unto the timid and increased the joy of the brave. Those awful rivers led to the abode of Yama. And many plunged into those rivers striking terror unto the Kshatriyas and died.

33. O best of men, on account of many carnivorous animals emitting yells on all sides the battle field became terrible, like the territory of the Regent of the Dead.

34. And innumberable, headless trunks rose on all sides. And many terrible creatures eating flesh and drinking blood and fat began to dance around.

35. And gratified with fat, marrow and flesh crows, vultures and cranes were seen to move about in delight.

36. The heroes, however, O king, shaking off fear and observing the warrior's vow, fearlessly did their duty.

37. On that field where innumerable arrows anddarts passed through the air and where various carnivorous animals in large numbers and the brave warriors armed moved about displaying their powers.

38—39. They called out one another by their own and family names. And many taking the names of their fathers and families began to assail one another with darts, lances and battle axes.

40. In that onset the Kuru army became divested of its strength and unable to stand any longer like a ship foundered on the bosom of the ocean.

Thus ends the fifty-second chapter, the thick fight in the Karna Parva.

CHAPTER LIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. While that war, destructive of the Kshatriyas, raged on, the dreadful twang of the Gandiva bow was heard, O Sire.

2. O king, there the son of Pandu brought about the destruction of the Samsaptakas, the Kosalas and the army of Narayana.

3. The Samsaptakas too, desirous of acquiring victory, and worked up with rage, made a downpour of their arrows from all sides on the head of Partha.

4. That shower of arrows, O king, the powerful Arjuna soon checked and plunging into battle destroyed many leading car-warriors.

5. Having assailed the car-warriors with Kanka-feathered and sharp arrows, Partha approached the mighty car-warrior, Susharma.

6. That foremost of car-warriors made a downpour of arrows, and the Samsaptakas too covered Partha with their shafts.

7. Thereupon, Susharma having pierced Partha with ten quick-coursing arrows struck Janarddana on his right arm with three arrows. Then with another Bhalla he struck down his standard.

8. That huge monkey, created by Vishwakarma, O king, being terrified emitted a tremendous roar.

9. Hearing the roar of the monkey, your army was agitated. And possessed by terrible fear they became inactive.

10. Becoming inactive, O king, that army looked like the garden of Chitraratha filled with various flowers.

11. Then regaining their consciousness, O foremost of Kurus, your soldiers made a downpour of arrows on Arjuna like clouds on a mountain.

12. They, then, all surrounded the huge car of Pandava. And then assailing him with sharpened arrows they, desirous of killing him, began to emit terrific cries.

13. Then assailing with great vehemence his horses, the wheels of his car, as well as his car, O sire, they began to send up leonine roars.

14. Some among them seized the long arms of Kesava and others seized Arjuna who was on his car.

15. Then shaking his arms on the field of battle Keshava struck down all of them like an elephant assailing other leading elephants.

16. Surrounded by those mighty car-warriors, and, beholding his car assailed and thus Keshava attacked, Partha, boiling with rage, overthrew a large number of car-warriors and foot-soldiers.

17. He then covering all those warriors, who were near him, with arrows, worthy of a close thus contest addressed, Keshava :—

18. "Behold, O Krishna, O you of long arms, those numberless Samsaptakas, bent upon a dreadful feat, are killed by thousands.

19. O foremost of Yadus, there is none on earth, save myself who is capable of bearing such a close attack on his car."

20. Having said this Vibhatsu blew his Devadatta conch and Krishna his Panchajanya filling the earth and sky with the blare.

21. Hearing that sound the army of the Samsaptakas began to tremble and were filled with fear.

22. O monarch, then repeatedly invoking the Naga weapon, Paridava, the slayers of hostile heroes, tied down their legs.

23. When they were thus bound down by the high-souled son of Pandu, O king, they became inactive like horses and dogs.

24. Then the son of Pandu began to slay all those inactive warriors as Indra killed the Asuras in the days of yore in his encounter with Taraka.

25. They, thus being slaughtered in battle, began to leave the best of cars and throw off all their weapons.

26. Having their legs bound down they could make no effort, O king. Then Partha slew them all with his straight arrows.

27. All those warriors, against whom Partha discharged his weapon of tying legs, were encircled by serpents in battle.

28. Then beholding his army thus bound down, O king, the mighty car-warrior Susharma speedily invoked his Sauparna weapon.

29. Then numerous vultures began to come down and devour snakes. Then, O king, beholding those birds the serpents began to fly away.

30. Freed from that foot-trapping weapon the Samsaptakas, O monarch, looked like the sun giving rays unto all creatures when freed from clouds.

31. Thus freed, the warriors once more discharged their arrows and weapons at Arjuna's car. And all of them pierced Partha with numerous weapons.

32. Cutting off with his own arrows the brightly weapons showered on him, Vasava's son, the slayer of hostile heroes, began to kill those warriors.

33. Thereupon Susharma, O king, struck Arjuna to his very vitals with arrows and three weapons.

34. Deeply wounded and feeling great pain Arjuna sunk down on the terrace of his car. Then all the soldiers cried aloud Partha is killed.

35. Then there arose the blare of conch, the profuse sound of bugles, and many other musical instruments. and the leonine roars of the warriors.

36. Then regaining his consciousness the highly energetic Arjuna of white steeds and with Krishna for his charioteer, quickly discharged the Aindra weapon.

37. Thereupon, thousands of arrows were seen on all sides which killed the kings and elephants. Thousands of horses and cars were also destroyed by those weapons.

38. The army being thus slaughtered they were possessed by terrible fear.

39. O descendant of Bharata, there was no man amongst the Samsaptakas and Gopalas who could withstand Arjuna.

40. There in the very presence of all the heroes Arjuna began to destroy your army. Beholding that slaughter all of them were petrified and could not display their prowess.

41. Having killed ten thousand warriors in that battle the son of Pandu shone like the blazing fire without smoke.

42. He then killed fourteen thousand warriors, Ayuta cars and three thousand elephants.

43. Then the Samsaptakas surrounded Dhananjaya determined upon either gaining victory or meeting with death.

44. Then there took place a dreadful encounter between your army, O king, and the heroic, diadem-decked son of Pandu.

Thus ends the fifty third chapter in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Beholding the Kuru army afflicted with the fear of Pandu's son and sinking like a boat foundered in the ocean, Kritavarma, Kripa, Drona's son, Suta's son, Ulaka, Suvala's son Shakuni and the king himself with his brother, came to their rescue.

3. Then there took place an encounter for the time being capable of striking terror unto the timid and increasing the delight of the heroes.

4. The downpour of arrows made by Kripa in the battle covered the Srinyajas like a swarm of locusts.

5. Thereupon Shikhandin, worked up with anger, speedily approached the son of Gotama and discharged a shower of arrows upon that best of men.

6. And checking that downpour of arrows Kripa, conversant with the use of mighty weapons, and filled with anger, struck in that encounter Shikhandin with ten arrows.

7. Then Shikhandin, worked up with anger, pierced Kripa with seven straight Kanka-feathered arrows.

8. Then the Brahmana Kripa, a mighty car-warrior, piercing heavily with sharp arrows, deprived Shikhandin of his horses, charioteer and car.

9. Then jumping down from the car, the heroes of which were slain, the mighty car-warrior speedily took up his sword and armour and approached the Brahmana.

10. Then he covered him suddenly who was approaching with straight arrows. This was indeed wonderful.

11. We then, O king, beheld a wonderful spectacle like the flying of rocks. And Shikhandin remained inactive in that battle.

12. Beholding Shikhandin covered with arrows by Kripa, O foremost of kings, the mighty car-warrior Dhristadyumna speedily approached him.

13. Thereupon the mighty car-warrior Kritavarma vehemently resisted Dhristadyumna who was advancing towards the son of Saradwata.

14. Drona's son then resisted Yudhishthira who was advancing with his own son and arms against the son of Saradwata.

15. Your son then impeded with a downpour of arrows the approach of the two car-warriors Nakula and Sahadeva.

16. Karna, the son of Vikartana, O descendant of Bharata, then resisted in battle Bhimasena, Karushas, Kaikeyas and Srinjayas.

17. Then in the battle, O Sire, Kripa quickly hurled arrows at Shikhandin as to burn him down.

18. Whirling his sword repeatedly (Shikhandin) then with his sword cut off all those gold-decked arrows that were discharged at him.

19. The son of Gotama then quickly cut off with his arrows the shield of Prishata's son that was adorned with a hundred moons. At this his people made a loud uproar.

20. Deprived of his shield, O monarch, and brought under the influence of Kripa, he, with his sword, advanced like a sick man advancing towards death.

21. O king, Chitraketu's son Suketu quickly proceeded towards the highly powerful (Sikhandin) who was thus distressed and assailed by the son of Saradwata.

22. Having covered in battle the Brahmana with sharp arrows, that one of immeasureable energy, advanced towards the the car of Gotama's son.

23. Beholding that Brahmana, observant of vows thus engaged in battle, Shikhandin, O king, quickly proceeded there.

24. O king, having pierced the son of Gotama with nine arrows Suketu once more pierced him with seventy and again with three.

25. He then cut off his bow and arrows; then with another he pierced greatly his driver to the very vitals.

26. Thereupon worked up with anger Gotama took up a fresh and strong bow and cut off Suketu to the very vital part with thirty arrows.

27. All his limbs were weakened and he shook on that best of cars as a tree trembles greatly during an earthquake.

28. Then with a razor-sharpened arrow he sundered from body his head still trembling with shining ear-rings, crown and head-protector.

29. His head fell down on the earth like a piece of meat stolen away by a hawk, afterwards his body, O Eternal one, fell down on the earth.

30. O Emperor, when he was slain, all his followers, leaving behind the son of Gotama in the battle-field fled, away in ten directions.

31. Encircling the highly powerful Dhristadyumna in the battle-field Kritavarma said to him :—"Wait! wait!"

32. Then there took place a terrible and wonderful encounter between the Vrishnis and Parshatas like that of two angry hawks, O king, for a piece of meat.

33. Worked up with anger, Dristadyumna, in that battle, assailed Hridika's son violently and struck him on the chest with nine arrows.

34. Thus Assailed by a Parohata in battle Kritavarma covered him, his chariot and horses with arrows.

35. O king, thus covered along with his car Dhristadyumna became invisible like the sun enshrouded by clouds surcharged with water.

36. Withstanding him with gold feathered arrows, O king, Dhristadyumna appeared in battle with wounds.

37. Obtaining Kritavarma, Parshata, the commander of the forces, worked up with anger, made a terrible downpour of arrows.

58. In that battle Hridika's son with many thousand arrows, all on a sudden, dispelled that highly dreadful shower of arrows that was about to fall on him.

39. Beholding in that battle that fearful downpour of arrows thus dispelled by him Prishata's son, approching Kritavarma, withstood him.

40. With a sharpened spike he despatched his charioteer to the abode of Death. Slain he fell down from the chariot.

41. Having vanquished his highly powerful enemy, the mighty Dhristadyumna speedily withstood the Kauravas in battle with arrows.

42. Thereupon emitting leonine roars your warriors ran towards Dhristhdymuna, and again an encounter took place.

Thus ends fifty-fourth chapter entitled the battle of Samsaptakas in Karna Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

2—2. Beholding Yudhishthira protected by Sini's son as well as by the war-like sons of Draupadi, the son of Drona, as if delighted, proceeded against him, scattering gold-feathered arrows, showing various ways of his light-handedness.

3. Thereupon he filled the sky with arrows of the vigour of celestial weapons. That one, conversant with the use of weapons, withstood Yudhisthira in battle.

4. When the sky was covered with the arrows of Drona's son nothing could be perceived. The space before the warriors was filled with arrows.

5. The sky being covered with a net-work of golden arrows it appeared as if a canopy had been spread there.

6. O king, the sky being covered with a net-work of shining arrows a shadow appeared there like that of clouds.

7. When the sky was thus converted into one sheet of arrows it was a wonderful sight to look at. No creature could range in the sky at that time.

8. Satyaki, although trying his very best, the pious son of Pandu and other warriors, could not display their prowess.

9. Beholding the light-handness of Drona's son, all the mighty car-warriors there, O king, were filled with wonder. All the kings could not look at him, as if shedding lustre of the sun.

10—11. Thereupon, when their soldiers were being thus slaughtered, the mighty car-warriors, the sons of Droupadi, Satyaki, the pious king Yudhishthira, and the Panchalas, all united, giving up the dreadful fear of death, rushed towards the son of Drona.

11. Piercing the son of Drona with twenty seven arrows he again pierced him with seven gold-plated winged arrows.

12. Yudhishthira struck him with seventy three arrows and Prativinda with seven. Shrutakarma cut him with three arrows and Shrutakirti with five.

13. Sutasoma struck him with nine arrows and Satanika with seven. And many other warrior struck him from all sides with a number of shafts.

14. Thereupon worked up with rage, O king, he, sighing like a deadly serpent, struck Satyaki with twenty five sharpened arrows.

15. And he struck Srutakirti with nine arrows and Sutasoma with five; and Prativinda with three arrows and Srutakarma with eight.

16. And he struck Raja Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma, with five arrows and Satanika with nine. And then he struck other warriors with two shafts each, and cut into pieces the bow of Srutakirti with very sharp pointed arrows.

17. After this he took up another fresh bow and at once struck Drona's son with three arrows and began to shower on him numerous sharp-pointed arrows.

18. Then, O monarch, O great sire of the Bharata race, the son of Drona covered the Pandava army with showers of arrows.

19. Just after this the highly spirited son of Drona, casting a smiling look upon Yudhisthira, simultaneously cut off his bow and struck him with three arrows.

20. Upon that, O king, the son of Dharma took up a very big bow and darted, one after another, seventy shafts, piercing the arms and breast of the son of Drona.

21. Then Satwaki, filled with anger, roared aloud and broke down in that very battle the bow of that terrible afflicter, Drona's son, with the seme-circular and sharp arrow of his own.

22. When his bow was thus cut off that hero of heroes, Drona's son, with a dart quickly struck the driver of Satwaki's car down and unseated him from his chariot.

23. Then, O Bharata, the mighty son of Drona, taking up another bow, covered the son of Sini with quite a shower of arrows.

24. When thus, O Bharata, the driver was killed Satwaki's horses were seen to run riot in the battle-field.

25. Then the Pandava army, commanded by Raja Yudhishthira, rushed furiously towards Drona's son, the foremost of all the wielders of weapons, and began to shower sharp shafts upon him.

26. Seeing them thus coming upon him as so many incarnations of anger the great terror of foes, Drona's son, received them all in the terrible battle with a spiteful smile.

27. Then the great car-warrior, Drona's son, burnt down, as it were, the Pandava troops in the battle with the flames of his arrows, just as the forest fire burns the dry hays and straws.

28. O foremost of Bharata's race, the Pandava army, thus provoked by the son of Drona, became exceedingly agitated as the water of a river is troubled by a whale.

29. O Maharaj, seeing the bravery of Drona's son made the people think, as if the Pandava army already were killed.

30. Then the great car-warrior Yudhisthira being enranged and filled with revengeful spirit thus addressed the son of Drona in a challenging one :—

31. O mightiest of men, neither have you any feeling nor do you cherish any sense of gratitude when to-day you are ready even to slay me.

32. To study and to practise asceticism and charities are the duties of a Brahman, and the Kshatriyas only are authorised to use the bow. So it seems that you are a Brahmin in name only.

33. However, O you of mighty arms, I am determined upon killing the Kourava army in the battle just before your eyes. Do your best. I call you a scum of the Brahman race.

34. Thus addressed, O monarch, the son of Drona smiled bashfully, and pondering over what was proper and meet could not give any reply.

35. Getting thus terribly annoyed the son of Drona kept quiet for a while and then began to shower arrows upon the Pandavas like unto the Destroyer himself when bent upon destroying the entire creation.

36. Thus covered, as it were, by the arrows of the son of Drona Pritha's son fled away from the field leaving his large army.

37. After Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, had thus fled from the field, O king, the high-minded son of Drona also left the spot.

38. Yudhisthira then, O king, thus avoiding the son of Drona in the great battle, marched against your army being determined to wage a ruthless slaughter.

Thus ends the fifty-fifth chapter of the Karna Parva called the retreating of Yudhisthira from the battle-field.

CHAPTER LVI.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After this Vaikartana, himself resisting Bhimasena aided by the king of Panchala, Chedi and Kaikeya, showered numberless arrows upon him.

2. Karna killed in the battle many strong car-warriors of the Chedis, Karushas and Srinjayas in the very presence of Bhimasena.

3. Then Bhimsena leaving Karna, the most powerful car-warrior, rushed towards the Kourava force like a blazing forest fire.

4. The Suta's son too began to slay by thousands the mighty bowmen of the Panchalas, the Kaikeas and the Srinyajas.

5. Indeed, the mighty car-warriors Karna, Partha and Vrikodera began to annihilate the Panchalas, Samasaptakas and Kauravas respectively.

6. For your bad policy, O king, all these Kshatriyas, burnt down, as it were, by those three heroes resembling three burning flames, got exterminated.

7. Thereupon, O foremost of the Bharatas, Duryodhana, being enraged, pierced Nakula and the four holes of his car with nine arrows.

Then again, O lord of men, your highly energetic son cut down the golden standard of Shahadeva with a razor.

9. Nakula then, O king, being greatly enraged, struck your son with seventy three arrows and Sahadeva with five. Filled with anger he struck,

10. Then, both of those great warriors of the Bharata race and the foremost of bowmen, on the breast with five arrows each.

11. Then he cut off the bows of both of those two warriors with two of his broad-pointed arrows, and suddenly, O king he pierced both of them with seventy three arrows.

12. Each of them, taking up two beautiful bows resembling those of Indra's, looked very graceful like two celestial youths in the battle-field.

13. Then, O king, those two brothers, greatly active in battle, began to throw terrible shafts in ceaseless torrents upon their cousins like two great masses of thick clouds pouring their contents on the hills.

14. Thereupon, O king, your son, the great car-warrior, being greatly enraged resisted those twin sons of Pandu, the great bowmen, with numberless arrows.

15. The bow of your son, O Bharata, was repeatedly drawn to a circle and the arrows were ceaselessly issued from it towards all directions.

16. Covered with Duryodhana's arrows those sons of Pandu ceased to shine brightly as the sun and the moon lose their splendour when enveloped with a mass of dark clouds.

17. Indeed, O king, those gold-winged arrows, sharpened on stone, covered all the sides like the rays of the sun.

18. When the firmament was thus covered and the whole sky looked like a sheet of arrows the twin brothers appeared like the destroyer himself.

19. But, on the other hand, beholding the valour of your son all the car-warriors took the twin sons of Madri to be at the point of death.

20. Then, O king, the mighty car-warrior Parshata, the commander of the Pandava army, went towards the direction of Suyodhana (Duryodhana).

21. Violating the regimental order of those two great car-warriors, the two brave sons of Madri, Dhristadyumna began to oppose your son with his arrows.

22. Then that highly energetic hero, your son, the foremost of men, full of revengeful spirit and smiling scoffingly, struck the prince of the Panchalas with twenty-five arrows.

23. Again the most energetic son of yours, actuated by the eager desire of taking revenge, struck the Panchala prince once with sixty arrows and again with five, and roared aloud.

24. Then the king, O sire, cut off, in the fight, with his razor-shaped arrow his enemy's bow and the leathern fence with the arrows fixed thereon.

25. Throwing away that broken bow, that oppressor of foes, the prince of Panchala, quickly took up a new and more elastic one.

26. Then that great bowman, Dhristadyumna, with blood-shot eyes, shone on his car like a burning flame.

27. Then, O chief of Bharatas, the heroe Dhristadyumna, bent upon killing him, discharged fifteen sharp shafts, called Narachas, which looked like hissing serpents.

28. These shafts, set with the feathers of Kanka's (peacocks') and sharpened on stone, were discharged with such a force that cutting through the gold bedecked armour of the king, they ran through his body and entered into the earth.

29. Being deeply wounded, O king, your son looked exceedingly grand like a Kinsuka tree full of flowers in the spring.

30. His armour being thus cut through and himself being fatigued with the wounds, and his feelings being awfully excited he cut off Dhristadyumna's bow with a broad pointed arrow.

31. Then, O lord of the earth, the king penetrated ten arrows into the forehead of his assailant whose bow had already been cut off by him.

32. These shafts, polished by the blacksmith, looked on the face of Dhristadyumna like so many black bees on a full blown lily desirous of sucking the sweet honey.

33. Throwing that broken bow aside Dhristadyumna quickly took up another bow, and with it sixteen broad-pointed arrows.

34. Then with five of these arrows he slew Duryodhana's four horses and his Suta charioteer, and with another he cut off his gilded bow.

35. And with remaining ten shafts the son of Prishata cut off the royal umbrella, the spear, the sword, the mace, the car with Upashkara and the flag of your son.

36. Alas, all the chiefs saw the beautiful standard of the Kuru king, adorned with golden Angada and bearing the likeness of an elephant set with jewels, cut off by Dhristadyumna.

37. Then, O foremost of the Bharata's race, Duryodhana, thus deprived of all his weapons in the battle, was protected by his brothers.

38. In the very sight of Dhristadyumna. Dandadhara, taking the king upon his own car, quickly carried him away from the field.

39. In the meantime, the greatly powerful Karna, having killed Satyaki, proceeded straight on towards the slayer of Drona for the rescue of the Kuru king.

40. And the son of Sini speedily pursued him striking him with arrows as an elephant pursues his rival piercing him with his tusks on the rear.

41. Thus, O king, the battle raged furiously amongst these sturdy heroes of both the armies and the spot, lying between Karna and the son of Prishta, grew simply terrifying.

42. Not a single combatant, of either party, turned his face from the field. Karna then rushed towards the Panchala with great speed.

43. Then, O best of men, countless men, horses and elephants of both parties fell just when the sun ascended the meridian.

44. The Panchalas, O king, desirous of victory, rushed towards Karna as birds flock towards their nest.

45—46. And the energetic son of Adhiratha began to oppose the Panchalas from the front with his sharp arrows marking specially their leaders, Baghraketu, Susarma, Chitra, Ugrayudha, Gaya, Sukla, Rochaman and the unconquerable Sinhasena.

47. All those heroes, quickly driving their cars towards Karna—the glory of the battle field, encompassed him and began to shower their sharp shafts upon that infuriated hero, the foremost of men.

48. But all those eight heroes who had proceeded to combat that brave heroe, the son of Radha, were sorely afflicted by him each with eight piercing arrows.

49. Thereupon, O king, the powerful son of charioteer killed thousands of other heroes—all skillful in the manuver of war.

50—51. Worked up with anger Karna struck in battle, Jishnu, Jishnukarman, Devapi, Chitra, Chitrayudha, Hari, Singhaketu, Rochamana, the great car-warrior Salabha, and many other Chedi heroes.

52. When the son of Adhiratha was engaged in striking those heroes his body, besmeared with blood and swelled with pride and animation, looked like the gigantic form of Rudra himself.

53. Then, O Bharata, the elephants, afflicted by Karna's arrows, bolted with fear and caused great commotion in the battle-field.

54. Others, oppressed by Karna's arrows, cried aloud in diverse voice and fell down as do the mountain peaks when struck down with thunder.

55. The earth, along the track of Karna's car, was fully strewn with broken cars, and carcasses of elephants, horses and men.

56. Verily none of the warriors of your army, nay not even Bhishma or Drona, did ever achieve such an exploit, as was achieved by Karna in the battle.

57. Suta's son, O most valiant of men, indeed made a havoc amongst the elephants and horses, and destroyed the cars and men in countless numbers.

58. Like a lion roaming fearlessly among a herd of deer Karna too moved about fearlessly amongst the Panchalas.

59. As a lion drives away a herd of timid deer in all directions, so Karna dispelled the crowd of Panchala's cars to all directions.

60. And as a stag can never escape from the black jaws of a lion so even those heroes, who happened to approach Karna, could not return with their lives.

61. As men are sure to be burnt down if they approach a blazing fire so even the Srinjayas, O Bharata, were burnt by the flame of Karna when they approached it.

62. Many proud and well-approved heroes of the Chedis and Panchalas were killed by Karna.

63. Beholding the valour of Karna, O king, I was under the impression that not even a single soul of the Panchalas would escape from the son of Adhiratha in that battle.

64. Indeed the Suta's son repeatedly routed the Panchalas in the battle.

65. Beholding the Panchalas thus slain by Karna in that terrible battle Dharma-Raja Yudhisthira wrathfully rushed towards him.

66. Dhristadyumna, the sons of Droupadi and hundreds of other heroes, O Sire, speedily encompassed the son of Radha, the slayer of foes.

67. And many other warriors of immeasurable strength as Sikhandin, Sahadeva, Nakula, his sons, the descendant of Sini and a good many of the Pravadrakas advancing along with Dhristadyumna in their respective cars looked very grand when they all began to strike Karna with their shafts and many other weapons of different descriptions.

68. But the son of Adhiratha, though single-handed, fell ferociously upon all those Panchalas, Chedis, and Pandavas in the encounter just as Garuda falls upon a number of snakes.

69. The battle, O monarch, that was fought between Karna and those warriors, became as fierce as the great battle that, in the days of yore, occurred between the gods and Asuras.

70. Like unto the rising sun dispelling darkness the single-handed Karna unhesitatingly encountered the united force of all those great warriors ceaselessly showering sharp shafts upon him.

71. While Karna was thus engaged with the Pandavas, Bhimasena, extremely exercised with anger, began to wound the Kurus with his shafts each of which was as sure as the very rod of Yama.

72. That great bowman, struggling alone with all those Valhikas, Kaikayas, Matshas, Basatas, Madras and the Saindhavas, looked exceedingly grand.

73. The earth itself began to tremble with the violence of the fall of the huge elephants struck fatally with the awful arrows of Bhimasena in the vital parts of their bodies with their riders shot dead.

74. Many horses also, with their riders slain, and many of the infantries lay down dead pierced with arrows and vomitting blood and bleeding profusely.

75. Thousands of car-warriors, deprived of their arms, lay senseless through the fear of Bhima and many lay dead, their bodies mangled with wounds.

76. Dead bodies of elephants and their drivers, horses and riders, cars and car-warriors and foot soldiers shot dead by Bhimasena, literally covered the battle-field.

77. The army of Duryodhana, O king, melancholy, maimed and grieved through fear of Bhimasena, stood in utter confusion.

78. That poor confounded host stood motionless in the field as, O king, the deep ocean remains quiet in a fair season.

79. Your army, in that great battle, became poorly and thoroughly inert.

80. And the confounded host of men, O king, stood motionless as deep ocean remains calm and quiet in a fair weather season.

81. The army of your son, however powerful and energetic it might have been, lost all its glory and pride at that time.

82. That army, O foremost of the Bharata, when fighting with one another, looked as if bathed in blood and went on killing one another.

83. Suta's son, filled with anger, routed the Pandava army while the enraged Bhimasena routed the Kurus. And both the heroes thus engaged looked exceedingly beautiful.

84—85. In that extremely fierce and awe-inspiring battle, Arjuna, that foremost of victorious heroes, having killed a arge number of Samasaptakas in the very heart of their array, addressed Vasudeva thus:—This array of these fighting warriors, O Janardana, has been broken through.

86—87. These great warriors of the Samasaptakas, unable to withstand my arrows, are running away with their men as a herd of deer at the roar of a lion and even the vast force of the Srinjayas appears to give way in this great battle.

88. There in the midst of Yudhisthira's division, the banner, of the highly intelligent Karna, bearing the device of an elephant is seen to move about with great activity.

89. No other warrior of our army is capable of conquering Karna.

90. You are well aware of Karna's energy and prowess.

91. Pray, proceed there where Karna is crushing down our force.

92. Leaving all others proceed against that mighty car-warrior, the son of Suta, O Krishna, this is my suggestion; but please do what you think proper.

93. Hearing these words of his, Govind smiled and addressing Arjuna said, "O son of Pandu, go on killing the Kouravas indiscriminately."

94. Then those swan white horses, driven by Krishna, penetrated into your strong array bearing both Krishna and himself and the son of Pandu.

95. And your host gave way on all sides as those two white animals bedecked with golden trappings entered into its midst led by Kesava.

96. That ape-bannered car hoisting its flags in the sky and roaring like thundercloud forced its way into your array like a celestial car passing through the welkin.

97. When, cutting through the vast army, Kesava and Arjuna entered the arena with their eyes blood red with anger, they looked exceedingly splendid and resplendent.

98. Taking great delight in battle and accepting the challenge of the Kurus when those two heroes came to the field they looked like the twin gods Ashvinis invoked with proper rites in a sacrifice by the priests.

99. Those two enraged heroes of tigerish fierceness grew extremely violent in their movements like two elephants excited at the claps of hunters in a deep forest.

100. Penetrating into the midst of those cars and horses drawn in array Phalguna moved about like the destroyer himself armed with his fatal noose.

101. Beholding him displaying such courage within his own army, O Bharata, your son tried once more to stir up the Samasaptakas against him.

102—103. Thereupon with thousand cars, three hundred elephants, fourteen thousand horse, and two hundred thousand valiant foot-soldiers, all well practised in aiming and highly skilful in all the ways of war and well armed with bows, the leaders of the Samasaptakas rushed towards the son of Kunti and covered the Pandavas, O king, with showers of shafts from all sides.

104. Covered with arrows Partha, that repressor of foes, in fight, looked exceedingly fearful like the destroyer himself with the noose in his hand, but he grew still more fierce and worth looking at when he began to kill the Samasaptakas.

105. Thereupon the sky became enveloped with the arrows mounted with gold and possessed of the lustre of the lightning that were being constantly discharged by Kiriti (Arjuna).

106. Indeed those arrows, that were ceaselessly being dischared by Arjuna, falling on all sides looked, O lord, as if so many snakes were lying all around.

107. The immeasurably energetic son of Pandu sent out his straight and sharp-pointed shafts towards all directions.

108. Hearing the terrible sound of Partha's palms people thought that all the oceans, the whole earth, all the ten directions, the etherial vault were going to burst out.

109. Having killed ten thousand of the chiefs, that great car-warrior the son of Kunti proceeded rapidly to the further end of the Samasaptakas' array.

110. Approaching the wing which was being defended by Kambovoja he began to harrass the troops by his powerful arrows as Vasava had harrassed the Danavas.

111. With his broad-headed arrows he began to chop off quickly the heads, thighs and arms with weapon in the grasp of his rivals who were desirous of killing him.

112. Deprived of all the limbs and weapons they began to fall down on earth like large trees of many big boughs hurled down by a hurricane.

113. When he was thus killing the elephants, horses, and car-warriors, &c.,

* * * *

114. Arjuna then cut off the two arms of his assailant with a pair of crescent-shaped arrows and then with razor-headed arrow he knocked down his head containing a face as beautiful as the full moon.

115. His life extinguished, the body bathed in blood fell down from his car like the summit of Manashila mountain clapped down by a thunder-bolt.

116. When this most beautiful and handsome-looking young man, the younger brother of Sudakshina and chief of the Kambojas whose beautiful and lovely eyes could be compared with the lotus-petals, lay down dead on the ground it appeared as if the summit of the golden Sumeru was tumbled down on earth.

117. And the battle, that was fought after this, was exceedingly terrible and awe-inspiring, and the fate of each of the fighting combatants changed repeatedly.

118. All the heroes of the Kambojas, Yavanas and the Sakas were killed by one arrow each: and their bleeding bodies, O king, gave the battle-field the look of a vast expanse of red.

189. The car-warriors were deprived of their steed, and drivers, elephants and horses lost their riders; many riders and drivers lost their horses and elephants; and thus fighting with one another, O king, a great loss of lives took place.

120. When the wing and further wing of the Samasaptakas had been thus eradicated by Savyasachin (Arjuna) the son of Drona rapidly proceeded against him.

121. Furnished with many terrible arrows and violently shaking his formidable bow Drona's son appeared in the battle-field as the sun appears in the horizon with his fierce rays.

122. Full of rage and revengeful spirit that mighty warrior, with his mouth wide open and blood-red eyes, looked formidable like Death himself with his terrible mace before a dying person.

123. Then he began to shower sharp shafts on the armies of the Pandavas and rout them.

124. Again, O king, as soon as he saw the Dasarha on the car he began to discharge his terrible shafts much more quickly.

125. And their dangerous arrows discharged by Drona's son, O king, falling on Krishna and Dhananjaya, entirely enshrouded both of them on their car.

126. And thus the violent Ashwathama, with hundreds of keen arrows, put both Madhava and Pandu's son into utter confusion.

127. Beholding those two guardians of the world, thus covered with arrows, the creation sent forth piteous cries of woe.

128. There hordes of Siddhas and Charanas poured in from every direction all solicitous of common weal for the day.

129. Never before, O monarch, did I witness such prodigies of valor like those displayed by Drouni when shrouding Krishna and Arjuna in the field.

130. Often and often did I hear in that battle, O king, the din of Drouni's volleys, thundering roars of lion to the consternation of the enemy.

131. Flinging his shots right and left as he moved round the field, the string of his bow shone like flashes of lightning sparkling amidst the cloudy heavens.

132. Inspite of the dexterity and inflexibility of his hand, the son of Pandu, beholding the son of Drona, at the time, was greatly bewildered.

133. And he (Arjuna) bethought himself of being deprived of his own prowess by that august personage (Aswathama), whose bearing in the field, O king, presented a dazzling sight for human eyes.

134. In that deadly conflict between Drouni and the Pandava, O king of kings, Krishna, seeing the powerful son of Drona get the better of the son of Kunti, became highly infuriated.

135. With inflamed eyes and swelling breath, frequently he cast his eyes towards Aswathama and Phalguna, devouring them, as it were, with the fury of his fire.

136. The indignant Krishna then addressing Partha in an endearing tone and said :

137. O Partha, what a strange part of, see, you play in the field? O son of Bharata, Drona's son overcoming you today in battle!

138. Have you the same strength of your arms as you had before? Do you still hold your Gandiva in hand? Are you seated in the war-chariot?

139. Has any thing gone wrong with your arms? Has your fist sustained any injury, or how is it that I see you overwhelmed by Drouni in the field.

140. O glory of Bharata's race, esteeming your assailant as the son of your preceptor stop not, O Partha, this is not the time for forbearance.

141. Hearing those words Arjuna just on the nick of time seizing fourteen Vallas (arrows, with crescent-shaped heads) darted them off, piercing right through his weapons, chariot, standard and umbrella, and dismantling Aswathama of his equipments, bows, darts and all.

142. He (Arjuna), then assailing him (Aswathama) with calf-toothed arrows, inflicted terrible wounds on his shoulder-joints fainting from which he sustained himself with his flag-staff.

143. Seeing him thus stunned with the assaults of his enemy his charioteer, O monarch, for rescuing him from (the army of) Dhananjaya, bore him away from the field.

144. In the meanwhile, that scorcher of enemy, Vijay, before the very eyes of your valiant son, slaughtered your army by hundreds and thousands.

145. Thus, O monarch, owing to your evil counsels such a ruthless slaughter with cruel onslaught of your champions was brought about as these knights presented arms to your foe.

146. Arjuna then in the twinkle of an eye beset the Samsaptakas, while Vrikodara attacked the Kurus, Karna, and the Panchalas.

147. O monarch, as the war raged furiously, destroying the lives of valiant soldiers, and presenting a vast scene of carnage, there arose in the field innumerable headless trunks, still retaining vitality.

148. O the chief of the Bharata race,, king Yudhisthira, sorely distressed with his wounds, and writhing in agony, stayed in the time two miles off from the scene of action.

CHAPTER LVII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thereupon, O Bharata chief, approaching Karna Duryodhana said to the Madra king as well as to other chiefs (present there).

2. The gate of heaven has of itself opened its door to us. Happy are those Kshatriyas who obtain such a battle.

3. If the heroic Kshatriyas fight with their pairs in battle great benefit occurs to them, O son of Radha.

4. Either having slain the Pandavas let them acquire the prosperous kingdom, or being slain by the enemies let them repair to the region of heroes.

5. Hearing those words of Duryodhana the Kshatriya chiefs shouted aloud and played on their musical instruments.

6. Thereupon when Duryodhana's army were fiilled with joy, the son of Drona gladdening all your soldiers said :—

7. Before the entire army and before you all, my father, when he had laid aside his arms, was killed by Dhristadyumna.

8. By that wrath and for the sake of my friend, I tell you, O king, what I promise :—

9. Without slaying Dhristadyumna, I will not lay aside my arms. If this my promise proves futile, I will not go to heaven.

10. Forsooth, I will grind him who will come against me, be he Arjuna, Bhimasena or any body else.

11. Thus addressed the entire Bharata army rushed against the sons of Kunti. The Pandavas also (came forward).

12. O Bharata king, the encounter of the leading car-warriors was highly wonderful. An ouslaught of men like that at the end of a cycle took place before the Kurus and Srinjayas.

13. When that encounter took place many created beings along with the gods and nymphs came there to see the leading heroes.

14. Delightedly the Apsaras showered, on those leading warriors, observant of the duties of their own order, celestial garlands, perfumeries and various jewels.

15. The wind carried that sweet fragrance to all the leading warriors. Enjoying that odor carried by the wind they struck each other down on the ground.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjajaya said :—

1. Thus a great encounter took place amongst all those warriors. Then Arjuna, Bhimasena and Karna were worked up with anger.

2. Having vanquished the son of Drona and other leading car-warriors Arjuna said to Vasudeva :—

3. See, O Krishna, the Pandava army is flying away. Karna is making a havoc on our great car-warriors.

4. O Krishna, I do not see Dharma's son Yudhisthira ; nor is his standard visible.

5. O Janarddana, the third portion of the day still remains. None amongst the sons of Dhritarashtra comes to fight with me. If you wish to do me a good turn proceed where Yudhisthira is engaged.

6. If I see Dharma's son and his younger brother well, I will fight again with the enemies.

7. Thereupon at the request of Vibhatsu Hari speedily moved the course of his car where king Yudhisthira and the valiant Srinjayas were fighting to death.

8. Thereupon, seeing in the battle-field such a slaughter of valiant heroes Govinda said to Savyasachin :—

9. See, O Partha, this great on slaught of the Kshatriyas for the sake of Duryodhana.

10. Look at the gold-backed bows of the archers and their costly quivers.

11. Saying this to Arjuna Vasudeva hurried on towards Yudhisthira. For, seeing the great king in battle, Arjuna too urged on Govinda to proceed.

12. Then did the invincible son of Vasudeva describe every thing unto the diademdecked Arjuna.

13. Then there began, O king, a dreadful encounter. The two armies, encountering each other, sent up loud war-cries.

14. Thus on account of your evil advice that terrible onslaught of your soldiers and enemies took place.

CHAPTER LIX.

(KARNABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then again the Kurus and Srinjayas undauntedly encountered one another. The sons of Pritha were headed by Yudhisthira and our army was headed by the charioteer's son.

2. Then took place a dreadful and hair-stirring battle between Karna and the sons of Pandu which increased the territory of Yama.

3—4. After that dreadful battle, producing pools of blood, had taken place and when only a few of the brave Samsaptakas remained alive, Dristadyumna, with all the kings and the mighty car-warrior Pandavas, rushed towards Karna.

5. As a mountain holds water so Karna alone received in battle those warriors filled with joy and longing for victory.

6. Encountering Karna those great car-warriors were scattered (by him) as a collection of water is dispersed on all sides while dashing against a huge mountain.

7. O great king, then took place a hair-stirring encounter between them. With arrows Dhristadyumna struck the son of Radha exclaiming "Wait! Wait!"

8—9. Boiling with rage the great car-warrior Karna shook the best of his bows, Vijaya. Then cutting off his bow and arrows like unto deadly serpents he struck Dhristadyumna with nine shafts. Cutting through the golden armour of that high-souled heroe they were covered with blood and looked like so many lady birds.

10. Then throwing off his broken bow the great car-warrior Dhristadyumna took up a fresh one and shafts resembling venomous snakes and struck Karna with seventy arrows.

11. Likewise Karna too covered Prishata's son, the scorcher of his enemies with arrows resembling deadly serpents.

12. The great bowman, the enemy of Drona, struck (Karna) with sharpened arrows.

13. Karna discharged at him in anger a golden arrow like the very rod of Death.

14. O king, the descendant of Sini, like an expert, sundered into seven pieces that dreadful arrow which was about to fall on him.

15. Seeing that arrow broken with his shafts, Karna, O king, covered Satyaki completely with a downpour of arrows.

16. He pierced him with seven arrows. The grand-son of Sini, in return, struck him with golden-feathered arrows.

17. Then there took place an encounter wonderful and terrible striking terror to ears and eyes.

18. Hairs on the body of all creatures present there stood erect on beholding in that battle the wonderful feats of Karna and of the grand-son of Sini.

19. In the meantime the highly powerful son of Drona approached Parshata, the subduer of his enemies and the destroyer of their prowess.

20. Drouni, the victor of hostile cities, said to him, in anger, "Wait, wait! O slayer of Brahmanas, you will not escape me to-day with your life.

21. Saying this he covered the great heroe, Parshata, with dreadful, sharpened and powerful arrows although that car-warrior tried his level best to thwart them.

22—23. As Drona, while he was alive, became dispirited on seeing the son of Prishata and took him for his death, so the son of Prishata, on seeing Drona's son in battle, regarded him as his death.

24. Seeing Dhristadyumna stand firm before him the heroic son of Drona, sighing in anger, rushed towards Parshata.

29. Seeing each other they were both worked up with great anger.

26. Then, O king, the powerful son of Drona quickly said to Dhristadyumna who stood before him.

27. O wretch of a Panchala, I will despatch you to-day to the abode of Death.

28—29. Verily you committed a great sin by killing Drona before. You will meet with an evil turn in extenuation of that iniquity if you stand in battle without being protected by Partha or if you do not beat a retreat. O fool, I tell you the truth.

30. Thus addressed the powerful Dhristadyumna replied :—

31. What, I said to your father, while trying his best in battle, will serve as a reply to your words.

32. If Drona, who was a Brahmana in name, could have been killed by me, why should I not, by my power, kill you to-day in battle.

33. Having said this, O king, the revengeful commander (of Pandava's army) Parshata struck Drona's son with sharpened arrows.

34. Thereupon, worked up with anger Drona's son, O king, covered all sides of Dhristadyumna with arrows.

35. Covered with thousands of shafts neither the sky, nor the quarters, nor the warriors around could be seen.

36. Before the very eyes of the charioteer's son, O king, Parshata covered Drona's son, the ornament of the battle-field, with arrows.

37. But the son of Radha alone, O king, visible on every side, withstood the Panchalas, Pandavas. the sons of Draupadi, Yudhamanyu, and the great car-warrior Satyaki.

38. Dhristadyumna, again in battle, cut off the dreadful bow of Drona's son and his arrows resembling venomous serpents.

39. He, again, O king, in a moment struck with arrows Parshata's bow, Sakti, club, standard, horses, charioteer, and car.

40. Having his bow, and car broken, and horses and charioteer slain, he took up a huge sword shining like a hundred moon.

41. O king, the great car-warrior, the heroic son of Drona, displaying light handedness and holding firm his weapon, quickly cut off in battle with Bhallas, that weapon of his, before he could come down from the car. It was indeed wonderful.

42. O foremost of Bharatas, that great car-warrior, although striving hard, could not kill Dhristadyumna, who had his bow and car broken and horses slain and was wounded with various arrows.

43. O king, when the son of Drona could not kill him with arrows, that heroe, laying aside his bow, quickly followed Parshata.

44. The motion of that high-souled one as he rushed on resembled that of Garuda, swooping down for catching a snake.

45. In the interval Madhava said to Arjuna:—" See, O Partha, how Drona's son is proceeding quickly towards Parshata's car. Forsooth, he will kill the prince.

46. O you of large arms, O subduer of enemies, rescue Prishata's son who is near the mouth of Drona's son as if he is within the jaws of death."

47. Having said this, O king, the powerful son of Vasudeva drove the horses where Drona's son was staying.

48. Urged on by Keshava those horses, effulgent like the moon, ran towards the car of Drona's son as if devouring the very sky.

49. Seeing those two mighty heroes approach him, Ashwathama set forth his exertions for killing Dhristadyumna soon.

50. O king, seeing Dhristadyumna dragged by his enemy, the powerful son of Pritha discharged many arrows at the son of Drona.

51. Those golden shafts, shot off his Gandiva, approached the son of Drona and wounded him deep like serpents entering into an ant hill.

52. Thus struck with dreadful shafts the powerful son of Drona left off the highly energetic Panchala Prince.

53. Thus wounded by Dhananjaya with arrows the heroe got on his chariot. And taking up his bow he began to strike Partha with innumerable arrows.

54. In the interval, O king, the heroic Sahadeva carried away on his own chariot Parshata the scorcher of his enemies.

55. Arjuna in return struck Drona's son with winged arrows. Worked up with anger Drona's son struck him on the arms and the chest.

56. Filled with anger Partha discharged in that battle at Drona's son a Naracha like unto the very rod of Death. That highly effulgent arrow fell on Bramhana's shoulder.

57. O king, he was stupified in the battle with the force of that arrow. He sat down exhausted on the car.

58. Then, O king, Karna took up his bow, Vijaya. And filled with anger he again and again cast his looks on Arjuna desiring for a duel with him.

59. Seeing Drona's son senseless his charioteer quickly took him away on his car from the battle-field.

60. Seeing Prishata's son released and Drona's son wounded, the Panchalas, O king, jubilant over the victory, sent up loud war-cries.

61. Thousands of musical instruments of sweet tune were struck. Seeing those wonderful feats the heroes sent up leonine shouts.

62. Having performed that wonderful feat, Arjuna said to Krishna, "Drive me towards the Samsaptaka, this is what I greatly wish for."

63. Hearing those words of Arjuna Krishna drove his car adorned with many banners and fleet like the wind or the mind.

CHAPTER LX.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. In the meantime pointing out the righteous king Yudhisthira to Partha, the son of Kunti, Krishna said :—

2. Behold, O son of Pandu, your brother Yudhisthira pursued by the highly powerful sons of Dhritarastra, all great bowmen, desirous of killing him.

3. The powerful Panchalas, whom it is difficult to vanquish, are running after the great Yudhisthira for rescuing him.

4—5. Accoutred in a coat of mail and accompanied by a large army Duryodhana, the king of the whole world, is purusing the Pandava king, with a view to kill him, O foremost of men, assisted by his brothers, all expert in fighting whose very touch is like the deadly venom of serpents.

6. Your army, riding on elephants, horses and cars and proceeding on foot are going to kill Yudhishthira like poor men for possessing a costly gem.

7. See, obstructed by Satwata and Bhima, they have become motionless like unto the Daityas desirous of pilfering ambrosia stupified by Sakra and Agni.

8. On account of their numerical vastness (the Kuru) car-warriors are proceeding quickly towards Yudhisthira like unto a collection of water running towards the ocean during the rainy season.

9. Blowing their conch-shell and shaking their bows those powerful bow-men are sending up leonine shouts.

10. I regard Kunti's son Yudhisthira who has been brought under the influence of Duryodhana as within the mouth of Death or like an oblation of ghee in fire.

11. Duryodhana's army is properly armed. Coming within the range of their arrows even Sakra cannot escape.

12. Who in battle can bear the force of arrows shot by Duryodhana, who, when worked up with anger, resembles Death himself.

13. The force of Duryodhana's arrows, or of Drona's son's, or Kripa's, or Karna's, can shatter even the very mountains.

14. The powerful light-handed and successful king Yudhisthira, expert in fighting and the scorcher of his enemies, was compelled by Karna to retreat from the battle-field.

15. Accompanied by the highly powerful and heroic sons of Dhritarashtra the son of Radha is capable of afflicting the Pandava chief in battle.

16. While the self-controlled Partha was fighting with them, other great car-warriors brought about his discomfiture.

17. O foremost of Bharatas, the king is greatly emaciated with fasts. He is gifted with the force of a Brahmana, but he is not endued with Kshatriya prowess.

18. Afflicted by Karna the king Yudhisthira, the son Pandu, has been greatly imperiled.

19—20. Methinks, O Partha, the king, Yudhisthira has fallen, since the wrathful Bhimasena, the slayer of his enemies, is calmy bearing the leonine shouts repeatedly sent up by Dhritarashtra's sons desirous of achieving victory and blowing their conch-shells.

21. Indeed, O foremost of men, Pandu's son Yudhisthira is slain. See Karna is exciting the great car-warrior of Dhritarashtra's army.

22. The powerful car-warriors are covering the son of Pritha with a down-pour of various weapons such as Indrajala, Sthunakarna and Pasupata.

23—24. Forsooth, O Arjuna, the king is greatly wounded and weakened, since the Panchalas, the weilders of all sorts of weapons, accompanied with Pandavas, are following him hurriedly at a time when it is necessary to display speed like unto men rushing to rescue a man sinking under earth.

25—27. The king's standard is not to be seen. Most likely it has been struck down by Karna with his arrows. Before the very eyes of the twin brothers, Satyaki, Shikhandin, Dhristadyumna, Satanika, Panchalas and Chedis, Karna is killing the Pandava army like an elephant spoilating lotuses.

28. The car-warriors of your army, O son of Pandu, are flying away. See, O Partha, how they are taking to their heels.

29. Struck by Karna in battle, O Arjuna the elephants are flying away in ten directions yelling cries of pain.

30. Pursued in battle by Karna, the grinder of his enemies the collection of cars is dispersed on all sides.

31. O foremost of those leading standards, see the standard bearing the emblem of an elephant of charioteer's son is moving about all over (the field).

32. There the son of Radha runs after Bhimasena scattering hundreds of arrows and killing your soldiers.

33. There the powerful Panchala car-warriors are being dispersed (by him) like the Daityas slain by Sakra in the great battle.

34. Having defeated the Panchalas, Pandavas and Srinjays, Karna is casting his eyes on all sides, methinks, for finding you out.

35. See Partha, how beautiful he looks while drawing his best of bows as did shine Shakra in the midst of the celestials after having defeated his enemies.

36. Witnessing Karna's power there the Kauravas are shouting and striking terror to the Pandavas and Srinjayas.

37. Having thus terrified the Pandavas in the great battle with all his force, the son of Radha, O giver of honor, addressing his army said :—

38. "May you fare well, O Kauravas. Do you move on with such a force that no Srinjaya can escape from the battle-field with his life.

39. Do so in a body. We will follow you." Saying this he followed them shooting his arrow.

40. See Partha, Karna is shining in the battle-field with a white umbrella like the Udaya (rising mountain) beautified with the moon.

41—42. With this umbrella of a hundred ribs resembling the full-moon held over his head he is casting his looks around for you. Forsooth, he will come here quickly.

43. See, O you of large arms, he is drawing a huge bow shooting, in the great battle, arrows resembling deadly serpents.

44. Seeing your banner bearing the emblem of a monkey the son of Radha is turning to this direction for seeking an encounter with you, O Partha and bringing on his own destruction like an insect approaching a burning flame.

45. This wrathful heroe is engaged in the well-being of Dhritarastra's son ; that one of wicked understanding always seeks to injure you.

46. Seeing Karna alone Dhritarastra's son is turning with his car force to protect him.

47. That wicked man with all his followers should be killed by you with all care if you wish to secure fame, kingdom and happiness.

48. Endued with energy and strength both of you should fight in battle like a god and demon.

49. Seeing you greatly worked up with anger and Karna too Duryodhana, although angered, will not be able to do any thing.

50—51. O foremost of Bharatas, knowing yourself self-controlled and Karna as cherishing animosity against the pious Yudhisthira, O son of Kunti, make use of this good opportunity. Making up your mind for battle encounter all the car-warriors.

52—54. O foremost of car-warriors, five hundred most excellent, powerful and energetic car-warriors, five thousand elephants, twice that number of horses, and six thousand foot-soldiers, protecting one another are coming against you in a body. Of your own accord show yourself to the great bowman, the charioteer's son. Advance with great force, O foremost of Bharatas.

55. Worked up with anger there Karna advances against the Panchalas. I see his standard approaching the car of Dhristadyumna. Forsooth, he will root out the Panchalas.

56. O Bharata chief, I will communicate to you a good intelligence, the virtuous king Yudhisthira is still alive.

57. The mighty-armed Bhima has returned and is leading the army. He is surrounded by the Srinjayas and Satyaka.

58. There in battle the Kuru soldiers are being killed in battle with sharp arrows by Bhimasena and the high-souled Panchalas.

59. Wounded with Bhima's arrows Duryodhana's army, retreating and bathed in blood, are quickly flying away.

60. Covered with blood the Bharata is looking poorly like the earth divested of crops.

61. Behold, O son of Kunti, Bhimasena, the commander of your army, worked up with anger like a serpent, is assailing the (Kuru) troops.

62. Look, O Arjuna, at the yellow, crimson, black and white banners painted with stars, moons and suns and innumerable umbrellas scattered all over the field.

64. Standards, made of gold, silver and other metals, are lying about, and there lie scattered slain horses.

64. Car-warriors, deprived of their life, are dropping down from cars, killed by the unretreating Panchalas with variegated arrows.

65. There the quick-coursing Panchalas, O Dhananjaya, are rushing against the elephants, horses and cars belonging the Dhritarastra's party, divested of their riders.

66. O foremost of men, O slayer of enemies, your warriors, giving up the love of their lives and invincible in battle, are, aided by Bhimasena's power, grinding the enemy's army.

67. There the Panchalas are sending up loud war-cries and blowing their conchs as they are advancing against their enemies and grinding them with their arrows,

68. Look at their greatness. Through their power the Panchalas are killing Dhritarastra's soldiers as the angry lions kill the tigers.

69. (Themselves although) without any arms they are carrying away the arms of the enemies (from their hands) and with them they are killing foes and making war-cries.

70. They are striking down the heads and arms of their enemies. Their car-warriors, elephant-warriors, and cavalry are all heroic and praise-worthy.

71. Like quick-coursing swans leaving Manasa lake and running into the Ganges the Panchalas are rushing against the Kuru army and are assailing every part of the huge force of Duryodhana.

72. Like bulls withstanding bulls, Kripa, Karna and other warriors with all their energy are resisting the Panchalas.

73. The heroes, headed by Dhristadyumna, are killing thousands of their enemies, the great car-warriors of Duryodhana's force, already sunk in the ocean of Bhima's weapon.

74. Beholding Panchalas overpowered by their energies Marut's son is covering the hostile force with arrows and with roars of lions.

75. The major portion of the huge army of Duryodhana is stricken with fear. The cars and horses assailed with Bhima's fear have been scattered all over.

76. See, these elephants, struck by Bhima with his Narachas, are dropping down like the summits of mountains clapped by Indra's thunder-bolt.

77. There the huge elephants, wounded by Bhima with his arrows, are flying away crushing their own army.

78. Do you not recognise the leonine shouts of Bhima, O Arjuna, who, worked up with the desire of achieving victory, is roaring.

79. There worked up with anger the Prince of Nishadas is advancing on his best of cars, like Death himself armed with his rod against the son of Pandu for killing him with his Tomara.

80—82. His two arms with Tomaras are cut off by Bhima with ten sharpened Narachas effulgent like fire or the sun. Killing him he is proceeding against other elephants resembling a mass of dark blue clouds and driven by riders. They are striking Vrikodara with Saktis and Tomaras. Slaying those elephants seven at a time with sharp arrows Partha's elder brother is striking down their victorious standards. The other elephants were killed each with ten Narachas.

83. The war-cries of Dhritarastra's soldiers are no longer audible since (Bhima), like Purandara himself, is engaged in battle.

84. Three Akshouhini of Dhritarastra's soldiers have been arranged and they all have been thwarted by angry Bhima, the foremost of men.

Sanjaya said :—

85. Beholding that arduous task accomplished by Bhima Arjuna, with his sharp arrows, killed the remaining enemies.

CHAPTER LXI.

Dhritarastra said :—

1—2. When Bhimasena and Pandu's son Yudhisthira were fighting, when my soldiers were being killed by the Pandavas and Srinjayas, when my army was routed and dispirited tell me, O Sanjaya, what did the Kauravas do.

Sanjaya said :—

3. Seeing the mighty-armed Bhima the valiant Karna, with eyes, reddened in anger, rushed towards him.

4. Beholding your soldiers routed by Bhima the powerful Karna rallied them again with great exertion.

5. Having collected your son's force the large-armed Karna advanced against the heroic Pandavas invincible in battle.

6. Drawing their bows and discharging arrows the great car-warriors of the Pandavas advanced against the son of Radha.

7—8. Worked up with anger and desiring for victory Bhimasena, the grand-son of Sini, Shikandi Janamejaya, the powerful Dhristadyumna, all the Prabhadrakas and the Panchalas advanced furiously from all directions against your army.

9. In the same way the powerful car-warriors of your host speedily advanced against the Pandava army desirous of killing them.

10. The two hosts, abounding in cars, elephants, the cavalry and infantry, looked exceedingly wonderful.

11. Shikhandi rushed against Karna, and Dhristadyumna, accompanied by a great force, proceeded against your son Dushasana.

12. Nakula ran against Vrishasena and Yudhisthira advanced against Chitrasena ; Sahadeva proceeded against Uluka in that battle.

13. Satyaki proceeded against Shakuni and the sons of Draupadi against other Kouravas. And the great car-warrior Drona's son proceeded against Arjuna in that battle.

14. Goutama encountered in battle the great bowman Yudhamanyu. And the powerful Kritavarma rushed against Uttamoujasa.

15. The large-armed Bhimasena alone withstood all your sons with their armies.

16. Thereupon Shikhandi, the slayer of Bhishma, with winged arrows, obstructed Karna ranging fearlessly (in the battle-field).

17. Thus obstructed and with his lips trembling in anger Karna struck Shikhandi on the fore-head with three arrows.

18. Carrying three arrows Shikhandi shone there like a silver mountain with three elevated summits.

19. Sorely wounded by Karna in that battle that great bowman struck him in return with ninety sharp arrows.

20. Having slain his horses and driver with three arrows the great car-warrior Karna struck down his standard with a razor-shaped arrow.

21. Then jumping down from his horseless car that great car-warrior, the aggrandiser of his enemies, discharged a dart in anger at Karna.

22. Cutting it off in battle with three arrows Karna struck Shikhandi with nine sharp arrows.

23. Avoiding arrows shot off Karna's bow Shikhandi, greatly wounded, quickly retreated from the field.

24. O king, then Karna fell on the Pandava army as the violent wind disperses a pack of cotton.

25. Wounded by your son Dhristadyumna struck, in return, Dushasana on the breast with three arrows.

26. Then Dushasana struck the left arm of his enemy with a sharp gold feathered, winged arrow.

27. Thus wounded and filled with terrible rage Dhristadyumna shot arrows at Dushasana.

28. O king, with three arrows your son cut off the shaft discharged by Dhristadyumna which was about to fall with great force.

29. Then approaching Dhristadyumna he struck him on the breast and two arms with seventeen other gold winged arrows.

30. Then worked up with anger Prishata's son cut off his bow with a sharp razor shaped arrow at which all his people shouted out.

31. Your son, however, taking up another bow, smilingly covered Dhristadyumna with wounds of arrows.

32. Beholding the prowess of your high-souled son all the warriors in the field, Siddhas and Apsaras were filled surprise.

33. We saw the highly powerful Dhrista dyumna obstructed by Dushasana like a huge elephant checked by a lion.

34. Then desirous of rescuing their generalissim. O elder brother of Pandu, the Panchala car-warriors, elephants and horses surrounded your son.

35. O slayer of enemies, then ensued a dreadful and destructive encounter between your people and your enemey's host.

36. Standing by his father's side Vrishasena struck Nakula with five iron arrows and again wounded him with three others.

37. The heroic Nakula however smiling struck Vrishasena on the breast with a sharp Naracha.

38. Thus wounded greatly by his powerful enemy that grinder of his enemies struck his adversary with twenty five arrows.

39. Those two foremost of men covered each other with thousands of arrows at which their respective battalions broke.

40. Seeing Duryodhana's soldiers quickly flying away Karna, O king, prevented them with force.

41. After Karna's departure Nakula proceeded against the Kauravas. Avoiding Nakula in battle Karna's son quickly went to Karna, who was guarding the passage of his chariot.

42. Angry Uluka was restrained by Sahadeva in battle.

43. Having killed his four horses the powerful Sahadeva despatched his charioteer to the abode of Yama.

44. Then leaping down from his car O king, Uluka, the joy of his sire, soon advanced against the host of Trigarttas.

45. Having pierced Sakuni with twenty sharp arrows Satyaki, as if smiling, struck down the standard of Suvala's son with his dart.

46. O king, the powerful son of Suvala too, worked up with anger, cutting off his coat of mail, again sundered his golden standard.

47. Then Satyaki pierced him in return with sharpened arrows and then quickly despatched to the abode of Yama his charioteer and horses with three arrows.

48. Then O king, jumping down all on a sudden from his own car Sakuni quickly got on Uluka's car. Then that heroe, expert in fighting, soon took away Sini's grand-son.

49. Then O king, Satyaki, with great force, advanced against your army at which they were all routed.

50. Covered with arrows shot by Sini's grand-son your soldiers, O king, fled away in all directions and dropped down dead.

51. Your son obstructed Bhimasena in battle. Bhima however, in a moment, deprived him of his horses, charioteer, car and standard.

52. His men, O king, were highly pleased and the king soon fled away from Bhimasena's view.

53. Then the entire Kuru army rushed towards Bhimasena. And desirous of killing Bhima they set up a terrible shout.

54—55. Having struck Kripa Yudhamanyu soon cut off his bow. But Kripa, the foremost of the wielders of arms, taking up another bow struck down on earth Yudhamanyu's standard, charioteer and umbrella. Then the great car-warrior Yudhamanyu fled away on his car.

56. Uttamouja soon covered Hridika's son Bhima of dreadful prowess like showers covering a mountain.

57. Then O slayer of enemies, that battle became highly dreadful the like of which had never been seen by me before, O king.

58. Then Kritavarma, in that battle, O king, all on a sudden struck Uttamouja on the breast at which the latter sank down on his car.

59. His charioteer however carried away that foremost of car-warriors. Then the Kuru army surrounded Bhimasena from all sides.

60. With a huge elephant force Dushasana and Suvala's son surrounded Pandu's son and began to assail him with small arrows.

61. Thereupon making the angry Duryodhana retreat from the battle-field with a hundred arrows Bhima quickly advanced against the elephant force.

62. Beholding that elephant force advance against him all on a sudden Vrikodara, worked up greatly with anger, invited celestial weapons. He then struck elephants with elephants as Indra assailed the Asuras.

63. Killing the elephants in battle Vrikodara covered the sky with arrows as a swarm of insects cover a flame.

64. As the wind scatters a collection of clouds so Bhima dispersed and killed those elephants collected there in thousands.

65. Covered with net-works of gold and gems the elephants looked greatly beautiful like clouds charged with lightning.

66. Assailed by Bhima, O king, the elephants fled away on all sides. Some, cut to their hearts, fell down on earth.

67. With elephants adorned with gold fallen there the earth appeared as if strewn with shattered mountains.

68. With fallen elephant warriors, shining and adorned with jewels the earth shone beautiful as if covered with planets dropped for the wane of virtue.

69. With their temples, frontal globes and trunks maimed the elephants, struck by Bhimasena's arrows, fled away in hundreds in that battle.

70. With their limbs wounded with arrows, stricken with fear and vomitting blood, some,huge like mountains, fled away like mountains adorned with metals.

71. There they saw the two arms of Bhimasena, holding bows, pasted with sandal and Aguru and resembling two huge serpents.

72. Hearing the twang of his bow resembling the sound of a thunder-bolt the elephants passed urine and excreta and fled away.

73. That feat, of the intelligent Bhimasena who fought single-handed, resembled that of Rudra while destroying all creatures.

CHAPTER LXII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Then on that best of cars drawn by white horses and driven by Narayana himself the beautiful Arjuna arrived there.

2. As the wind agitates a great ocean so Vijaya overpowered your army, O foremost of kings, abounding in horse-men.

3. While (Arjuna) the rider of white horses was a little careless your son Duryodhana, worked up with anger, and surrounded by his soldiers, came there all on sudden and encompassed the revengeful Yudhisthira.

4. He then struck Yudhisthira with seventy-three razor-shaped arrows. At that Kunti's son Yudhisthira was greatly worked up with anger.

5. He quickly struck your son with thirty darts. Then the Kuru soldiers rushed against Yudhisthira for seizing him.

6. Then apprised of the evil intention of the enemies the great car-warriors came there in a body for rescuing Kunti's son Yudhishthira.

7. Encircled by an Akshouhini of soldiers Nakula, Sahadeva, Dhristadyumna and Parshata advanced towards Yudhishthira.

8. Grinding the great car-warriors of your army Bhimasena too went where Yudhisthira was surrounded by his enemies.

9. Making a downpour of arrows, O king, Vikartana's son Karna obstructed alone all those great bowmen.

10. Although making a downpour of arrows, discharging Tomaras, and exerting their very best they could not look at the son of Radha.

11. With a huge downpour of arrows the son of Radha who had mastered all sorts of weapons withstood all those great bow men.

12. Taking up speedily his bow the noble-minded Sahadeva soon approached Duryodhana and struck him with twenty arrows.

13. Struck by Sahadeva Duryodhana, huge like a mountain, covered with blood, appeared like a maimed elephant.

14. Seeing your son sorely wounded with many powerful shafts Karna, the best of car-warriors, wroth proceeded there.

15. Beholding Duryodhana in that condition and quickly getting ready his weapon he soon struck the sons of Yudhisthira and Prishata.

16. Assailed with arrows by the great son of the charioteer Yudhisthira's soldiers all on a sudden fled away.

17. Various sorts of arrows fell there touching one another. Those, shot off the bow of Karna, touched the wings of others with their blades.

18. The arrows coming in contact with one another a conflagration was caused in the sky.

19. With arrows capable of piercing the bodies of the enemies and advancing quickly Karna covered the ten quarters as if with a swarm of locusts.

20. Beautiful bows shone in the arms of Karna of the color of crimson sandal and adorned with gold and jewels.

21. Then all the quarters were shrouded with arrows. And Karna greatly assailed the righteous king Yudhishthira.

22. Then worked up with anger Kunti's son king Yudhishthira struck Karna with fifty sharpened arrows.

23. Darkened with arrows that army looked exceedingly dreadful. And your soldiers, O king, sent up piteous wails of pain,

24. Whilst they were being slain by Dharma's son with various sharp Kanka-feathered arrows whetted on stone, Bhallas, Saktis and clubs.

25. Wherever the virtuous king extended his looks all the soldiers of your party were shattered.

26. Then Karna, greatly worked up with anger, struck Yudhisthira with winged and calf-tooth shaped arrows.

27. Revengeful, wrathful and having his lips trembling in anger the highly energetic Karna struck Yudhishthira with arrows. Yudhishthira too struck him with gold feathered and sharpened arrows.

28. Karna, as if smiling, struck the Pandava king on the breast with three winged darts.

29. Thus greatly assailed by him the pious king Yudhishthira sat down on his car and ordered his charioteer to go.

30. Then all the soldiers of your army with their king sent up a loud war-cry saying "seize him." And then they rushed towards the king.

31. Then seventeen hundred Kekaya warriors with Panchalas obstructed the soldiers of Duryodhana.

32. When that dreadful and destructive battle raged on the highly powerful Duryodhana and Bhima fought with each other.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(KARNA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Karna, with a net-work of arrows, struck the mighty car-warrior, the great bowman of the Kekaya race who all stood before him.

2. Five hundred heroes who withstood him in battle were killed by Karna.

3. Thereupon seeing the son of Radha irrepressible in battle all those warriors, assailed by Karna's shafts, approached Bhimasena.

4—5. Dispersing that car-force with his arrows Karna, in a charriot, pursued the heroic Yudhishthira, who, then wounded with arrows, and almost unconscious, was slowly proceeding towards encampment between the twins.

6. Approaching the king, the car-warrior's son, with a desire to do good to Duryodhana, struck him with three highly powerful sharpened arrows.

7. The king then struck Radha's son on the breast with an arrow, his charioteer with three and his horses with four.

8. The two sons of Madri protected the sides of Yudhisthira and then they ran towards Karna so that he might not kill the king.

9. Then the highly careful Nakula and Sahadeva severally covered Karna with a downpour of arrows.

10. Then the highly powerful son of the charioteer struck those high-souled and victorious heroes with sharpened darts.

11. Then in the battle Radha's son killed Yudhishthira's most excellent horses white as the teeth, quick-coursing like the mind and having black tails.

12. Then as if smiling the charioteer's son, a great bowman himself, struck down with another Bhallya the crown of the son of Kunti.

13. Having killed then Nakula's horses the powerful (Karna) sundered the bow and arrows of the intelligent son of Madri.

14. Then those two sons of Pandu, the two brothers (Yudhisthira and Nakula) greatly wounded, got upon Sahadeva's car after their horses and car had been destroyed.

15. Seeing them deprived of their cars, their maternal uncle, the king of Madra, and slayer of inimical heroes, out of compassion said to Karna.

16. "You are to fight to-day with Pandu's son Phalguna. Why do you, irate, then fight with the pious king Yudhishthira?"

17. With your weapons exhausted, the coat of mail mutilated, arrows reduced and without quiver, with your horses and charioteer worn out with fatigue and yourself wounded with shafts by the enemies, when you will encounter Partha, O son of Radha, you will be a butt of ridicule."

18. Although accosted thus by the king of Madra in the battle-field, still Karna, worked up with anger, pursued Yudhishthira.

19. Having wounded then greatly with sharpened arrows the two sons begotten on Madri by Pandu, Karna smiling made (the king) turn his face with arrows in battle.

20. Thereupon, Salya, smiling again said to Karna, who was on the car, worked up with anger and bent upon killing Yudhishthira.

21. "O son of Radha, leaving aside Partha, for whom you are always honored by the son of Dhritarastra, what will you reap by killing Yudhisthira?

22. Here is the great blare of the conchs blown by the two Krishnas. And here is being heard the twang of his bow like the muttering of clouds in the rainy season.

23. Behold O Karna, having slain all our car-warriors in battle with a net work of arrows, Arjuna is devouring our entire army.

24. The rear of the heroe is being protected Yudhamanyu and Uttamajasa. And Satyaki is protecting his wheel on the north.

25. Dhristadyumaa is guarding his wheel in the south and Bhimasena is fighting with the king Duryodhana.

26. Look to it to-day, O Karna, so that Bhima may not kill the king in our very presence and he may escape him.

27. Behold he has been overpowered by Bhimasena, a beauty of the battle field. It will be a great wonder if you can release him.

28. Go there and rescue the king for he has been overtaken by a great danger. What will you gain by killing the two sons of Madra and the king Yudhisthira?

29—32. Hearing the words of the king Salya and seeing Duryodhana overpowered by Bhima in that great battle, Karna, worked up with the words of Salya and anxious to save the king, left the king Yudhishithira who has no enemies and the two sons of Madri and hurried on for rescuing your son. After Karna's departure, Yudhisthira, begotten by Pandu on Kunti, left the battle-field, born by the quick-coursing horses of Sahadeva.

33—35. Guarded by the twins the king quickly returned to his camp in shame. His body was covered with wounds of arrows. He got down from the car and sat on his best seat. The arrows were then taken out of his person and the king, filled with sorrow, said to his twin brothers the two great car-warriors, the powerful sons of Madri. "Go speedily to Bhima's detachment."

CHAPTER LXIV.

(KARNABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya siad:—

1. Thereupon surrounded by a mighty car-force Drona's son appeared, all on a sudden O king, where Pritha's son was.

2. Like a bank containing ocean Pritha's heroic son, assisted by Shouri, all on a sudden, encountered him.

3. Thereupon filled with anger, O monarch, the highly powerful son of Drona covered Arjuna and Krishna with arrows.

4. Beholding those two Krishnas covered with arrows the mighty car-warriors of the Pandava and Kuru armies, filled with great wonder, looked at them.

5. Thereupon as if smiling Arjuna created a celestial weapon which, O descendant of Bharata, the Brahmana baffled in battle.

6. Whatever weapon that the Pandava discharged in battle for killing the son of Drona, the great bowman made useless.

7. Then, O king, a great encounter of weapons took place in that great battle when we saw the son of Drona like Death himself with widening mouth.

8. Having filled all the quarters and directions with straight arrows he sundered Krishna's right arm with three arrows.

9. Thereupon killing all the horses of the high-souled one Arjuna created, in the battle-field, a dreadful stream of blood, carring away all to the other region.

10. There all beheld cars and warriors belonging to the detachment of Drona's son destroyed by arrows shot off Partha's bow. There then flowed a river dreadful and running on to the other world.

11. In that agitating and dreadful encounter between Drona's son and Partha the warriors rushed towards one another without any consideration whatsoever.

12. O king, the horses and charioteers of cars were killed, the cavalry were destroyed and the riders of elephants were slain. Thus a dreadful slaughter of animals was carried on by Partha in that battle.

13. Then the car-warriors fell down slain by arrows shot off Partha's bow. And the horses, with their trappings destroyed ran about hither and thither.

14—15. Witnessing these feats of Partha, beautifying the battle-field the powerful son of Drona speedily encountered that foremost of the victorious, quivered his dreadful, gold bedecked bow and struck him on all sides with innumerable sharpended arrows.

16. O monarch, Drouni again ruthlessly wounded Arjuna on the breast with a winged arrow.

17. O son of Bharata, being greatly wounded in battle by that son of Drona he, with force, took up his Gandiva bow. Then the highly intelligent heroe covered Drona's son with a downpour of arrows and cut off his bowstring.

18. Having his bow thus snapped Drona's son took up a sword, like unto a thunder bolt and hurled it at Arjuna.

19. O King, as if smiling, Arjuna all on a sudden cut off that gold-gilded sword that was about to fall on him.

20. Sundered by Partha's arrows it fell down on earth like a mountain shattered by (Indra's) thunder-bolt.

21. Thereupon irate, the mighty car-warrior son of Drona covered fully Vibhatsu with weapons granted him by Indra.

22. Beholding those weapons of Indra about to fall on him Partha took up his Gandiva and speedily baffled them with an arrow created for him by Vasava.

23—24. Then cutting off that net-work of Indra's weapon Partha soon covered the car of Drona's son. Assailed by Arjuna's arrows Drouni, encountering the former and cutting through the downpour of Pandava's arrows, called to his aid a powerful weapon, and all on a sudden wounded Krishna with a hundred arrows, and Arjuna with three hundred small arrows.

25. Thereupon with a hundred arrows Arjuna pierced the son of his preceptor to the very vitals. He then covered his horses and charioteer with a number of arrows in the very presence of the warriors.

26. Then wounding Drouni on his vital parts, Pandava, the slayer of inimical heroes, struck down his driver from his car with a dart.

27. Then himself taking up the reins of horses Drona's son covered Krishna with arrows. He saw a wonderful power in him then.

28. He simultaneously drove his horses and fought with Phalguna. He was spoken highly of by all the warriors in battle, O King.

29. Then smiling a little, Vibhatsu also named Jaya spedily cut off the rein of Drouni's horses in battle with a razor-like shaft.

30. Assailed with weapons the horses ran away on all sides. There then took place a great havoc of your soldiers.

31. Having thus accomplished victory the Pandavas, desirous of achieving (further) success, pursued your soldiers, on all sides, making a discharge of arrows.

32—33. Thereupon in the very presence of your sons, O king, conversant with diverse modes of warfare, of Suvala's son Shakuni and Karna your great army was again and again routed by the Pandava warriors desirous of victory.

34. Although prevented, O king, by your sons that great army assailed on all sides did not stop in the battle-field.

35. The warriors taking to their heels on all sides in numbers a great confusion took place in the vast terror-stricken army of your son.

36. Karna then exclaimed "Wait wait" But your army, slain by many great warriors, did not wait in the battle-field.

37. Beholding the army of Duryodhana, thus routed on all sides, the Pandavas, filled with the desire of victory, sent up oud war-cries.

38—39. Duryodhana then lovingly said to Karna:—"See, O Karna, how our army, greatly assailed by the Pandava,is flying on all sides, although you are present here. O repressor of foes, do what you think proper now.

40. Routed by the Pandavas, thousands of our soldiers are calling after you only.

41. Hearing those weighty words of Duryodhana, Karna, as if smiling, said to the Madra king.

42. "Behold, O king, the strength of my arms and weapons. I will kill to-day in battle all the Panchalas and Pandavas. Drive my car, O best of men, and every thing will be as I have said."

43—44. Having said this, O monarch, the charioteer's son, highly powerful as he was, took up his old victorious bow Vijaya the best of its kind, and rubbing again and and again its string set it on the bow. Thereupon having assured his army and commanded them to wait in the battle-field, the powerful and highly energetic Karna set Bhargava weapons to his bow-string.

45. There came out in a stream, O king, millions of sharp arrows in that mighty encounter.

46. Covered fully with those shining and dreadful Kanka and peacock-feathered arrows the Pandava soldiers could see nothing in the battle-field.

47. Assailed by the powerful Bhrgava weapon in that battle, O king, Panchalas set up loud lamentations.

48—49. And O king, thousands of elephants, horses, cars and men falling on all sides, the earth began to shake. The great army of the Pandavas quivered from one end to the other.

50. In the meantime while killing his enemies, that foremost of men, the great warrior Karna, even destroying his foes, shone like smokeless fire.

51—52. Massacred then by Karna the Panchalas and Chedis lost their consciousness in the battle-field like elephants when a forest fire rages on. The leading warriors sent up war-cries roaring like tigers. Like animals at the hour of universal dissolution the soldiers, terror-stricken, and running wildly about in the battle-field, set up loud cries of lamentations.

53. Seeing them thus slaughtered by the charioteer's son, all creatures, beasts and birds, were terrorised.

54. As the spirits call upon the Regent of Death to save them, so the Srinjayas, massacred by Karna, repeatedly prayed to Arjuna and Vasudeva's son to save them.

55. Beholding there the discharge of the dreadful Bhargava weapon and hearing the cries of his men slaughtered by Karna, with arrows Kunti's son Dhananjaya said to Krishna.

56. "Behold, O mighty-armed Krishna, the power of Bhargava weapon. No one can withstand it in battle.

57. Behold again in this great encounter O Krishna, the great son of a charioteer, resembling Death himself in power and performing a dreadful feat.

58. Repeatedly urging on his horses he is looking at me. I will not be able to tear me away from Karna in battle.

59. If a man survives he either meets with success or deafeat in battle. To one dead, O Hrishikesh,death itself is a victory.

60. Thus addressed by Partha, Krishna, the subduer of his enemies,said to Dhananjaya, the foremost of the wise, the following suitable to the occasion.

61. The royal son of Kunti has been greatly wounded by Karna. Seeing him first you will afterwards kill Karna.

62. Then Janarddana proceeded to see Yudhisthira, thinking, O king, that Karna, in the meantime, would be worn out with fatigue in battle.

63. Himself too being desirous of seeing the king thus wounded with arrows, Dhananjaya, at the bidding of Keshava, left the battle, and went on his car.

CHAPTER LXV.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having vanquished Drona's son and performed a highly difficult and heroic task, Dhananjaya, ever irrepressible to his enemies, with a bow ready in his hands, eyed his own army.

2. Cheering up the warriors that were still fighting at the heads of their respective detachments and speaking highly of their former successes Arjuna enjoined his car-warriors to be at their posts.

3. Not finding his brother Yudhisthira, a descendant of Ajamida, Arjuna quickly approached Bhima and enquired of the king's whereabouts, saying "Where is the king ?"

Bhima said :—

4. Wounded wirh Karna's arrows the pious king Yudhisthira has gone away from here. I doubt if he still survives.

Arjuna said :—

5. For this very reason proceed you quickly from here and bring the news of the king, that foremost of Kurus. Forsooth, greatly wounded with Karna's arrows the king has gone to his camp.

6. Although struck greatly with sharpened arrows by Drona's son the king still waited in the battle-field, desirous of victory, until Drona was slain.

7. The high-minded chief of Pandus, undoubtedly met with peril in battle through Karna. Go quickly, Bhima, and learn of his condition. I will wait here and oppose the enemy.

Bhima said :—

8. O illustrious and leading descendant of Bharata, better go yourself and enquire after the king. If I go, O Arjuna, the leading warriors will explain that I am frightened in battle.

Sanjaya said :—

9. Then Arjuna said to Bhimasena :—"The Samsaptakas are before my army. Without killing these my enemies I cannot leave the post."

10. Bhima replied then to Arjuna :—"O foremost of Kurus, with the aid of my own power, I will encounter the Samsaptakas in battle, you better go yourself, O Dhananjaya.

11. Thereupon hearing those brave words of his brother Bhimasena, in the midst of the enemies, and desirous of going to see Yudhisthira, he said to the Vrishni heroe (Krishna) :—

12. "Leave this ooean-like army, O Hrishikesha and drive the horses. I wish to see, O Keshava, the king who has no enemies."

13. While he was about to drive the horses, the foremost of Dasharhas said to Bhima :—"It is nothing wonder for you, O Bhima. Kill the enemies of Partha."

14. Thereupon Hrishikesha drove quickly where Yudhisthira was. Quickly was he borne there, O king, by the horses resembling Garuda himself.

15. He had left there Bhimasena, the slayer of his enemies, with instructions to fight the enemies, O king.

16. Then driving in their car those two heroes approached the king who was lying alone on his bed. They got down from the car and saluted the ieet of the righteous Yudhisthira.

17. Seeing that foremost of men safe and sound the two Krishnas were filled with delight as the two Ashwins are on seeing Indra.

18. As Vivaswan congratulated the two Ashwinis, as Vrihaspati congratulated Indra and Vishnu after they had killed the powerful Asura Jambha so the king congratulated them both.

19. Thinking that Karna had been killed the virtuous king was delighted and he then addressed them thus, with his accents suppressed with joy.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. Welcome to you, Devaki's son and Dhananjaya, highly agreeable to me is the pleasure of you too, O Arjuna, O Achyuta.

2. Though yourselves are not wounded by your enemies, you two, who are his enemies, have killed the mighty Karna,

3. Who was like a deadly serpent in battle, an adept in all weapons, the leader of all the sons of Dhritarashtra, nay the very warder of their armour and coats of mail;

4. Who was protected by the great archers Vrishasena and Sushena; highly energetic, powerful and taught by Rama (himself) the use of arms;

5. Who was the head of all the world, and most celebrated car-warrior; who was the saviour of Dhritarashtra's sons and who led the van of the army;

6. Who was the destroyer of others' armies and the oppressor of the enemies, and was bent upon doing Duryodhana a good turn and afflicting us;

7. Who was irrepressible even unto the gods headed by Vasava in a great battle, and was like unto fire and wind in energy and strength;

8. Who was unfathomable like the nether region and an increaser of the joy of friends, he was like Death incarnate to his enemies. By good luck, having slain that Karna in the great battle you come here like the immortals after vanquishing the demons.

9. O Achyuta, O Arjuna, a great encounter took place to-day between myself setting forth my best energies and that hero who appeared like Death incarnate bent upon destroying all creatures.

10—11. By him my standard was cut down, my two Parshni drivers were killed and I was made horseless and carless in the very presence of Yuyudhana, Dhristadyumna, the twins, the heroic Shikhandin the son of Drupada, and all the Panchalas.

12. O you of mighty arms, having vanquished them all and many others of his enemies the highly powerful Karna, defeated me in that great battle although I tried my very best to withstand him.

13. Forsooth pursuing me on all the sides and defeating all my allies in that battle that foremost of warriors addressed to me many harsh words.

14. It is through Bhima's power that I do still survive, O Dhananjaya; what more need I say? The humiliation is indeed too much for me.

15. O Dhananjaya, through fear of him, I have not slept in the night nor have I enjoyed comfort in the day for these thirteen years.

16—17. O Dhananjaya, I am burning with hatred against him. Conscious of my days being numbered I avoided Karna, like the bird Vaddrinasa. I approached him as if bent on my own destruction. Awake or asleep I spent my days only in thinking how I would accomplish Karna's death.

18. Even while awake, O Arjuna, I see his illusion (of Karna) and it seems to me as if the whole universe is filled with Karna.

19. Wherever I go, O Dhananjaya, in fear of Karna, everywhere I see his image before me.

20. O Partha, with my horses and cars I was vanquished by Karna, who never retreats from the battle-field. He simply let me go with my life.

21. Of what use is life and kingdom to me, since Karna, the beauty of the battle-field, has defied and ridiculed me.

22. I had never undergone such humiliation in battle even from Bhishma, Kripa, or Drona, as I have to-day at the hands of the son of Suta the mighty charioteer.

23. Therefore it is that I ask you to-day, O son of Kunti, about your welfare. Relate to me in detail how you slew Karna to-day.

24. He was in battle like Sakra himself and in prowess like Yama and like Rama in arms. How has he been killed then?

25. He was a mighty charioteer and well-known for being an adept in all the forms of warfare: he was the foremost of archers and the leader of all.

26. O prince, he was respected by Dhritarashtra himself as well as by his sons for you alone. How has then the son of Radha been killed by you to-day?

27. O Arjuna, O foremost of men, in all the battles Karna was regarded by Dhritarashtra's sons as your death.

28. How have you then, O most powerful of men, killed him in battle? Describe to me, O son of Kunti, how Karna has been slain by you.

29. How did you cut off his head, O most mighty one, as a tiger pieces off the head of a Ruru deer, while he was fighting, even in the presence of all his allies?

30—31. Does the wicked Karna lie to-day on the naked earth killed with your keen Kanka-feathered arrows—Karna, the son of Suta, who used to search all the quarters for you and who had promised to give a car with six elephantine bulls to him who would point you out? Indeed by killing him in battle you have performed a work highly congenial to me.

32. How did you encounter and kill in battle that well-honored hero, that proud and haughty son of Suta who used to search you everywhere in the battle-field.

33. Have you, O brother, really slain in battle the vicious scoundrel who was ever ready to challenge you and to give away to others a superb golden chariot along with bulls, steeds and elephants provided they could give him some clue of you?

34. Have you, indeed, slain that favourite of Suyodhana who, being elated with the pride of chivalry, ever used to indulge in self-glorification amidst the assembly of the Kurus?

35. Does the scoundrel lie low on the battle-field to-day being mangled all over the body with long-ranging blood-besmeared shafts hurled by you from your bow. Could you break in twain the arms of Dhritarastra's sons?

36. Could you baffle the foolish braggings he used to make amidst the assembly of kings simply to soothe Duryodhana, saying,—I will kill Phalguna?

37. Have you, O son of Indra, slain in to-day's battle the dull-headed Karna, the son Suta, who had taken an oath not to wash his feet till Partha breathed?

38—39. That designing Karna who amidst the assembly of the Kuru chiefs had said to Krishna 'why don't you, O Krishna, desert the powerless, imbecile and degraded Pandavas'—that Karna who had vowed solemnly that he would not return from the field till he slew (both) Krishna and Partha—tell me does that vicious Karna lie to-day on the field with mangled limbs?

40. You do full well remember how hotly the battle raged when the Srinjayas and the Kaurava's faced each other—the encounter in which I was brought to such a sad plight. Did you come face to face with Karna and shoot him down?

41. Have you to-day, O Sabyasachin, severed that ear-ring-bedecked splendid head of Karna off from his body with your fiery shafts discharged from the Gandiva.

42. O valiant one, afflicted with Karna's shafts to-day how I thought of you (that you would slay him)! Have you put that thought of mine to action by slaying Karna?

43. Being under the ægis of Karna the proud Suyodhana cared us not a jot. Have you by your might removed that ægis?

44. Did you encounter him in the field and settle with that wretched wight, the son of Suta, who had even before the assembly of the Kauravas likened us to sesame seeds devoid of kernel;

45. That unrighteous son of Suta who had, grinning all the while, ordered Duswashanta to drag out Jagyasena's daughter won by Subala's son (as a stake) at dice;

46. That dull-headed Karna who had upbraided the foremost warriors on Earth—our grand-sire Bhisma—upon being described as an indifferent car-warrior in the course of the tale of Rathas and Atirathas?

47. Assure me, O Phalguna, that you have met with and slain that Karna in battle, and thereby quench the flame of vindictiveness blazing within my heart being fanned by the wind of mortification.

48. Tell me, therefore, how you slew the son of Suta. O hero, I have so long been expecting you even as the divine Bishnu had awaited the arrival of Indra to bring him the news of Vritra's death.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hearing those words of the pious king, who was all anger, the great warrior Jishnu of indomitable energy said to the irrepressible and powerful Yudhisthira:

2. "O king, while fighting with the Samsaptakas to-day, Drona's son, the leader of the Kuru army, all of a sudden came upon me discharging arrows that were like deadly serpents.

3. Seeing my car rattling like a cloud, all the soldiers stood encircling it. Killing them all, who were full five hundred in number, I proceeded, O mightiest of kings, against Drona's son.

4. Encountering me, O king, the hero rushed resolutely against me like a leader of elephants rushing upon a lion and intended to rescue the warriors who were being slain by me.

5. Later on in the battle, the invincible preceptor's son, the foremost of Kuru warriors, afflicted me and Janardana with arrows poignant like poison and fire.

6. While he fought with me, eight carts each drawn by eight bullocks conveyed his hundreds of arrows. Like a wind dissipating clouds I baffled the arrows he showered upon me.

7. Like a dark cloud discharging its watery contents in downpours he, drawing his bow-string to his very ears, showered upon me with skill and force thousands of other arrows.

8. So quickly did he move about in the battle-field that we could not discern from which side did he shoot his arrows, right or left, nor could we ascertain when he took up the arrows and when he discharged them.

9. In fact, always we saw the bow of Drona's son drawn to a circle. At last he struck me with five sharp arrows and Vasudeva with another five.

10. In a moment, however, I struck him with thirty thunder-bolt-like arrows. Greatly wounded with the shafts discharged by me he ere long looked like a porcupine.

11. All his limbs were covered with blood. Beholding his soldiers, the best of warriors, bathed in blood and overpowered by me, the son of Suta soon entered into the detachment of car-warriors.

12. Beholding the soldiers terror-striken and over-powered by me in battle and seeing the elephants and horses flying away, Karna at once marched against me with fifty car-warriors. Killing them, however, and avoiding Karna I have come here presently to see you.

13. Seeing Karna, the Panchalas are all filled with fright even like the kine on seeing a lion. Like men entering into the gaping jaws of Death the Prabhadrakas, O king, have confronted Karna.

14. Karna has already killed seventeen hundred of these car-warriors. The son of Suta did not lose heart till he came to our view.

15. You were first engaged with Ashwathama and awfully wounded by him. Afterwards Karna saw you. I thought, O you of wonderful deeds, that coming away from the wanton Karna you were enjoying rest.

16. O son of Pandu, I saw Karna's wonderful weapon being carried in front of the army. Methinks there is none amongst the Srinjayas who will be able to withstand the mighty car-warrior Karna.

17. O king, let Srini's grandson, Satyaki and Dhristadyumna guard my two wings. Let the heroic princes Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas protect my rear.

18—19. O illustrious and most mighty king, as Sakra encountered Vitra, I shall to-day fight with Suta's son, that heroic and invincible car-warrior, if he can be found in this battle. Come and see us fight with each other in battle for victory.

20. Like persons facing a powerful bull the Prabhadrakas are charging upon Karna. Six thousands of kings are giving their lives for heaven.

21. If however, O king, displaying all my strength I do not kill Karna with his allies in battle, I shall be doomed, O lion among kings, to the curse which falls to the lot of one who promises a thing and does not redeem it.

22. I seek thy blessing, O king. Do say that 'victory will be mine.' There the sons of Dhritarashtra are about to devour Bhima. I will slay Karna and his men and all our enemies."

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing that Karna of great prowess was still alive and being angry with Phalguna, Yudhisthira, the Pritha's son of incomparable energy, who had been wounded by Karna with arrows, said to Dhananjaya :

2. "Your army, my brother, must have been disgraced to-day and fled away, stricken with fear. And you have come here forsaking Bhima because you have not been able to kill Karna.

3. Shame it is, O Partha, that you did enter into Kunti's womb. It did not become you to leave behind Bhima in the battle-field because you could not slay Karna.

4. You said to me, O Partha, in the Daita forest that you would kill Karna with no one on your car. Why have you then, afraid of Karna, come here avoiding him and leaving behind Bhima.

5. If you had said in the Daita forest 'O king, I won't be able to kill Karna, we would have in time, O Partha, made some befitting arrangements.

6. Having promised to kill him, O hero, you have not kept your promise. Having launched us in the midst of our enemies why have you shattered us into pieces by wrecking us on a rock ?

7. O Arjuna, we showered many a blessing on you because we expected much good of you. But all our hopes, O prince, are frustrated, like that of a man expecting fruits from a tree and getting flowers instead.

8. Like a hook hidden in a fish, like poison mixed up with food, you did for nothing point out to our covetuous selves this destruction in the shape of kingdom.

9. For these thirteen years, O Dhananjaya, we have been hoping and expecting much of you even like the seeds sown on earth in expectation of rains from gods in season.

10—11. O you of wicked sense, an invisible voice from the sky said to Pritha, on the seventh day from your birth: 'This son born to you will be powerful like Vasava. He will vanquish all his powerful enemies. Gifted with a superior energy he will defeat at Khandava all the gods assisted by other creatures. He will conquer the Madras, the Kalingas, and the Kaikeyas. He will kill the Kurus in the midst of numbers of kings.

12. There will be no archer superior to him and none will be able to discomfit him. This boy, being the master of his own senses and adept in all the branches of knowledge, will subjugate all the living beings at his will.

13—14. O Kunti, this magnanimous son of yours will be handsome like the Soma, swift like the Wind, patient like Sumeru, forbearing like the Earth, effulgent like Sun, wealthy like Kuvera, valiant and powerful like Vishnu. This son of yours, even like Aditi's son Vishnu, the slayer of foes, has taken his being in order to bring victory to his kins and deal destruction to the enemies. This boy of indomitable valour will be far-famed and the founder of a dynasty.'

15. Even that celestial voice resounding in the skies reached the ears of the Maharsis living on the peaks of the Satasringa mountains. But now that voice comes to be untrue. It seems, therefore, that the gods too speak falsehood.

16. The praises which the saintly beings used to lavish upon you, never made me expect Suyodhana's success nor ever did I think that you will be paralised with the fear of Karna.

17. You ride upon a car especially made by the celestial artizan (Viswakarma) himself, the axles of which move smoothly and without any noise. You have the standard of an ape, you hold a sword bedecked with gold and tied with silk, and your bow Gandiva is as lengthy as the palm tree, even you have Kesava for your charioteer. Why then, O Partha, have you come back from the field of battle, for fear of Karna?

18. If you, O wretch, had even made over your bow to Kesava and contented yourself by being his charioteer, he would have slain that fearful Karna, as the lords of the Maruts (Sakra) slew with thunder the Asura known by the name of Vritra.

19. If you are unable to resist the fearful Karna in his march on the field to-day, then do make over this your Gandiva to any other king who is your superior in the use of weapons.

20. The world will not then see us bereft of family and children, deprived of our happiness and kingdom, and sunk, O son of Pandu, into the fathomless abyss of the hell of torment.

21. It would have been better had you come out in the fifth month as an abortion, or better still, if you would not have taken your being in the womb of Kunti, than, O vile wretch, being born of a royal line, to show your back in the battle-field.

22. Fie to your Gandiva! Fie to the strength of your arms, fie to your numberless arrows, fie to your standard bearing the ensign of an ape on it and fie to your car presented to you by the god of fire!"

CHAPTER LXIX.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing the words of Yudhistira, Kownteya—the owner of white steeds—in a tempestuous mood took hold of his sword to slay that mightiest of the Bharata's race.

2. Kesava, the cogniser of human hearts, seeing his rage, enquired;—"Why, O Partha, do you lay your hands on your sword?

3. Here, O Dhananjaya, I see no adversary to try the strength of your steel. Clever Bhimasena has already assailed the Dhartarastras.

4. O Kownteya, you have returned from the field, to see king Yudhistira and you have seen that he is keeping up well.

5. This is the time of rejoicing, as you have seen that best of kings whose prowess is like that of a tiger. Why should you then betray yourself thus?

6. O son of Kunti, I do not find any one here whom you can slay. What makes you then to yearn for fight, or have you lost the balance of your mind?

7. Why do you seize your mighty sword so suddenly, I enquire this of you. O Kownteya, whence is this desire of your heart, or why do you fly to sword in such a sullen mood and with such a vigour?"

8. Thus addressed by Krishna, Arjuna, looking towards Yudhistira and whizzing like an angry snake, replied:—

9. "He who tells me 'Give your Gandiva to another,' I would cut his head off; such is my secret vow.

10. Now that this king of immeasurable prowess has told me those words in your presence, O Govinda, I won't forgive him.

11. I will, therefore, put to the sword this pious king. I will redeem my vow by slaying this best of men.

12. For this alone I have taken up the sword, O delighter of the Yadus; by slaying Yudhisthira I will thus adhere to truth.

13. I shall thereby be free from grief and fever. O Janardana, what do you wish me to do under the present circumstances.

14. Sire, you are well acquainted with all the past and the future of this universe. I shall, therefore, do as you tell me."

Sanjaya said :—

15. Saying, "Fie, fie unto you, Partha," Govinda again continued :

16. "Now I understand, O Partha, that you have never attended upon the old, since you, O mightiest of men, have been overcome with anger at a time quite out of season.

17. O Dhananjaya, those who are versed in the niceties of religion would never act in the way as you are doing to-day, O pious son Pandu, on not being acquainted with them.

18. O Partha, he who does an act improper and heinous is the vilest of men.

19. You know not the words of wisdom the learned men preach, after the rules of morality, to the pupils waiting up on them.

20. Persons ignorant of them become benumbed and befooled in discriminating between what ought to be done and what ought not, even as you, O Partha, have been non-plussed.

21. It is not easy to learn what ought to be done and what ought not. Of course everything can be learnt with the help of the scriptures. You are, however, a stranger to them.

22. Believing yourself to be conversant with morality, you are observing it in a way which but indicates your ignorance of it. You believe yourself to be virtuous but you know not, O Partha, that it is a sin to slay living beings.

23. Methinks, keeping from doing any injury to any animal is a cardinal virtue. Even an untruth might be told but never an animal ought be slain.

24. O best of men, how could you then like an ordinary man wish to slay your eldest brother the king, who is well versed in morality.

25—26. O Bharata, the slaying of a man who is not engaged in a fight, or is unwilling to fight, or takes to flight, or seeks your shelter, or joins his hands, or gives himself up to you, or is insane, be he even a foe, is never upheld by the righteous. And your superior is even all this.

27. You had formerly taken the vow through childishness. And now through folly you are inclined to do an unrighteous act.

28. Why, O Partha, do you rush upon thy superior, intending to slay him, without determining [before-hand] the exceedingly fine course of virtue which is, certainly, not easily intelligible.

29—30. O son of Pandu, this mystery of virtue I will now explain to you as it was explained by Bhisma, by the pious Yudhisthira, by Vidura or the so-called Kshatri, and by Kunti of great renown. I will tell it you in all its detail; listen to it, O Dhananjaya.

31. One who tells the truth is a pious person. Nothing is there higher than truth. It is, therefore, very difficult to understand the details of truth as observed in action.

32. Truth becomes unutterable and untruth utterable, where untruth would pose as truth and truth as untruth.

33. In a question of danger to life and in marriage untruth may be uttered. Where one's entire fortunes are at stake untruth becomes utterable.

34. At a marriage, or in the enjoymen of lust, or when one's life is at stake, or when one's entire fortunes are about to be lost, or in the cause of a Brahmin untruth may be uttered. It is said that there is no sin in uttering these five sorts of falsehood.

35. On these occasions untruth becomes truth and truth untruth.

36. He who is bent upon always practising truth alone is a fool and takes truth to be as it is. Indeed it is not a very easy thing to become righteous. He who can distinguish between the niceties of truth and untruth can alone become conversant with morality.

37. What wonder is there then that a wise man by doing something awfully cruel may even acquire virtue, as Valaka did by killing a blind beast.

38. What wonder then that an ignorant and inexperienced person, intending to practise virtue, would commit grave vice like Koushika on the river-bank."

Arjuna said :—

39. Tell me of it, O holy one, in a way that I may learn it,—these stories about Valaka and Koushika on the river-bank.

Basudeva said :—

40. There was once a hunter, O Bharata, Valaka by name. He used to kill animals, not willfully but, in order to support his children and wife.

41. Devoted to his tribal pursuits, always speaking the truth and devoid of malice, he used to maintain his aged mother and father and other dependants.

42. Once on a day, though diligently searching for an animal, he could find none. At last he found a beast of prey, drinking water, which had lost its eyes but the loss was supplied by its keen sense of smell.

43. Though he had not before seen a like of it, yet he killed it then and there. No sooner the blind beast had been killed, that there fell from the skies a shower of flowers.

44. A celestial car, filled with the songs and music of Apsaras, came down from heaven to fetch that hunter of animals.

45. That beast having, successfully performed all the austerities of asceticism with a view to kill all the animals, had received that boon but was made blind instead by the Self-born.

46. Therefore Valaka, having killed the beast that was bent upon killing all the animals, went to heaven. Morality is, therefore, very difficult to be understood.

47. There was an ascetic Brahmin named Kaushika not much read in the Scriptures. He used to reside at a confluence of rivers, not far away from a village.

48. He had taken the vow that 'he would ever speak the truth.' Therefore, O Dhananjaya, he become famous as a truthful man.

49. At a time certain persons, being afraid of robbers, entered the woods. Even there the robbers, filled with anger, doggedly haunted after them.

50. They then approaching Kaushika the truthful, said, 'O holy one, which way have a number of men passed a little while ago? Asked in the name of truth tell us if you have seen them.'

51. Being thus asked Kaushika told them the truth,—that they had entered the wood thickly covered with trees, creepers and shrubs.

52. O Partha, thus did Kaushika inform them. And the report goes that on this those wanton men got hold of those persons and put them to death.

53. For the grave sin of uttering that truth, which should not have been uttered, Kaushika, unversed in the subtleties of religion, fell into a fearful hell :

54. As a foolish man, ill-read in the Scriptures, unacquainted with the details of morality, is fit to fall into an awful hell for not asking aged men to set his doubts at rest.

55. Your definition of morality must be then something like that. Some people attempt at attaining that high and difficult knowledge by the exercise of reasoning.

56. Many persons maintain, on the other hand, that morality can be learned from the Scriptures alone. I do not find fault with the latter, but then everything is not provided for there.

57. The moral precepts have been made for the well-being of the creatures.

58. All that is free from any motive of injury to any being is surely morality. For, indeed, the moral precepts have been made to free the creatures from all injuries.

59. Dharma (morality) is so-called because it protects all. Indeed, morality saves all creatures. Surely then that is morality which is capable of keeping off a creature from all injuries.

60. Those who try to stick to them logically, have scarcely a mind to acquire morality. If you can get rid of them without a word do on no account have any intercourse with them.

61. If he must be spoken to or if he takes offence on not being talked with, in that case better speak a falsehood ; verily that untruth is truth.

62. He who, having taken a vow on some set purpose, cannot redeem the same by acts, attains not the rewards of that vow.

63. When one's life is endangered, at marriage, at the risk of destruction of one's kith and kin or in the course of business, all that is uttered will not be regarded as falsehood.

64. To those who are well-versed in the real secrets of morality, there appear no immorality in all this.

65. There even, where one cuts off his connections with robbers after having taken an oath, it is better to swear falsely, for surely that falsehood would be truth. On no account should one's wealth be given to the robbers, if that could be helped.

66. Wealth when given to the sinful afflicts even the donor. Therefore, an untruth spoken in the cause of morality does not amount to a falsehood.

67. I have now duly pointed out to you the distinctive features of morality. Having heard all these tell me, O Partha, if Yudhisthira deserves to be killed."

Arjuna said :—

68. "O Krishna! You have spoken as a man of great wisdom should say, as a man of great intelligence need say. Your words are even such as would do good to us.

69. You are like both a mother and a father to us. You, O Krishna, are our sanctuary; that is why your words are beneficial to us.

70. Nothing is there in the three worlds that is unknown to you. Therefore, you know the sublime morality with all its niceties.

71. I admit that the righteous Yudhisthira, son of Pandu, is unslayable. In this connection kindly tell me something in my favour. Hear me tell you of something else that lies in my heart.

72—73. You know, O Keshava, the best scion of the Dasharha race, that my vow is that whoever among men tells me 'make over, O Partha, thy Gandiva to him who is superior to you in point of chivalry or in wielding armours' I will, with all my might, slay him. So Bhima also has taken a vow to slay the man who addreses him as 'one without the hirsute indications of manhood!' Just now the king has repeatedly told me in your presence " make over your bow."

74. O Keshava, if I slay him, surely then the thought of having slain the king will immerse me in sin and make me loose my valour and mental faculties, and thus cut short my days in this world.

75. Therefore, O Krishna, the best of all the righteous men, do give me such counsels as would uphold my well-known vow and leave both myself and the eldest son of Pandu alive."

76. Basudeva said, "O valiant one, the King Yudhistira feels weary and aggrieved on being afflicted with arrows shot at him by Karna during the campaign; the more so as he was harassed with shaft-shots by the son of Suta even when he was retiring from the field.

77. Heavy at heart as he was at all this, he used such angry and improper expressions to you. Moreover, he addressed you in that tenor thinking that if he could provoke you, you would forthwith slay Karna in battle.

78. O Partha, the king believes that this immoral Karna is unbearable to everyone else on earth but you. It was this that enraged him so highly as to use such cruel words even in your face.

79. King Yudhistira, the righteous, is of opinion that to-day's battle is a play at dice in which the life of the ever-deviceful and ever-overbearing Karna has been laid as an wager. If he is slain, the Kauravas would necessarily meet with defeat.

80. Therefore, O Arjuna, the son of Dharma deserves not death at your hands. At the same time your vow also must be kept good. Under the circumstances listen to the means that will make him apparently dead without the real loss of life.

81. A man of honour lives in this material world so long as he receives the homage due to him, but when he is woefully dishonored, he is spoken of as one more dead than alive.

82. O Partha, this king has ever been honored by you, Bhima, and the twins and by all the wise and chivalrous men of this world. You just offer some insult to that king.

83. O Bharata, a superior on being addressed as 'thou' dies [at heart]. Therefore, you do address the much-respected Yudhistira as 'thou.'

84. O the best of Kurus, O son of Kunti, do behave thus towards Yudhistira the righteous, and insult that honorable man by this censurable behaviour.

85. This is a Sruti given out by the Rishis Atharva and Angira, the best of all the Srutis; people who wish well should always follow this without any scruple.

86. To address a venerable superior as 'thou,' is to kill him without actually depriving him of his life. Therefore do you, who are versed in morality, address Yudhistira the righteous, in the manner I have indicated.

87. On your acting thus the righteous Yudhistira will verily feel that you have offered him a death-blow. Later on you will worship his feet and speak to him in befitting terms and thus pacify him.

88. O Partha, your intelligent brother Yudhistira would never feel in the least angry with you. On being thus freed from impiety and fratricide you may cheerfully proceed against and slay Karna, the son of Suta."

CHAPTER LXX.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Being thus spoken to by Janardana, Pritha's son Arjuna highly approved of the friendly counsels and then addressing Yudhistira, the righteous, in a sullen tone, spoke such harsh words as he had never before done.

2—4. Arjuna said, "O king, thou shouldst upbraid me no more. Thou who art at a distance of about two miles from the battle-field, shouldst not upbraid me for nothing. He who having, in fair fight, defeated the enemies and slain those chivalrous lords of Earth and their best and leading car-warriors, elephants, cavalry and innumerable combatants, has been fighting with the foremost of heroes; he, who having routed in fight more than a thousand elephants and ten thousand soldiers of the Kamboja-mountaineers has been yelling as a lion roars after having killed many a deer; that Bhima may upbraid me.

5. The wonderful feats the hero Brikodara has been achieving on jumping down from his chariot with mace in hand, and the innumerable horses, cars and elephants he has been destroying, are such, the like of which thou canst never achieve.

6. That hero, with the valour of Indra, has been, with the best of swords, splitting down riders with horses and elephants, and has been consuming the enemies with arrows and the broken limbs of cars, and spreading death all around with his feet and hands.

7. Indeed, Bhimsena, mighty like Yama and Kuvera, readily slays the hostile army. That Bhimsena may revile me and not thou who art ever being protected by friends.

8. He, who has been diving single-handed deep into the surge of Durjodhana's soldiers, carrying by storm the foremost elephants, steeds, infantry and charioteers; that Bhimsena, the slayer of foes, may reprove me.

9. He, who has been slaying, in numbers the ever-furious elephants of the hostile Anga, Banga, Kalinga, Nisada and Magadha, that look like masses of blue clouds; that Bhimsena, the chastiser of enemies, may find fault with me.

10. In the battle that valiant Brikodara being seated on a superbly-decked chariot has been holding in readiness handful of arrows and oppurtunely hurling them down in showers, like the clouds pouring torrents of rain.

11. I have seen that in to-day's battle Bhimasena has cut asunder with his arrows, the heads, bodies and proboscis of eight hundred elephants and thereby killed them; therefore, that Brikodara, the slayer of foes, may use harsh words towards me.

12. O Bharata, the learned men say that the strength of the foremost of Brahmanas lies in words and the main strength of the Kshatriyas is in their arms; but thine strength lies in thine words, moreover thou art wanton. As for me, it is not unknown to thee what stuff I am made of.

13. I am ever bent upon pandering to thy inclinations with my wives, sons, life and soul; still that thou hast been torturing me with thine pointed words, I am convinced that we cannot expect happiness at thy hands.

14. O Bharata, dost thou be trifling with me no longer, lying all the while on Draupadi's bed. It is for thee that I have been slaying many a mighty car-warrior. Perhaps that has been making thee fearless and wanton still. Indeed, I could never feel any happiness from thee.

15. O God among men, the magnanimous Bhisma, true to his vows and only with a view to please thee, had himself pointed out that the valiant and high-souled Shikhandin, the son of Drupada, would be the cause of his death; and whele I had been shielding that Shikhandin in the battle-field he was slain by the latter.

16. I do not approve of thine being restored to sovereignty, because thou art addicted to the vice of gambling. Having thyself committed a sin, to which the low alone are addicted, thou art now trying to get off from thy foes through our aid.

17. Thou hast heard of the immorality and the numerous evils of playing at dice, dilated upon by Sahadeva. Yet thou couldst not forego those evils practised by the wicked alone. It is but for this that we are steeped in distress.

18. Since thou wert engrossed in gambling, we could derive no happiness from thee. O Pandava, having caused all these mischiefs thyself, thou art now heaping al, these reproaches on me.

19. Lo, the hostile troops, slain by us are lying prostrate on earth with mangled limbs and are uttering the deepest groans. Indeed, it was thou who didst those wrongs, for which the Kauravas have lost their lives.

20. The mighty warriors of the Kurus and ourselves have performed wonderful feats of valour in the battle-field. The hostile troops from the North, the West, the East and the South have been slain to a man.

21. O ruler of mankind, it was you who had played at dice, and it was for you alone that our kingdom was lost and we have fallen on evil days. Therefore, O king, do not provoke us too much by casting cruel aspersions on us."

Sañjaya said :—

22. The calm, virtuous and conscientious, Sabyasachin (Arjuna) having addressed to Yudhistira such harsh and exceedingly cruel words, and having thus slightly sinned became cheerless.

23. Then that son of Indra became repentant and sighing heavily unsheathed his sword. Seeing this, Krishna said "What is this? Why do you draw your sword lustrous like the blue skies?

24. If you have anything to ask, be out with it. I will tell you how to gain your desired ends." Being thus spoken to by Keshava, the foremost of men, the remorse-stricken Dhananjaya replied:

25. "I do mean to destroy my body that has thus sinned." Hearing this from Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, Krishna the adorable of the righteous, said unto him:

26. "O slayer of foes, O Kiritin (Arjuna), why have you become so much crest-fallen on addressing the king as 'thou.' You intend to kill yourself, but no honest man would approve of it.

27. O hero among men, what your state would have been had you, under a false religious zeal, slain your eldest brother to-day?

28. O Partha, religion is very subtle and awfully unintelligible, the more so to the ignorant. Hear me tell you of it. Suicide is tantamount to fratricide, and in either case condemnation to the same hell would have been inevitable.

29. Therefore, O Partha, now recount to him your merits and valorous deeds and you shall thereby slay yourself."

30. Dhananjaya, the son of Sakra (Indra) hailed these words, saying, "Be it so." Then lowering his bow, he said unto Yudhistira, the adored of the virtuous, "Hear me, O King:

31. "O ruler of men, excepting only the wielder of Pinaka, the foremost of the Gods, there is no skilled archer like me. On receiving the sanction of that illustrious deity, whose forehead is bedecked with the cresent moon, I can surely destroy in a moment this whole universe with all its organic and inorganic creation.

32. O King, it was I who had defeated all the nations and the chiefs of all the principalities in the world and brought them under your subjection. It was through my influence that your Rajasuya sacrifice had been brought to a happy close by gifts of Dakshina and by a meeting of the celestials.

33. In my palms there are the signs of sharp swords and stringed bows and arrows, and in my soles are the marks of cars and ensigns. That is why a man like me can never be defeated in battle.

34. I have slain the enemies from the North, routed the foes from the West, driven off the hostile squadron from the East, and extirminated the foes from the South. Indeed I have slain over half the hostile armies; there is left only a small portion of the most unflinching foes.

35. O king, the army of Bharata, with the blazing effulgence of the celestial host, being slain by me, are lying flat on the field. With weapons, I slay those alone that are skilled in the use of weapons, that is why I do not make a wholesale massacre of the entire hostile army.

36. O Krishna, let us hasten to slay the son of Suta, riding upon my awe-inspiring and victorious chariot. Let this king be free from all anxieties and troubles. I am sure to slay Karna in battle with my arrows.

37. To-day either dame Suta will be bereft of her son by me, or Kunti will be bereft of me by Karna. Verily do I tell you that I won't unlock my mail-cloak to-day without slaying Karna in battle with my arrows."

Sanjaya said :—

38. Having again thus addressed Yudhistira, the foremost of the righteous, the diadem-decked Arjuna readily laid aside his weapons and bow and thursted his sword into the scabbard.

39. Having thus appeased Yudhistira he hung down his head in shame and with joined hands thus addressed him: "O king, I bow unto you, be pleased with me; you will understand in due course the gist of all that I have told you."

40. The valiant Arjuna, having thus appeased Yudhistira, capable of bearing all enemies, and, having stood there awhile, said again, "It shall not be deferred, it must be done ere long. There is Karna coming towards me. I must proceed against him.

41. "I am going to extricate Bhimasena from the battle by all means and slay the son of Suta. My life is devoted to perform what pleases you. I am telling you the truth, know it for certain."

42. The diadem-decked Arjuna of blazing effulgence having said this and worshipped Yudhistira by his feet, rose to proceed to the battle.

43. After having heard these harsh words of Phalguna (Arjuna), Yudhisthira, the foremost of the righteous, with a heavy heart rose from the bed [on which he had been reclining] and said unto him,

44. "O Arjuna, the wicked deed that I have done has brought upon you this terrible calamity; do you, therefore, chop off to-day the head of this exterminator of the race, the worst of the family.

45. "A wretch, sinner, dull-headed, idle, coward, insulter of the aged, and wanton that I am, what is the good of your thus behaving towards me, after having addressed such rude words?

46. A sinner that I am, I would repair to the woods this very day: relieved of my company may you live in happiness. The magnanimous Bhimsena is worthy of the throne. An impotent that I am, what is the use of my having the sovereignty?

47. I cannot any longer bear the harsh words you spoke being excited with anger. Therefore, let Bhimsena be the king. It is not worth my while to live after being thus insulted."

48. Having expressed himself thus, the king Yudhistira leaving that bed stood up suddenly and then expressed his intention of proceeding to the woods. Upon this Vasudeva bowing down, said unto him,

49. "O king! you know already the vow of the veracious wielder of the Gandiva, in respect of his Gandiva.

50. Whoever in this world tells him, 'Give thy Gandiva to another,' would be slain by him. And even these words you addressed him just now.

51. "O lord of the Earth! that is why Partha simply to keep up that solemn vow, under my instructions, addressed you with those insulting words. Because it is said, that insults to superiors are tantamount to death.

52. "Therefore, O long armed king! forgive us of the unmannerly behaviour of us both, Arjuna and myself.

53. O king! we both of us surrender ourselves to you. I beseech you, by all means vouchsafe us your pardon.

54. To-day the earth shall soak the blood of that reprobate son of Radha; solemnly I swear before you that you may count upon Suta's son as slain to-day, and know it for certain that whomever you like, he loses his life to-day."

55. Upon this Yudhistira, the foremost of the righteous, hastened to raise the prostrate Hrisikesha with due honor.

56. Then, folding his hands together, he said unto him these opportune words: "It is just as you said, O Gobinda! Let this transgression be in respect of me; there is no harm in that.

57. O Madhaba, O Achyuta! I am obliged, to and saved by you; you have rescued us to-day from a grave calamity.

58. Both of us were steeped in ignorance to-day. It is only through your help that we have been rescued from an ocean of distress.

59. O Achyuta! It is through having obtained your intelligence at our raft that this day we have safely passed over an ocean of grief and remorse. In fact, it is through you that we have been blessed with our relatives and allies."

CHAPTER LXXI.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Having addressed Yudhisthira in such an unbecoming manner, and thus being guilty of an unrighteous conduct, Dhananjaya, the son of Prithi, became disconsolate beyond measure.

2—4. Basudeva [then] in a caustic tone addressing the son of Pandu said, "How, O Partha, would you have fared, had you mindful of [your] truthfulness, slain the son of Dharma with the keen edge of your steel. By simply 'thou theeing' the king you are affected so much: what, would you have done, O Partha, had you actually fulfilled your promise. The law of polity are indeed too subtle for comprehension, especially to those of weak intellect.

5. For moral scruples you would surely have taken out the life of your eldest, and would have thus committed a heineous sin and fallen into eternal perdition.

6. I adjure you, therefore, to assuage the sorrows of the pious king, the adored of the devout and the head of the Kurus.

7. Let us pacify king Yudhisthira with due obeisance, and when he is reconciled let both of us march against the chariot of the son of Suta, and fight him out.

8. O bestower of honors, secure the blessings of the son of Dharma, by shooting down Karna with the keen points of your arrows.

9. O mighty-armed one, in my opinion this is the best course you could follow at present. By acting thus you will gain your ends."

10. After this, O monarch, Arjuna became quite ashamed of himself; bending his head down he touched Yudhisthira's feet,

11. And repeatedly said unto that chief of the Bharatas, "O king, be appeased; forgive me for the impropriety of my language towards you; they were given expression to [as the only course left me] for maintaining truthfulness and avoiding sin."

12—13. O giant of the Bharata race, seeing Dhananjaya, the slayer of foes, thus fall at his feet with tears in his eyes, Yudhisthira, the lord of creation, the emblem of religion, rose up from his reclining position and with gushing eyes affectionately embraced him.

14. Having thus indulged themselves for some time and assuaged their grief the two brothers of bright effulgence became reconciled to each other, and were once again cheerful.

15. Later on the son of Pandu, again giving Jaya a hug and taking the fragrance of his head, became supremely happy, and praising his conduct, said:

16. "O mighty-wielder of bows, in spite of all my exertions in the battle-field, Karna with his shafts has, in the midst of the whole assembly, shattered my armours pinions, forces, arrows, bows and steeds.

17. O Phalguna, thinking of this, and witnessing his conduct in the battle, I have been sorely aggrieved. Life has no longer any charm for me.

18. If you do not overcome that indomitable hero in to-day's battle, then surely I will give up my life:—what would be the use of bearing the burden of this body and carrying it on the earth any longer?

19. O mighty scion of the Bharata race, upon hearing Yudhisthira thus express himself, Vijaya replied:

20—21. "O foremost of kings, O lord of the earth, solemnly do I swear unto you that by your grace, by Bhima, and the twins that this day either I shall slay Karna, or myself kiss the earth being slain by him. I take this vow upon this weapon."

22. Having delivered himself thus to the king he addressed the following words to Madhaba: "Verily, O Krishna, I will slay Karna in to-day's battle. May you be blessed! for it is only through your tactics that the wretch could be slain."

23. O foremost of kings, upon Partha's uttering these words Keshava said unto him: "O mighty Bharata, you are well worthy of slaying Karna.

24. Indeed, O best of men, O foremost of car-warriors, it has ever been uppermost in my thoughts as to how you would succeed in slaying him."

25. Then the ever-intelligent Madhaba once more turned towards the son of Dharma, and said; "O Yudhisthira it is meet that you would console Bibhatsu,

26. And order him to slay the wretched Karna to-day. O son of Pandu, it is upon hearing that you were being afflicted with the arrows of Karna that we came to ascertain the plight you were in.

27. O king, it was very fortunate that you were not slain or captured. O holy one, do now console your Bibhatsu and bless him that he may attain victory."

28. Yudhisthira said,—"Come O Partha, O Bibhatsu, come and embrace me; O son of Pandu, you have addressed me in words befitting the position and for my good, and I have forgiven you for their expressions.

29. O Dhananjaya you have my orders to go and slay Karna. Do not, O Partha, take offence with me for the vile expression I have made use of against you."

Sanjaya continued:—

30. O king, thereupon Dhananjaya bent his head low, and with his hands took hold of the feet of his eldest brother.

31. The king then raising him clasped him to his bosom, and smelling his head once more addressed him thus:

32. "O Dhananjaya of mighty arms, I feel highly honored by you; do you attain once more the greatness and victory you ever deserve."

Arjuna said:—

33. "Getting hold of that sinful son of Radha, who vaunts of his prowess, I shall in to-day's battle slay him along with his allies.

34. Karna, who had afflicted you with his arrows shot from a full-drawn bow, would reap the dire effects of his act, this day.

35. O ruler of the earth, I assure you that I will slay Karna to-day in dreadful battle, and come back to bring unto you the happy tidings walking all the while in your steps.

36. O lord of the universe, I swear unto you by your feet that I shall not return from the terrible battle to-day without having slain Karna."

Sanjaya said :—

37. As the diadem-decked Arjuna was speaking in this strain, Yudhisthira cheerfully addressed to him these graver words :

38. "Do you ever attain unfading fame, eternal life, ready consummation of hopes, perpetual victory, ceaseless energy and continual success over your enemies ! May the gods grant you prosperity ! May you realise all that I wish of you ! At present go at once to the battle and kill Karna for self-elevation even as Purandara killed Vritra.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. On having satisfied Yudhisthira, Partha, bent upon slaying the son of Suta, cheerfully said unto Govinda :

2. "Let my chariot be again got ready, and let the best of steeds be harnessed thereto, and let all sorts of arms be placed in that superb vehicle.

3. The horses, thoroughly trained by expert horsemen, have already refreshed themselves by rolling on the ground. Let them be forthwith brought out, and equipped in the trappings of the car. O Govinda, make headway, to take away the life of Suta's son.

4. O sovereign, on being thus addressed by the magnanimous Phalguna, Krishna said to Daruka, "Do all that has been said by Arjuna, the foremost of archers and the best scion of Bharata's race."

5. O best of kings, Daruka on being thus ordered by Krishna, equipped the chariot, covered with tiger-skins and ever awe-inspiring to the enemies. He then informed the magnanimous son of Pandu, that the chariot was ready.

6. Seeing the chariot equipped by the high-souled Daruka, Arjuna took leave of Yudhisthira, and with the Brahmanas' blessings and performance of their many propitiatory rites, then proceeded to ascend his superb chariot.

7. On Yudhisthira, the righteous one and of great wisdom, having bestowed his benedictions Arjuna marched against Karna's chariot.

8. O Bharata, seeing that great archer start off for the field all the living beings believed Karna as already slain by the magnanimous Pandava.

9. O king, the whole universe turned calm for the time being. O lord of men, blue jays (the king-fishers), wood-peckers, herons, began to hover round the son of Pandu.

10. O king, a flight of birds, of beauty and good omen, called Pung, began to cackle merrily as if to urge Arjuna to hasten to the battle.

11. While O monarch, the protentous Kankas, vultures, cranes, hawks and ravens flew before him in anticipation of food.

12. Besides these other auspicious auguries presaged the extinction of the hostile host, and the doom of Karna.

13. While on his way to the field Partha began to perspire copiously and became deeply thoughtful as to how he would gain his end.

14. Then finding Partha proceeding in such a thoughtful mood Vasudeva's son, the slayer of Madhu, said these words to the wielder of Gandiva :

15. "O Wielder of Gandiva, there is no man in this world, who could defeat those you have defeated with your bow in the battle-field.

16. I have seen many a hero, valiant like Sakra, who have gone off to the highest regions having encountered you in the battle.

17—18. O gifted one, who, that is not equal to you, could in battle withstand Drona and Bhima and Bhagadatta and Binda and Anubinda of Abanti, and Sudakshina, the chief of the Kambojas, and Srutayudha of mighty prowess, and Achyutayudha as well.

19. O Arjuna, you have heavenly weapons and dexterity of hand and energy ; you are always clear-handed in the battle-field, well-versed in the science of war, unfailing in your aim, and your ready-wit in emergencies and your martial manœvres are admirable.

20. O Partha, you can vanquish the gods and Gandharvas together with the organic and inorganic creation, there is no mortal warrior on earth who can be your rival in battle.

21. There cannot be found any skilled archer like you, either among the invincible Kshatriyas or the gods.

22. Brahma, the creator of all beings, has himself made that powerful bow Gandiva, O Partha, which you fight with. And that is why no one can outsrip you in battle.

23. However, O son of Pandu, I shall tell you words that would conduce to your well-being. O strong-armed one, do not think lightly of Karna, who is a glory of the field.

24. Karna is valiant, proud, an adept in the use of weapons, an expert charioteer, skilled in the tactics of war, a veteran warrior, and an able diplomatist.

25. O son of Pandu, to you I need not say much; hear me tell you of him in brief. I regard that mighty car-warrior Karna as being equal, if not superior, to you in prowess. Therefore, exert utmost caution in slaying him in the great battle.

26. He is valarous like Agni, swift like the speed of the wind, furious like the Destroyer, strong and powerful like the lion.

27. He is eight ratnis (i.e., about 168 inches) in height, and of long arms. His chest is expanded and strong, and he is almost invincible. He is, moreover, chivalrous and an eminent hero, and of graceful figure.

28. He possesses all the necessary attributes of an warrior, and is a dispeller of of the fears of his friends, always hostile to the Pandavas and ever bent upon doing good turns to the sons of Dhritarashtra.

29. Methinks that the son of Radha cannot be slain by any one, not even by the gods with Vasava himself at their head, excepting by you alone. Therefore, do you slay the son of Suta to-day.

30. No one made of flesh and blood, not all the warriors, nor even the gods would succeed in defeating that mighty car-warrior in fight, even if they combine together to do so.

31. He is wicked, vicious and wanton, and ever bears evil designs against the Pandavas. He has no self-interest in this quarrel with the Pandavas. Do you attain success to-day by slaying Karna in battle.

32. Do you to-day cut short the days of that son of Suta, the adored of the car-warriors, who claims to be beyond the pale of death. That son of Suta in his arrogance ever disdains the Pandavas.

33. O Dhananjaya, the sinful Suyodhana poses himself as a hero only counting upon Karna's valour. Do you to-day strike at the root of all evils by slaying down that son of Suta.

34. O Dhananjaya, do slay that mighty Karna, who has the sword for his tongue, the bow for his mouth, the arrows for his teeth, and who is moreover arrogant and energetic.

35. I am fully aware of your chivalry and strength. Do, O hero, slay that Karna in battle even as a lion kills an elephant.

36. Do in to-day's battle kill that Vaikartana Karna, counting upon whose prowess the sons of Dhritarashtra overlook your manly virtues,"

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O Bharata, then again did Keshava of magnanimous heart address the following words to Arjuna, who was proceeding resolutely to slay Karna,

2. To-day, O Bharata, is the seventeenth day of this horrible carnage of men, elephants and horses.

3. O sovereign, at first your own troops and those of the hostile party were a legion, but being engaged in fight there have been left but a small remnant.

4. Though the Kauravas had, at the outset, numerous steeds and elephants, yet they have been routed on the field as they had to face yourself as their foe.

5. These potentates, and these united forces of the Srinjayas, and these Pandavas have been successful in holding their ground, only because they have such an unflinching leader in you.

6. O destroyer of foes, being under your protection, the Panchala, Pandava, Matsya, Karusa and Chedi hosts have been sweeping away the hostile army.

7. O Sire, who else could have vanquished the combined army of the Kauravas, had not the valiant Pandavas been fighting under your ægis?

8. What need I speak of defeating the Kauravas? Single-handed you can vanquish in battle the Asuras, celestials and human beings of the three worlds put together.

9. O mighty one, who else, excepting yourself, could have conquered Bhagadatta in fight, even were he powerful like Basava himself.

10. O holy Partha, no mortal could even gaze upon this vast army, being as they were, under your protection.

11. O Partha, Dhristyadyumna and Shikhandi had succeeded in slaying Drona and Bhisma, only because you protected them in battle.

12. Or, O Partha, who else could have conquered in battle those most eminent warriors of the Bharata race,—Drona and Bhishma, endued with the prowess of a Sakra.

13—15. O most powerful one, who else but you could defeat those formidable leaders of Aksouhinis, those unflinching and invincible heroes, Bhisma—son of Shantanu, Drona, Vaikartana, Kripa, and Drona's son and King Duryodhana himself, all united together and adepts in wielding arms.

16. Numerous detachments of [hostile] soldiers have been extirpated; their cars, horses and elephants have been cut down [by you], as also numbers of indignant and impetuous Kshatriyas hailing from various provinces.

17—18. O Bharata [lo] the forces of the Gobasas, the Dasamiyas, Basatis, the Easterners, the Batadhanas and the sensitive Bhojas, and of other Bramhanas and Kshatriyas, with their best horses and elephants, have all been slain confronting you and Bhima [in battle].

16—21. The Tusharas, the Yabanas, the Khashas, the Darbabhisaras, the Paradas, the Shakas, the Ramathas, the Tanganas, the Andhraks, the Pulindas, all of fierce temperament and awful deeds, and the Kiratas of formidable prowess, and the Mlechhas, the Mountain tribes, and the people inhabiting the Sea coasts, all of whom are very powerful, unflinching in battle, and wielders of maces, have gathered round the standard of the Kurus and been fighting hard for Suyodhana. And none else but you, O scorcher of foes, could defeat them in battle.

22. If you had not come to the rescue who else could advance against the mighty troops of the Dhartarastras arrayed in battle order?

23. O puissant one, the hostile troops shrouded with dust looked-like a surging sea, and the infuriated Pandavas, forcing their way amongst them, threw them overboard.

24. The mighty Jayatsena, the king of the Magadhas, was slain in battle by Abhimanyu these seven days past.

25. The ten thousand powerful elephants, forming the king's retinue, were then struck down by Bhimasena with his mace.

26. Later on hundreds of other elephants and charioteers fell through Bhima's powerful hands.

27. Therefore, O Partha, in the course of this terrible battle the Kauravas, along with their steeds, cars and elephants, have fallen victims to Death no sooner they encountered Bhimasena and your self.

28. O Partha, the van of the Kaurava host on being slain by the Pandavas, Bhisma shot forth showers of deadly arrows.

29. Skilled in the use of celestial weapons he covered the Chedis, the Kashis, the Panchalas, the Karushas, the Matsyas and the Kaikayas, with his arrows and slew them to a man.

30. The atmosphere became thick with gold-feathered, straight-shot deadly arrows, that were discharged from his bow.

31. Discharging flights of shafts at a time he struck down thousands of charioteers. He killed in all a hundred thousand powerful men and elephants.

32. The shafts he shot during the battle did not take any of the nine wrong courses, but flying direct through the tenth [and the approved] course destroyed many steeds, cars and elephants.

33. Massacring the [Pandava] troops for ten days together, Bhisma rendered the terraces of many a car empty and slew numberless elephants and steeds.

34. Assuming the form, of Rudra or that of Upendra in battle, he afflicted the Pandava detachments and played a havoc with them.

35. The wicked Suyodhana, bereft of a cause was about to be drowned in the sea of misfortune, and with the view of rescuing him Bhisma slaughtered the rulers of the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Kaikayas, and caused a great carnage amongst the Pandava army teeming with cars, steeds and elephants.

36. As he careered in battle, resplendent like the Sun himself, neither the innumerable infantry of the Srinjayas, all well-armed, nor the other rulers of the earth were even able to look at him.

37. Yet the Pandava troops with all their resources made a giant effort against the victorious Bhisma who was thus careering in the battle.

38. Indeed he had achieved an unrivalled heroism in the field, having routed the Pandavas and the Sanjayas all single-handed in battle.

39. Being under your powerful protection Sikhandin encountered him, and with his straight shafts slew that foremost of men.

40. O mighty one, as the Asura Vritra courted his death obtaining Vasaba for his foe, so having obtained you [as his foe] there lies on a bed of arrows that grandsire [wrapt in eternal sleep].

41. The violent Drona having arranged his troops in an impenetrable array has slain the army of the enemies and many a mighty charioteer for five days together.

42. That valiant charioteer having protected Jayadratha in battle committed a havoc amongst the hostile army during the nocturnal fight, like the fierce Destroyer himself.

43. Having with his arrows killed numerous warriors that valiant and chivalrous son of Bharadwaja, at last attained the highest end on encountering Dhristadyumna.

44. If you had not held at bay Suta's son and other charioteers in the battle that day, then Drona would never have been slain.

45. O Dhananjaya, you kept engaged the entire Dhartarashtra forces, and thus it was that the son of Prishata could slay Drona.

46. O Partha, who else among the Kshatriyas but you, could have achieved such feats [of martial strength], as you did when overthrowing Jayadratha?

47. Having thwarted the vast host and slain numerous valiant kings you, with the strength of your weapons, have slain the ruler of the Sindhus.

48. O Partha, to the mortals the slaughter of the ruler of the Sindhus seem to be exceedingly strange, but to you it is no wonder, as you are an eminent charioteer.

49. O Bharata, methinks, it would not appear impossible even if all the Kshatriyas were to be exterminated in the course of a day, with you for their adversary in the field.

50. O Partha, now that Bhisma and Drona are slain, the fierce Dhartarashtra force may well be regarded to have lost all their heroes.

51. With their chief and foremost warriors slain, with their horses, chariots and elephants struck down, the Bharata army look like the welkin bereft of the Sun, the Moon and the Stars.

52. O Partha, as the Asura hosts were routed by the prowess of Sakra in days of yore, so yonder host of terrible prowess have been vanquished by you.

53. Besides the slain there are now left only five mighty charioteers, Ashwathwama, Kritabarma, Karna, Shalya—the ruler of Madra, and Kripa.

54. O mightiest of men, by killing those five eminent charioteers to-day may you get rid of all foes, and bestow this earth with all its islands, cities and seas to King Yudhistira.

55. Let that Pritha's son of illimitable valour and fortune obtain to-day the entire Earth with the mountains and forests and waters [on it], the firmament [above it], and the nether regions [below it].

56. As Vishnu, in days of yore, made a gift of the three worlds to Sakra after overthrowing the Daityas and the Danavas, so may you bestow the Earth on the king after slaying the Kauravas.

57. On their enemies being slain, let the Panchalas rejoice to-day as did the celestials on the occasion of Vishnu's exterminating the Danavas.

58. If out of respect for that illustrious personage, your preceptor Drona, you feel sympathy for Ashwathwama, if again out of reverence due to a preceptor, you are kindly disposed towards Kripa,

59. If out of high regard for your maternal relatives, you do not despatch Kritavarman to-day to the regions of Pluto in encountering him,

60. If, O lotus-eyed one, encountering thy mother's brother, Shalya, the King of Madras, out of mere compassion, you do not deign to strike him down,

61. Do thou, O mighty one, with your sharp shafts hasten to slay that wretched Karna to-day who, at heart, cherishes utmost hatred for the sons of Pandu.

62. It is your noblest duty; nor is there any impropriety in it; we all assent to it, and there is no guilt in that.

63. O sinless one, in that attempt to burn your mother with all her children during the night, and the behaviour that Suyodhana bore towards you during the play at dice, that wretched Karna lay at the bottom of all.

64. Suyodhana has ever a firm conviction that it is Karna alone who will help him out [of this scrape]. That is why he has been filled with rage and tries also to afflict me.

65. O giver of honours, it is the firm belief of the royal Dhartarastras that Karna will, to a certainty, slay all the Parthas in battle.

66. O son of Kunti, it is through having secured the aid of Karna that Dhritarastra's son has ventured to fight with you, though he is full well aware of your prowess.

67. Karna also often says that, "I will conquer the assembled Parthas and Vasudeva, that valiant charioteer of Dasharha's race.

68. O Bharata, that wicked Karna thus always roars in the court (of the Kurus) with a view to cheer up that depraved son of Dhritarastra. Do you, therefore, slay him to-day.

69. It is the profane and malignant Karna who is mainly responsible for all the evils that have been done to you by Dhritarastra's son.

70. I have seen the valiant son of Subhadra, of lustrous eyes, fall at the hands of six heartless charioteers belonging to the Dhartarastra force.

71. Harassing mighty heroes like Drona, Drona's son and Kripa, and others, he divested elephants of their riders and mighty charioteers of their cars.

72. Abhimanyu of mighty neck, the pride and the glory of both the Kurus and the Vrisnis, made also the steeds bereft of their riders, and the infantry, their arms and life.

73. Overthrowing the hostile files, and harassing many powerful charioteers, he has packed off numbers of men and steeds and elephants to the gates of Pluto.

74—75. O friend, by truth I swear unto you that I am burning at the thought that while Subhadra's son was thus advancing, striking down with his arrows the hostile force, even then, O lord Partha, the malevolent Karna, unable to withstand him in a face to face fight, had been engaged in acts of hostility to that heroic Abhimanya.

76. Mangled with the arrows of Subhadra's son, rendered senseless and bathed in blood, Karna became highly enraged and drew heavy breaths, till at last covered with shafts he thought of turning away from the field.

77. Heartily wished to beat a retreat, but finding no means of egress of doing so, exhausted and stupefied with the wounds received, he had to roam about in the field, giving up all the while his hopes of life.

78. At last hearing the opportune, though wanton, words of Drona in battle, Karna cut off Abhimanyu's bow.

79. On his bow being thus cut asunder in that battle, five mighty charioteers of blunt conscience slew him with showers of arrows.

80. On the hero being thus slain all were touched at heart. Only that wicked-hearted Karna and Suyodhana laughed.

81. [Verily you remember] the vile epithets that Karna so cruelly flung towards Krishna in the [Kuru] court before both the Kurus the Pandavas.

82. "O Krishna, the Pandavas have been slain and are gone to eternal damnation; do you, therefore, O one of sweet voice and heavy posteriors, take to yourself another lord.

83. Betake now to the service of Dhritarastra as a maid, for, O lotus-eyed one, your husbands are no more (in the land of the living.)

84. O Krishna, this day forth the Pandavas will no longer have any control over you. O Princess of Panchala, you are now the wife of men that are servants, and, O beautiful one, yourself, a maid.

85. Duryodhana alone is regarded as the ruler of this earth, to-day all the other lords are engaged in helping him towards the good government of his state.

86. Lo, O amiable one, how all the Pandavas have equally fallen, under the prowess of Dhitarastra's son, and have now been staring at each other.

87. Verily these [men] are like sesame seeds without kernel, and have fallen into purgatory, and they will have to serve ere long that foremost of Kaurava Kings."

88. O Bharata, these vile words were uttered by that sinful, debased, mischievous and unprincipled Karna at that time, in your hearing.

89. Let your gold-plated and sharpened shafts, capable of dealing death to the living, to-day assuage the sorrows caused by those words of effrontery.

90. Let your shafts retaliate all the other mischiefs done to you by that wicked one, by slaying him.

91. Let that wicked Karna feel the pangs of those deadly shafts sped from the Gandiva, and remember the words of Bhisma and Drona.

92. Let the gold-feathered iron shafts, capable of dealing death to the enemies, and emitting rays of lightning, sped by you go straight into the vital organs and drink his blood.

93. Let the sharp and winged arrow of irresistible force shot by your arms touch Karna to the core, and despatch him off to the den of Pluto.

94. Let the lords of this hemisphere, seeing Karna fall to-day from off his chariot, covered with your shafts, despondent and heart-broken, indulge themselves in grief.

95. Let his relations with distress witness to-day the [sad] spectacle of Karna's falling prostrate and lying down on the bosom of the Earth, weltered in blood and bereft of arms.

96. Let the huge standard of Adhiratha's son, bearing the ensign of the elephant's rope, totter. to its fall from the shots of crescent-shaped arrows.

97. Let Shalya,—alarmed with the scene of his golden chariot thus scattered to the winds, and his charioteer and steeds taken off with numberless darts of your arrows, —deserting his empty car, beat a hasty retreat [from the field].

98. And then let the enemy Suyodhana, witnessing to-day Adhiratha's son thus fall a victim to your arms, despair of his life and his soveriegnty.

99. There, O Partha, Karna with prowess like Indra, or even like Sankara himself, is causing a massacre of your men with his shafts.

100. Look up yonder, O foremost of the line of Bharata, [and see how] the Panchalas are dropping off from the sharp points of Karna's arrows in their anxiety to rescue the Pandavas.

101—102. Know it for certain that the Panchalas, the sons of Draupadi, Dhristadyumna, Shikhandin, and the sons of Dhristadyumna, and Satanika,—the son of Nakul,—and Nakul [himself], Sahadeva, Durmukha, Janamejaya, and Sudhurman, and Satyaki, are held in subjection by Karna.

103. [From off the scene of action] the howling groans, O subduer of foes, of those allies of yours,—the Panchalas—reach our ears, as they are assailed, in that dreadful engagement, with the weapons of Karna.

104. The Panchalas are not the persons to get frightened, much less to shew their back in the thick of the fray. In sanguinary battle these mighty wielders of bow do not at all care to stake their life.

105. The Panchalas did not shew their back even encountering that [redoubtable Bhishma, who, alone and unaided, hemmed in the Pandava forces with a thick cloud of shafts.

106—107. [Nor is this all]. They, who, without remiss, gave battle to that invincible Drona,—the preceptor of all bowmen, the flaming lustre of weapons, the glory of the field, the unapproachable foeman,—these Panchalas are not the men to turn away from the field through fear of Adhiratha's son.

108. Like the flaming fire consuming myriads of insects that irrepressible Karna with his shafts devoured these swift-armed Panchalas as they approached him in battle array.

109. Rallying round the banner of their allies as these valiant Panchalas, reckless of their life, marched against him the son of Radha took off their hordes by legions.

110. O Bharata, it now behoves you to steer these sturdy bowmen,—the valiant Panchala forces,—who are fast sinking in the ocean of Karna without a bark.

111. The weapon which Karna obtained from that foremost sage Rama,—the son of Bhrigu, is blazing forth its appalling form.

112. The awful form of that weapon, spreading terror and consternation all round, and encompassing the vast array of troops, is glistening with its own bright.

113. Those arrows flung from the bow-strings of Karna, afflicting your hosts in battle, are hovering round like swarms of bees.

114. Afflicted in battle with the shots of Karna, that is irresistible by persons of weak nerve, O Bharata, the Panchalas, are flying in all directions.

115. Yonder, O Partha, foaming and frothing with rage yet unsatiated, fights Bhima with the Srinjaya forces around him, and is getting afflicted with the sharp arrows of Karna.

116. O Bharata, if you remain indifferent towards Karna, he will cause a sad havoc of the Pandava, the Srinjaya, and the Panchala forces, like the seizure of the ills, that flesh is heir to, makes the body succumb.

117. Amongst the vast array of the forces of Yudhisthira, I find not another general, save and beyond yourself, who is capable of returning from the field scatheless, after having encountered son of Radha in battle.

118. O foremost of men, buckle on your armour, therefore, to pop off Karna with the keen shafts of your arrows, and, thus redeeming your pledge, redound your glory.

119. Most assuredly I tell you, O warrior of warriors, you, and you alone, are capable of worsting Karna in battle, and defeating the whole bands of Kaurava army.

120. And accomplishing this proud feat, O Partha, and achieving victory over the master car-warrior, Karna, may you, the best of men, gain your ends, and be successful and happy!"

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hearing, O Bharata, these [reassuring] words of Keshava, Vibhatsu, instantly shaking off his sorrowful countenance, took heart again.

2. And grating his bowstring and stretching it at length, he took hold of his Gandiva with a view to make away with Karna, and addressing Keshava, thus expressed himself:—

3. "Since you,—O Govinda, who, [fathoming the mysteries of fate] see through events, past and future,—since you are so kindly disposed towards me, under your [able] generalship, I may well be certain of gaining the day.

4. O Krishna, with you at my elbow, bidding defiance to all the three worlds, marshalled in array, I can well launch them [one and all,] into eternity, what speak you of Karna then.

5. O Janardana, I witness how the Panchala hordes are beating their retreats [from the field], and I also see how Karna with his lofty bearing domineering in the battle.

6. The sight of the Bhargava weapon, let loose by Karna, and floating on the air like the great thunder of Sakra, meets also my view.

7. But in to-day's battle I will give no quarter to Karna, and all the world will proclaim the fact till as long as it will last.

8. To-day, O Krishna, pointed arrows flung from Gandiva and sped by my arms, will send Karna to his last account.

9. And King Dhritarashtra, to-day will hurl malediction on his evil genius under the inspiration of which he placed the diadem on the brow of Duryodhana, who was least deserving of sovereignty.

10. O large-armed one, to-day King Dhritarashtra will be deprived of his sovereignty and happiness, wealth and dominion, capital and sons.

11. Most assuredly do I tell you, O Krishna, that Karna's doom being [thus] sealed to-day, Duryodhana, goaded to desperation] will lose all hope of both his life and sovereignty.

12. As in days of yore, in the contest between the Devas and the Asuras, Indra rent in twain the body of the demon Vritra, so beholding the body of Karna, all cut into pieces with the arrows inflicted through my hands, let Duryodhana to-day recall to mind the proposal you made, O Lordly Being, when suing for peace.

13. Let the son of Suval realize to-day O Krishna, that my arrows happen to be my dice, my Gandiva is my gaming board, and my chariot, my chequered cloth.

14. O Govinda, striking to-day the death knell of Karna with keen shafts, I will remove the long lost sleep of the son of Kunti.

15. On my hastening the departure of Suta's son to the other world will raise the drooping spirit of the royal descendant of Kunti, and he, taking life easily, will enjoy eternal happiness.

16. O Keshava, I will fling to-day such an irresistible arrow, unique of its kind, that will surely make Karna shuffle off his mortal coil.

17. And such was the vow of that wretch of human beings about taking my life, that "until I put an end to the existence of Phalguna, I will not have my feet washed."

18. Giving a lie to the words of honor of that vile creature, O Madhusudan, I will, hitting him straight with my arrows, throw off his body from his car.

19. The Earth to-day will drink the blood of that son of Suta, who, in battle, defies all mortals of this sphere.

20. In addressing Krishna, that Karna, the son of Suta, vaunting of his own superiority, with the approbation of Dhritarashtra, had indulged himself [in the expression], "O Krishna, you are now without a husband."

21. My sharpened arrows will falsify to-day that vile expression of his, and like the foaming snake, surcharged with active poison, will feast on his blood.

22. My cloth-yard shafts, dazzling with the splendour of lightning, let loose by my capacious arms and from off the strings of Gandiva, will lead Karna to his eterna goal.

23. The contumely which the son of Radha gave expression to, in addressing the Princess of Panchala in the open court, vilifying the Pandavas, will to-day make him repent of his misdemeanour.

24. After the fall of the son of Suta the vicious-souled Karna, also called Vaikartan, those words that were at one time sesame seeds without grain, will turn out to-day to be the reverse.

25. While addressing the sons of Dhritarashtra Karna let fall from his lips these words,—full of sound and fury,—"I will save you of the sons of Pandu," to-day my keen shafts will belie even those imperious words of his.

26. In the presence of all the assembled archers, to-day, I will take the life out of that Karna, who dared to have said, "I will put all the Pandavas to death with their sons."

27. O Madhusudana, to-day, I will cause the slaughter of that Karna, the son of Radha, confident of whose prowess the haughty son of Dhritarashtra, full of wicked design and evil passion, slighted us all along.

28. And as a deer, afraid of the lion, turns its tail, so, O Krishna, let all the Dhartarashtras, to-day, with the fall of Karna, beat a hasty retreat.

29. Let king Duryodhana also indulge himself in grief, to-day, as Karna falls a victim to my arms in company with all his sons and relations.

30. Seeing Karna meeting his death to-day through my arrows, O Krishna, let the savage son of Dhritarashtra acknowledge me to be the peerless archer in the field.

31. I will make King Dhritarashtra, with all his descendants, counsellors, and followers, shelterless to-day.

32. O Keshava, to-day, vultures and other birds of prey will roam about the body of Karna, cut into pieces with the shafts of my arrows.

33. O Madhusudana, to-day I will in the presence of all the archers, marshalled in array, dissever the head of Karna of Radha's womb.

34. With sharp-pointed Vipathas and other razor-edged arrows, to-day, I will pierce through the body of that wicked soul, Karna.

35. The mighty king Yudhisthira will shake off to-day his great suffering due to his long cherished mental anguish.

36. O Krishna, I will cheer up king Yudhisthira, the son of Dharma, by slaying to-day the son of Radha with all his tribe.

37. O Krishna, with shafts blazing like fire, or resembling venomous serpents, to-day, I will devour all the sunken hosts of Karna.

38. O Govinda, with shafts adorned with the feathers of vultures, I will deluge the earth, to-day, with the scattered bodies of potentates, all armoured with shields of gold.

39. O Madhusudana, with sharp-pointed arrows, I will, to-day, striking down all the enemies of Abhimunya dissever their heads, and disjoint their body.

40. O Keshava, to-day, either I will, making the earth devoid of Dhartarashtras, make a gift of her unto my brothers, or you shall have to traverse this ground shorn of Arjuna.

41. O Krishna, I will acquit myself, to-day, of the obligations I owe to all the bowmen, to my avenging spirit, to the Kurus, to my shafts, and to Gandiva.

42. And like Maghavat causing the slaughter of Samvara, I will, O Krishna, killing Karna, to-day in battle, shake off the heavy affliction I have been cherishing these thirteen long years.

43. With the fall of Karna in battle, to-day, let the mighty car-warriors of the line of Somakas, all anxious for the interests of their allies, rest assured of the issue of this, their engagement.

44. And, O Madhava, I cannot conceive even of the great joy which the descendants of Sini will experience to-day, when Karna will be no more, and after I have won the battle.

45. Slaying Karna in battle, and his mighty car-warrior son, I will clear the hearts of Bhima and the Twins, as also of Satyaki.

46. Taking away the life of Karna, to-day in great battle, O Madhava, I will free myself of the very many obligations I am under the Panchalas, as also under Dhristadyumna and Shikhandin.

47. Let them all witness to-day the scene of the furious Dhananjaya, encountering all the Kaurava forces in the field, give a death-blow unto the son of Suta.

48. Let me, once again, indulge myself in the luxury of singing my own praise in your presence.

49. In all this wide world I have no rival in archery. And who is there to match me in prowess? Then again what soul is there that can equal me in mercy? White in fire and fury I yield to none.

50. With the bow in my hand, and with the strength of my capacious arms, I can outvie the Asuras, the celestials, and all the other creatures grouped together, know it for certain, that my prowess surpasses to that of the most powerful.

51. And like a spark of fire in a heap of dried grass at the end of winter, I, too, alone, am well capable of setting fire to all the Kurus, and the Valhikas, as also their followers with my flashing arrows flung from Gandiva.

52. My palms bear the marks of these arrows, and this superb and out-stretched bow with its string trimmed with arrow; the soles of my feet also bear the marks of a car and a standard; and so when a person [with all these marks on] goes to battle, he, least of all, can be triumphed over."

53. Saying this much to Achyuta that hero of heroes, and destroyer of enemies, rushed to battle with a view to rescue Bhima and dissever Karna.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhitarashtra said:—

1. When Dhananjaya, the infinite dread of my valiant chieftains, rejoined the Pandava and Srinjaya forces, O Sire, how fared the battle?

Sanjaya said:—

2. All the assembled troops marshalled in array, sounding their bugles and blowing this horns, like thick volumes of clouds at the end of summer, roared thunders.

3—4. That grim visaged war, which followed the sanguinary contest of the Kshatriyas, all up in arms, for the extermination of their race, and in which blood streamed forth in rushing currents,—like the untimely falling off of a shower of evil,—became the cause of destruction of all living beings. Huge elephants forming the cluster of clouds of that shower, with weapons its down-pour; pealing instruments, sounds of chariot-wheels, clapping of hands constituting its thunder-bolts, and weapons, trimmed with gold, making its lightning; and swords and arrows, and cloth-yard shafts, and other weapons of great velocity, becoming its drops.

5. Many car-warriors,—assembled together, assailing an opponent despatched him off to the King of Terrors; while a supreme car-warrior, fighting the good fight with a single adversary, hastened his departure to the other world; or another, assailing many in close contest, launched them all into eternity.

6. Then again some car-warrior in exchanging shots with his enemy made him die a violent death, together with steeds and charioteer, while another warrior riding on his elephant put to death many car-warriors and horsemen.

7. Partha thus inflicting the enemy with a heavy downpour of shafts rent them asunder with all their cavalry, infantry, and elephant soldiers, as also the rides and riders of their war-chariots.

8. Kripacharya met Sikhandin in the field, while Satyaki encountered Duryodhana; and Srutasravas challenged Drona's son, while Yudhamauna took Chitrasena for his assialant.

9. And, like a hungry lion hotly pursuing a stout bull, Uttamaunja, the great car-warrior of the Srinjayas, pounced upon Susena, the son of Karna; while Sahadeva launched out against Sakuni, the King of the Gandharas.

10. Young Satanika, the son of Nakula, rushing headlong afflicted young Vrishasena with a showering torrent of his shafts, and [he, too,] the heroic son of Karna returned the charges of the son of the princess of Panchala in no stinted measure.

11. Madri's son Nakula, the skilful adept of war tactics, and the wonderful warrior of unique fame, assailed Kritavarman, while Ynanasena's son the King of the Panchalas rushed against general Karna with all his hosts.

12. O Bharata, Dushasana, with the swelling hosts of the Samsaptakas and all the troops comprising the Bharata force, rode full tilt against Bhima, the infictor of woes in battle to all wielders of arms, and the foremost of all warriors.

13. There the powerful Uttamaujas, putting forth all his might, struck down the son of Karna, and his dissevered head fell down on the ground with a terrible shriek, which made the Earth and the sky resound its roar.

14. Overwhelmed with grief at the [ghastly] sight of the severed head of Susena thus rolling on the ground Karna remained stupefied [for a while], but, his avenging spirit soon taking the better of him, he, soon, with sharp-pointed arrows cut to pieces the steeds, chariot, and the standard of his son's adversary.

15. Uttamaujas, in the interval, striking home, with his keen shafts and the sharp edge of his steel, the steed and the side-guards of Kripa, quickly leapt into the chariot of Shikhandin.

16. Shikhandin, observing from his own chariot, [the sad predicament of] Kripa thus deprived of his conveyance, did not like to pursue him with his shafts; the son of Drona, in the meanwhile, covering the car of Kripa with that of his own, like a bull fallen in a ditch, rescued him.

17. Here, the son of the Wind-god, Bhima, covered with armor of gold, afflicting with his keen shafts, like the burning mid-day Sun of summer, scorched the whole body of troops of your sons.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. IN the thick of that awe-inspiring fray, Bhima, fighting single-handed, against tremendous odds, addressed his charioteer and said, "drive towards the center of the Dhartarashtrâ force."

2—3. "Spur your horses, O charioteer, and I will hasten the departure of all these Dhartarashtras to the region occupied by the King of Death." The charioteer, being thus desired by Bhimasena, drove, at a furious speed, towards the spot against the whole hosts of your sons, and from whence Bhima wished to fight them out. And, then, from all sides, a large retinue of Kaurava force, consisting of elephant and car-warriors, and cavalry and infantry, hemmed him in.

4. And they all poured down their arrows on that best of chariots occupied by Bhima from every direction, whereupon the high-souled Bhima, with his own gold-feathered shafts, scattered to the winds, all those weapons hurled against him by his enemies.

5—10. And those gold-winged arrows of his enemies, thus broken into tatters of two or three fragments by the shafts of Bhima, fell upon the ground. Then, O King, there arose one long loud cry of woe from amidst the throng of those valiant chiefs of the Kshatriya race, as they, with their mounts of elephants and steeds, and their chariots and body infantry, got afflicted with the arrows thurst hard by Bhima, like thunders rolling in mountains. Those pride of the Kshatriya race, being thus assailed by Bhima, and his powerful shafts smiting them hip and thigh, flew at him (Bhima) from every side of the plain, like the new-fledged family of the feathered tribes thickening around a tree. And as your troops fell back upon him, Bhima, of infinite prowess and strength, repulsed them with the full display of all his might, like the mighty King of Terrors, dealing destruction, at the end of time, with his mace, unto the creation. And your hosts, in that battle, could not repel the fearful impetuosity of Bhima, himself the personation of fire and fury, like the great Destroyer himself rushing, at the end of the cycle, with wide-open mouth for the extermination of all living beings. O Bharata, the whole troops, comprising the Bharata force, thus ruthlessly torn asunder in battle, by the noble-minded Bhima, dispersed from the field in a state of panic, like a strong gust of wind scattering thick clouds in a tempest. Then the powerful Bhimsena, endowed with great-sagacity, addressing his charioteer once more, said unto him in full glee.

11. "Just know, O Suta, whether do all those chariots, which are advancing towards us, belong to our party, or to that of the enemy.

12. As I, with this battle raging, can make no distinction between the two, see that I do not beseige my own hosts with my shafts.

13. I am greatly mortified, O Vishoka, to see around me these leaders of war in hostile array, and also with the sight of their cars and the tops of their standards. The King lies wounded, and the diadem-decked Arjuna is not yet come to take the field. All these, O Suta, are preying heavily on me.

14. O charioteer, that the pious King Yudhistira should have gone away from the field, leading me alone in the midst of the enemy, is in itself heart-rending. Then again I am quite in the dark as to his fate. Nor do I know whether Vibhatsu is still alive or not. All these add to my grief.

15. And, though dejected and disspirited, I will play the hell with all these troops inspite of their strength. And thus making the vast army in hostile array pay the penalty in the wager of battle, let me rejoice with you to-day.

16. O Suta, examine closely all the quivers of my arrows, and see the numbers still left, and then let me know decidedly the quantity and variety of each."

17. Being thus addressed, Vishoka replied,

"O hero, you have full sixty thousand arrows still left, while your shafts, both razor-shaped and broad-pointed, number ten thousand each. O hero, you have still two thousand cloth-yard shafts, while the Pradaras, O Partha, number three thousand. To speak candidly, O son of Pandu, the quantity that is still left is quite unmanageable even by half-a-dozen bullocks, if placed on carts.

18. O skilful one, throw off your weapons in no measured number, for your maces, swords, and scimitars, as also your lances, darts and spears, and other weapons of the arms, number thousands upon thousands. So be of good cheer, and pray do not be misapprehensive of your weapons running short."

Bhima said :—

19. "Mark, O Suta, in this day's fearful engagement the plains will present the aspect of the dismal regions of Death, when the field will be shrouded with thick sets of my irresistible arrows, furiously let loose from off my bow,—tearing into pieces the entire body of the trainbands of my enemy, and making the Sun, as it were, disappear from view.

20. To-day, O Suta, it will be known to all the Kshatriyas, even unto the last generation, that either Bhimasena has given himself up in battle, or, singly, he has got the better of all the Kurus.

21. To-day, either let the Kauravas fall in battle, or, let all the world sound my death knell. Alone, encountering them all, I will either overmatch them, or, let them, all combined, put an extinguisher upon Bhimsena.

22. May the guardian angels, who further the course of all righteous action, shower down their blessing on me; and let Arjuna, the victor of enemies, come here speedily [to my relief], like the invoked Sakra appearing in the sacrificial ground.

23. Look there, and see the disbanded Bharata force! Why are all these chiefs taking to their flight. Surely it seems to me inevitable that Savyasachin, that best of human beings, has been shrouding that force with a heavy downpour of his arrows.

24. Look there, O Vishoka, [and see how] the mounted soldiers riding on their steeds or elephants, and standard-bearers, and foot-soldiers are beating their retreat. Look, also, at these war-chariots, [and see how] they with their warriors on, are getting scattered by the darts, shafts and arrows, O Suta.

25. Charged with the gold-winged and peacock-feathered arrows of Dhananjaya, and bursting like the bolts from the blue, those Kaurava forces, falling fast in numbers, as often swell the ranks of their file.

26. Those steeds yoked on war-chariots, and elephants, trampling down the vast array of foot-soldiers are fleeting away. In sooth, the whole host of the Kauravas, seized with consternation, are beating a hasty retreat, as do the terrified elephants in the midst of a flaming forest. The elephants are roaring furiously in the field, and their savage cries, O Vishoka, make, one and all, utter cries of woe and alas!"

Vishoka said :—

27. "Can't you, O Bhima, hear the awful sound of the Gandiva? [Or,] have these ears of yours lost their sensibility from the effects of the thunder produced by Partha, while outstretching it with fire and fury?

28. All your wishes, O son of Pandu, have been gratified, yonder is seen the standard of Ape [of Arjuna] wafting aloft. Look there, the bowstring [of Gandiva] is emitting incessantly rays of light, like the flashes of lightning from amidst the blue regions of etherial space.

29. That Ape wafting aloft from the standard of Dhananjaya, is seen to strike terror, all along the line of the enemy, [and to speak freely] even I myself am stricken with awe at that [august] sight.

30. There, the resplendent beauty of Dhananjaya's diadem is shedding its effulgence brightly, and the bright luster of the gem studded on it, sparkling with the radiancy of the Sun, is looking much more resplendent.

31. Alongside him, behold, there, his conch Devadatta of thundering blare, and resembling a white sheet of cloud. Behold there, Janardana, reins in hand, making his way into the center of the hostile divisions.

32. Behold, there, O hero, by the side of Janardana his discus, radiant like the Sun, nave like thunder, and sharp like razor,—that discus which enhances the fame of Keshava, and which is always worshipped by the Yadus.

33. There, large trunks of huge elephants, resembling the lofty yew trees, dissevered by Kiritin are falling fast. There, also, huge elephants and their riders, pierced with shafts all through, are falling down like mountains riven with thunder.

34. Behold, there, O son of Kunti, the Panchajanja [conch] of Krishna,—resplendent like the moon,—the Kaustabha, [pearl] dazzling on his breats, and his garland of victory.

35. There cannot be any mistake in the fact that Partha,—the glory of car-warriors—the best and foremost of them, carried by those precious steeds of his,—the best of their kind,—and in color as white as the white clouds of the sky: with Krishna as their driver,—is rushing in the field, routing the enemy all through.

36. Behold there, your younger, resembling in energy the deity of the celestials, is piercing with his shafts those cars, steeds, and bands of foot-soldiers, and they are falling down as if a forest overthrown by the tempest caused by the wings of Garuda.

37. Behold, Kiritin, with his powerful shafts, to outstrip in battle four hundred car-warriors with their steeds, and drivers, and seven hundred elephants, as also numberless infantry and cavalry.

38. Shedding his effulgence like the constellation of Chitra, the all-powerful Arjuna, after having massacred the Kuru forces, is speeding towards you. All your wishes have been gratified :—your enemies, thrown overboard. May your prowess and the span of your life continue to increase for ever and ever."

Bhima said :—

39. "For this welcome news, O charioteer, with unfeigned pleasure I grant you fourteen choice villages; and, O Vishoka, as you bring me the tidings of Arjuna, I also present you a hundred female slaves, and twenty chariots.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing the loud rattles of chariots, and the lion like roars [of warriors] in the field, Arjuna, addressing Govinda, said, "Clap spurs to the chargers."

2. Hearing these words of Arjuna, Govinda replied him [thus] :—" Off I go towards the spot where Bhima has taken his post."

3. Then, like the king of the celestials, proceeding in great wrath, and with thunder in his arms, to strike down Jambha (the Asura), Jaya [Arjuna] rushed [in the field], to obtain victory, borne by horses white as snow or conchs, and with housings laid with gold, pearls and gems.

4. Many warriors, [of the other side], representing lions in prowess all boiling with rage, and followed by a large retinue of elephant, horse and foot soldiers, faced him, and making the Earth resound, and rending the skies with the whizz of their arrows, the rattling sound of the wheels of their war-chariots, and the noise of the tread of their horses' hoofs.

5. Then, there ensued, O sire, a mortal conflict between them [the train-bands of the Kaurava forces] and Partha,—a conflict carrying death and destruction in its train to body, life and sin alike,—like the great battle between the Asuras and Vishnu, the greatest of all great conquerors, for the [sovereignty of the] three worlds.

6. Alone and unaided, the diadem-decked and garland-necked Arjuna, rent asunder all the powerful weapons flung [against him] by them [his adversaries], and struck off their heads and arms in many and varied forms, with his razor-edged and crescent shaped shafts, as also with his broad-pointed arrows.

7. Umbrellas, banners, horses, chariots, elephants, and foot soldiers, shattered and mutilated, fell down on the Earth, like a forest uprooted by a violent wind.

8. Mighty elephants caparisoned with gold-laid trappings, and equipped with banners of triumphs, and adorned with riders [on their back], wore a majestic look, and shed a luster all round, as they were encompassed with gold-winged shafts, like blazing mountains.

9. With excellent shafts piercing elephants, horses, and war chariots, and resembling thunder of Vasava, Dhananjaya winged his way to strike down Karna, like Indra, in days of yore, proceeding to rend in twain (the Asura) Vala.

10. Then that mightiest of men, the terror of enemies, rushed headlong into the midst of your vast array as does the Makar while plunging into the deep sea.

11. Seeing Pandu's son so advance, O king, your warriors, with a long line of cars, and a retinue of elephant, horse and foot soldiers, pressed upon him.

12. And, while rushing against Partha, they raised a tumultous cry like the roarings of the surging waves in a tempest.

13. Those great warriors, powerful like tigers, reckless of their life, rushed in battle to face that mighty man, careering like a tiger.

14. With a heavy down-pour of arrows they advanced towards him, but Arjuna dispersed them like vapours before the gushing wind.

15. Those mighty warriors—all good shots and of unfailing aim—in a body, and with a long line of war-chariots following them, advanced against Arjuna and began to pierce him with their sharp weapons.

16. Arjuna, then, [rendering asunder] with his arrows, chariots, elephants, and horses by thousands, despatched [them] off to the region of Pluto.

17. Thus afflicted in action with shots flung from Arjuna's bow, those mighty car-warriors, terrified and panic-stricken, began gradually to melt away.

18. Among those great car-warriors four hundred valiantly kept the field; and Arjuna, with his keen shafts, sent them, one and all, to their last account.

19. [And those that held the rear,] afflicted, in that battle, with keen shafts and sharp arrows of all kinds, dispersed themselves in all directions—far away from Arjuna.

20. The shouting noise made at the van by the retreating army was as furious as as the grumbling roars of the breakers of the surging seas when dashing against rocks.

21. Thus, with his arrows, dispersing the panic-stricken army, O sire, Arjuna, the son of Pritha, advanced against the column commanded by the son of Suta.

22. The great noise made by Arjuna while advancing towards his enemies, was like that of Gadura, in days of yore, while swooping down upon snakes.

23. The mighty Bhimasena, anxious as he was to have a look of Partha, became highly gratified with that sound.

24. Hearing that Partha is come, the redoubtable Bhimasena, O king, began to afflict your troops, fearless of his own life.

24. Bhima,—the son of the Wind-god, and himself possessing the prowess and impetuousity of the wind,—that valiant Bhima began to career in that battle like that of the wind itself.

26. Your army, O king, being thus hard pressed by him, O ruler of the universe, began to roll and tumble like a shattered vessel in the high seas.

27. Bhima then, with his deadly weapons, and with great dexterity of hands, waging a ruthless slaughter amongst that body of troops, despatched them to the region of Pluto.

28. Your warriors, O Bharata, seeing the wonderful exploits of Bhima in that battle, careering like the King of Terrors at the end of time, became greatly agitated.

29—30. King Duryodhana, seeing his best soldiers, O Bharata, thus worsted by Bhimasena, [gave vent to the following expression, addressing his whole hosts, generals and other great warriors, O best of the Bharata race, "All of you in a body engage Bhima in action and fell him down, [inasmuch as on him hinges the fate of the Pandavas,] and, when he [Bhimasena] is felled, well may I count upon the Pandu forces as if already slain.

31. Following the behest of your son, all the vassal chiefs, [hitting] from all sides, covered Bhima with a thick shower of arrows.

32. Hosts of elephants, O monarch, and men, eager for victory, as also war-chariots and horses, O King of Kings, thickened around Vrikodara,

33. That chief of the Bharat race, endued with heroic qualities, being thus hemmed in by those brave bands of heroes, looked resplendent like the radiant Moon shedding its effulgence amidst myriads of glowing stars.

34. O, Monarch, that foremost of men, was looking, during that fight, so beautiful, like the Full Moon in the midst of his corona.

35. All those Kings with eyes flamed with wrath, and bent upon slaying Vrikodara, began to shower down their weapons upon him.

36. As the fish frees itself from the net, so did Bhima cutting their shafts straight free himself from the pressure of the battle.

37—38. O Bharata slaying ten thousand elephants that faced him, one hundred thousand and two hundred men, hundred car-warriors and five thousand horse Bhima actually made a river of blood to flow there.

39. In that carnage blood flowed like water, and the war-cars forming its eddies, elephants, its alligators, horses and men, its sharks and fishes, and the hair of animals, its herbs and moss, were all floating on it.

40. Arms severed from bodies floated like snakes, and precious stones were abundant in the bloody current;—thighs and marrows formed its gavials and mud, and human heads, its mountain.

41. Iron bound bludgeous and maces were also floating there like snakes; and bows and arrows formed its rafts by means of which persons tried to cross that fearful and bloody stream, banners and umbrellas drifted on it like swans, and costly head-dresses its foam.

42. The dust rising from the earth were like the waves of the stream, and jewelled necklaces were looking like so many lotuses: the brave could alone cross that stream while the faint hearted sunk within to navigate it.

43. That gushing current, with bands of sturdy soldiers forming its alligators and crocodiles, streamed its course towards the realm of Death. [And] and that man with tiger-like ferocity made its course flew on.

44. [And] as the Vaitarine is unnavigable by persons of filth and inquity, even so was that awful stream of blood to men wanting in valour and intrepidity, making their heart quail with shudder.

45. [And] there that son of Pandu, the best of car-warriors, rushed in, slaying hundred thousands of enemy.

46. Duryodhana seeing Bhimsena thus career in battle, O king, said unto Sakuni the following words :—

47. "Overpower in battle, O uncle, the all-powerful Bhimsena. The victory over the vast array of the Pandava forces hinges on his final overthrow."

48. Being thus desired, O king, the powerful son of Suvala, the peer of great warriors marshalled in array, marched on—his brothers surrounding him.

49. That hero, affronting the fiercely powerful Bhima in that battle, checked his intrepidity, as if a continent resisting the tides of an ocean.

50. And despite the resistance of the keen shafts, [which the powerful son of Suvala hurled against him,] Bhima approached him [in formidable array.]

51. Whereupon Sakuni, O king of kings, flung a number of cloth-yard shafts, bedecked with wings of gold and sharpened on stone, and assailed Bhima at the seat of his heart.

52. Those fearful shafts, feathered with the plumes of Kankas and peacocks, O monarch, piercing the coat of mail of the high-souled son of Pandu, sunk deep into his vital parts.

53. Being thus smitten in battle, O Bharata, Bhima, then flung, all of a sudden, a shaft laid with gold upon the son of Suvala.

54. And the powerful Sakuni, the inflictor of woes on his enemies, and, O king, skilful in the manipulation of hands, rent that fearful weapon in seven fragments as it was coursing its way towards him.

55. His weapon thus falling adrift on the ground, O king, Bhima, inflamed with rage, without any strain rent in twain with a broad-pointed arrow the bow of the son of Suvala.

56. Whereupon the mighty son of Suvala, throwing away that bow, rendered useless, with the greatest alacrity seized a new one, as also sixteen broad-edged shafts.

57—58. And the son of Suvala, O king, hit the chariot-driver with two, and Bhima with seven; struck off the banner with one, and the umbrella with two; and pierced, O lord of the universe, the four chargers with the remaining four of those broad-headed shafts.

59. Enraged at this, O king, the powerful Bhima, in that battle, threw down a weapon made of iron, and the staff of which was decked with gold.

60. That weapon, resembling in activity the tongue of a snake, being thus cast from the arms of Bhima came speedily down upon the chariot of the noble son of Suvala.

61. [And] he (the son of Suvala) seized that weapon, adorned with gold, and, O lord of the universe, hurled it back against Bhimsena with a fierce countenance.

62. That weapon, piercing through the left arm of the noble son of Pandu, fell down like flashes of lightning coursing on the ground.

63. Then the Dhartarastras began to rent the air from all sides with their loud outcries, but, O king, Bhima could not brook the lion-like roars of the enemy,—all of great intrepidity.

64. That extraordinarily powerful man (Bhima) taking hold of another bow fitted with string, almost in no time, O best of kings, covered the mighty son of Suvala and his forces, who were fighting valiantly without caring the least for their lives, with showers of arrows.

65. That mighty man (Bhimasena) with utmost intrepidity stricking off his (Sakuni's) four horses, and then sending his charioteer to his eternal rest, O ruler of the universe, rent asunder his adversary's banner with a broad-edged arrow.

66, Speedily bounding out of that steedless chariot, Sakuni, the best of men, with eyes flaming with wrath and stretched bow, took his stand on the ground,—breathing all the while heavy breaths; and then, O king, he covered Bhima with mumberless arrows from all sides.

67. Then the mighty Bhima rending asunder Sakuni's arrows with great wrath hit him with a host of sharp arrows.

68. Being thus afflicted by his powerful assailant, that destroyer of enemies, O king, dropped down on the Earth almost dead.

69. Seeing him (Sakuni) in such a woeful plight, your son, O supreme ruler of the universe, putting him in his own chariot carried him off from the scene of action before the very face of Bhimasena.

70. Seeing that foremost of men, Sakuni, thus knocked down and borne away on Duryodhana's chariot, the Imperial hosts began to beat a hasty retreat from the field and flew in all directions from the very fear of Bhimasena.

71. When the son of Suvala was thus discomfitted and defeated, O monarch, by that excellent archer (Bhimasena) your son Duryodhana, left the field in a state of trepidation, and, out of his concern for the life of his uncle Sakuni, urged his fiery chargers to a furious speed.

72. Seeing the king thus flee away from the battle, all his troops, O foremost of the line of Bharata, who were each engaged in fierce struggle with a hand-to-hand fight, began to disperse themselves in all directions.

73. Observing the whole hosts of the Dhartarastra force thus dispersing themselves in every direction, Bhima, with great impetuousity rushed against them, and attacked them with innumerable arrows.

74. Thus afflicted by Bhima, O monarch, the retreating bands of Dhritarastra's army [all in a body moved towards Karna's flank,] and coming thither and with them [General Karna] in their center, they once more held their ground.

75. As the ship-wrecked mariners become comforted in reaching an island, so your distressed army stood cheerfully on finding that mighty Karna.

76. O foremost of the Bharata race, O mightiest of men, O lord of the universe, they then proceeded having death for their ultimate end.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O Sanjaya, what did Duryodhana and Suvala's son say on finding our troops shattered in battle by Bhimasena ?

2. Or, what did that mighty conqueror —Karna, or Kripa, or Kritavarman, or Drona's son or Dushasana, or the other leaders of my army, say in that battle ?

3. The powers of Pandus' son seem to me to be most extraordinary that he could fight single-handed against all the warriors of my army.

4. O Sanjaya, did the son of Radha, that scorcher of foes, keep his vow, and did he discharge himself accordingly towards the [hostile] troops ? [In fact,] he was the bestower of prosperity, the saviour, the refuge, and the hope of the Kurus.

5. How did Karna, the son of Adhiratha and Radha, behave in that battle, on finding our troops worsted and beaten by Kunti's son of illimitable prowess ?

6. And also what did my unconquerable sons and the other kings and mighty charioteers of our army do ? Tell me of all these, O Sanjaya, because you are a skilled narrator.

Sanjaya said :—

7. O king, the valiant son of Suta began to strike down the Somaka troops, in that afternoon, even on the very face of Bhimasena.

8. The mighty Bhima also began to smite down the Dhartarastra troops. Upon this Karna ordered [his driver] Shalya to make straight way for the Panchalas.

9. Karna, on observing that his army was being routed by the highly intelligent Bhimasena, asked his driver once more to drive on direct to the Panchalas.

10. On being thus spoken to, Shalya, the avenger of enemies and the king of Madras, urged those white horses, that could run fast like thought, in the direction of the Chedis, the Panchalas, and the Karushas.

11. On penetrating into that vast array, Shalya, the avenger of foes, took Karna to the very spot that that foremost of warriors wished to be in.

12. O lord of the universe, the very sight of that chariot, dismal like the cloud, and enveloped in tiger-skins, struck terror into the hearts of the Pandavas and the Panchalas.

13. Then the clatter of that chariot became audible in that fierce battle like the crash of a thunder or like the sound of a mountain splitting into pieces.

14. Then Karna, drawing the bow-strings close to his ears, shot numberless sharp shafts, which destroyed the Pandava forces by hundreds and thousands.

15. While the invincible Karna was performing these heroic feats numbers of valiant archers and mighty charioteers of the Pandavas came forth and surrounded him on all sides.

16. In sooth, Shikhandin, Bhima, Dhritadyumna, Nakula and Sahadeva, as also the (five) sons of Draupadi pressed hard upon the son of Radha, and began to shower down their weapons upon him,—all kindled with the desire of hastening his departure to the other world.

17. In that battle that foremost of men, the valiant Satyaki struck Karna with a score of sharp arrows hitting him on the shoulder-joint.

18. In that engagement Shikhandin afflicted him with five and twenty arrows, as did also Dhristadyumna with seven, the sons of Draupadi with four and sixty, Sahadeva with seven, and Nakula with a hundred.

19. The redoubtable Bhimasena, boiling with rage, assailed the son of Radha, in that battle, with ninety straight shafts, and hit him [also] in the shoulder-joint.

20. Then, the son of Adhirath, endued with great strength, with an indignant smile, stretched out his superb bow and began to pour down heavy showers of keen-edged arrows to the discomfiture of his enemies.

21—22. And the son of Radha assailed them in return, each with five arrows, and rending in twain, O best of the line of Bharata, the bow and standard of Satyaki, sped nine arrows against him, hitting him in the center of his chest, and then, with great violence, struck Bhimasena with thirty shafts.

23. That scorcher of foes, O sire, next struck off Sahadeva's standard with a flat-faced arrow, and then pierced his charioteer with three others.

24. He, O foremost of the Bharata race, almost in no time, deprived the (five) sons of Draupadi of their chariots, and it seemed truly wonderful.

25. In fact, the straight dead shots of the mighty Karna, made those brave warriors retreat from the field ; and he caused a havoc amongst the Panchalas and the powerful car-warriors of the Chedis.

26. The Chedis and Matsyas, O ruler of the universe, being thus worsted in that encounter, all pressed forward and made a supreme effort to fell down Karna, and poured down a heavy shower of arrows upon him.

27—28. In that battle, the mighty son of Suta, alone and unaided, fought single-handed with his own prowess, and kept all the great Pandava archers at bay, despite their utmost endeavour. O descendant of King Bharata, I am an eye-witness of this extraordinary and wonderful feat, and the gods themselves, the Siddhas and Charans were all highly pleased to see the lightness of the hands of the noble Karna.

29. And, O lordly being, all the great warriors of the Dhartarastra force paid him their homage and worshipped him as the best of all bowmen.

30. And then, O monarch, as in summer the blazing conflagration burns heaps of hay into ashes, so did Karna consume his enemies' forces, as it were, with the fire of his weapons.

31. Thus beaten by that foremost of car-warriors, Karna, the Pandava troops began to flee in all directions—afraid to face him in battle.

32. Afflicted with the sharp shots coming out of Karna's bow in that battle the Panchalas sent forth bitter cries of woe.

33. Bewildered at that tumultuous uproar, the vast army, comprising the Pandava force and belonging to the hostile party,—regarded him as the hero of the field in that great battle.

34. The son of Radha, that scorcher of his enemies, displayed once again such wonderful prowess that the Pandavas, all combined, dared not even to look at him.

35. And like a stream dividing itself when checked by a mountain, so did the Pandava forces break themselves opposed by Karna.

36. In that battle, the mighty and strong-armed Karna, O king, burning the vast army of the Pandavas, stood out in relief like a blazing fire without smoke.

37. That strong-armed man with great lightness of hands, O monarch, began to strike off with his shafts, the arms and heads, as also the ears adorned with rings of many of his sturdy enemy.

38. He went on, O king, cutting off horses, elephants, shafts, swords with hilts of ivory, fans and cars, and wheels, axles and yokes, as also many other things in a mess, like a hero.

39—40. Heaps of carcasses of elephants, and horses, slain by Karna, O Bharata, were lying on all sides, and the earth became slippery with their blood, while their dead bodies blocked the way and made it impassable.

41. The earth became so covered over with dead bodies of horses, foot soldiers, elephants and with broken cars that it became impossible to distinguish the even land from the uneven.

42. The (atmosphere) became dark as pitch with the shower of arrows shot by Karna, and nobody could know each other, or foes from friends.

43. O monarch, the great car-warriors of the Pandavas, were covered with the gold-decked darts coming out of Karna's bow.

44. O king, the son of Radha repeatedly broke the ranks of the powerful car-warriors of the Pandavas, though they tried their utmost to worst him in that fight.

45—46. As in a wild the herds of deer are scared away before an angry lion or other animals seeing an wolf, so, in that battle, the foremost car-warriors of the Panchalas and other great warriors of the Pandavas were driven before Karna.

47. As the Pandava troops turned their backs in battle the powerful Dhartarashtras followed them uttering loud shouts.

48. O king of kings, Duryodhana being very glad ordered in great glee his war bands to discourse music throughout the whole range of his army.

49. The great Panchal warriors, the best of men, all determined to die in that battle, returned bravely to the field.

50. O king, those brave warriors were repeatedly broken down in that fight by the son of Radha, the smiter of his enemies, and powerful like a bull.

51. O Bharata, Twenty Panchala car-warriors, and more than a hundred of the Chedis were sent to the other world by Karna's arrows.

52. O descendant of Bharata, he (Karna) pulled down men from their seats in the cars' and from the backs of horses and elephants' and also scared away the infantry.

53. That brave warrior, the son of Suta, the smiter of his foes, like Pluto at the time of destruction looked brilliant as the sun in the meridian, and nobody could set his eyes upon him.

54. O great monarch, after destroying hosts of elephants, horses, infantry, and car-warriors, that powerful archer, the destroyer of his enemies, stood upon his chariot.

55. The great car-warrior Karna after killing the Somakas stood like the mighty Pluto after destroying the elephants.

56. The Panchals also showed very great courage, for they never left the head of the battle-field, even when thus distressed by Karna.

57. And the king (Duryodhana), killed the Pandava forces by hundreds and thousands as did also Dushasana, Kripa, the son of Sharadwata, Ashwathama, Kritavarman, and Shukuni of great strength.

58. The two sons of Karna too,—aye those two brothers of unconquerable strength, O king of kings, boiling with rage, waged a ruthless slaughter among the Pandava hosts in many different places.

59. And the battle [that ensued then] was deadly in the extreme, and the slaughter [which followed] was really very great.

60. Then the Pandava warriors Dhristadyumna and Shikhandhin, the (five sons of Draupadi, fretting and foaming with rage, caused a terrible havoc among your troops.

61. And thus the losses which attended the Pandava forces in their several divisions, were equ. l to those of your own, when the all-powerful Bhima joined them (the Pandavas) in the field.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—5. Arjuna in that great battle, after destroying the four divisions (of the army belonging to the enemy) and taking a glance of the enraged son of Suta, made a river of blood to flow there, a river that was filled with flesh, bones, and marrow; elephants and horses formed the bed of that river; and human heads, like rocks and stones strewn on all sides, seemed to resound with the cries of crows and ravens; umbrellas floated like swans; and bodies of brave soldiers like so many trees drifted away by the current; necklaces were like lotuses in the stream; and head-dresses its foam, broken pieces of skulls floated about, and bows and arrows were like fishes in it; armours and shields formed its eddies; chariots, with which it teemed, were like its rafts; and braver-hearted men could alone cross that bloody stream, while the faint-hearted sunk within to navigate it.

6. Vibhatsu, the foremost of men, and smiter of hostile warriors after making this bloody stream to flow, spoke the following words to Vasudeva.

Arjuna said :—

7. "O Krishna, I see the banner of Suta' our troops, with Bhimasena at their head' are fighting with that mighty car-warrior, O Janardana, the Panchalas becoming afraid of Karna are melting away.

8. Behold, King Duryodhana, alongside Karna is looking exceedingly beautiful, with the white umbrella over his head, in his efforts to rout the Panchalas.

9. Karna is protecting Kripacharya, Kritavarman and Aswathama, while those great warriors are protecting the King Duryodhana in their turn; and unless we resist them they will cause a massacre among the Somakas.

10. O Krishna, Shalya, a thorough master in the art of driving, is looking surpassingly beautiful, as he drives the chariot of Suta's son, seated on his high seat of the car.

11. It would be well to go over there, so lead my big chariot in that direction, I am not going to return without killing Karna in that fight.

12. O Janardan, the whole hosts of the Pandavas and the Srinjayas will all be destroyed before our very face, unless this son of Radha be killed."

13. Thus asked Keshava led the chariot through your army towards the great archer

Karna, with a view to bring about a dual fight between him and Savyasachin.

14. As urged by the son of Pandu the very driving of the car by the strong-armed Vasudeva gave assurance to the Pandava troops and cheered them up.

15. In that fight the rattling noise of the wheels of the car of Pandu's son, sounded, O sire, like the rumbling of Vasava's thunder.

16. The son of Pandu of unfathomable nobleness, and the very personification of power, thus went on destroying your army as he proceeded onward with the loud rattling noise of his car.

17. Looking at the standard, the white steeds, and the black driver, (Krishna) of the noble Arjuna, Shalya, the king of Madra, addressing Karna, said :—

18. " You were enquiring about Arjuna; there comes he in that chariot, drawn by white steeds and driven by the black charioteer (Krishna),—destroying his enemies as he makes his way forward.

19. There stands the son of Kunti with the outstretched Gandiva in his hand; save us by killing him.

20. O Karna, he is willing to try his strength with you in battle, and being restless is slaying many of our picked warriors. Advance, O son of Radha, onward to meet that descendant of Bharata race.

21. Slaughtered in large numbers, the Dhartarashtra troops have become afraid of, and are giving way before, him.

22. I believe, hastily he is coming towards you avoiding other warriors,—his body is swelling with wrath.

23. You have worsted Vrikodara, and so Partha is burning with anger to meet you in battle, and would not wait to fight out any other warrior save and beyond yourself.

24—26. You have badly hurt the virtuous King Yudhistira, and deprived him of his chariot, you have placed Shikhandin, Satyaki, the sons of Draupadi, Yudamamanyu, Uttamaujas and his brother Nakula and Sahadeva in woeful plights; Partha, the smiter of his enemies, in a sullen mood and blood-shot eyes, is advancing, in hot haste and with impetuosity, to wreak his vengenance on you.

27. Eluding the grasp of other warriors he is hastily advancing towards us, so Karna, be you on the alert, as there is none else to resist him in battle.

28. As a continent resists the fury of the surging sea, so you are the only archer in all the world who can resist Dhananjaya's rage.

29. He is advancing all alone, there is none to guard him in the front or in the rear, and well may you now count upon success following you.

30. You are the only man who can cope with the Krishnas in battle, so make your march, O son of Radha; you alone are capable of it.

31. You stand in the same footing with Bhishma, Drona, Drauni and Kripa; in prowess, so put a stop to the advance of Savyasachin in this great battle.

32. Dhananjaya is looking like a snake protruding his quivering tongue, or like a bull bellowing loudly in rage, or indeed, like a tiger of a forest; O Karna, put an end to him.

33. Not at all caring for the safety of others those chiefs, the principal warriors of Dhartarastra army, are melting away, being afraid to face Arjuna.

34. O mighty warrior, O Suta's son, you are the only man in this field who can bring relief and assurance into the hearts of flying chiefs.

35. As in a tempest the drowning sailor look forward anxiously for an island for their protection, so the whole Kaurava army is looking up to you, O foremost of men, as their saviour.

36—37. O son of Radha, you have worsted in battle the unconquerable Vaidehas, Amvasthas, Kamvojas, Nagnajits and the Gandharas, now with the same energy, and putting forth your best exertion and prowess, O mighty armed one, like a man, do you proceed onward and attack the son of Pandu, as also against Vasudeva, the descendant of Vrishni, and who is always adored by the crowned Arjuna."

Karna said :—

38. " O strong-armed Shalya, you are no longer afraid of Dhananjaya and seem to be in good humour, and as such you are agreeable to me.

39. You will witness to-day the tuition I have received in the tactics and stragems of war also the strength of my arms, truly you can well count upon the extermination of this vast Pandava troops by me alone, as well upon the destruction of those two foremost of men,—the two Krishnas.

40—41. I am determined not to return from the battle-field without putting an end to those two mighty warriors, or I would be done to death by them.—There are chances in warfare, and victory is always uncertain, however, whether I kill them or they kill me, I will stand true to my purpose."

Salya said :—

42. "O Karna, this (Arjuna) the best of warriors even when alone, is considered to be unconquerable by all the warriors, and now when he is protected by Krishna it is really a venture to try to face and defeat him."

Karna said :—

43. "Yes, it is told that he (Arjuna), is the foremost of all the car-warriors that was ever born in this earth, now witness my prowess, for I will fight this Partha out who is so mighty.

44. Perhaps this son of the Kuru king (Arjuna), who is being borne by white steeds will send me this day to my last account, but there will be an end of all these with my fall.

45. This prince is possessed of strong powerful arms that are never exhausted, and do neither sweat nor shake, and are marked with cicatrices, he is light-handed and well-skilled in the use of weapons, and, in truth, the son of Pandu is the foremost of all warriors.

46. At a time he can take a number of shafts and can shoot them like one, and quickly placing on the bow-string he can even send them to the distance of two miles, always hitting his mark; and who is there to match him in all the world.

47. That energetic and great warrior Savyasachin, the son of Pandu, with Krishna to back him, after satisfying the deity Agini in Khandava, received as a presen his bow Gandiva, and the noble Krishna, his discus.

48. That strong-armed man with never-failing prowess, on the same occasion received from the god of fire his formidable car with those white steeds yoked on them and which rolls on with great rattle, as also his two fine celestial and inexhaustible quivers, and many other celestial weapons.

49. He, after destroying numberless Daityas and the Kalakeyas in the dominion of Indra, received the Dev-Datta conch; there is no mightier man than he in all the world.

50. High-spirited as he is, after satisfying Mahadeva in battle he received the most terrible weapon Pashuput,—powerful enough to annihilate the three worlds.

51. When he—that first among men—exterminated all the Kalakhanja Asuras, he received from the different regents of the world many weapons of unfathomable power with which he slew them.

52. Then in the chief city of King Virata he, all alone on a single chariot, discomfited all of us, and forcibly took away the wealth of kine and the garments of all the great warriors before their very face.

53. O Shalya, I must be the most courageous man in all the world to challenge in battle that foremost of men of the royal race, that hero who possesses such might and qualities, and more so, as he is seconded by him of the Vrishni's race (Krishna).

54—55. Besides that, the noble and unrivalled Vasudeva,—who is always victorious, who is the Narayana himself, who is the Vishnu decked with conch, discus and mace, and whose qualities cannot well be sung by all the worlds even in numberless years,—is protecting him (Arjuna). Beholding the two Krishnas in one chariot, I am at once led by misgivings and courage.

56. Partha is the best of all archers, and Narayan with his discus is invincible, even it may be possible for one to shake off the mountain Himalaya from its place, but never can this son of Pandu and Vasudeva be shaken.

57. Who but myself, O Shalya, would dare face this Phalguna and Vasudeva in battle, for both of them are athletic, firm-handed, skilful in war, and mighty car-warriors.

58. O king of Madras, to-day my earnest desire is to fight out this son of Pandu, and that will be achieved soon, and that most beautiful and extraordinary fight, the like of which has never been seen before, will occur very shortly. To-day they will either put an end to my life or I will send them to their last account."

59—60. Speaking the aforesaid words to Shalya, Karna, the smiter of his enemies, in that battle gave utterance to loud roars resembling those of the clouds, and advanced towards your son (Duryodhana), the first of the Kurus, who respectfully saluted him, and spoke the following words to him, and to the strong-armed Kripa, and to Bhoja Chief Kritavarman, to preceptor Drona's son and his younger brother, and to the king of Gandhar and his son, and to all elephant-riders, horsemen and infantry :—

61. "O kings, do youplease push on towards Krishna and Arjuna and shut them up from all sides, when they feel tired and exhausted from fighting with you I shall be able to despatch them off quite easily."

62. "Let it be so," said they, and accordingly those mighty warriors, determined to put an end to Arjuna's life all rushed towards Dhananjaya and attacked him with numberless shafts.

63. As the rivers and streams course mightily onward, but loose their forces and melt in the bosom of the unfathomable deep, so all those warriors were received by the great Arjuna.

64. Such was the lightness of Arjuna's hands that it was impossible for his enemies to mark how he was putting his shafts on the string and how he was shooting them out, only horses, men and elephants went down all the time in heaps, struck dead with Arjuna's shots.

65. As persons with sore eyes cannot look up towards the sun so Jaya (Arjuna) whose arrows were brilliant like the rays of the all-burning sun at the end of Yuga, and whose bow Gandiva formed his circular disk, could not be looked at by the Kauravas.

66. Smiling and stretching his bow Gandiva to the fullest extent he sent out numberless arrows from it, destroying all the powerful weapons sent against him by the great car-warriors, and hitting them at the same time.

67. O lord of the universe, Arjuna, thwarting the weapons of his enemies sped numberless arrows which destroyed many of your army like the powerful sun during the months of Jaistha and Asharh drawing up great quantities of water (from the earth).

68. As the clouds pour down heavy showers upon mountain, so did your son, Kripa, the king of the Bhojas, and that powerful son of Drona rushed on and began to pour down arrows upon him like rains.

69. Thus attacked, the son of Pandu very quickly cut off, all the weapons sent against him by all those skilful and mighty car-warriors, and struck three arrows at the breast of each of them.

70. As the sun, in the months of Jaistha and Ashara, shines brilliantly in the midst of his corona, so Arjuna, scorching his enemies, shone out in great relief, the full drawn Gandiva forming his corona, and his shafts forming his rays.

71. Drona's son (Aswathama) coming forward shot ten choicest arrows against Dhananjaya, three against Krishna, four against the four horses, and many other good arrows against the great ape in charge of his standard.

72. In spite of these, Dhananjaya made Drona's son carless by cutting off the outstreched bow of his foe with three shafts, killing his driver with a razor like shaft, and making away with his banner with three, and his four horses with four other shafts.

73. He (Aswathama), being greatly angry, took up a splendid bow ornamented with gold, diamonds and other precious stones, which looked like the body of the snake Takshaka or a great mountainous snake.

74. He then throwing down other weapons on the earth and putting string to the bow from an adjacent place began to distress and strike those two best of men, who were unconquerable, with various arrows.

75. Your son Duryodhana, Kripa and the Bhoj King, and other great warriors, who were leading the field, attacked that mightiest of the Pandavas shooting showers of shafts against him, and he looked like the sun (who drives away darkness) surrounded by clouds on all sides.

76. As in days of yore Indra with his thunder destroyed the horses and car of Valiraj (Asura), so Partha, powerful as the thousand-armed (Kartavirya) with various shafts distressed Kripa's driver and his horses, and cut off his bow and arrows as also his banner on his chariot.

77. As Kiritin had distressed Ganga's son Bhisma before, so Kripa was now distressed in that great fight with innumberable shots after striking off his standard and weapons.

78. Then the banner and bow of your brave and roaring son was struck off by the mighty Partha, who next cut off the standard and steeds of Kritavarman.

79. As a mighty river washes away an embankment, so the ranks of your great army was broken to hundred different portions by him (Partha), who destroyed in no time many elephants, steeds, cars, drivers and weapons of his enemies' army.

80—81. Then Keshava, leaving the distressed enemies on the right side, drove the chariot onward, and Dhananjaya when going quickly like Satamanyu (Indra) at the time of killing Vritra was followed by other great warriors with lofty banners and excellent chariots all desirous of gaining a name in battle.

82. Then the great car-warriors Shikhandin, Satyaki, and the twin brothers, with fearful roars advanced towards Dhananjaya and obstructed the hostile troops, striking them with sharp shafts.

83. Like the Devas (celestials) and the Asuras in the old days, the Kuru warriors and the Srinjayas, coming wrathfully in contact with each other, went on killing one another with powerful and straight shafts.

84—85. Then all anxious to gain victory or to go to heaven by dying in the battle-field, the elephant riders, car-warriors and horsemen with leonine-roars struck each other with well-armed blows. In fact, those brave and picked warriors sent out such hosts of shots against one another that the light of the sun became almost indistinct, and the very atmosphere was filled with darkness.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(KARNABADHA PARVA),—Contd.

Sanjaya aaid :—

1—2. O monarch, Dhananjaya, seeing, Bhima almost sinking under the pressure of the attack of many of great Kaurava warriors, left aside the son of Suta and his division, O Bharata, and went to the rescue of his brother, and sent many warriors of the hostile army to Pluto's region.

3. His showers of shafts fell dividedly, some covered the skies, while others killed your army.

4. O king, Dhananjaya, filling the sky (which is the place for birds to play) with his arrows, seemed at that time the very destroyer of Kurus.

5. He with his long flat-pointed shafts and various other brilliant weapons, and keen like razor, began to cut off bodies and heads of enemies.

6. Warriors dead and dying, trunks without heads, lopped off portions of human bodies deprived of armour, covered the battle-field.

7—8. O monarch, heaps of unshapely and mangled bodies of elephants and horses, cut off by Dhananjaya with hisweapons in different ways, and broken cars made the field look ghastly and awful, and the way uneven and impassable, resembling the great river Vaitarini.

9. It was also strewn with cars, some without horses, and some with horses yoked on them, and some with drivers and some without drivers, as also with broken axles, wheels and arrows.

10—11. Four hundred fearful and highly trained elephants ridden by wrathful warriors enveloped in golden coloured armors and decked with golden ornaments, urged by the pressure of the heels and toes of their guides,—who were also powerful, filled with rage, and cruel,—came forward, and was struck down by the chosen weapons of Kiritin or the diadem-decked Arjuna, and fell down resembling great mountain tops inhabited by living beings when loosened.

13. Dhananjaya covered the earth by killing many great and choice elephants by his shafts.

13. Heaps of carcasses of elephants with greasy matter oozing out of them looked like clouds, and as the sun stands out in relief dispersing the clouds, so Dhananjaya's car passed through these masses of dead elephants.

14. Phalguna made a great havoc, and the path was covered with dead horses, men, elephants, and with many broken chariots, as also with dead bodies of warriors divested of their coats of mail, instruments of war and other weapons, and the place was also strewn over with various srots of weapons loosened from the clutches that held them.

15. The awful sound made by his outstretched Gandiva was like the clash of thunder amidst the gloomy clouds.

16. As in a hurricane a great vessel is wrecked to pieces by the tossing of the sea, so your army was broken, and it suffered badly from Dhananjaya's shots.

17. Lots of deadly, burning and meteor-like shots, coming like thunderbolts out of the Gandiva, began to burn down your troops.

18. As on a night, a blazing forest of bamboos burns on a great mountain, so your great army looked ablaze under fire from (Arjuna's) shots.

19. Your troops, being thus hard pressed, burnt and distressed, and killed by Kiritin's (Arjuna's) arrows began to fly in all directions.

20. As in a great forest, herds of deer being afraid fly wildly in all directions when it catches fire, verily such became the fate of the Kauravas when they were burnt to death by Savyasachin.

21. Leaving the strong-armed Bhimasena, the distressed Kaurava troops retreated from the field.

2. Thus breaking down the Kuru army the unconquerable Vibhatsu then approached Bhimasena and rested there for a while.

23. Phalguna then receiving Bhima's caress and consulting him for a while, informed him that the arrows with which Yudhisthira was afflicted have been drawn out of his body, and that he is keeping well.

24. O Bharata, then taking Bhima's permission, Dhananjaya again advanced towards his enemies, making the earth and sky ring back with the rattling noise of his car-wheels.

25. Then your ten sons, who were born after Dushasana, all good warriors and brave hearted, surrounded Dhananjaya.

26. O Bharata, they with drawn bows distressed Arjuna with firey arrows even as do the hunters an elephant and seemed to dance in the battle-field (with excitement).

27. And the destroyer of (Asura) Madhu, quite confident that Kiritin will soon send them to the region of Pluto, urged on the car, brought them all to the right side.

28. Then seeing that Arjuna with his car was getting from them, they made a rush towards him.

29. Then Partha soon struck off their banners, bows and horses and they fell down on the earth; then with some crescent-shaped arrows and with ten other shafts cut off their heads.

30. Those heads with lips and eyes red with rage looked fair like a collection of lotuses.

31. The destroyer of his enemies (Arjuna) thus sending ten gold mailed Kauravas to the other world with ten broad-headed, gold-winged and swift arrows proceeded onward.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(KARNABADHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. As the great ape-bannered Arjuna was advancing with swift horses, he was attacked by ninety brave car-warriors of the Kauravas.

2. Taking sacred oaths those mighty warriors surrounded that foremost of men Arjuna.

3. But those swift horses of Arjuna decked with gold and strings of pearls were directed by Krishna towards Karna's car.

4. As the destroyer of his enemies, Dhananjaya was advancing towards Karna's car, he was followed by the ninety Samsaptaka car warriors who were pouring down arrows upon him.

5. Then Arjuna, with sharp arrows, cut off their bows, banners and sent them all with their drivers to the other world.

6. As Siddhas (pure souls) are obliged to have a fall from heaven with their cars, when their virtues wear off, so those warriors were all knocked down by Kiriti's various weapons.

7. Then many Kauravas with their horses, elephants and cars boldly faced that foremost man of Kuru and Bharata races viz., Phalgooni.

8. Then many spirited men of your sons' great army with numbers of horses and mighty and select elephants in front obstructed Dhananjaya's further progress.

9. Then that descendant of the line of Kuru race was surrounded by many great archers of the Kaurava army who were throwing lances, swords, cutlasses, darts and maces and other weapons upon him and covered him.

10. The son of Pandu with his own weapons baffled those hosts of arrows which covered the skies even as the sun shines out in its own splendour dispelling the darkness by the power of his rays.

11. Then the son of Pandu was attacked on the side by thirteen hundred Mlecha troops on furious and unruly elephants.

12. Partha on his chariot was distressed, by Nalikas, lances, darts spears, Kampanas, barbed arrows and other sorts thrown at him by them.

13. Phalgooni cut off with his broad-edged and crescent-shaped sharp arrows all those hosts of excellent weapons, although some of them were thrown by elephants with their tusks.

14. As the mountain is broken to pieces by thunder, so those elephants with their riders, and their standards were knocked down by various choice shafts (from Arjuna).

15. Those mighty elephants adorned with golden necklaces, being distressed by gold-winged arrows, fell down dead.

16. The twang of the Gandiva was prominent amid the loud shouts and distressful noises of hosts of men, elephants and horses.

17—18. O King, elephants and rider-less horses being hurt began to fly hither and thither, and numberless cars without horses and rideres could be seen there changing their forms like smoke when rising into the sky resembling the city of Gandharvas.

19. O monarch, many of your cavalry when flying on all directions were struck down lifeless by Partha's arrows.

20. At that time Arjuna displayed the marvellous strength of his arms by destroying in battle, alone and unaided, car-warriors horsemen and elephants.

21—22. O foremost of the Bharata race, Bhimsena, seeing that Kiritin was thus surrounded by the three different kinds of troops, O king, left the few remnant of your car warriors and quickly came up to Arjuna's car.

23. Seeing Bhimsena advance towards his brother those distressed men that were left unslain took to their heels.

24. Bhima of inexhaustible prowess, with mace in his hand, slaughtered in that great battle the remnant of the mighty Kaurava cavalry that were left after the havoc made by Arjuna.

25—26. O sire, Bhima by his fearful mace "which was deadly as the black night of death, which was capable of pulling down walls, gates of cities and houses, and whose food was, men, elephants and horses, slaughtered innumerable riders and horses.

27. The son of Pandu knocked down horses and men with black armour on, by his mace; they all came crumbling down with great noise.

28. Covered with blood, with heads, bones and legs broken, they biting the earth i.e., (eating dust) became food for animals of prey.

29. That mace, appeared with drinking blood, also eating flesh, bones and marrow and became terrible to look at like the black night of death.

30—31. Bhima slaughtered ten thousand horse and numberless infantry and was running to and fro in wrath, with mace in hand; and your troops, O Bharata, seeing him thought that the Pluto himself has come among them, armed with his death-dealing wand.

32. The wrathful son of Pandu, who looked like an unruly elephant, himself forced his way with the elephant division (of his enemies) as a Makara takes his sweeping dive in the sea.

33. Thus entering the army Bhima by the help of his mighty mace sent them all to the region of Pluto in no time.

34—35. We could see the furious elephants cased in mail, with riders and banners, tumbling down on all sides like so many winged mountains and the powerful Bhimsena thus exterminating the elephant division went back to his car and joined Arjuna's rear.

36. O king, your very army, about to fly, being thus slain and surrounded on all sides; with weapons, lost all energy, and being greatly confounded, was at their wit's end as to what to do.

37. Arjuna, seeing that host in that humble plight and so confounded, began to shower death-dealing shafts upon them.

38. Elephants, horses, cars and men being thus covered by arrows shot by the holder of Gandiva they looked like the handsome Kadamva flower with the filaments of it.

39. O monarch, thus hurt by Arjuna's arrows which were putting an end to elephants, car-warriors and horses, the Kaurava troops gave vent to loud lamentations.

40. Your troops, panic-stricken, kept close to each other and were turning round from this side to that side like a wheel on fire.

41. The great fighting still went on between the Kurus and (Arjuna) and all the elephants, horses, cavalry and car-warriors were wounded i. e., (no body came out scatheless).

42. Resembling a forest of blooming Asoka the troops, streaming with blood, with their armours broken, looked red as if they were ablaze with fire.

43. Seeing Savyasachin (Arjuna) display so much prowess, all the Kauravas despaired of Karna's life.

44. The Kauravas, beaten by Partha, the weilder of the Gandiva, not being able to bear the brunt of the battle, gave up fighting.

45. Distressed to death by (Arjuna's) shafts they all, leaving Karna, began to disperse themselves on all directions abusing the son of Suta all the time.

46. The Pandava warriors, with Bhimsena at their head, were all very happy to see Partha follow the flying columns shooting many hundreds of arrows.

47. As persons, drowning in the deep sea, find shelter in an island, so your sons, O king, went towards Karna's car for their safety.

48. O monarch, the Kauravas, all afraid of the holder of the Gandiva, like snakes whose stock of venom has exhausted, looked up to Karna for their safety.

49—50. O great king, your sons, being afraid of the noble son of Pandu, sought protection of the great warrior Karna, like the creature of the earth, responsible for their actions, take shelter of virtue from fear of death.

51. Karna who was not at all afraid, seeing them all bleeding and distressed by shafts (of Arjuna) re-assured them and said, "Do not fear, come to me."

52. And Karna, beholding that all the troops have been broken by the prowess of Partha, stretched out his bow for the purpose of killing his enemy.

53. Having seen that the Kauravas have all fled from the battle-field, Karna, the best of warriors, drew a deep sigh, and thinking awhile determined to slay Partha.

54. Then Vrisha—the son of Adirath, drawing his great bow, again rushed towards the Panchalas before the very face of Savyasachin.

55. As the clouds pour down heavy showers upon a mountain, so Karna was almost immediately met by hosts of arrows from many rulers of the earth whose eyes were blood-red with wrath.

56—57. O ye of noble mind and best of living beings, when Karna—the son of Suta and protector of his friends, thus desirous to serve his friends, sent thousands of shafts which killed many of the Panchalas, cries, loud from woe, rose among them.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. O monarch, after the Kurus had been routed (by Arjuna) on whose car were attached white horses, Karna—the son of Suta, like the high wind dispersing the clouds, went on slaughtering the Panchalas.

2. With Anjalika weapons he brought down the driver of Janamejaya from the car and broke down the bows of Satanikas Sutasoma covered them with broad-headed arrows.

3. Then he, striking Dhristadyumna with six arrows, almost instantly knocked down his and Satyaki's horses, and then in quick succession killed Vishoka—the Kaikeya prince.

4. Then the Kaikeya General Ugrakarman, seeing the Kaikaya prince thus killed, rushed on towards Karna and moving forward his bow repeatedly began to distress Karna's son Prasena with many powerful shafts.

5. Then Karna, with three crescent-like shafts, severed his head and arms from the body and like a Shala tree cut down by an axe he (Ugrakarman) fell down lifeless from his car.

6. Then Prasena, as if dancing with excitment, assailed the steedless grandson of Shini (Satyaki) with many straight arrows, but was in return killed by the grandson of Shini.

7. Karna, filled with vengeance at the death of his son, and wishing to slay that foremost of Shinis addressed him, "consider yourself a dead man" and struck him with a deadly arrow.

8—9. But Shikandi severed that arrow with three shafts, and with three others distressed Karna ; then the wrathful son of Suta with two razor-like shafts struck off the bows, arrows and banners of Shikhandi and with six other powerful arrows hit Shikhandi himself and killed Dhristadumnya's son ; and the noble son of Adhiratha also struck Sutasoma with a very sharp arrow.

10. O most powerful of monarchs, in that terrible fight loud lamentations were heard as the son of Dhristadumnya fell down and Krishna, hearing that, addressed Partha and said, "Partha go and kill Karna for he is destroying the whole Panchala race."

11. Then in order to save the Panchalas from the fear of that great car-warrior, Karna, he (Arjuna) advanced on his car towards the chariot of the son of Adhiratha with a smile in his lips.

12. Then rubbing his palm on the bow-string with a very loud twang he stretched out the Gandiva and suddenly made the Earth look dark by covering the sun with showers of arrows and also killed hosts of men, horses and elephants, and destroyed many banners.

13. At that fearful moment, when Kiritin (the diadem-decked Arjuna) greatly excited, with the Gandiva in his hands, bent almost to a circle, assailed his enemies the loud twang of his bow resounded through the skies, and the birds being afraid took refuge in caves and mountains.

14. The redoubtable Bhimasena followed Arjuna on his car guarding the rear, and both the princes fighting their way on their respective cars advanced fast towards Karna.

15. In the meantime the son of Suta had been fighting terribly : he repeatedly thrashed the Somakas and killed large numbers of elephants, horses and car-warriors ; in fact he covered the atmosphere with his shafts.

16. Then Uttamaujas, Janamejaya, the wrathful Yudhamanyu, Shikhandin and Prishatha's son Dhristadumnya all in a body fiercely attacked Karna with many weapons and with loud roars.

17. As the objects of senses cannot extract the purity out of a holy man, so those five best Panchala warriors, though they tried their utmost, could not shake Vaikartana (Karna) from off his car.

18. Karna, with his arrows very soon rending asunder their bows, arrows, drivers and banners and striking each of them with five arrows, gave vent to a loud shout that resembled the roar of a lion.

19. When Karna was thus distressing his enemies with his bow and arrows in hand the whole world, with its mountains and trees, seemed to spilt into pieces by the loud twang of his bow, and people became afraid.

20. The son of Adhiratha, with his large bow like that of Shakra fully drawn, went on throwing his arrows; indeed in that fight he looked brilliant like the sun with his firing rays in the midst of his corona.

21. Suta's son then struck Shikhandin with twelve keen shafts, Uttamaujas with six and Yudhamanyu, Janmenjaya and Dhristadyumna with three each.

22. O respected king, as the objects of senses are conquered by a holy man of abstinence, so those five great warriors, overpowered by Suta's son in that dreadful fight, became confounded and inactive to the great delight of their enemy—

23. As ship-wrecked merchants are saved from drowning in a deep sea by means of other ships, so did the sons of Draupadi, with the help of their cars, save their maternal uncles from sinking under the pressure of Karna's weapons who resembled the sea.

24. Then the most powerful of the Shinis (Satyaki) cut off all the sharp arrows of Karna and struck him with many sharp arrows purely made of iron and your eldest son, Duryodhana, with eight.

25. Then Kripa, the Bhoja king, your son and Karna himself assaulted Satyaki in return with many sharp arrows, but that best of Yadu's race fought with those four great warriors as did the king of Daityas with the regents of the four quarters.

26. As in autumn the Sun shines brilliantly in the sky, so with his outstretched bow, which was sounding loudly and sending forth arrows unrestrainedly, Satyaki became hard to face.

27. As the Maruts helped Shakra (Indra) when he distressed his enemies, so the great Panchala car-warriors—the distressers of their enemies—all clothed in coats of mail, collected together, getting back upon their cars and protected that greatest man of the line of Shini.

28. Many elephants, horses and men were then killed in that fight that took place between your enemies and your troops, and it raged as hot and fierce as was the great battle which ensued between the Gods and the Asuras, in days of yore.

29. All the infantry, car-warriors, elephants and steeds distressed with various weapons, and struck by each other they began to move about sending forth dolorous cries of woe; some tumbled while others dropped down dead as they moved.

30. At that time your son Dushasana, the younger brother of the king, boldly going up to Bhimsena, shot hosts of shafts against him, and Vrikodara like a lion taking his leap upon a big Ruru (deer) swiftly made a rush towards him.

31. As in days of yore Shakra and Shamvara fight with each other, so did those two brave warriors, both panting for revenge, fight with each other making their very lives the wager of the fight.

32. As two lustful elephants fight for a she-elephant with fatty secretions streaming down their bodies, so did they strike each other with powerful and piercing shafts.

33. Then Vrikodara with two razor-like shafts struck off the banner and the bow and the arrows of your son, and with another winged arrow he hurt him on the forehead and with a fourth, he severed the head of his charioteer.

34. Prince Dushasana, taking up another bow, hit Bhima with twelve arrows and taking hold of the reins of his horses rained upon Bhima hosts of shafts.

35. Then Dushasana sent against Bhima an arrow worked with gold, diamond and other valuable gems, and brilliant as the sun's rays, deadly and powerful as Indra's thunder.

36. Vrikodara being struck by that weapon with outstreched arms fell down on his car like one dead and powerless, but again regaining his senses he began to roar like a lion.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

Sanjaya said :—

1. In that fight Prince Dushasana fought with great prowess and performed difficult feats; with a single arrow he severed Bhimasena's bow and struck his driver with six others.

2. That noble and energetic warrior after performing these brave acts, first distressed Bhima with nine shafts, and almost immediately again covered him with numberless powerful shafts.

3. The light-handed Bhimasena, being enraged at this, threw a fearful dart at your son, but your noble son drawing his bow to its full length with ten shafts severed that awful dart as it was coming straight to him like a burning brand.

4. All the warriors seeing him do this bold feat adored him and became very glad; your son again struck Bhima with another arrow which cut him deeply.

5—6. Bhima then became very angry and kindling with wrath told your son, "you have wounded me very soon; O brave warrior, you have also distressed me now, bear the weight of my mace." Now catching hold of his formidable mace for killing Dushasana he said "O Scoundrel, in this fight I will drink your heart's blood."

7. Hearing these words your son threw a death-like dart at Bhima with all his might and Bhima fomenting in rage giving turns to his fearful mace struck his enemy with it.

8. Crushing Dushasana's dart, that mace came down straight on your son and hit him on the head; in that fearful fight when thus struck the prince, with his mace, resembled an unruly elephant from whose body fatty sweat was flowing down.

9. Struck down by that weapon Dushasana fell at a distance of ten bows from his car and when he reached the ground he was shaking all over from the shock of that weapon.

10. O monarch, all his ornaments, garlands and dresses were destroyed and torn, his horses slain, his car broken to pieces, and he himself knocked down and greatly distressed under the pressure of that blow.

11. Then in that great fight the energetic Bhima gradually remembered all the sufferings they (the Pandavas) have undergone at the hands of your eldest son.

12. O monarch, the mighty Bhima of extraordinary prowess, seeing Dushasana, also remembered how he had insulted Devi Draupadi, by catching hold of her tresses and forcibly taking off her cloth, specially at a time when she should not have been touched by any male.

13. The noble-minded Bhima also, remembering the various oppressions suffered by her on different other occasions when her lords (husbands) were obliged to turn their faces and keep quiet, actually flamed in fury like fire when helped with clarified butter.

14. Addressing the great warriors, Karna, Suyodhana, Drona's son Kripa and Kritavarman, said he, "I will this day put an end to the life of this miscreant Dushasana, defend him if you can."

15. Speaking these words the energetic and mighty Bhimasena all on a sudden sprang forward with the intention of slaying Dushasana.

16. As the furious lion pounces upon an elephant, so the exemplary hero Vrikodara, showing such prowess, in that battle attacked Dushasana before the very face of Karna and Suyodhana.

17. He reached the earth leaping down from his car, eagerly looked at his fallen enemy (Dushasana) for some time and pressing his throat with his foot, took up his keen sword and therewith tearing open his chest, drank his warm blood.

18—19. O king, that strong-minded man in order to redeem his promise, threw down your son, and with the sword struck off his head and went on drinking his blood by sips with the greatest relish and looking at him spoke these words wrathfully.

20—21. "The taste of my enemies' blood is sweeter than my mother's milk or honey or butter or sweet wine or curd or the pure water or skimmed milk,and to me it is much more tasteful than all the other nectarine drinks of the world."

22. The highly wrathful Bhimasena, the very picture of fierceness, seeing that Dushasana no longer lives, with a smile said, "You are now rescued from my clutches, since you are dead; what more can I do you."

23. O monarch, he, who then saw Bhimasena who was glad at heart by drinking the blood of his enemy and was placing the battle-field giving vent to those words, actually fell down to the earth out of sheer fear.

24. Others who were not thus struck down were also so affected with fear that they lost hold of their weapons, and some with half closed eyes looked fearfully towards Bhimsena uttering meaningless ejaculations.

25. Those men, who were at that time near Bhima and who saw him thus drink Dushasana's blood being overpowered with fear, fled on all directions saying to each other that he is no human being.

26. He became so horrible to look at when drinking the blood that your troops with Chitrasena becoming afraid took to their heels saying that he is surely a Rakshasa. (Monster).

27. Then the Prince Yudhamanyu gallantly pursuing the retreating Chitrasena struck him with seven sharp arrows successively.

28. As a snake, when trodden upon, turns back with protruding tongue to give out its venom so did Chitrasena, wheeling round, struck the Panchala prince with three arrows also hitting the driver with other six.

29. Then that choicest of warriors Yudhamanyu, drawing his bow to the full extent, sent an arrow, from it, with beautiful wings and of very keen edge, and that struck off his head.

30. Karna of unparalleled energy, seeing his brother Chitrasena dead, showed great prowess and began to disperse the Pandava troops but Nakula thereupon faced him.

31. Bhimsena, then after thus killing the vengeful Dushasana and holding a full draught of his blood in his hands in the presence of those great and mighty warriors, loudly spoke the following words.

32—33. "O you most miserable wretch, now I am drinking your heart's blood" do you again joyfully defy us and say, "Beast, Beast" and also said, "O you who were very glad and danced at our misery and called us beasts, we now fling back the words to your very teeth.

34—37. You (Dushasana) were the root of all the mischief and sufferings we had to undergo; it is through the evil counsels of Duryodhana, Shakuni and the son of Radha we had to sleep at the house called the Pramankoti, and our food was poisoned; we had to suffer from bites of black snakes, we were going to be burnt down to ashes in the house of lac, we were robbed of our kingdom through gambling, and Draupadi was insulted and her beautiful hairs seized mercilessly; we were exiled in wilderness, we suffered both at home and at battle from strokes of weapons when living in Virata's residence.

38. We have never been happy but have undergone all these sufferings from the evil intentions of Dhritarashtra and his son."

39. Thus speaking, O monarch, Vrikodara, after gaining victory, addressed both Keshava and Arjuna.

40. And the short-tempered Bhimasena, who was all bleeding and was very red in the face and highly wrathful, spoke these words—" You witness, O ye brave warriors, that in battle I have this day redeemed my pledge regarding Dushasana.

41. I will very soon redeem my other promise by crushing the head of that other brute the miscreant Duryodhana with my foot, as a sacrifice in this warfare, before all the Kauravas, and then I will know peace."

42. And the mighty Bhimasena uttering these joyfully with blood streaming through his body, began to shout loudly as thousand-eyed (Indra) after killing the (Asura) Vritra.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—contd.

Sanjaya said :—

O monarch, after the death of Dushasana your ten sons, all great car-warriors, who never showed their backs in field, greatly energetic and revengeful, covered Bhima with their arrows.

2—3. They were Nisangen, Kavachin, Pashin, Dundadhara, Dhanurograha, Alulupa, Saha, Shanda, Vatavega and Subuchasas; and being greatly sorry on account of the death of their brother, they faced the strong armed Bhimasena and struck him with arrows.

4. Being hemmed in on all sides by the arrows of those mighty car warriors, Bhima, with fiery and blood-red eyes, looked brilliant as Pluto himself.

5. O Bharata, Vrikodara, of the line of Pritha, then with ten gold-winged and flat edged shafts, sent those ten princes of the line of Bharata, whose wrists were adorned with gold bracelets, very quickly to the region of Pluto.

6. After those ten brave warriors have fallen, your troops being afraid of the Pandavas began to give way even in the presence of Karna himself.

7. O monarch, as human beings are afraid of death, so Karna seeing Bhima of great power became afraid of him.

8. Then Shalya, the ornament of the battle-field, knowing from the very look of Karna what was passing in his mind, addressed that scorcher of his enemies with words befitting.

9. "O son of Radha, do not be depressed; it is not fit for you; all the chiefs are dispersing themselves afraid of Bhimasena.

10. Duryodhana is confounded owing to the woeful fate of his brother and specially as his blood has been quaffed by the brave-hearted Bhima.

11. Kripa with others and the surviving brothers of the king, with painful hearts their rage depressed with sorrow, are all seated round Duryodhana and taking care of him.

12. Those brave warriors, the Pandavas who never miss their aim, are coming forward to meet you in fight.

13. O foremost of men, for these reasons and remembering the duties of the Kshatriyas you should put forth all your energies and march against Dhananjaya.

14. O you strong-armed warrior, the whole responsibility of this war has been put on you by the son of Dhritarashtra; exert yourself and bear that burden to the best of your ability.

15. There is great glory in victory, and even in defeat Heaven is certain.

16. O son of Radha, your son Vrisasena, beholding that you are at your wit's end, is advancing towards the Pandavas with great wrath."

17. Thus addressed by Shalya of unfathomable prowess, Karna reflecting came to the conclusion that there is no other alternative but to fight the battle out.

18. Then Vrisasena, all wrathful, with his car advanced against that son of Pandu viz., Vrikodara who was destroying your army and with his mace was looking like Pluto himself with his death-dealing sceptre.

19. As (in days of yore) the victorious Magavat joyfully ran to meet the (Asura) Jambha, so did Nakula, the bravest of warriors, with great anger rushed towards their enemy, Karna's son.

20. Then the mighty Nakula, with a razor-like arrow, rent asunder the gem-bedecked banner of his foe, and with another flat-faced shaft broke the gold-belted bow of Karna's son.

21. Karna's son, master of many powerful weapons, showing how he felt for the woeful fate of Dushasana promptly took up another bow and distressed the son of Pandu with many powerful and celestial weapons.

22. The noble Nakula, very much enraged, struck his enemy with shots fiery as the burning wand, whereupon the skilful warrior, Karna's son, began to pour down celestial weapons upon Nakula.

23. The son of Karna, out of rage from the hits of his enemy as also from the brilliancy and might of his own weapons, looked like the fire ablaze when helped with clarified butter.

24. O monarch, Karna's son with his fine shots, indeed killed the white and good looking chargers of Nakula, who were of the Vanayu breed and were adorned with fittings of gold.

25. Nakula then got down from his horseless chariot, and taking up a shield that was studded with golden moons and a sky colored sword jumping now and then looked like a sprightly bird.

26. In the ceremony of horse-sacrifice as it is the duty of the killer to cut down many animals, so Nakula, with that sword in hand bounding in the air, struck down many brave men, horses and elephants.

27. Nakula, wishing to attain victory, single-handed in no time knocked down two thousand well disciplined, and well-paid warriors, collected from different countries who were of sure aim, who were always glad to fight and whose bodies were besmeared with fine sandal paste.

28. Then Karna's son all of a sudden, rushed against the advancing Nakula and distressed him with hosts of sharp shafts from all sides in order to put an end to him.

29. Nakula distressed with arrows (from Vrishasena), in return, also struck his enemy, and Vrishasena being thus struck by Nakula became very angry but the noble Nakula being protected by his brother Bhimasena at that time in that hard fight performed prodigies of valor.

30. Then the son of Karna angry at heart, with eighteen arrows, struck the brave Nakula with whom fighting was like play and who was destroying single-handed the bravest warriors, chargers and elephants.

31. O monarch, being greatly distressed by Vrishasena in that encounter, Pandu's son Nakula, the best of men and of great energy then rushed on for the purpose of killing Karna's son.

32. Vrishasena began raining hosts of sharp arrows upon the mighty Nakula as he advanced straight like a hawk pouncing npon a lump of meat with its wings spread.

33. After thwarting the hosts of arrowy of his foe, Nakula went on making mans beautiful evolutions in the air, but Karna's son, O monarch, in that fierce encounter, with his powerful shafts cut off his shield studded with a thousand stars.

34—35. Then as Nakula was careering with his drawn sword, of good steel, well polished and very sharp and strong enough to bear great weight and to lop off bodies of all sorts of enemies, and deadly as snake Vrisasena in a short time cut off that sword with six razor-like shafts and also hurt his enemy in the centre of the chest with arrows well tempered and keen edged.

36. Having thus performed deeds according to the usage of the ancients, which would have been difficult for others to do, the noble-minded Nakula, endued with great activity, advanced, O monarch, towards the car of Bhimasena, distressed with those shafts.

37. The son of Madri, becoming horseless and being thus distressed by Karna's son, in the presence of Dhananjaya bounded upon the car of Bhimasena resembling a lion leaping on the summit of a mountain.

38. Then that noble-minded and brave warrior Vrisasena, excited with rage, began to rain hosts of arrows upon those two powerful car-warriors seated on the same car with the purpose of distressing those two sons of Pandu at the same time.

39. After the car of the son of Pandu had been broken and his sword quickly cut off, the son of the Wind-god (Bhimasena) told Phalguna (Arjuna) "see how Nakula is being distressed by the son of Karna; he has even the audacity to attack us, do you proceed against him."

40. The fierce warrior Dhananjaya, whose head was adorned with diadem, on hearing these words, riding up to Vrikodara's car, drove straight on his great ape-bannered car and with Keshava as its driver towards Brisasena.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Then those eleven mighty scorchers of enemies, namely the five brave sons of Drupada, the grandson of Shini (Satyaki), and the five sons of Draupadi, learning that Nakula had been made carless and greatly distressed, and wounded with the shafts and other weapons of the son of Karna, his sword and bow broken, advanced on their rattling cars with standards floating in the air and pulled by jumping horses driven by skilful drivers. Those well-armed heroes with shafts deadly as snakes went on killing your elephants, chariots and men.

3. Then your leading car-warriors, viz., Hridaka's son, Kripa, Drona's son, Shakuni's son, Vrika, Krathadeva, and Abridha immediately advanced against them with their bows on cars, the wheels of which were rattling loudly like the roars of elephants or the boom of the clouds.

4. O monarch, the Kaurava warriors thus attacking those eleven best of car-warriors and choicest of men, checked their course with most powerful shafts, the Kulindas mounted on elephants of great Sini and looking like mountain cliffs and resembling in color newly gathered clouds, rushed against the Kaurava warriors.

5. Those unruly and proud elephants of the Himlayan breed, adorned with networks of gold and mounted by skilful warriors, eager to show their prowess in battle, looked beautiful like the clouds in the sky with lightning flashing upon them.

6. Then the Prince of the Kulindas with ten arrows made entirely of steel, bravely attacked Kripa but being struck in return by arrows of Sharadwat's son the prince with his elephant fell down on the earth.

7. The younger brother of that prince attacked Kripa's car with spears made of steel and shining like the rays of the sun, and began to shout loudly, and while so careering his head was severed by the king of Gandhara.

8. Those powerful car-warriors of our army being glad at the fall of the Kulindas blew their sea conchs and with bows in hand attacked their enemies.

9. The battle which followed between the Kurus on one side and the Pandus and the Srinjayas on the other with shafts cutlasses, darts, swords and maces and battle axes became awful aud hard, and many steeds, men and elephants were killed.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Vasudeva the foremost of men beholding the great bodied Karna whom the gods could not advancing with roars like the swelling ocean said to Arjuna with a smile.

2. There comes the chariot (of Karna) with grey steeds and Calya its driver, with the intention of meeting you in battle so wait with calmness.

3—4. O son of Pandu, look how beautifully the car of Karna is adorned; the son of Radha is on it and it has four beautiful grey horses and it is also decked with various sorts of banners and net work of bells and how it is being borne as if in the skies by their pale horses.

5. Look the high souled Karna's banner is like clouds and resembles the bow of Akhandal (Indra) which divides the sky

6. See how Karna sends hosts of arrows like clouds pouring down rain as he is advancing to fulfil the intention of Dhritarastra's son.

7. The king of Madra (Calya) is seated on the front of the car and guiding the horses of the powerful Radha's son.

8—9. Hear, O son of Pandu, the noise of their tumtums and the shrill note of their conchs and lion-like roars that are coming from all directions. Karna, of unfathomable prowess, has drawn his bow and its loud twang can be heard above all other sounds.

10. As in a forest a wrathful lion scares away herd of deers so the mighty Panchala warriors are melting (before Karna).

11. O son of Kunti, you are the only person who would venture to bear the brunt of his weapons, so you should take all possible measures to kill him,

12. I know well that you are capable to conquer in battle all the three worlds together with its mobile and immobile creations and the gods and Gandharvas.

13. Nothing need be told about fighting; men cannot look towards the great god the three eyed and terrible Sarva, also called the Kaparddin.

14. You have satisfied in battle that god of gods the Siva, deity Sthanu, the creator of the happiness of all creatures.

15. O Partha, as Indra slew Namuchi so you will, O, you of powerful arms, by the kindness of the great god who is armed with trident, kill Karna and be victorious; and may it farewell with you.

16. Arjuna said, O Krishna, you are the destroyer of Madhu and master of all creation; and as you are kind to me my victory in this battle is sure.

17. O Hrishikesa, a mighty warrior, urge on the horses and advance with my car. Phagoon will kill Karna.

18. O Govinda, today either I will slay Karna and hack him to pieces with my weapans or he will see me killed by his arrows.

19. You will soon witness the fight that will bewilder the three worlds and it will be spoken of till the world ends.

20. Thus speaking to Krishna of inexhaustible energy, Partha advanced towards Karna like one elephant against another.

21. Partha of great prowess again told Krishna who was the scorcher of foes "O Hrishikesa, time flies, so spur on the steeds;" and thus requested Kecava lashed the horses which were swift as the mind.

21—22. Partha of great prowess again told Krishna, the scorcher of his foes "O Hrishikesha, time flies spur on the horses;" and being thus addressed by the noble son of Pandu Kecava who wishes him victory lashed the steeds which were swift as the mind and very quickly brought the car of Pandu's son before Karna's chariot.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. Seeing his son Brisasena thus killed the energetic Karna shed tears with grief and wrath, his eyes red as copper and advanced to meet his enemy having defied Dhananjaya in fight.

3. Then those two cars covered with tiger skins and shinning with lustre looked like two suns facing each other.

4. Those scorchers of their enemies, the mighty warriors, with white steeds attached to their cars, looked like the sun and moon of the skies in brilliancy.

5. When those two warriors, like Indra and the Vali (son of Birochan) prepared for fight as if to conquer the three worlds, all the creatures were struck with wonder.

6—7. All the rulers of earth were filled with admiration as those two warriors faced each other with their car wheels rattling their bows twanging and their arrows flying, with whizz, Partha with his ape banner flying and Karna with his banner marked with an elephant and roaring like a lion.

8. O Bharata, all the kings began to give vent to lion-like roars (with excitement) seeing those two car warriors engaged with each other and praised them greatly.

9. Thousands of fighters, seeing them thus engaged in duel fight, began to sound their arm-pits with the palm of their hands and shook their garments (in excitement.

10. The Kauravas struck up their martial music and sounded their conchs to excite and please Karna.

11. The Pandavas also for rousing Dhananjaya caused all the sides to resound with the sound of their drums and conchs.

12. In that contest between Karna and Arjuna fearful noise arose on account of the shouts and lion-like roars of warriors and for the striking of their palms over their arm-pits.

13. All the persons gazed eagerly on those two best of car wrriors and most powerful of men as they faced each other adorned with arrows and darts.

14. Both of them were cased in armours and had swords hanging in their belts: they had grey steeds yoked to their cars and both of them had beautiful conchs; both of them were mighty car warriors, one had Calya for his driver, the other had Krishna.

15. Both had long arms and necks powerful like that of the lion; their eyes looked red with rage and they were decked with golden garlands; their bo vs seemed to send forth lightning flashes and they were possessed of choicest of weapons.

16. They were being fanned with chowries and white umbrellas were held over their heads; and they were masters of best arrows and lookod most beautiful.

17. Both of them were like furious bulls; and they were both broad chested-and had short necks like lion and were exceedingly strong.

18. O monarch, summoning each other to combat they precipitated upon one another like two powerful bulls in a cowshed with the intention of slaying one another.

19. As they fought they resembled two furious elephants, or angry mountains, or the little snakes of deadly poison or Yama the destroyer of the creation.

20. Roused against each other like Indra and Vritra (asura) they resembled the sun and the moon in brilliancy and looked like two planets approaching each other in order to bring the world to its end.

27. They were both handsome as the gods and were of godlike prowess having sprung from heavenly fathers.

22. O king, your army were filled with delight seeing those two brave warriors of tiger-like ferocity engaged in battle.

23. Beholding those foremost of men Karna and Dhananjaya engaged in combat, it could not be said as to who would be victorious in the end.

24. They were both skilful in war and possessed of select weapons, and they made the skies ring back with the noise of sounding their arm-pits.

25. Both of them were famous for their courage and strength and they were skilful like the (Asura) and the king of gods in war.

26. Both resembled Kartavirya or Dacaratha's son (Rama) in battle and looked like the god Vishnu himself in prowess or Bhava himself.

27. In that fight, O monarch, both of them had white horses and select chariots and the best of drivers.

28. Those two warriors looked beautiful and brilliant on their cars and they were admired by all the Siddhas and Charanas that were present.

29. O best of Bharata race, the Dhartarastras, without losing time, surrounded the noble Karna, who was the best of warriors.

30. So Dhristadyumna, with all the Pandavas surrounded the noble Partha matchless in war.

31. Your troops, O monarch, began to fight for Karna and the Pandavas in favor of Partha.

32. The troops of both the sides were eager witnessess of that great Yama of battle and defeat and victory of either party depended on them (Karna and Arjuna).

33. To decide the fate of the war they began that duel fight and our men and the Pandavas stood in front of the field to see that fight.

34. O king, in that battle those two brave warriors well skilled in warfare, determined to kill each other.

35. O master, they looked like two fearful comets when they engaged in that deadly fight.

36. O most powerful of the Bharata race, the inhabitants of the skies differed in opinion and angry disputes were going on amongst them as to whether Karna or Arjuna would be victorious and also the whole world was uncertain as to the issue of that fight.

37. The gods, Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pichachas, the Nagas, the Rakshashas differed in their opinions.

38. The heavens with all the stars sided Karna and the earth backed Partha as mother wishes her son well.

39. O foremost of men, all the mountains, rivers, seas, with trees, herbs and plants were for crowned Arjuna.

40. O smiter of enemies, the Asuras, the Yatudhanas, the Guhyakas and ravens and other birds who roam the skies also favoured Arjuna.

41—42. All the valuable jewels, the four Vedas, the Mahabharata, the Upavedas, the Upanishads with all their mysterious contents, the Vasuki and Chitrasena, the Takskka and Upatakskaka, the mountains and all the descendants of Kadru and their children with all the poisonous great snakes and Nagas were on Arjuna's side.

43. Aryavarta with his children, the descendants of Shuravi and Vaikati and the Bhojins all favoured Arjuna and the smaller snakes sided Karna.

44. The wolves and deer of the wild and other animals and birds of good omen all sided Partha.

45. The Vasus, the Maruts, the Siddhvas,the Rudras, the Vicwadevas, the Acwins, the Agni, the Soma and Indra, the Pavana and the ten sides were in favor of Dhananjaya but the Aditya sided Karna.

46. O monarch, the Vaicyas, the Cudras, the Sutas and other half caste people were in favor of Radha's son.

47. The Pitris and the heavenly bodies with all their followers and staff, Yama and Vaicravam and Varuna were for Arjuna. The Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, the gifts (Dakshinas), the sacred sacrifices were in favor of Arjuna.

48. The Pretas, the Pichaches, animals and birds of prey, the Rakshasas, the sea monsters, the dogs and jackals were on Karna's side.

49. The different sets of Rajarshis were for the son of Pandu. O Monarch, all the Gandharvas with Tomvuru as their head were in Arjuna's favor.

50—51. The different tribes of Gandharvas and Apsaras and the descendants of Pradha and Mauni and many sages riding on wolves, deers, elephants, horses and cars and others on foot or riding on the clouds and the wind came to see that combat betwen Karna and Arjuna.

52—53. O monarth, the Gods, Danavas Yakshas, Nagas, the birds, the learned Rishis well versed in the Vedas, the Pitris who live upon Swadha, the Sciences and and asceticism and herbs of heavenly qualities all came and with great noise took their position in the sky.

54. Brahma together with Bhava (Mahadeva) with all the Bramharishis and Monsters of creation driving in excellent cars also came to that place.

55. As those two noble warriors engaged in fight Cakra (Indra) himself wished that Arjuna might conquer Karna and Surya wished that Karna might conquer Arjuna.

56. One said my son Karna will gain victory and the other said my son Arjuna will be victorious.

57. Thus they of lion like-prowess disputed for each other taking different sides.

58. Seeing those two noble warriors face each other in fight the Asuras took one side and the gods the other.

59. The gods, the Rishis and all the creations of the three worlds began to shake with fear seeing that fight.

60 All the Gods favoured Partha and the Asuras Karna and all the creations felt an interest either for the Pandava warrior or the Kuru warrior.

61. Seeing (Brahma) the master of creation who had no father (self born) all the Gods requested him to make the issue of that fight between those two foremost of men to be equal.

62. The whole creation will be destroyed if Karna and Arjuna continued this fight O self born one; only speak the word that these two will be equally successful.

63. Hearing this Maghavat respectfully nodding to the God of Gods the Grand Sire the August one of all sensible creatures said

64. O sacred one, thou hast said before that the two Krishnas are sure to gain victory, be then pleased and let that be the case now.

65. Hearing this Brahma and Icana said to the king of the celestials the noble Vijaya (Arjuna) will surely gain victory.

66. O Cakra, Savyasachin has pleased the eater of sacrifices (Agni) in Khandava forest and also helped him when he came to Heavan.

67. Karna takes part with the Danavas and he deserves to be defeated so the intentions of the Gods will be fulfilled.

68. O King of Heaven, one should always be careful about his business and as the noble minded Phalgoon is truthful and virtuous undoubtedly he must always be the conquerer.

69. O thou with hundred eyes, why will not he be victorious, who both pleased the noble and sacred God who has the bull marked on his banner

70. Partha has the master of the world Vishnu himself as his driver besides he is a hero, is very powerful and is virtuous at the same time.

71. He is of active body, master of the science of weapons and has all qualities; and he should conquer because the Gods wish it to be so.

72. By his great prowess Partha can overrule destiny itself whether it be in his favor or not; when he means he can destroy all creatures.

73. When those two Krishnas are roused, they care not for anything and those two foremost of men are creators of real and unreal matters.

74. They are the ancient and good Rishis Nara and Narayana; they have no fear and they are smiters of all enimies and can not be ruled by any one; they rule over all.

75. Either in Heaven or earth there is none to equal them; they are above all the Heavenly Rishis and Charanas of the three worlds.

76. All the Gods and creatures come after them; they are properly speaking the main stay of the whole world.

77—78. Let Karna, the son of Vikartan, who is foremost of men and who is a brave warrior, attain the best region and let him be like the Vasus or Maruts; let him be adored in heaven with Bhima and Drona, but let the two Krishnas be victorious.

79. When those two greatest of Gods (Brahma and Icana) said so the God with thousand eyes respectfully bowed to their words and himself said to other creatures.

80. You hear what the two Gods say for the good of the whole world and it must surely be so and not otherwise; so rest assured.

81. O my lord king, hearing Indra say these words all creatures admired and praised that deity.

82. The inhabitants of heaven then sounded their horns and showered many sorts of sweet scented flowers.

83. And actually all the Gods, Danavas and Gandharvas waited anxiously to see that unrivalled duel between those two men of leonine prowess.

84. O monarch, both the cars, ridden by Karna and Arjuna, had grey steeds attached to them and their wheels rattled loudly as they careered with beautiful banners on their tops.

85. Many brave warriors came near Vasudeva and Arjuna and also near Calya and Karna and sounded their conchs.

86. Then began that fight which struck terror into the hearts of cowards and like Sakra and Samvara the warriors rushed fiercely against each other.

87. Like the planets Rahu and Ketu appearing in the sky at the time of the destruction of the whole world the banners of those two heroes looked very brilliant and beautiful.

88. The elephant's rope on Karna's standard which was very strong and decked with jewels and precious stones resembled a poisonous snake and the bow of Indra in beauty (as it fluttered).

89. The great ape of Partha, opening its fearful and broad jaws, struck terror in to the hearts of all and became difficult to look at like the sun.

90—91. The ape, on the banner of Gandiva, being willing to fight all on a sudden, left his place, lept upon Karna's banner like Gadura swooping down upon a snake and began to tear the elephant rope standard ficercely with its nails, and teeth.

92. The elephant's rope, which was strong as iron and adorned with strings of small bells, which resembled the fatal noose (of Yama), becoming wrathful pressed against the ape.

93. Thus in that terrible duel between those two great warriors and which was the result of their match game in dice, their banners first fought with each other and the horses of the one neighed at the horses of the other.

94. Keshava, whose eyes were like lotuses, looked towards Calya with piercing glances who returned them in the like manner.

95. By his stern looks Vasudeva conquered Salya and Dhananjaya the son of Kunti conquered Karna.

96—97. Then Suta's son with a smile asked Salya "O friend, tell me the truth what would you do if I am killed to day by Partha"; and Salya answered "if thou art killed I myself will put an and to both Krishna and Dhananjaya".

98. The king of Madras again said "O Karna, if you are to day killed by this grey-horsed Arjuna I alone on a single car will put both Madhava and Phalgoona to death."

99. Arjuna also asked Govinda the same question and Krishna spoke to Partha these words having deep meaning.

100. O Dhananjaya, the sun may come down and be displaced, the earth itself may be crushed with a thousand pieces, the fire may become cold but Karna will never kill thee.

101. But if it so happens you must know that revolution of the world is near and as for myself I will send both Salya and Karna to the Pluto's den with my army.

102. Arjuna, who was ape-bannered, hearing these words smiled and told Krishna whose prowess was inexhaustible.

103—104. O Janarddana, Calya and Karna both together is no match to me and today O Krishna, you will see how I destroy Karna with Calya, his banners, car, horses, his umbrella, his armour, his bows and arrows all together with my shafts in the battle.

105. As the elephant, with his tusks, rends into pieces a tree in a forest so I will this day crush him with armour, his car, horses, arrows and other weapons into atoms.

106. O Madhava, the day of widowhood for the wives of Radha's son is very near and surely they must have dreamt of the coming evil last night.

107—108. Surely you will today see Karna's wives will become widows. I cannot check my rage when I think of evils done to us by this (thoughtless) fool when Krishna was taken forcibly before the assembly and he used abusive language to us and laughed.

109.—As the furious elephant destroys a tree with all its blossoms and flowers in anger so O Govinda, I will knock him down today.

110. Today after Karna is no more, O Slayer of Madhu, you will hear those pleasant words,—i.e.—By good fortune, O you of Vrishin's race, you have conquered.

111. Today you shall be able to console the mother of Abhimanyu with a free conscience by pay back the debt of the enemies in their own coin and also joyfully soothe your maternal aunt Kunti.

112. O Madhava, today you shall be able to comfort Krishna, on whose face drops of tears are always trickling down and to speak pleasant sweet words to King Yudhisthira the just.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. It was really a wonderful sight to see the skies covered with Gods, Nagas, Asuras, Yakshas, and numbers of Gandharvas, Rakshashas, Apsaras, Royal and regenerate Rishis and birds of most beautiful plumage.

2. All the human beings looked and admired the scene in the sky which was filled with the echoes of songs, music, laughter, sacred hymns, dance and many other sorts of beautiful sounds.

3. Then the warriors on both the Kaurava and Pandava sides went on slaying each other's enemies making the world and the ten sides ring with their martial music, notes of their conchs, loud shouts and noise of their warfare.

4. The field of battle became brilliantly red with blood and abounded with men, horses, elephants, cars and weapons and became difficult for the throwing of swords, maces, darts and other weapons and was filled with dead bodies and looked like the fight that in the old days took place between the Gods and the Asuras.

5. When Dhananjaya and Adhiratha's son had begun to defeat the warriors with their arrows, they, with keen shafts, almost covered all the sides.

6. Darkness fell over the atmosphere, with the shafts shot at in that battle, and the warriors on either side could not see anything. And being afraid they took shelter of either of the car warriors (Karna or Arjuna) like streaks of light going towards the sun or the moon.

7. The two brave warriors thwarted one another's weapons, like the East and West winds struggling with each other and looked brilliant like the sun or the moon after dispelling darkness.

8. They assuring their troops with the words "dont give way" were surrounded by their troops and their inimical forces like Vasava and Samvara by the Gods and the Asuras.

9. O Bharata, those two foremost of men were welcomed by the beating of drums and other instruments and uttered loud shouts and looked resplendant as the sun and the moon when surrounded by deep roaring clouds.

10. Both of them were armed with fearful bows drawn to the fullest extent like circles which looked like coronas, shot thousands of shafts which were like rays.

11. In war they could not be borne and looked like two powerful suns risen for destroying the universe at the end of Yuga. Both unconquerable, both destroyers of enemies and they were bent upon killing one other and showing great skil in war.

12. Those two fighters namely Karna and the son of Pandu bravely assailed each other in that awful fight like Indra and Asura Jamba; and invoking the help of most powerful weapons those two redoubtable bowmen shot fearful arrows against each other.

13. O Monarch, the two foremost of men however shot hosts of elephants, horses and, men and also struck one another; and like the smaller animals when attacked by a lion the Kurus and Pandus together with their horses, elephants and car warriors fled on all directions being assailed by those two best of men.

14. Then the five great car warriors viz., Duryodhana, the King of Bhojas, Suvala's son Kripa and the son of Sarad vata attacked Dhananjaya and Keshava with deadly arrows.

15—17. Dhananjaya with arrows cut off at once elephants, horses, the bows and quivers, the cars with their drivers of those fighters and struck every one of them with good arrows and Suta's son with twelve shafts. Then one hundred chariots, one hundred elephants and Caka, Sukhara and Yavana Cavalry together with some best of Kamvoja warriors precipitated themselves upon Arjuna inorder to slay him but he (Arjuna) very soon not only cut off with rozor-headed shafts all those weapons of his enemies but also their heads, their elephants, cars and horses. Dhananjaya knocked down his enemies in battle.

18. Then the good Gods sounded their heavenly drums in praise of Arjuna.

19. Then heaps of sweet scented flowers fell upon Arjuna. O Monarch, the Gods, men and all the creatures were struck with wonder at seeing this.

20. Only your son and Suta's son, who were sorry in their minds, felt neither any joy nor admired the deed. Then Drona's son taking Duryodhana by the hands entreatingly said to him.

21. O Duryodhana, be pacified; you need not prolong this quarrel; make peace with Pandavas; war is detestable. The preceptor (Drona) who was like Bramha and was master of most powerful weapons he and other foremost of men with Bhisma have been killed in this war.

22. I and my maternal uncle can not be killed; and if I request Dhananjaya he will object to fighting and Janarddan also is averse to this quarrel. Reign as a joint monarch with the sons of Pandu over this kingdom far long.

23. Yudhisthira always seeks the welfare of all creatures. Vrikodara and the twins (Nakul and Sahadeva) are always under Yudhisthira's order; and if you make peace it would appear that you make it only for the welfare of all parties.

24. All the kings then will return to their respective homes and the troops will no longer fight with each other; if you do not hear my advice you will have to repent hearafter when you will be crushed by your enemies.

25. It will be hard for the slayer of Vala (Indra) or Yama or Prachetas or the famous king of Yakshas to perform the heroic feats that have been done by crown-headed Arjuna single handed. You yourself and the whole world have seen that.

26. Dhananjaya is possessed of immense qualities and will never disobey my words. He will be your ally i.e., respect you. O, Monarch, for the good of the world, be pacified.

27. I am your sincere friend and you always respect me, and it is for that reason that I am speaking these words to you; and if you make up your mind for peace, I shall dissuade Karna.

28. The sages have said there are four kinds of friends, namely, those who are born friends, those that are made friends by good behavior, those that are made so by wealth and those that are made friends by power and you have all these advantages and connections with the Pandavas.

29. O you most powerful, the Pandavas are your friends by nature and make them your permanent friends by making peace. O king of kings, you both agree and make peace.

30. Duryodhana thought for a while when those words were spoken to him by his friends, and with sorrowful heart heaving a deep sigh, said "O friend, you have said your say, now hear what I have got to speak to that.

31—32. As the might of the storm is checked by the mountain of Meru so Arjuna wont be able to cope with Karna in battle, and the sons of Pritha cannot possibly have any confidence in me for the many acts of wilful enemity I have done to them.

33. O you glorious man, O preceptor's son, it is not meet for you to disuade Karna from fighting, for Phalgoona is greatly tired to-day and Karna will kill him in no time.

34. Saying these words humbly again and again to Drona's son, your son commanded his army, saying, "Armed with shafts proceed against the enemies and kill them; why are you standing inactive?"

CHAPTE LXXXIX.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the blare of conchs and sound of bugles became very high in the battle-field, those two, Suta's son Vaikartana and Arjuna mounted on white horses, closed each other, O king, on account of the vile policy of your son.

2. Those two dreadful heroes Dhananjaya and Adhiratha's son encountered each other like two Himalayan elephants with full-grown tusks, madly fighting for a she-elephant.

3. Those two warriors, with bows twanging loudly and sending forth hosts of shafts and the palms of their hands also producing great sounds when shooting them and their car-wheels making rattling, encountered each other like the collision of two heavy masses of clouds or two mountains.

4. Those two great warriors fell upon and struck one another with many powerful weapons resembling two mountains of towering height having many trees, herbs and creepers upon them and inhabited by various animals, rushing against each other.

5. The fight between those two great warriors became so terrible that it resembled the war between the king of heaven and the son of Virvahana in the days of old—it was impossible for other persons to bear up in such a fight and a river of blood flowed there, ghastly to look at; the limbs of both the warriors were badly cut in many places as also their drivers and horses.

6. Those two cars, fitted with broad banners, when nearing each other, looked like two large lakes full of fishes and tortoises, and many kinds of lotuses floating on its waters which was gently moved by the wind and resounding with the sweet voices of diverse kinds of birds.

7. Both of them, mighty as the God Indra, assailed one another with weapons powerful as Indra's thunder and fought also like Indra himself and (Asura) Vritra.

8. Both the armies abounding in cars, horses, elephants, foot adorned with fine mail, vestments and weapons as also those that were in the skies (the gods) were all struck with terror in seeing that extraordinary fight between Karna and Arjuna.

9. When Arjuna precipitated himsesf upon the son of Adhiratha like one furious elephant rushing against another with the intention of killing him, others out of excitement and joy uttered lion-like roars and raised their cloths shaking them fingers.

10. The Somakas called loudly to Partha, "Go haste and slay Karna and by that put an end to the hope of Dhritarastra's son for the empire."

11. In the same way many of our warriors went to Karna and said: "Kill Arjuna with your sharp arrows and let the sons of Pritha go again to the wilderness for good."

12. Then Karna struck Arjuua with the powerful arrows and Arjuna also shot sharp arrows with great force against Karna's chest in return.

13. Thinking to take advantage of each other's weak points with buoyant spirits they repeatedly attacked each other with great fierceness and hacked and wounded one another with may good winged arrows, in that terrible fight.

14. The fierce warrior Arjuna then rubbed his bow-string with his arm and sent hosts of cloth yard shafts and arrows called Nalikas i.e., shafts headed with boar's ears and razors and Angalikas i.e, half moon-shaped arrows.

15. As at night-fall the birds for the purpose of resting during the night enter a tree, so O Monarch, Partha's arrows after entering Karna's car with bent heads spread on all sides.

16. But O King, all those arrows and the successive ones, shot by Arjuna, that scorcher of enemies, with angry look and contracted brow, were all destroyed by Karna by his own shafts.

17. The son of Indra (Arjuna) then sent against Karna such a brilliant and fiery weapon that it lighted up the whole world, the skies, the ten sides and also his own body and covered the very course of the sun with its brilliancy and was capable of killing all enemies.

18. The dresses of warriors caught fire and they fled making great noise like that which is heard when a bamboo forest catches fire.

19. The Suta's son, the brave Karna, seeing now that fiery weapon was burning everything, shot the Varuna weapon and extinguished the fire.

20. Huge masses of clouds instantly covered the sides with darkness; they resembled big mountains and poured heavy showers upon the earth.

21. The earth and the skies were covered by the clouds and that awful conflagration was extinguished in no time.

22. All the sides being covered by those clouds became very dark and nothing could be seen, but Arjuna with the vairy weapons dispersed those clouds.

23. Then the invisible Dhananjay, inspiring the Gandiva, its string and the shafts with mantras, invoked a favorite weapon of the king of Heaven and powerful like his thunder.

24. Then many sharp arrows namely the Anjalikas, i.e., razor-headed shafts and crescent like and Nalikas and cloth-yard arrows and those adonred with the boar's ears all very powerful and sharp, came out in numbers from the Gandiva with force.

25—26. Those powerful and sharp arrows, adorned with feathers like vulture quickly piercing the body, car, horses, earth and wheels, of Karna, entered into the earth even as the snakes enter when afraid of Garuda; and thus being struck on all sides and bathed in blood Karna in anger rolled his eyes.

27. Then bending the strong stringed bow, the twang of which resembled the deep roar of the sea, he invoked the Bhargava weapon and cut off all the shots coming out of the mouth of the Indra weapon (shot by Arjuna).

28. He thus cut off the weapons of his enemy, many of the cars, elephants and foot soldiers of the Pandava army by virtue of the Bhargava weapon, himself not being able to bear the prowess of Arjuna in that battle.

29. That best of men, Suta's son of great energy, smiling at the two Krishnas, struck the chief men among the Panchals with aimed arrows.

30. O Monarch, the Panchals and the Somakas being thus attacked by Karna, fired up with anger and conjointly began to strike Suta's son with arrows from all sides.

31. Then Suta's son cut off with his own arrows the shots of the Panchals and distressed the cars, elephants and horses of the Panchals.

32. Like powerful elephants when killed by a mighty and angry lion, they fell down dead on the earth with loud noise being struck by those shafts of Karna.

33. Having thus slain the choicest warriors of the Panchals, those strong and brave and proud warriors, Karna, O King, when shooting his shafts resembled a mass of clouds when pouring down showers.

34. Then, O Head of the Kuru race, your warriors, thinking that Karna had gained the day and brought the two Krishnas under subjection, began to clap and gave vent to lion-like roars.

35. They saw the power of the great hero Karna, overpower the enemies and his weapon to baffle all those of Dhananjaya in that fight.

36. The son of Wind God, the wrathful Bhimsena, with eyes kindling with rage, pressed his own hands and drawing heavy breaths, and greatly excited addressed Arjuna, of never-failing aim.

37. How is it that this most irreligious scoundrel could slay so many good Panchal warriors before your very face.

38. The very gods and Kalakeyas were not able to vanquish you before this; why, you fought with Sthanu himself hand to hand. O diadem-adorned Arjuna, how is it that Suta's son has been able to pierce your with ten long arrows that are used by car warriors.

39—40. I wonder how Suta's son has been able to penetrate the arrows shot by you, O, Savyasachin; remember the distasteful, sharp and cutting jokes, this bold and wretched Suta's son uttered towards us and called us sessame seeds not having anything within them and think over the sorrows of Krishna and soon put an end to the life of this scoundrel in to-days's battle, for you should not be any more careless about killing this Karna.

41. Do you remember how you have conquered all creatures and have satisfied the hunger of Agni in the Khandava and with that patience i.e., (resembling yourself) kill Suta's son. I will also knock him down with my mace.

42. Then Vasudeva seeing that Partha's shafts were being frustrated by Karna, addressed him (Arjuna).

43. How is this O Kiritin, that your weapons are being baffled by Karna. O brave warrior, why are you looking like one confounded. Dont you see the Kauravas, behind Karna, are all uttering loud shouts of joy—beholding your weapons made useless by those of Karna.

44. This day kill Karna with the same energy that you have shown yuga after yuga in killing persons possessed of dark weapons and fierce Rakshasas and the boon-proud Asuras in battle.

45. Concentrating all your might cut off the head of your enemy with this Sudarshana of razor-like keen edge which I am giving to you, like Cakra who cut off the head of Namuchi, his enemy with thunder.

46. You have even satisfied the great god Mahadeva (in battle) when he was disguised as a hunter; recovering the same patience, O hero, kill this son of Suta and his followers.

47. By that you will restore to the king Yudhisthira the sea-belted earth with its towns, villages and wealth and remove all his enemies from the face of the Earth and by that you will gain great fame.

48. Thus roused by Bhima and Janardan Partha, of great prowess, internally remembered himself and for what he had come to the world and addressed Keshava and said.

49. Now I will invoke a powerful and terrible weapon for the benefit of the world and slaughter of Suta's son; let me have your permission as also of Brahma's and Bhava's as well of all persons who have acquired the Brahmajnana.

50. Addressing these words to Keshava Savyasachin, of unfathomable soul, bowing to Brahma, then brought forth into action that unbearable and choice weapon called, Brahma which could only be used after great concentration of the mind.

51. But thwarting that weapon Karna looked handsome like the raining clouds and went on sending showers of shafts.

52—53. In that fight seeing that weapon of Kiritin waisted by Karna the powerful and wrathful Bhimasena, firing up with anger, thus addressed Arjuna of never failing aim:—"O Savyasachin, you are master of the noble Brahma weapon, the great means of destroying enemies.

54. Do thou, O Savyasachin, shoot the same sort of weapon again and again." And thus being asked by his brother, Savyasachin shot another like the one he used before and by that the energetic Partha covered all the cardinal and subsidiary points of ten compass.

55. The arrows, coming out of the Gandiva, resembled terrible snakes or the un's rays and the foremost of the Bharata ace also shot hundreds and hundreds of hem adorned with gold wings.

56—57. They were brilliant as the yuga fire or the sun's rays and in no time covered Karna's car whence also came forth hundreds of long darts, battle-axes and cloth yard shafts of fearful shape and killed many warriors of the opposite party by cutting off their heads.

58. One fell to the ground out of fear seeing another fall; the third's arm, powerful and large as an elephan trunk, was cut down with the sword still held in clasp.

59—60. The left arm, of a fourth with the shield grasped being severed by razor-headed shaft, fell to the ground, and thus Partha, who was adorned with crown and garlands, killed and wounded all the best warriors of Duryodhana's army by his awful and dreadful arrows; Vaikartana (Karna) also sped in return thousands of arrows in that fight.

61. Those arrows came down upon the son of Pandu with hissing noise like a downpour of rain from the clouds. Then Karna of great prowess having struck Bhimsena, Janardana and Arjuna of crowned head, with three shafts which gave vent to loud and fearful roars.

62. Then the diadem-adorned (Arjuna) beholding Bhimsena and Janarddana thus struck and himself being also pierced lost all patience and again shot eighteen shafts.

63. Piercing Susena with one, Calya with four and Karna with three, he with the other ten slew Sovapati (a Kanrada prince) who was cased in a golden armour.

64. That prince fell down dead from the front of his car, bereft of his head, arms, his steeds and banner like a Sala tree hewed down with the axe.

65. Again striking Karna with three, eight, twelve, four and ten shafts he put four hundred armed elephants and eight hundred car-warriars to death.

66. He also killed one thousand horses with their riders and eight thousand powerful infantry with his fleet arrows. So covered Karna, his car, horses, driver and standard that they all became invisible.

67. Then the Kauravas being thus distressed by Dhananjay began to call loudly the son of Adhiratha from all sides and said:—"Do you display your weapons and slay this son of Pandu or he will with his shafts put on end to the whole Kuru army."

68. Thus requested, Karna began to try his utmost and sent hosts of blood thirsty arrows that were capable of piercing the very core of the heart and thereby killed many of the Pandavas and Panchals.

69. In this way those two choicest of of archers, the two most powerful warriors who could face and bear against all enemies, and who were masters of all sorts of weapons, fearful to look at, went on striking each other and others that were fighting against them with their mighty weapons.

70. After the broken blades have been drawn out of his body and his wounds healed by mantras and herbs prescribed by best surgeons who were friendly to him King Yudhisthira, cased in armour of gold, came to the spot to see the fight between Karna and Arjuna.

71. Like the brilliant full moon coming out of Rahu's grasp all the creatures were greatly delighted to see the virtuous king Yudhisthira in the battle field.

72. All the gods in heaven and persons of the earth, checking the animals they were riding upon, waited calmly to see the issue of the fight between those two great heroes, Karna and Partha, who were the choicest of warriors and sorchers of enemies.

73. O monarch, both Dhananjaya and Adhiratha's son went on striking each other with well-aimed shafts which made a great whizing noise; and also the sounds made by the bows, bowstrings and the palms of the hands of those two brave warriors rose very loud.

74. At last tha string of the bow of the son of Pandu being drawn with great might suddenly snaped with a great noise; in the meantime the son of Suta struck Partha with hundred small arrows adorned with feathers.

75. Then with sixty sharp arrows that were like snakes set at liberty from sloughs and were slippery as if they were dipped in oil, he pierced Vasudeva; on this the Somaka troops rushed towards that place.

76. As in the sky the sun is covered by the clouds, so they, coming forward, shrouded Karna with their shafts but the son of Suta, well versed in the use of weapons, worsted the approaching warriors and covered them by his own shafts.

77. O Monarch! Suta's son thus killed all their horses, cars and elephants and distressed many of their best warriors by his own shafts,

78. As a whole pack of powerful dogs is destroyed by an angry lion of great prowess so those warriors fell down dead on earth with loud noise, their bodies pierced by the arrows of the mighty Karna.

79. During this cessation of fight between Karna and Dhananjaya, many of the strong and great Panchal warriors became deprived of their lives by the well directed shafts of Karna; and others began to fly.

80. Then your troops, believing that Karna has brought Krishna and Arjuna under subjection, thought the great victory to theirs and loudly clapped their hands and gave vent to roars like that of a lion.

81. Then Partha, though badly mangled by many arrows, became filled with rage and bending his bowstring soon cut off the shafts of the son of Adhiratha and again attached the Kauravas in the battle.

82. Then the diadem-adorned Arjuna, pressing his bowstring with the palm of his hand, covered the world with darkness by innumerable shafts and also struck Karna, Salya and other Kaurava warriors with them.

83. By those arrows of great swiftness the sky became so dark that even the birds could not take their flights; and gentle and sweet-scented wind began to blow, as if sent by the Heavenly father.

84. Then, smiling, Partha shot with great force ten shafts against Calya's armour and struck Karna first with twelve and then with another seven arrows.

85. Karna, being thus mangled by winged shafts of great impetuosity from Partha's bow, his limbs pierced and blood streaming down his body, resembled the bloody Rudra sporting in the midst of a crematorium at the time of destruction.

86. Then the son of Adhiratha struck Dhananjaya, who was looking like the king of Heaven (Indra) with three arrows and shot five other burning shafts like snakes for the purpose of killing Krishna.

87. Those well-directed and mighty shafts, winged with gold, after piercing the armour of that noblest of human beings, entered the earth and having bathed (in the waters of Bhogavati) again returned towards Karna.

88. Dhananjaya then with ten well-aimed and flat edged shats, cut each of them into three pieces and thus those five great snakes (friends of the Acwasena the son of Taksha) fell to the earth.

89. Then seeing the body of Krishna pained by those snakes in the forms of shafts from Karna's hands, Arjuna, who was adorned with crown and garland, burnt with anger like fire kindled with very grass.

90. He, then drawing the string to his ears, shot many burning and deadly arrows thereby striking Karna in all his vital points, but Karna of great patience, though, he felt very painful, kept his face summoning all his courage.

91. O monarch, Dhananjaya, becoming angry, by his arrows covered all the sides of Karna's car; even the rays of the sun became invisible and the sky looked hazy as in a frosty day.

92—93. O monarch, Savyasachin, the greatest of warriors, and foremest of the Kuru race, in that fight soon destroyed two thousand great Kuru warriors who were protecting the wings and car wheels of Karna and formed his van and rear guards, with all elephants, cars, and horses; they were the selec. portion of Duryodhana's car warriors and were fighting bravely under his orders.

94. Then the remnants of the Kaurava army with your son fled on all directions leaving Karna and even the wounded father and son fled leaving each other in the field.

95. But the great warrior Karna, O King, seeing himself abandoned on all sides and left alone, was not at all afraid but pushed on against Arjuna with a brave heart, and with energy.

CHAPTER XC.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. The broken Kaurava army, when melting away out of fear as wrathful Arjuna began his shots but halted and looked back from a distance at Arjuna's blazing weapon which resembled lightning and was coursing on all sides with increasing energy.

2. Then Karna swallowed up (destroyed) that weapon when it was flying on the sky and which Arjuna had sped with great force for the purpose of putting an end to his enemy in that fearful contest with a downpour of his own fearful arrows.

3. Drawing his loud-twanging bow the string of which was very strong, Karna, by gold winged arrows, destroyed Arjuna's weapon of increasing energy which was killing the Kurus and shot many other shafts.

4. He then, with that mighty weapon he had received from Rama, which was vested with the Atharvan rite, worsted that firy weapon of Arjuna and also struck Partha with many other sharp arrows.

5. O king, then the fight between Arjuna and the son of Adhiratha assumed a fearful aspect and like two elephants attacking each other with their tusks, they went on hitting each other with shafts.

6. Then Partha and Karna shot such incessant showers of arrows that all the sides became dark and even Sun could not be seen; the whole sky was spread over with them and there was no loop hole to be seen.

7. The Kauravas and Somakas only saw a broad net-work of arrows and nothing could be seen through the great darkness caused by them.

8. O monarch, those two best of men well versed in the use of weapons, when continually aiming and shooting hosts of arrows showed may beautiful feats and strategems.

9. In that fight between them sometimes the Suta's son excelled over his foe and sometimes the crown-adorned Partha excelled over his antagonist in might, weapons and light-handedness.

10. The other warriors were struck with wonder in seeing that fearful combat between those great warriors who were always trying to take advantage of each other's failings (weak points).

11. The creatures of heaven, O monarch, praised Karna and Arjuna, and being satisfied called out loudly "Bravo Karna, Bravo Arjuna."

12. At that time when this awful fight was raging and the earth was oppressed by the heavy pressure of car-wheels and tread of elephants and horses, the snake Acwasena, who was Arjuna's enemy, was residing in the subterranean region.

13. O king, that brave snake, who escaped when the Khandava was burnt and who entered the subterranean region, now remembering the death of his mother and the hostile feelings he cherished towards Arjuna, came up with great force to the sky being capable of flying into the sky to see the fight between Karna and Arjuna.

14. And believing, O Monarch, this to be the just time for avenging himself upon the wicked (in his opinion) Partha he assumed the shape of an arrow and entered quickly into Karna's quiver.

15. Karna and Partha now covered the whole sky with showers of arrows; not even a little space was left and it looked like a brilliant and thick net-work of shafts.

16. All the Kauravas and Somakas were filled with fear seeing that great net-work of arrows; and nothing could be seen through the darkness made by that net, on account of the dropping of arrows.

17. Beholding those two heroes the foremost of men and greatest of archers tired in war,

18. The handsome Apsaras in Heaven fanned them with new and fine fans and sprinkled sweet scented sandal water upon them; and Cakra and Surya with their own hands cleansed the faces of those two brave warriors.

19. Then when he found that he could not excel Partha in fight but was rather badly pained and wounded instead, Karna thought of the snake weapon that was only left in his quiver.

20. He put on the string that fearful, burning, snake-mouthed, sharp, well-polished and death-dealing weapon which he had long kept concealed for the purpose of killing Partha.

21. Karna, drawing his bow-string to the full stretch, put on it, and aimed at Partha that fiery and mighty shaft that was lying in a quiver of gold filled with sandal dust and which was always worshipped.

22. The arrow belonged to the Airavata race and the sky and all the ten sides became lighted; and fearful meteors and lightning strokes fell as he aimed that arrow for the purpose of striking Phalgoona's head.

24. The son of Suta was not aware that the snake (Acwasena) had entered his arrow by means of yoga, but as he aimed that arrow, Cakra and other Regents of the sides gave vent to lamentations.

24. The noble ruler of Madras, seeing Vaikartana aim that shaft, spoke to Karna and said, "O Karna, think well before you shoot this arrow; it will not reach Arjuna's neck."

25. The energetic son of Suta, with wrathful look, told the king of Madras, "O Shalya, Karna never takes his aim twice; with warriors like us it must always be fair play in fight."

26. O Monarch, speaking the words, 'Thou art killed, O Phalgoona," he, desirous of victory, with care let go that arrow which for many years he had cherished with regard.

27. That fiery arrow, of awful sound and shinning like the sun, shot off from Karna's bow, lighted up and divided the sky as a woman divides her crown when combing her hairs.

28. Madhava, the slayer of Kansa, seeing that fiery weapon rise in the sky, with his foot quickly pressed down that beautiful car one cubit deep in the earth.

29. The horses, white as silvery moon beams, adorned with gold trappings, with bent knees fell flat to the ground.

30. That mighty and best of men bringing his strength into action put down the car and the horses with bent knees stretched themselves to the earth and the car sunk into it.

31. The heavenly creatures greatly praised Vasudeva; they gave vent to lion-like shouts and dropped flowery showers upon Krishna when the slayer of Madhu thus pressed the car into the earth by his might.

32—34. By dint of that arrow, on account of its snaky nature and energy and wrath with which it was discharged the charioteer's son struck down from Arjuna's head the beautiful diadem known all over the earth, heaven and the watery region. The powerful Brahma had made this head-dress for the king of gods himself, with gold and pearls, endued with the effulgence of the sun, moon or planets. It was given by Indra himself to Partha when the latter killed his enemies.

35. It was so strong that even Rudra, the king of waters, Cakra and Kuvera could not smash it by their respective weapons, Pinaka, noose, thunder or other mighty shafts; the very gods could not bear it but it was now taken away by that snaky weapon.

36. That fearful false wicked, but energetic snake, of awful shape, attacked that beautiful crown adorned with stones and diamonds and took it away from Arjuna's head.

37. O Monarch, the snake, by its own prowess, snatched from Partha's head that beautiful ornament of good shape set with precious stones and diamonds, very brilliant to look at and crushed it to pieces as the thunder breaks down mountain tops adorned with fine trees and flowers.

38. As the sun, in setting, goes down from the Asta Hills with all the lustre so that handsome, brilliant, adorned diadem of Partha came down to the earth smashed to pieces and burning with that snake's poison.

39. As the head of a mountain decorrated beautifully with high trees, birds and flowers is smashed by thunder so that snake, by his might, tore asunder that gemmed crown from Arjuna's head.

40. O Bharata, as during a storm a great noise is heard through out the Earth, sky, Heaven and the waters, so was the sound heard throughout the world at that time and all the people, though they tried to remain steady, became greatly afraid and stumbled.

41. The dark young man, Dhananjaya, bereft of his crown, looked beautiful like a mountain without top and being not at all afraid stood his ground after binding his hairs with a white cloth.

42. Crushing down his crown that precious arrow, effulgent like the sun or fire, shot by Karna, the great serpent, who was rendered by Arjuna his enemy, went away.

43. Having burnt the effulgent and variegated crown shinning on Arjuna's

(head) the arrow wanted to enter again into its quiver; but accosted by Karna it said,

44. "O Karna, you discharged me without seeing me and hence I could not cut off his head. Shoot me again immediately in battle after seeing me and I shall slay your enemies as well as mine."

45. Thus addressed in the battle-field Suta's son said "who are you of such a terrific form?" The Naga said "Know me as one whom Partha has made his enemy by killing my mother.

46. Even if the weilder of thunder-bolt (Indra) protects him, he will go to the kingdom of the Pitris. Do not disregard me. Do what I say and I will kill your enemy. Shoot me soon."

Karna said:—

47. "Karna does not wish victory today in battle depending on another's strength. I shall not discharge, O Naga, a shaft twice even if I am to kill a hundred Arjunas."

48. Addressing again that Naga in the battle-field that best of Sun's sons said "By the help of my other weapons and by dint of my energy and wrath I shall kill Parth. Go you away at ease."

49. Thus aadressed by Karna in the battle-field and unable to bear his words in anger that fierce Naga King, proceeded himself for the destruction of Partha, assuming the form of an arrow.

50. Thereupon Krishna said to Partha in the battle-field "kill the great snake whom you have made an enemy." Thus spoken to by the slayer of Madhu, the holder of Gandiva bow, ever holding a dreadful bow to his enemies, said "who is this Naga who, of his own accord, comes against me as if into the mouth of Garuda.

51. Krishna said:—While armed with a bow you were gratifying the fire-god in Khandava forest—this snake, having his body covered by his mother's, was in the sky. You killed his mother taking her for a single snake.

52. Remembering that hostility, O Partha, he has come to-day for slaying you. O grinder of enemies, see he is coming like a burning fire-brand dropped from the sky.

Sanjaya said:—

53. Thereupon covering the snake with six sharpened arrows Jishnu cut him off while he was moving in the sky. His body cut off he dropped down on earth.

54. After that serpent had been cut off by Kiritin, the Purusothama himself, O King, of huge arms, raised that car from the earth with his own hands.

55. In that very moment, Karna, looking askance on Dananjaya, struck that foremost of men with ten arrows whetted on stone and adorned with peacock feathers.

56-57. Then Dhananjaya struck Karna with twelve keen and boar-eared arrows and a powerful Naracha like a virulent snake shot off his full-drawn bow. Those arrows went though Karna's armour, as if drinking his blood and killing him, and entered into the earth with their wings soaked with blood.

58—59. Then Brisha, angered at the stroke of arrow like a scotched snake, discharged most powerful and quick-coursing shafts like a serpent vomitting poison, He struck Janarddana with twelve and Arjuna with nine arrows. And striking the latter again with a dreadful arrow Karna laughed.

60. Pandu's son could bear his joy Then that one, of Indra's power, acquainted with all the vitals parts, cut him to the quick with a hundred winged arrows as did Indra wound Bala with great force.

61. Then Arjuna shot ninety arrows each resembling Yama's rod at Karna. Wounded greatly Karna trembled like a mountain clapped by a thunder-bolt.

62. Karna's head dress, set with costly. gems, his most excellent other ornaments and ear rings were struk down on earth by Arjuna's winged arrows.

63. Pandu's son cut off in no time into pieces the costly and shinning armour of Karna that had been prepared with great care by clever artists working for a long time.

64. Then he again, in anger, struck Karna with four sharp and strong arrows who was devested of his armour. He trembled, thereat, like a person suffering from bile, wind, phlegm and fever.

65. Arjuna again cut Karna to the quick with many excellent and keen arrows shot off his circling bow with force, care and skill.

66. Thus wounded by Partha with many keen and powerful arrows Karna looked like a red chalk mountain with streams of red water pouring down.

67. Then with straight-going, strong, gold-feathered steel arrows resembling the rod of death, Arjuna struck Karna on the breast like Agni's son striking the mount Krouncha.

68. Then throwing off his bow that resembled Indra's bow and quiver Karna stood inactive and stupified, suffering great pain and losing his grasp.

69. The honorable Arjuna, always following the duties of a heroe, did not like to kill him in that plight. Then Indra's younger brother respectfully said "why do you make a mistake, O Pandu's son ?

70. The wise never spare their enemies even for a moment, however weak they may be. A learned man always acquires merit and glory by destroying his distressed enemies.

71. Lose no time in discomfitting your enemy Karna immediately who is the foremost of heroes. When all right he will again proceed against you. Kill him therefore like Indra destroying the Asura Namuchi."

72. In pursuance of Krishna's order and worshipping him the Kuru heroe Arjuna again struck Karna with many powerful arrows like Indra striking the Asura Shamvara.

73. Then Kiritin, O descendant of Bharata, covered Karna, his car and horses with calf-toothed arrows and the ten quarters with gold winged ones.

74. Wounded with those calf-toothed arrows the broad-chested son of Adiratha shone like a blossoming Asoka, Palasa or Salmali tree or a mountain laden with sandal trees.

75. His body covered with numberless arrows Karna shone like the mountain-chief covered with trees or adorned with blossoming Karnikaras.

76. Discharging numberless arrows Karna, having shafts for his rays, looked like the crimson-coloured sun coursing towards the setting hill.

77. Meeting in the sky the shining and snake-like arrows discharged by Karna, those keen ones, shot by Arjuna, destroyed them.

78. Recovering equanimity of mind and discharging arrows like angry serpents, Karna struck Arjuna with ten and Krishna with six all resembling angry snakes.

79. Then in that great battle Dhananjaya wished to discharge a dreadful, great steel arrow, like a serpent or fire in force and sending forth a sound like that of Indra's thunderbolt.

80. Then on the arrival of the hour of Karna's death Kala invisibly appeared on his car and reminding him of the Brahmana's curse said "The earth is devouring the wheel of your car."

81. Really, O King, when the hour of Karna's death approached he forgot the great Brahma weapon which Bhargava had given him. And the Earth was about to devour the left wheel of his car.

82. Having gone deep into the earth and been clogged there like a holy tree with flowers standing on a high land, Karna's car, on account of the great Brahmana's imprecation, reeled.

83. When his car began to reel, when the great weapon given by Rama did not shine, when his serpent-faced shaft was broken by Partha, Karna was filled with sadness.

84. Unable to bear those misfortunes he shook his arms and vilified virtue saying "The virtuous always say that virtue protects the virtuous.

85. We, however, always practice virtue to the best of our knowledge and power. But virtue, instead of protecting us, is now destroying us who are its votaries."

87. While he gave vent to these words he was greatly assailed by Arjuna's shafts. His horses and charioteer were dislodged. He was cut to the quick and became careless about his doings. He again and again spoke ill of virtue in the battle-field.

88. He struck Krishna's arm with three dreadful arrows, and Arjuna with seven. Arjuna then discharged seventeen dreadful, straight-coursing and forcible arrows effulgent like fire and resembling Indra's thunder-bolt in impetuosity.

89. Those powerful and dreadful arrows went through Karna's body and dropped on the surface of the earth. Trembling thereat Karna showed his activity to the very best of his power.

90. Controlling himself with great exertion he brought the Brahma weapon into requisition beholding which Arjuna invoked the weapon given him by Indra with becoming mantras.

91. Then inspiring his Gandiva, its strings and arrows with mantras that repressor of enemies discharged arrows like Indra pouring down torrents of rain.

92. Coming out of Arjuna's car those powerful and terrefic arrows appeared near Karna's. That great car-warrior baffled those arrows which appeared before him.

93. Seeing the arrows thus baffled, Krishna said to Arjuna :—" Discharge more powerful weapons, O Partha ; Karna makes these your arrows powerless."

94. Then duly invoking it with mantras Arjuna set the Brahma weapon on his string. Then covering all the directions with arrows he struck Karna with many.

95. Then with a number of whetted arrows of great power Karna sundered the string of Arjuna's bow for five times.

96. Similarly his string was cut off by Vrishna for the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth and eleventh times. Although capable of discharging hundreds of arrow Karna knew that Arjuna had a century of strings.

97. Then setting another string to his bow and shooting innumerable shafts, Arjuna covered Karna with arrows resembly fiery-mouthed serpents.

98. So quickly did Arjuna replace his strings that Karna could not perceive when one was broken and another replaced. The feat was highly wonderful to him.

99. Radha's son, however, nullified all the arrows of Savyasachin. With his power he got better of Arjuna for the time being.

100. Seeing Arjuna thus assailed with Karna's arrows Krishna said to him "Go nearer to Karna and strike him with more powerful weapons."

101. Worked up with anger Arjuna invoked the aid of another celestial weapon with mantras which was effulgent like fire, dreadful like venom and hard like adamant.

102. Then uniting it with Raudra weapon he was about to hurl it at his enemy when the earth swallowed up one of the wheels of Karna's car.

103. Then getting down in no time from his car he caught the sunken wheel with two hands and set forth a mighty exertion to extricate it.

104. Drawn up forcibly by Karna, the Earth, that had swallowed up his wheel, rose up with her seven insular continents, mountains, rivers and forests to a height of four cubits.

105. Seeing his wheel thus sunk, Karna wept in anger. And seeing Arjuna before him, he, worked up with anger, said.

106. "O Partha, wait for a moment till I extricate my wheel.

107. Seeing my wheel thus accidently sunken you should give up your idea which is cherished by a coward only.

108—109. Brave and pious heroes never shoot their arrows at persons with dishevelld hairs, at those who fly away from the battle-field, at a Brahmana, at him who claspes his hands, at him who surrenders, at him who prays for quarter, at one who throws off his weapon, at one whose arrows are all gone, or at one whose weapon has fallen off or been broken.

110—111. You are the bravest and pious of all in the world. You know all the rules at warfare. Pray, excuse me for a moment till I get out my wheel from the earth, O Dhananjaya. You are stationed on your car and I am standing helplessly weak on the earth. You should not kill me now.

112. Neither Krishna, nor you fear me the least. You are a Kshatrya and the scion of an illustrious family. Remembering the dictates of virtue, excuse me for a moment, O son of Pandu."

CHAPTER XCI.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then Krishna, who was on the car said to Karna:—"Fortunate it is, O son o Radha, that you remember virtue. It is always seen that men, when they are in distress, speak ill of the Providence and not of their own evil deeds.

2. You, Duryodhana, Dushasana and Suvala's son Shakuni, brought Draupadi, clad in one piece of cloth, before the court. Then O Karna, this virtue of yours, did not display itself.

3. When Shakuni, a clever hand at dice, defeated Kunti's son Yudhisthira who was innocent of the game where was this virtue of yours?

4. When at your advice the Kuru king attempted to kill Bhima through snakes and poisoned food where was this virtue of yours?

5. When the period of exile and the thirteenth year (of concealment) was over and you did not return the Pandavas their kingdom where was this virtue of yours?

6. When you set fire to the wax-house at Varanavata for burning the sleeping Pandavas to death where was this virtue of yours?

7. When you laughed at Draupadi while she, spare dressed and in her season, stood before the court at Dushasana's will where was this virtue of yours?

9. When you spoke to the Princess Draupadi, of dignified elephantine gait, "O Draupadi, the Pandavas are lost into eternal hell, choose another husband" and looked on the scene with glee where was this virtue of yours?

10. When thirsting for the kingdom and relying on the king of Gandharas you invited the Pandavas to a game at dice where was this virtue of yours?

11. When encircling the boy Abhimanyu in battle a number of powerful car-warriors killed him where was the virtue of yours?

12. If this your virtue, the aid of which you now solicit, was no where on all those occasions what is the use of drying up your tongue by uttering that word? You now wish to practise virtue, O Suta, but you shall not escape with your life.

13. Like Nala who was vanquished by Pushkara at a game of dice, but who regained his kingdom by dint of his power, the Pandavas, who are free from cupidity, will regain their kingdom by the force of their arms and help of their friends.

14. Having killed their powerful enemies they with the Somakas will regain their kingdom. The sons of Dhritarashtra will be killed by those best of men who are always sheilded by virtues.

15. Thus accosted by Krishna, O descendant of Bharata, Karna hung down his head in shame and made no reply.

16. With lips trembling in anger, he, of great energy and prowess, took up his bow and began to fight with Arjuna.

17. Then Vasudeva's son said to Phalguna, that best of men;——"Strike Karna down with a celestial weapon."

18. Thus accosted by the deity Arjuna was worked up with anger. And recollecting all the incidents Dhananjaya was possessed by a terrific rage.

19. Then, O king, as if scintillations of fire began to come out from the pores of the angry Partha's body. The scene was exceedingly wondrous.

20. Seeing it Karna invoked the Brahma weapon, shot arrows on Dhananjaya and tried once more to get rid of his car.

21. Partha, also, by his Brahma weapon made a down pour of arrows upon Karna. Counteracting the arrows of his enemy with those of his own Pandu's son continued to strike him.

22. Then aiming at Karna Kunti's son discharged another favourite weapon of his powerful as the fire.

23. Karna, however, put out that fire with Varuna (watery) weapon. Suta's son covered all the directions with clouds created by his arrow and it appeared like a rainy day.

24. Then before the very presence of Karna, the powerful son of Pandu scattered those clouds with his Vayavya weapon.

25. Then for killing the son of Pandu, the charioteer's son took up another dreadful arrow shining like the fire.

26. When that arrow was set on the bow-string, O king, the earth shook with her mountains, watery expanses, and forests.

27. Violent winds blew scattering pebles. All the directions were covered with dust and cries of lamentation arose amongst the celestials in the sky.

28. Seeing that arrow aimed by Karna, the Pandavas were worked with depression and sorrow.

29. The keen arrow, effulgent like Shakra's thunder-bolt shot off Karna's hands, fell upon Dhananjaya's breast and went into it like a serpent penetrating an ant-hill.

30. Thus wounded that chastiser of enemies, the high-souled Vibhatsu began to reel. His grasp became loosened and his bow Gandiva dropped off his hands. He shook there like the king of mountain in an earth-quake.

31. During this opportunity the great car-warrior Vrisha leaped down from his chariot to extricate the wheel that had been sunk underneath the earth. Holding it with his two hands he tried his best to get it out. But unfortunately for his bad luck he failed through he was possessed of great strength.

32. In the interval regaining his consciousness the diadem-decked and the high-sould Arjuna took his arrow Anjalika which was fatal as the rod of Death. Thereupon Krishna said to Partha;—"Cut off with this arrow the head of your enemy before he gets upon his car."

33. Praising highly those words of Lord Krishna and while the wheel of his enemy was still under the earth the great car-warrior Arjuna took up a highly effulgent, razor-headed arrow and struck down Karna's standard bearing the emblem of an elephant and shining like the spotless sun.

34. That standard bearing the elephant was decorated with gold, pearls, gems and diamonds and was made with great skill by the best of artizans. It was highly beautiful and made of pure gold.

35. That standard always used to inpire your soldiers with courage and fill your enemies with fear. Its form was highly praiseworthy. Known all over the world it was effulgent like the suu.

36. With that kneen, gold-winged razor, headed arrow effulgent like fire, fed with libations of clarified butter the diadem-decked Arjuna cut off that standard of Adhiratha's son, the great car-warrior.

37. With that standard fell the glory, pride, hope of success, and every thing dear unto the hearts of the Kurus. And cries of lamentations arose in your army.

38. Seeing that standard struck down by the light-handed Kuru heroe your soldiers gave up all hopes of Karna's success.

39. Then wishing to kill Karna quickly Arjuna took out from his quiver an Anjalika arrow that was effulgent like Indra's thunder-bolt, Agni's rod or the thousand-rayed sun.

40. Capable of cutting to the quick, covered with flesh and blood, effulgent like the sun or fire, made of precious ingredients, straight-coursing, impetuous, destructive of men, horses and elephants it was three cubits and six feet in length.

41. Powerful as the thousand-eyed Indra's thunder-bolt, irresistible as the night rangers, the trident or the discus it was highly terrible and capable of destroying all creatures.

42. Partha cheerfully took up that arrow which could not be withstood even by the celestials. This great weapon, capable of discomfitting the celestials and Asuras, was always adored by the sons of Pandu.

43. Seeing that arrow taken up by Partha in battle, the entire universe trembled with its mobile and immobile creations. Beholding that arrow about to be discharged the Rishis cried aloud "Peace be to the universe."

44. The holder of the Gandiva then set that peerless arrow on his bow united with another highly powerful weapon. Then drawing his Gandiva bow he said,

45. "If I have ever practised penances, if I have ever respected my elders and listened to the counsels of well-wishers let this arrow be powerful enough to destroy the body and heart of my enemy.

46. Let this sharp arrow, adored by me, slay my enemy Karna." Saying this Dhananjaya discharged the arrow for destroying Karna.

47. It was a terrific arrow, efficacious as a rite of the Atharvan of Angiras, effulgent and incapable of being borne by Death himself in battle. Desirous of slaying Karna Partha again cheerfully said "May this arrow bring on my victory. May it, effulgent like the fire or sun, shot by me, despatch Karna to the abode of Death."

48. Saying this, Arjuna, adorned with crown and garlands, ever inimical towards Karna and desirous of killing him, struck his enemy with that best of arrows, effulgent like the sun or moon and capable of giving victory.

49. Discharged by that mighty heroe that arrow, effulgent like the sun, emblazoned all the quarters. With that arrow Arjuna struck off his enemy's head like Indra striking the head of Vritra with his thunder.

50. With that powerful Anjalika weapon inspired with mantras Indra's son cut off the head of Vaikartana in the afternoon.

51. Thus sundered with Anjalika arrow Karna's trunk dropped down on earth.

52. The head also of the commander of the Kuru army, effulgent like the risen sun and the meridian sun of the autumn, dropped down on earth like the crimson sun falling down from the setting hill.

53. Cut off with Arjuna's arrows and shorn of life the tall and shining body of Karna, with blood gushing out of every wound, looked like the summit of a red chalk mount clapped by a thunder-bolt with red streams running down after a shower.

54. Then a light came out of Karna's body, passed though the sky and entered into the sun.* This wonderful spectacle was witnessed by all the on-lookers after Karna's fall.

55. The head of the illustrious Karna reluctantly left the body, highly beautiful and brought up in luxury like a person unwillingly leaving a big house filled with riches.

56. Then seeing Karna slain by Phalguna the Pandavas blew their conchs. Likewise Krishna and Dhananjaya, overflowing with joy, blew their conchs.

57. Seeing Karna slain and lying on the battle-field the Somakas were filled the joy and sent up loud shouts with other soldiers. With great joy they struck their trumphets and shook their arms and garments.

58. Then, O king, approaching Partha, all the warriors began to praise him; other powerful heroes danced embracing each other; and others sending loud shouts said "By good luck Karna has lain prostrate on earth wounded with arrows."

59. Karna's head, separated off the body, looked like a mountain top loosened by a storm or like fire put out after the completion of a sacrifice, or the sun after it has risen the setting hill.

60. After having scorched his enemy's army the Karna-like sun, having arrows for its rays, was caused to be set by Arjuna time.

61. As while moving towards the setting hill the sun withdraws all its rays so (Arjuna's) arrow passed out taking Karna's vital breaths.

62. In the afternoon cut off with Anjalika in battle the head of the charioteer's son dropped down on earth.

63. Before the very presence of the Kaurava troops that weapon speedily took away Karna's head and body.

64. Beholding the brave Karna prostrated on earth wounded with shafts and bathed in blood the king of Madras left the battle field on the car deprived of the standard.

65. After Karna's fall the Kuru soldiers, wounded with arrows and filled with fear, took to their heels looking again and again on the lofty and shining standard of Arjuna.

66. The beautiful head, having a countenance like a loutus of a thousand petals, of Karna, whose exploits like those of the thousand eyed Indra, dropped down on earth like the thousand-rayed sun in the end of day.

CHAPTER XCII.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Seeing the soldiers assailed with shafts in that encounter between Karna and Arjuna, Salya, worked up with anger, pursued on that car shorn of its equipments.

2. Seeing his army deprived of Karna and his cars, horses and elephants destroyed Duryodhana, with tears trickling down his eyes, sighed again and again in agony.

3. For seeing the brave Karna, wounded with shafts and bathed in blood lying prostrate on earth like the sun dropped from the sky the warriors came there and stood encircling the fallen heroe.

4. Amongst them, belonging to your army as well as to the enemy's some showed signs of joy, some of fear, some of sorrow, some of wonder and some of grief.

5. Hearing that the mighty Karna had been slain by Dhananjaya and his armour, ornaments, robes and weapons had been displaced, your soldiers fled away in fight like a herd of kine, overcome with fear at losing their bull.

6. Then shaking the sky with terrible shouts Bhima began to strike his arm-pits, jump and dance striking terror to the sons of Dhristarastra.

7. The Somakas and Srinjayas also loudly blew their conchs. Seeing the charioteer's son killed all the Kshatryas embraced one another in delight.

8. After a dreadful fight Karna was killed by Arjuna as an elephant is slain by a lion. The best of men Arjuna thus did wreck his vengeance.

9. Approaching Duryodhana speedily on that car devested of standard the king of Madras, with an aggrieved heart, said sorrowfully.

10. "The elephants, horses and the flowers of your army have been killed. On account of those great car-warriors, horses and elephants, huge as mountains being destroyed your army looks like kingdom of Death.

11. Never before, O descendant of Bharata, such a battle had been fought as that between Karna and Arjuna. Karna assailed the two Krishnas and your other enemies.

12. Destiny however is in favour of Partha; she is protecting the Pandavas, and destroying us. Many heroes, who were resolved upon encompassing your end, have been per force killed by the enemy.

13—14. Many heroes resembling Kuvera, Yama, Vasava or Varuna in energy, courage and strength, who were accomplished, unslayable and bent upon securing your object, have been killed by the Pandavas. Do not grieve, O descendant of Bharata. It is destiny. Every object is not always crowned with success."

15. Hearing the words of the king of Madras and remembering his own misdeeds, Duryodhana, deprived of senses, sighed again and again.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. How did Kuru and Srinjaya army look, when on that dreadful day, it was assailed and consumed with arrows in that encounter between Karna and Arjuna and while it was flying from the action.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Listen, attentively, O king, to the onslaught of men, horses and elephants in that dreadful battle.

3. When after Karna's fall Partha sent up leonine war-cries your sons were possessed by a mighty fear.

4. After Karna's fall no warrior of your side had a heart of rallying your troops or displaying his prowess.

5. On their main stay being destroyed by Arjuna they were like merchants, whose vessels had been wrecked on the deep main, desirous of crossing it.

6. After the destruction of the charioteer's son, the Kauravas, terrified and wounded with arrows, having no lord and seeking refuge, looked like a herd of elephants pursued by lions.

7. Discomfitted by Savyaschin on that evening they took to their heels like bulls with broken horns or serpents with wounded fangs.

8. Having the best of their heroes killed, their soldiers all routed, and themselves wounded with sharp arrows your sons, on the fall of Karna, fled away in fear.

9. Deprived of their coats of mail and weapons, unconscious of the right direction and bewildered they crushed one another in their flight and cast fearful looks upon one another.

10. The Kauravas, pale with fear, thought "Vibhatsa is following me, Vrikodara is pursing me" and fell down as they fled.

11. Thus fled away in fear all the great car-warriors some on cars, some on horses, some on elephants and some on foot.

12. In their fearful fight cars were shattered by elephants, the cavarly were crushed by car-warriors, and the infantry were trampled down by horses.

13. After the fall of Karna your warriors behaved like men, having no protector in a forest abounding in beasts of prey and robbers.

14. They behaved like elephants without riders and men without arms. Stricken with fear they thought that the entire universe was filled with Partha.

15. Seeing them thus take to their heels in fear of Bhimasena, and his soldiers leave the battle field by thousands, Duryodhana, bewailing, said to his driver.

16. "Partha will not be able to go beyond me standing bow in hand. Drive my horses slowly behind all the troops.

17. If I fight in the rear of my army forsooth the son of Kunti will not be able to approach me as the ocean is unable to go beyond its banks.

18. Killing Arjuna, Govinda, the haughty Vrikodara and my other enemies I will repay the debt I owe to Karna."

19. Hearing the words of the Kuru Chief becoming a heroe and an honorable man the driver slowly drove his horses adorned with golden trappings.

20. Then deprived of cars, cavalry and elephants, twenty-five thousand warriors of your army addressed themselves for fighting on foot.

21. Then worked up with anger Bhimasena and Prisata's son Dhristadyumna encircled them with four kinds of forces and began to strike them with their arrows.

22. Your warriors also fought with Bhimasena and Prisata's son. Some of them challenged both the heroes by calling them by name.

23. Thereat Bhima was worked up with anger. Coming down from his car with a mace in his hand he fought with those warriors standing for battle.

24. Following the rules of a fair fight, Kunti's son Vrikodara alighted from his car, and depending upon the strength of his own arms he began to fight with them on foot.

25. Taking up his heavy golden mace he made a havoc on them like Death himself armed with his bludgeon.

26. Then worked up with anger and heedless of their lives the Kuru soldiers rushed upon Bhima like insects falling upon a burning fire.

27. The maddened warriors, whom it was difficult to vanquish in battle, perished in no time like creatures on seeing Death himself.

28. Armed with his mace the powerful Bhima moved about like a hawk and killed those twenty five thousand warriors.

29. Having killed that heroic army Bhima, of great strength, whom it was difficult to defeat in battle, stood there with Dhristadyumna before him.

30. The energetic Dhananjaya proceeded against the remaining car warriors of the Kuru army.

31. Nakula, Sahadeva and Satyaki with great pleasure proceeded against Sakuni and killed the soldiers of Suvala's son.

32. Having killed with sharp arrows his cavalry and elephents they attacked

Sakuni himself upon which a great encounter took place.

33. In the meantime proceeding against your car-warriors Dhananjaya twanged his bow Gandiva known all over the three worlds.

34. Seeing his car drawn by white horses and driven by Krishna himself and Arjuna standing on it your soldiers fled away in fear.

35. Twenty-five thousand foot soldiers, deprived of cars, were killed there with arrows (by Bhima and Dhristadyumna).

36—37. Having killed them that best of men, the foremost of car-warriors, the heroic son of Panchala king Dhristadyumna again appeared in view with Bhima before him. That great bowman, the destroyer of his enemies, looked there exceedingly beautiful.

38. Seeing Dhristadyumna's car, drawn by horses white as pigeons and bearing a standard made of a Kavidara tree the Kuru soldiers fled away in dismay.

39. Having pursued the light-handed king of Gandharvas the illustrious twins and Satyaki again appeared (amongst the Pandavas.)

40. Having killed your 'huge army Chikitan, Shikhandin and the five sons of Draupadi blew their conchs.

41. Although they saw] your soldiers flying away from the battle-field those heroes pursued them like bulls pursuing other angry bulls.

42. Still seeing a portion of your army standing for battle Savyasachin was filled with anger.

43. Drawing his bow Gandiva known all over the three worlds the highly energetic Dhananjaya rushed against your car-warriors.

44. All on a sudden he covered your soldiers with arrows. The dust covered the directions and nothing was descernible.

45. When the earth was thus covered with dust and all the quarters were enshrouded with darkness your soldiers, O king, fled away on all sides in dismay.

46. When his army was thus routed your son, the Kuru king, rushed against his enemies who were proceeding against him.

47. Duryodhana then challenged all the Pandavas in battle as did the Asura Bali the celestials in the days of yore.

48. Thereat all the' Pandava warriors rushed in a body upon Duryodhana, hurled various weapons and chastised him again and again.

49. Worked up with anger, however, Duryodhana killed his enemies, in hundreds and thousands with keen arrows.

50. Wonderful was the prowess your son exhibited on that occsion for alone and with none to help him he fought with all the Pandavas in a body.

51. Duryodhana then saw that all his soldiers were assailed with wounds and about to flee but they had not gone very far from the scene of action.

52. Rallying his soldiers, and cheering them up your son, who was bent upon keeping his honor, said.

53. There is no spot on earth or on mountain, I see, where if you go the Pandavas will not kill you. What is the use of your flying away ?

54. The Pandava army is very small now. The two Krishnas have been assailed with wounds. If we all stand for battle we will surely win victory.

55. If we however fly away disconcerted the sinsul Pandavas will pursue us and kill us all. It is better therefore that we should die in battle.

56. Happy is the death in the battle-field. Follow your Kshatriya duties and fight. The dead know no misery. They however enjoy eternal bliss hereafter.

57. Listen therefore, O Kshatriyas who have assembled here. While death does not spare a heroe or a coward what foolish Kshatriya is there who would not fight ?

58. Will you place yourselves under the power of our enemy Bhima? It is not proper that you should neglect the duties followed by your fathers and grand-fathers.

59. There is no sin greater to a Kshatrya than flight from the battle-field. There is no more blessed road to heaven than battle ; killed in battle therefore, O Kshatriyas, enjoy heaven in no time.

60. Though your son gave vent to those words the Kuru soldiers greatly wounded fled away on all sides caring not for his speech.

CHAPTER XCIV.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA.)—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing your son busy about rallying your soldiers the king of Madras, beside himself with grief, said.

Shalya said:—

2—3. Look at this dreadful scene of action, O heroe, covered with numberless killed men, horses and elephants. Some places are covered with carcasses of huge mountain-like elephants, maimed and their vital parts wounded with shafts. The armours, weapons, shields and swords of the lifeless warriors are lying on all sides. They resemble huge mountains clapped with thunder, with trees, rocks and herbs dropping down from them on all sides.

4. The bells, hooks, lances and standards with which these huge animals, were equipped have been scattered on the ground. The bodies, which were adorned with golden trappings, are now covered with blood. Some places are covered with the carcasses of killed horses, mangled with arrows, breathing hard in agony and vomitting blood.

5. Some of them are crying in agony, some of them are biting the earth with rolling eyes, and some are neighing piteously. A part of the battle-field is covered with elephant warriors and horsemen thrown off their animals and car-warriors forcibly knocked down from their cars.

6. Some of them are already and others are on the point of death. Covered with the dead bodies of men, horses and elephants their trunks and limbs and broken cars, the Earth looks awful like the great Vaitarini.

7. The Earth looks awful covered with elephants with shattered tusks, vomitting blood, crying piteously in anguish in the battle-fund, deprived of their armourless drivers and the infantry that protected them, with their quivers, banners and standards broken down and having their bodies that were adorned with nets of gold, wounded deep with the arrows of the enemy.

8. Covered with the dead bodies of elephant warriors, horsemen and car-warriors of great repute and of foot soldiers killed while combating with one another, divested of armours, ornaments and weapons the Earth looked like the sky covered with clouds.

9. Strewn with the heads and bodies of thousands of heroes wounded with arrows, all deprived of consciousness but some drawing vitality slowing, the Earth appeared to have been covered with extinguished fires.

10. Covered with the dead bodies of Kuru and Srinjaya warriors wounded with arrows and killed by Karna and Arjuna the Earth appeared as if covered with shining planets dropped from the sky or looked like the sky bespangled with stars in the night.

11. Cutting through the bodies of elephants, horses and men and putting out their vitality the arrows discharged by Karna and Arjuna entered into the earth like serpents entering into their holes with bent heads.

12. The entire field was blackened with carcasses, corpses, broken cars and arrows shot by Partha and Karna.

13—14. Well equipt cars were crushed by their arrows along with the warriors, weapons and standards. Their wheels, joints, axles, yokes, Trivenus, Upaskaras, Amikarsanas, the seats of the drivers and the fixtures of quivers were all broken into pieces. Covered with all these the Earth looked like the sky covered with autumnal clouds.

15. Riderless cars were dragged by quick-coursing horses. Men, elephants, and horses fled away in no time. And the army was thus completely routed.

16. The battle-field was strewn with maces, battle-axes, lances, clubs, mallets, unsheathed swords and maces covered with cloth of gold.

17—20. It was covered with gold decked bows, gold-winged arrows, bright and unsheathed swords of good metal, lances, scimitars shining like gold, umbrellas, fans, conchs, armours, painted with beautiful flowers of gold, trappings of elephants, standards, car-fences, crowns, necklaces, yalk tails, garlands of corals and pearls, chaplets, ornaments for the wrist and upper arms, golden collars for the neck, various precious diamonds, jems and pearls, beautiful moon-like heads and bodies brought up in luxury.

21. Leaving behind their mortal coils, luxurious pleasures and dresses, acquiring glory by proving faithful to the duties of their caste they have gone with glory to the region of bliss.

22. "Retreat Duryodhana. Let your troops retire. O king, run on to your camp. The sun is going down. Remember O king, that you are the root of all this."

23. Addressing these words to Duryodhana, Salya, with an aggrieved heart, stopped. Duryodhana too, greatly moved and beside himself with sorrow, with tears running down his eyes, wept for the charioteer's son crying "O Karna, O Karna!"

24. Consoling Duryodhana again and again all the kings headed by Drona's son returned to their camp looking repeatedly on Arjuna's standard that was resplendant with his glory.

25—26. Beholding the earth that was saturated with blood coming out of the bodies of men, elephants and horses as if she were a courtezan clad in sable garments and golden ornaments, the Kouravas, who were bent upon going to the other world and who could not be recognized on account of their faces being covered with blood, could not stand there in that critical moment.

27. Worked up with sorrow on account of Karna's destruction they all bewailed crying "Alas Karna! Alas!" Then seeing the sun assume crimson colour they all returned to their camps.

28. Although killed and wounded with gold-winged arrows, whetted on stone and adorned with blood-dyed feathers, shot off the Gandiva, the heroic Karna lying on earth looked like the sun of bright rays.

29. Having touched with his rays Karna's body bathed in blood, and assumed a crimson appearance on account of grief the great sun, ever kind to his votaries, proceeded to the other ocean for bathing.

30. Thinking thus the host of gods and Rishis left the scene of action for their respective habitations. Other creatures also wended their way, as they liked, either for the celestial region or for the earth.

31. Having witnessed that wondrous encounter between Karna and Arjuna which struck terror unto all living creatures the leading Kuru heroes stricken with wonder and speaking highly (of the feat) proceeded (to their quarters.)

32. Although his coat of mail had been shattered with arrows, although he had been killed in that dreadful fight the beauty of his countenance did not forsake Radha's son even when dead.

33. Every one saw that the body of the heroe resembled burning gold. It appeared to have been instinct with life and looked effulgent like the sun or fire.

34. Seeing the charioteer's son lying dead on the field of battle all the warriors were stricken with fear like other animals at the sight of a lion.

35. Although dead that best of men seemed ready to issue commands. Nothing was changed in that great heroe dead.

36. Wearing a beautiful apparel and possessing a charming neck Karna's face looked resplendent like the full moon.

37. Bedecked with various ornaments, and golden Angadas, Vaikartana, albeit slain, lay on earth like a huge tree embellished with branches and twigs.

38. There lay that best of men like a mass of pure gold or blazing fire extinguished with the water of Arjuna's arrows.

39. As a blazing fire is quenched by water so Karna fire was extinguished by the Partha-like cloud in that battle.

40. Having made a downpour of arrows and burnt the ten cardinal points that best of men with his sons was destroyed by Partha. He left the world but took away with him his fame which he had won on earth by fair fight.

41—42. Having scorched the Pandavas with the fire of his weapons, having made a down-pour of arrows and consumed the hostile armies and heated the world like the thousand rayed sun Vaikartana left the world with his sons and followers.

43. Thus perished the heroe who was an all-giving tree unto the bird-like suitors. Begged by them he always said "I give" and never "I have not."

44. The virtuous always knew him to be pious. Such was Vrisha who died in a single combat. His wealth was always given to the Brahmanas. There was nothing not even his life which he could not make over to the Brahmanas.

45. He was a darling of men, generous and a great car-warrior. Such a high-minded man met with death.

46. Thus repaired to the celestial region the heroe depending upon whom your son made enemies taking with him the hope of success and joy of the Kouravas.

47. The rivers were calm when Karna fell. The sun set with pale colour. Burning like fire or the sun, Soma's son Mercury moved askance through the sky.

48. The sky was cut into two pieces. The earth roared loudly. All the points of compass, covered with smoke, were as if set on fire. The oceans were agitated and roared terribly.

49. There shook the mountains with their forests and all the creatures were pained. Assailing the constellation Rohini the planet Jupiter looked like the moon or the sun.

50. At Karna's death all the minor points of compass were ablaze. The sky was enshrouded with darkness. The Earth shook. Burning meteors dropped. The Rakshasas and other night rangers were filled with joy.

51. When with his razor-shaped arrows Arjuna cut off Karna's head having a moon-like countenance all the denizens of heaven, sky and earth sent forth cries of Oh and Alas !

52. Having killed his enemy Karna, adored of the celestials, men and Gandharvas Arjuna shone in his energy like the thousand-eyed deity after the destruction of Vritra.

53—55. Then mounting their chariot the rattle of which was like the muttering of clouds, whose bright colour was like the mid-day sun of autumn, which was decorated with flags and standards, which was white in colour like the snow, the moon, the conch or crystal, whose horses were like those of Indra, those two foremost of men Krishna and Arjuna, who were energetic like great Indra himself who were embellished with gold, pearls, gems, diamonds and corals and who were effulgent like fire or the sun, moved on the battle-field with great force like Vishnu and Indra seated on the same car.

56—57. Divesting per force the enemy of his splendour by the twang of the Gandiva bow and the striking of palms, and destroying the Kurus with arrows the ape-bannered Arjuna and Garuda-bannered Krishna, gifted with measureless prowess, those two best of men joyfully took up, with their hands, their snow white conchs sending forth loud peals, adorned with gold and blew them simultaneously striking terror unto the hearts of their enemies.

58. The sounds of Panchajanya and Devadatta filled the earth, the sky and heaven.

59. At the blare of Madhava's conch as well as that of Arjuna's all the Kauravas, O king, were stricken with fear.

60. Resounding the woods, mountains, rivers and cardinal points with the blare of their conchs and filling up your soldiers with terror those two foremost of men gladdened Yudhisthira.

61. No sooner the Kauravas heard the the blare of the conchs than they speedily left the battle-field leaving behind them the king of Madras and the Bharata chief Duryodhana.

62. Then all the creatures in a body congratulated Dhananjaya who was shining in the battle-field and Janarddana, those two foremost of men who were like two risen suns.

63. Pierced with Karna's arrows those two repressors of foes shone like the bright moon of many rays and the sun after dispelling darkness.

64. Then leaving off those arrows those two great heroes of incomparable prowess, encircled by their well-wishers and friends, returned to their camp like the Lords Indra and Vishnu.

65. After Karna had been killed in that dreadful encounter, the celestials, Gandharvas, men, Charanas, Rishis, Yakshas and Nagas respectfully offered adorations to Krishna and Arjuna and wished them success.

66. Having received all their friends with due honor and been praised by them for their heroic deeds those heroes enjoyed in the company of their friends like the king of gods and Vishnu after the destruction of Bali.

CHAPTER XCV.

(KARNABADHA PARVA)—contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. On Karna being slain, all the Kauravas, stricken with fear, fled away in all directions looking vacantly.

2. Hearing that the heroic Karna had been killed by his enemy your soldiers, overcome with fear, fled away on all sides.

3. Then the Kuru leaders anxiously desired to rally your troops and your son also tried to cheek their flight.

4. Encircled by the remaining portion of the Narayana troops Kritavarma speedily proceeded to his camp.

5. Seeing Adhiratha's son killed Shakuni surrounded by a thousand Ghandarvas, quickly returned to his camp.

6. Encircled by a large elephant force resembling a mass of clouds Saradwata's son Kripa quickly went towards his camp.

7. Sighing heavily at the success of the Pandavas, the brave Ashwathama quickly went to his camp.

8. Encircled by the remaining portion of the Samsaptakas which was still a large army, Susarma, looking at the terror-stricken soldiers, went away.

9. Deprived of every thing, and his heart heavily laden with sorrow and afflicted by painful thoughts king Duryodhana went away.

10. Having his standard broken and looking on all sides, Salya, the best of car-warriors, returned to his camp.

11. Assailed with fear and shame and beside themselves with grief the remaining car warriors of the Bharata army, still a large number, fled away.

12. Seeing Karna slain all the Kuru soldiers, trembling and with their voice suppressed with tears, fled away precepituously in fear.

13. The great car-warriors of the Kuru army fled away in fear some praising Karna and others Arjuna.

14. Amongst the many thousand warriors of your army there was not a single individual who had any desire for fighting.

15. Upon the destruction of Karna, O king, the Kurus gave up all hopes of their lives, kingdom, wives and riches.

16. Worked up with sorrow your son decided to give them rest for the night.

17. Obeying his orders, O king, the great car-warriors, bending low their heads, left the battle-field depressed and with pale countenances.

CHAPTER XCVI.

(KARNA-BADHA PARVA)—contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the destruction of Karna and the flight of the Kuru soldiers Krishna, embracing Partha in delight, said,

2. Vritra was killed by the holder of thunder-bolt and Karna has been killed by you. They will simultaneously talk of the destruction of Vritra and Karna.

3. Vritra was killed by Indra with thunder and Karna has been killed by you with bow and keen arrows.

4. Proceed, O Kunti's son, and describe to the righteous king Yudhisthira your power capable of earning fame for you and which is known in the worlds.

5. Having given an account of the death of Karna, for which you had been trying for many years, to the virtuous king Yudhisthira, you will be freed from your debt to him.

6. While you were fighting with Karna Dharma's son came here for witnessing the battle.

7. Wounded deep with arrows he could not stay in the battle-field and that best of men returned to his tent.

8. Partha acquiesed in the request of the Yadu chief who then cheerfully turned his car.

9. Having thus accosted Arjuna Krishna addressed the soldiers, saying :—" Blessings unto you all. Stand, confronting the enemies carefully."

10. He then said to Dhristadyumna, Yudhamanyu, the twin sons of Madri, Vrikodara and Yuyudhana.

11. " Stand you all here carefully, O kings, till we come back having communicated to the king the destruction of Karna by Arjuna."

12. Having been thus permitted by those warriors he started for the camp of the King. Govind, then, with Partha, saw Yudhisthira.

13. Seeing them cheerful and with great wounds on their persons Yudhishthira thought that the son of Radha was dead and speedily got up from his seat.

14. Having got up from his seat that repressor of his enemies, the king of mighty arms, again and again locked Arjuna and Krishna in his loving embraces. Then he asked Krishna about particulars (of Karna's death).

15. Then the sweet-speeched son of Vasudeva, the scion of the Yadu race, described Karna's death exactly in every detail.

16. Joining his hands and addressing Yudhisthira, whose enemies had been killed, Krishna alias Achyuta, smilingly said.

17—18. " By good fortune, the holder of the Gandiva bow, Pandu's son Vrikodara, yourself and the two sons of Madri are all safe from this heroe-destroying and hair-stirring battle. Do what should next be done, O son of Pandu. The powerful son of the charioteer alias Vaikartana has been killed.

19. By good luck, O king of kings, you have achieved victory, and by good fortune, you have gained over others, O son of Pandu.

20. The Earth is drinking to day the blood of the charioteer's son, the wretch of a man who had laughed at Draupadi won at the game of dice.

21. Wounded all over with arrows, your enemy, O foremost of Kurus, is lying prostrate on the naked Earth. Look at that best of men mangled with arrows.

22. O Heroe, rule now vigilantly the earth shorn of your enemies and enjoy with us all pleasures of life."

23. Hearing the words of the great Keshava Yudhisthira cheerfully adored him in return and repeatedly said " Good luck ! Good luck !"

24. " It is no wonder, O mighty-armed son of Devaki, that having yourself for his charioteer Partha should perform those super-human feats."

25. Then taking hold of Keshava's irght arm bedecked with Angadâs and addressing him and Arjuna the righteous son of Pritha said.

26. "Narada told me that you two are the two foremost of divine Rishis Nara and Narayana ever engaged in maintaining virtue.

27. The highly intelligent and blessed Krishna Dwaipayana Vyasa has also recounted to me several times this divine history.

28. By your help, O Krishna, this son of Pandu, Dhananjaya, has defeated his enemies, without ever retreating from the battle-field.

29. Since you have condescended to drive Partha's chariot we are sure to win victory and not defeat."

30—31. Having said this the impartial king Yudhisthira, that foremost of men, got upon his chariot. It was adorned with gold and drawn by horses having black and ivory white tails and quick-coursing like mind. And talking pleasantly with Krishna and Arjuna he started, surrounded by his troops for seeing the battle-field teeming with many incidents.

32. While talking with those two heroes Madhava and Phalguna the king saw Karna, the foremost of men, lying on the battle-field.

33. The king saw Karna pierced all over with shafts like a Kadamva flower with straight filaments shooting up all over.

34. He saw Karna lighted up by a thousand of golden lamps filled with scented oil.

35—36. Having seen Karna and his son killed and wounded with arrows shot off the Gandiva Yudhisthira looked again and again at them before he could believe his eyes. He then praised Krishna and Arjuna saying,

37. "Having got you, highly wise as you are, as my lord and protector, I am O Govinda, the king of earth with my brothers.

38—42. Hearing of the destruction of the haughty son of Radha the wicked son of Dhritarastra will give up all hopes of his life and kingdom. By your favour, O foremost of men, we have achieved our object. By good luck, you have won victory, O Govinda. By good luck, the enemy has been killed and by good luck the holder of the Gandiva bow has been crowned with success. Thirteen years we have spent in misery and vigilance. By thy favour we will now sleep peacefully in night."

In this way the king praised Janarddana and Arjuna.

43. Seeing Karna and his son slain with arrows Yudhisthira considered himself as if born anew.

44. Overflowing with joy all the car-warriors of the Pandava army approached Yudhisthira and delighted him.

45—46. After the death of the charioteer's son, Nakula, Sahadeva, Bhima, the great Vrishni car-warrior Satyaki, Dhristadyumna, Shikhandi, Panchalas, Srinjayas and other Pandava warriors adored the son of Kunti.

47-49. First speaking highly of Pandu's son Yudhisthira, those heroes, who always took delight in battle, disirous of victory and of sureness of aim, eulogised the two Krishnas. These great car-warriors delightedly returned to their camps. Thus took place the dreadful, hair-stirring onslaught on account of your vile policy. Why do you grieve for it now.

50. Hearing that evil news the Kuru king Dhritarastra fell down all on a sudden on the ground from his seat.

51. The far-seing queen Ghandhari too fell down. And she bewailed for the destruction of Karna in battle.

52. Vidura and Sanjaya then raised up the king and consoled him. The Kuru ladies also raised up Gandhari.

54. Thinking destiny to be all powerful the Royal Rishi lost his senses under the weight of grief.

55. His heart pining with sorrow and anxiety the king did not swoon away again. And consoled by them he sat silent indulging in melancholy reveries.

56. He who reads the account of this great encounter between Karna and Partha, like unto a great sacrifice, and he who hears it read, both reap the fruits of a great sacrifice duly performed.

57. The learned hold that the eternae Vishnu, Agni, Vayu, Soma and Surya is sacrifice. He who will therefore here recitl these Parvans will attain to every blissful regions.

58. Those who devoutly read his holy and best of Sanhitas, rejoice acquiring riches, corns and glory.

59. Every one should therefore hear it reverentially. He who does it enjoys happiness and Vishnu, Brahma and Siva are propitiated with him.

60. By reading it a Brahmana reaps the fruit of the Vedic studies, a Kshatrya obtains victory and strength in battle, a Vaishya immense riches and Sudra health and immunity from ailments.

61. The illustrious Vishnu has been glorified in this Parvan: therefore by reading or hearing it recited a man becomes happy and acquires all desired-for objects. These words of the great Rishi Vyasa can never be false.

62. The merit acquired by listening to the recitation of this Parvan is tentamount to what is obtained by giving away good kine with calves incessantly for a year.

SHALYA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted the Narayana and Nara the foremost of male beings, as also the goddess of learning Saraswati let us cry success.

Janamejaya said :—

1. On Karna being thus killed by Savyasachin what did the small remnant of the Kuru army do?

2. Seeing the (Pandava) army elated with energy how did the king Suyodhana act towards them befitting the occasion?

3. Describe it, O foremost of the twice-born. I wish to hear it. I am never satiated with hearing of the great feats of my forefathers.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. After the destruction of Karna, O king, Dhristarastra's son Suyodhana was immersed in a sea of grief and beheld despair on all sides.

5. Exclaiming repeatedly "oh! Karna! oh! Karna!" he with difficulty reached his camp with the remaining kings on his side.

6. Although consoled by those chiefs with cogent arguments sanctioned by scriptures he could not enjoy peace of mind thinking of the death of the charioteer's son.

7. Considering Destiny and Luck as all-powerful and determined upon fighting the king issued out again for battle.

8. Having appointed duly Shalya as the commander-in-chief, that foremost of kings, O king, went out for battle with the remaining chiefs.

9. Thereupon, O foremost of Bharatas, a terrible encounter took place between Kurus and Pandavas like that between the celestials and Asuras.

10. Then, O king, having made a great onslaught in battle, Shalya, having lost a large number of his force, was killed by Yudhisthira at mid-day.

11. Thereupon having his allies slain king Duryodhana fled from the battle-field and entered into a dreadful lake in fear of his enemies.

12. Then on that afternoon causing the lake to be encircled by mighty warriors Bhimasena invited him for battle and killed him.

13. After his destruction in that great battle three çar-warriors, who were still alive, worked up with great anger, killed the Panchalas in night.

14. Having left the camp next morning Sanjaya went to the Kuru capital depressed and laden with grief.

15. Having entered the city, and raising up his arms in sorrow and trembling the charioteer entered the Palace of the King.

16. Overwhelmed with grief, O foremost of men, he cried aloud, saying "Alas! O king, ruin has overtaken us all by the death of the great king.

17. Alas! Time is powerful! Difficult are his ways, since all our men, powerful like Indra, have been killed by the Pandavas.

18. Beholding Sanjaya return in that painful state all the people anxiously lamented.

19. Hearing of Duryodhana's death, the entire city, O foremost of men, including even children bewailed from all sides.

20. Pressed down with sorrow and bewildered men and women were seen running about like mad people.

21. Entering the Royal Palace Sanjaya saw that great and highly wise king.

22—26. Beholding the innocent king, the illustrious scion of the Bharata race seated encircled by his daughters-in-law, Gandhari, Vidura and other well-wishing relatives and friends and engaged in thinking of the same subject Sanjaya, with an aggrieved heart and suppressed accents said :—" I am Sanjaya, O great king. I bow to you, O foremost of the Bharatas. The Madra-king Shalya has been killed, as also Suvala's son Shakuni, and Uluka, the heroic son of Shakuni. The Samsaptakas, the Kambhojas, the Shakas, the Mlechas, the Mountaineers and the Yavanas have all been killed.

27. The Easterners, the Southerners, the Northerners and the Westerners, O king, have all been killed.

28. All the kings and princes have been killed. The king Duryodhana too has been killed by Pandu's son (Bhima) as he had promised.

29. With his thighs broken he is lying prostrate on earth bathed in blood. Dhristadyumna and the invincible Shikhandi have also been slain.

30. Uttamouja, Yudhamanyu, Prabhadrakas, and those foremost of men the Panchalas and Chedis have all been killed.

31. Your sons as also the five sons of Draupadi have been killed. The valiant and powerful son of Karna, Vrishasena, has also been killed.

32. All the men collected have been destroyed as also the elephants. All the car-warriors and horses have been slain n battle.

33—34. Very few are surviving on your side, O king. On account of the conflict between the Kurus and Pandavas the Earth contains only women now. Amongst the Pandavas seven are alive and amongst your people only three.

35. They are the five Pandava brothers, and Vasudeva, and Satyaki, and Kripa, and Kritavarman, and Drona's son, that foremost of victorious heroes.

86. These three car-warriors, are all that survive, O best of kings, of all the Akshauhinis collected on your side, O uler of men !

These are only living O monarch, the rest have died. Making Duryodhana and his hostility towards the Paudavas the cause, the whole world, it seems, has been destroyed, O foremost of Bharata's race, by Time!"

38. Hearing these cruel words, Dhritarashtra, that ruler of men, fell down, senseless, O monarch, on the Earth.

39. As soon as the king fell down, the illustrious Vidura also, O king, afflicted with sorrow for the king's distress, fell down on Earth.

40. Gandhari also, O best of kings, and all the Kuru ladies, suddenly fell down on the ground, hearing those cruel words.

41. All those royal persons remained lying on the ground, deprived of their consciousness and crying in delirium, like figures painted on a large piece of canvas.

42. Then king Dhritarashtra, that lord of Earth, afflicted with the misery of the death of his sons, slowly and with difficulty regained his life-breaths.

43—47. Having recovered his consciousness, the king, with trembling limbs and aggrieved heart, looked of all sides, and said these words to Kshattri Vidura :—"O learned Kshatri, O you of great wisdom, O foremost of Bharata's race, you are now my refuge! I am lordless and all my sons are dead"—Having said so, he once more dropped down unconscious. Beholding him fallen, all his relatives, that were present there, sprinkled cold water over him and fanned him. Comforted after a long while, that king stricken with sorrow on account of the death of his sons, remained silent, sighing heavily, like a snake put into a pot.

48. Sanjaya also wept aloud, beholding the king so aggrieved. All the ladies too with the famous Gandhari, did the same.

49—51. After a long while, O best of men, Dhritarashtra, having repeatedly swooned, said to Vidura.—" Let all the ladies retire, even the illustrious Gandhari, and all these friends! My mind is greatly unsettled!"—Thus addressed, Vidura, repeatedly trembling, slowly sent away the ladies, O foremast of Bharata's race.

52. All those ladies retired, O chief of the Bharatas, as also all those friends, seeing the king deeply afflicted.

53. Then Sanjaya cheerlessly looked at the king, O scorcher of foes, who, having recovered his senses, was weeping in great misery.

CHAPTER II.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vashiampayana said :—

1. After the ladies had been sent away, Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, sunk into grief greater than that which had afflicted him before, began, O monarch, to bewail.

2. Exhaling smoky breaths, and repeatedly shaking his arms, and reflecting a little, O monarch, he said these words.

Dhritarashtra said:—

3. 'Alas, O Suta, painful is the news that I hear from you viz., that the Pandavas are all safe and have suffered no loss in battle!

4. Forsooth, my hard heart is made of the essence of thunder, since it breaks not upon hearing of the fall of my sons!

5. Thinking of their ages, O Sanjaya, and of their sports in childhood, and learning today that all of them have died, my heart seems to break into pieces!

6. Although owing to my blindness I never saw their forms, still I cherished a great love for them on account of the affection one feels for his children.

7. Hearing that they had passed out of childhood and entered the period of youth and then of early manhood, I became highly glad, O sinless one.

8. Hearing today that they have been killed and divested of prosperity and energy, I do not enjoy peace of mind, being overwhelmed with grief on account of the calamity that has befallen them.

9. Come, come, O king of kings, to me that am without a lord now! Deprived of you, O mighty-armed one, what will be my condition?

10. Why, O sire, leaving all the assembled kings do you lie on the nacked ground, deprived of life, like an ordinary and wretched king?

11. Having been, O monarch, the refuge of kinsmen and friends, where do you go now, O hero, leaving me that am blind and old?

12. Where now, O king, is that pity of yours, that love, and that respectfulness? Invincible you were in battle, how, alas, have you been killed by the Parthas?

13—14. Who will now, after I will get up from bed at the proper hour, repeatedly address me in such loving and respectful words as,—O father, O father—O great king,—O Lord of the world!—and affectionately clasping my neck with tearful eyes, will ask for my orders, saying,—Command me, O you of Kuru's race!—address me, O son, in that sweet language once more!

15. O dear child, I heard even these words from your lips, viz.,—This wide Earth is equally ours with Pritha's son!

16—21. Bhagadatta and Kripa and Shalya and the two princes of Avanti and Jayadratha and Bhurishravas and Cala and Somadatta and Valhika and Ashwatthaman and the chief of the Bhojas and the mighty princes of Magadha and Vrihadvala and the ruler of the Kacis and Shakuni, the son of Suvala and many thousands of Mlecchas and Shakas and Yavanas, and Sudakhina the ruler of the Kamvojas and the king of the Trigartas and the grandsire Bhishma and Bharadwaja's son and Gotama's son and Shrutayush and Ayutayush and Shatayush of great power, and Jalasandha and Rishyashringa's son and the Rakshasa Alayudha, and the mighty-armed Alamvusha and the great car-warrior Suvahu,—these and many other kings, O best of monarchs, have taken up arms on my behalf and are ready to throw away their very lives in great battle!

22—23. Stationed on the field amidst these, and encircled by my brothers, I will fight against all the Parthas and the Panchalas and the Chedis, O foremost of kings, and the sons of Draupadi and Satyaki and Kunti-Bhoja and the Rakshasa Ghatotkach.

24. Even one amongst these, O king, worked up with anger, is able to resist in battle the Pandavas rushing towards him!

25. What need I say then of all these heroes, every one of whom has wrongs to avenge on the Pandavas, when united together? All these, O monarch, will fight with the followers of the Pandavas and will kill them in battle.

26. Karna alone, with myself, will kill the Pandavas. All the heroic kings will then live under my control.

27.—28. Their leader, the mighty Vasudeva, will not, he has told me, take up arms for them, O king.—In this way, O Suta, did Duryodhana often use to speak to me. Hearing what he said, I believed that the Pandavas would be killed in battle.

29. While, my sons, stationed in the midst of those heroes, and fighting vigorously in battle, have all been slain, what can it be but Destiny?

30 When that lord of the world, viz., the valiant Bhishma, having encountered Shikhandin, died like a lion, killed by a jackal, what can it be but Destiny?

31. When the Brahmana Drona, the master of all offensive and defensive, weapons, has been killed by the Pandavas in battle, what can it be but Destiny?

32. When Bhurishravas has been slain in battle, as also Somadatta and king Valhika, what can it be else Destiny?

33. When Bhagadatta, an expert in fighting from the back of elephants, has been killed, and when Jayadratha has been slain, what can it be but Fate?

34. When Sudakshina has been slain, and Jalasandha of Puru's race, as also Shrutayush and Ayutayush, what can it be but Destiny?

35. The mighty Pandya, that foremost of all holders of weapons, has been slain in battle by the Pandavas. What can it be but Destiny?

36—37. When Vrihadvala has been slain and the powerful king of the Magadhas, and the brave Ugrayudha, that model of all bowmen, when the two princes of Avanti viz., Vinda and Aunvinda have been slain, and the king also of the Trigartas, as also the numerous Samsaptakas, what can it be but Destiny?

38. When king Alamvusha, and the Rakshasa Alayudha, and Rishyashringa's son, have been slain, what can it be but Destiny?

39. When the Narayanas have been slain, as also the Gopalas, ever invincible in battle, and many thousands of Mlecchas, what can it be but Destiny.

40. When Shakuni the son of Suvala, and the powerful Uluka, called the gamester's son, at the head of his forces, have been slain, what can it be but Destiny?

41—42. When numerous great heroes, well-read in all sorts of offensive and defensive weapons, and gifted with prowess equal to that of Indra himself, have been slain, O Suta, when Kshatriyas coming from different kingdoms, O Sanjaya, have all been slain in battle, what can it be but Destiny?

43. My mighty sons and grandsons have been slain, as also my friends and brethren. What can it be but Destiny?

44. Truly man takes his birth, subject to Destiny. A fortunate man always meets with good.

45. I am bereft of good fortune, and, therefore, am deprived of my children, O Sanjaya. Old as I am, how shall I now submit to the sway of enemies?

46. I do not think anything else but exile into the woods is good for me, O lord. Shorn of relatives and kinsmen as I am, I will go into the woods.

47. Nothing else save an exile into the woods can be better for me who am fallen into this plight and who am shorn of my sons, O Sanjaya.

48—49. When Duryodhana has been slain, when Dusshasana and Vivingsha and the mighty Vikarna have been slain, how shall I be able to bear the shouts of that Bhimasena who has alone killed a hundred sons of mine in battle?

50. He will frequently speak of the slaughter of Duryodhana in my ears. Burning with grief and sorrow, I shall not be able to withstand his cruel words!' "

Vaishampayana said:—

51. Even thus that king, burning with grief and deprived of relatives and kinsmen, repeatedly swooned, overwhelmed with grief consequent on the death of his sons.

52. Having wept for a long time, Dhritarashtra, the son of Amvika, sighed heavily thinking of his defeat.

53. Overwhelmed with sorrow, and burning with grief, that best of Bharata's race once more enquired of his charioteer Sanjaya, the son of Gavalgana, the details of the battle.

Dhritarashtra said:—

54. After Bhishma and Drona had been slain and the Suta's son also overthrown, whom did my warriors make their general?

55. The Pandavas are slaying quickly every one whom my warriors make their general in battle.

56. Bhishma was slain at the van of battle by the diadem-decked Arjuna in your presence. Even thus was Drona slain before you all.

57. Even thus was the Suta's son, the valiant Karna, slain by Arjuna in the presence of all the kings.

58. Long before, the high-souled Vidura ura had told me that through the fault of Duryodhana, the people of the Earth would be rooted out.

59. There are some fools that do not see things even though they cast their eyes on them. Those words of Vidura have proved true in my case.

60 What the pious Vidura, conversant with the attributes of everything, then said, has proved true, for the words he uttered were nothing but the truth.

61 Afflicted by fate, I did not then act according to those words. The fruits of that evil course have now appeared. Describe them to me, O son of Gavalgana, once more.

62 Who became the head of our army after Karna's fall? Who was that car-warrior who proceeded against Arjuna and Vasudeva?

63 Who were they that protected the right wheel of the ruler of the Madras in battle? Who protected the left wheel of that hero when he went to battle? Who also protected his rear?

64 How, when all of you were together, could the mighty king of the Madras, as also my son, be slain, O Sanjaya, by the Pandavas?

65 Describe particularly the great destruction of the Bharatas. Tell me how my son Duryodhana fell in battle!

66 Tell me how all the Panchalas with their followers, and Dhrishtadyumna and Shikhandhin and the five sons of Draupadi, were killed.

67 Tell me how the (five) Pandavas and the two Satwatas (viz., Krishna and Satyaki), and Kripa and Kritavarman and Drona's son, have escaped with life.

68 I desire to hear everything about the battle and its nature. You are a skillful narrator. O Sanjaya, tell me every thing!'

CHAPTER III.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Hear, O king, attentively how that great onslaught of the Kurus and the Pandavas took place when they encountered each other.

2—3. After the Suta's son had been killed by the illustrious son of Pandu, and after the troops had been repeatedly collected and had repeatedly been routed and after a terrible onsaught had taken place, O foremost of men in battle after Karna's death, Partha began to utter leonine shouts. At that time your sons were possessed by great fear.

4. Indeed, after Karna's death, there was no warrior in your army who could rally the troops or show his prowess.

5. They then looked like ship-wrecked merchants on the vast sea without a raft to save themselves. When their protector was slain by the diadem-decked Arjuna, they were like persons on the vast sea desirous of reaching safely some shore.

6. Indeed, O king, after the slaughter of the Suta's son, your troops, panic-stricken and mangled with arrows, were like helpless men like a herd of deer attacked by a lion.

7. Defeated by Savyasachin, they retired in the evening, like bulls with broken horns or snakes shorn of their fangs.

8. Their foremost of heroes slain, themselves thrown into confusion and cut with keen arrows, your sons, O king, upon the slaughter of the Suta's son, fled away in fear.

9. Deprived of weapons and coats of mail, all of them were bewildered and knew not where to fly. Looking on all sides, many of them began to kill one another.

10—11. Many fell down or became pale, thinking,—It is me whom Vibhatsu is persuing!—It is me whom Vrikodara is persuing!—Some riding on quick horses, some on fleet cars, and some on fleet elephants, many great car-warriors fled away from fear, leaving behind the foot-soldiers.

12. Cars were broken by elephants, horsemen were crushed by great car-warriors, and the foot were smashed and slain by bodies of horse, as they fled away from the field of action.

13. After the fall of the Suta's son, your troops became like straggling travellers in a forest abounding with robbers and beasts of prey.

14. Some elephants whose riders had been killed, and others whose trunks had been cut off, stricken with fear, saw the entire universe full of Partha.

15—16. Beholding his troops flying away in fear of Bhimsena, Duryodhana, then, with cries of Oh and Alas, addressed his driver, saying,—"If I stand at the rear of the army, armed with my bow, Partha then will never be able to go beyond me. Drive quickly the horses, therefore.

17. When I will display my courage in battle Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, will not dare go beyond me like the ocean never venturing to transgress its banks.

18–19. To-day, killing Arjuna with Govinda, and the proud Vrikodara, and the rest of my enemies, I will free myself from the debt I owe to Karna."—Hearing these words of the Kuru king worthy of an honorable man, his driver slowly urged those horses adorned with trappings of gold.

20. At that time many brave warriors, deprived of elephants and horses and cars, and five and twenty thousand foot, proceeded slowly for battle.

21. Then Bhimasena, worked up with wrath, and Dhrishtadyumna the son of Prishata, encircling those soldiers with the help of four kinds of forces destroyed them with arrows.

22. All of them fought vigorously with Bhima and Prishata's son. Many amongst them challenged the two Pandava heroes mentioning their names.

23. Surrounded by them in battle, Bhima became angry with them. Quickly getting down from his car, he began to fight, with his mace.

24. Depending on the might of his own arms, Vrikodara, the son of Kunti, who was on hls car, observing the rules of fair fight, did not fight with those foes who were struck down on earth.

25. Armed with his heavy mace made entirely of iron and adorned with gold and resembling the Destroyer himself at the end of the Yuga, Bhima slew them all like Yama destroying creatures with his club.

26. These foot-soldiers, worked up with great anger, heving lost their friends and kinsmen, were prepared to cast away their lives, and rushed in that battle towards Bhima like insects towards a blazing fire.

27. Indeed those warriors, stricken with fear and invincible in battle, approaching Bhimasena, suddenly died like living creatures at the look of the Destroyer.

28. Armed with sword and mace, Bhima moved on like a hawk and killed your twenty-five thousand warriors.

29. Having killed that brave division, the powerful Bhima, of invincible prowess, once more stood, with Dhrishtadyumna before him.

30. In the meantime the highly energetic Dhananjaya proceeded towards the car-division of the Kurus. The twin sons of Madri and the mighty car-warrior Satyaki, all strong, cheerfully rushed against Shakuni for slaying him.

31. Having slain with keen arrows the numerous cavalry of Shakuni, those Pandava heroes quickly proceeded against Shakuni himself, whereupon a fierce encounter took place.

32. Then Dhananjaya, O king, penetrated into the midst of the car-detachment of the Kauravas, expanding his bow Gandiva known over the three worlds.

33. Beholding that car having white horses yoked to it and Krishna for its driver coming towards them, with Arjuna as the warrior on it, your troops fled away in fear.

34. Deprived of cars and horses and struck with arrows from every side, five and twenty thousand foot-soldiers proceeded towards Partha and surrounded him.

35. Then that mighty car-warriors amongst the Panchalas, viz., Dhrishta dyumna with Bhimasena at the head quickly killed them and gained vicory.

36. The son of the Panchala king, viz., the celebrated Dhrishtadyumna, was a great bowman possessed of great beauty aed a repressor of foes.

37. Seeing Dhrishtadyumna to whose car were yoked steeds white as pigeons and whose standard was made of lofty Kovidara, your troops fled away in fear.

38. The celebrated sons of Madri, with Satyaki among them, followed by the Gandhara king who was quick in the use of weapons, soon appeared before us.

39. Chekitana and Shikhandin and the five sons of Draupadi, having killed a large number of your troops, blew their conchs.

40. Seeing all your troops flying away from the field, those Pandava heroes pursued and killed them like bulls pursuing defeated bulls.

41. Then the mighty Savaysachin the son of Pandu, beholding the remaining portion of your army still fighting was filled with anger, O king.

42. Suddenly, O monarch, he covered the remnant of your army with arrows. The dust, however, that was then raised, covered the sky, for which we could not see anything.

43. Darkness also spread over the place and the field of battle was covered with arrows. Your troops, O monarch, then fled away in fear on all sides.

44. When his army was thus broken, the Kuru king, O monarch, rushed against both friends and foes.

45. Then Duryodhana challenged all the Pandavas to battle, O chief of Bharata's race, like the Asura Vail in days of yore challenging all the celestials.

46. The Pandavas then, collected in a body and filled with rage, chastising him repeatedly and discharging various weapons, proceeded against Duryodhana.

47—50. The latter, however, fearlessly struck his foes with arrows. The prowess of your sons was exceedingly wonderful, since all the Pandavas together were unable to overcome him. At this time Duryodhana saw his troops, exceedingly mangled with shafts, and about to fly away. Rallying them then, O monarch, your son, resolved on battle and desirous of gladdening them, addressed those warriors, saying,—"I do not see a place on plain or mountain whither if you fly, the Pandavas will not kill you! What use then in flight?

51. The Pandava army has now been reduced to a small number. The two Krishnas have been greatly wounded. If all of us make a stand here, we are sure to gain victory.

52. If, however, you fly away, the Pandavas, pursuing you, will slay you all. Death in battle, therefore, conduces to our good.

53. Death in the field of battle while fighting according to Kshatriya custom, is welcome. Such death begets no grief. By meeting with such a death, a person enjoys eternal happinesa in the other world.

54. Let all the Kshatriyas assembled hear me. It were] better that they should submit to the angry Bhimasena than that they [should neglect the duties practised by them from the days of their fore-fathers.

55. There is no act more sinful for a Kshatriva than to fly away from the battle-field. Ye Kauravas, there is no greater path to heaven than the duty of battle.

56—57. The warrior acquires in a day the blissful regions of the other world that take many long years for others to acquire."—Obeying those words of the king, Kshatriya car-warriors once more rushed against the Pandavas, unable to put up with their discomfiture and firmly resolved to display their prowess.

58. Then began a battle once more that was highly terrific, between your troops and the enemy, that resembled the one between the gods and demons.

59. Your son Duryodhana then, O monarch, with all his troops, rushed against the Pandavas with Yudhishthira at the head.

CHAPTER IV.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1—7. 'Beholding the boxes of cars as also the cars of great warriors, and the elephants and foot-soldiers, O king, killed in battle,—seeing the field of battle appear dreadful like the sporting ground of Rudra,—seeing the ignominous death obtained by hundreds and thousands of kings,—seeing also the prowess of Partha after the retreat of your son with a sorrowful heart and when your troops, filled with anxiety and fallen into great distress, O Bharata, were deliberating about their next course, hearing also the loud lamentations of the Kaurava warriors that were being smitten, and marking the displaced and disordered tokens of great kings, the energetic, old, eloquent and compassionate Kuru leader Kripa, approched king Duryodhana, and angrily said to him:—"O Duryodhana, listen, O Bharata, to these words. Having heard them, O monarch, act according to them, O sinless one, if you like.

8. There is no path, O monarch, that is better than the duty of battle. Taking recourse to that path, Kshatriyas, O best of the Kshatriyas, fight.

9. He who follows Kshatriya practices, fights with son, father, brother, sister's son, and maternal uncle, and relatives, and kinsmen.

10. If he is killed in battle, there is great merit in it. Similarly, there is great sin if he flies from the field. It is for this that the life of a Kshatriya is exceedingly hard.

11—12. I will say a few wholesome words to you about this. After the fall of Bhishma and Drona and the mighty car-warrior Karna, after the slaughter of Jayadratha and your brothers, O sinless one, and your son Lakshmana, what is there now for us to do?

13. They, upon whom we had laid all burdens and had been enjoying the kingdom, have all repaired to regions of blessedness attainable by persons conversant with the knowledge of Brahma, casting off their bodies.

14. As regards ourselves, deprived of those great car-warriors of numerous accomplishments, we shall have to pass our time in sorrow, having caused many kings to die.

15. When all those heroes were alive even then Vibhatsu could not be defeated. Having Krishna, for his eyes, that mighty-armed hero is incapable of being defeated by the very gods!

16. The vast Kaurava army, approaching his monkey-emblem standard that is high as Indra's pole set up in the spring and that is effulgent as Indra's bow, has always shaken in fear.

17. At the leonine shouts of Bhimasena and the blare of Panchajanya, and the twang of Gandiva, our hearts will be paralyzed.

18. Moving like flashes of lightning, and closing our eyes Arjuna's Gandiva is seen to resemble a circle of fire.

19. Adorned with pure gold, that bow, as it is shaken, looks like lightnings moving about on all directions.

20. Quick-coursing and white horses endued with the splendour of the Moon or the Kuca grass, that run as if devouring the skies, are yoked to his car.

21. Urged on by Krishna, like masses of clouds driven by the wind, and decked with golden trappings, they bear Arjuna to battle.

22. That foremost of warriors, Arjuna, burnt that great force of yours like a rising fire consuming dry grass in the forest in the winter.

23. Possessed of the splendour of Indra himself, while penetrating into our army we have seen Dhananjaya look like an elephant with four tusks.

24. While agitating your army and terrorizing the kings we have seen Dhananjaya resemble an elephant agitating a lake full of lotuses.

25. While terrifying all the warriors with the twang of his bow, we have again seen the son of Pandu resemble a lion striking terror to smaller animals.

26. Those two foremost of bowmen in all the worlds, viz., the two Krishnas clad in mail, are looking highly beautiful.

27. Today is the seventeenth day of this dreadful battle, O Bharata, of those that are being killed in the midst of this fight.

28. The diverse detachments of your army are routed and dispersed like autumnal clouds scattered by the wind.

29. Savyasachin, O monarch, made your army tremble and reel like a boat exposed to danger by a storm on the bosom of the ocean.

30. Where was the Suta's son, where was I, where were you, where was Hridika's son, where your brother Duscasana accompanied by his brothers, when Jayadratha was slain?

31—32. Upon beholding Jayadratha and finding him within the range of his arrows, Arjuna, displaying his prowess upon all your kinsmen and brothers and allies and maternal uncles, and placing his feet upon their heads, killed king Jayadratha before us all. What then is there for us to do now?

33. Who is there among your troops now that would defeat the son of Pandu?

34. That high-souled warrior is a master of many sorts of celestial weapons. The twang, of Gandiva, deprives us of our energies.

35. This army of yours that is now without a leader is like a night without the Moon or like a river that is dried up with all the trees on its banks broken by elephants.

36. The mighty-armed Arjuna of white horses will, at his pleasure, move about amidst your army having no commander, like a blazing fire amid a heap of grass.

37. The vigour of those two, viz. Satyaki and Bhimasena, would rend all the mountains or dry up all the oceans!

38. The words that Bhima spoke in the midst of the assembly have all been nearly fulfilled by him, O monarch. That which remains unaccomplished will again be accomplished by him.

39. While Karna was fighting with the unconquerable army of the Pandavas, it was vigorously protected by the wielder of Gandiva.

40. You have done many misdeeds without any cause, by the righteous Pandavs. The fruits of those acts have now come.

41. For accomplishing your own object you had, with great care, mustered together a large force. That huge force as also yourself, O best of Bharatas, have fallen into great danger.

42. Preserve your own self now, for self is the stay of everything. If the support is broken, O sire, everything attached thereto is scattered on every side.

43. He that is being weakened should seek peace by conciliation. He that is prosperous should make war. This is the policy taught by Vrihaspati.

44. We are now inferior to the sons of Pandu as regards the strength of our army. Therefore, O lord, I think peace with the Pandavas is conducive to our good.

45. He that does not know what is for his good or knowing disregards what is for his good, is soon deprived of his kingdom and never obtains any good.

46. If by submission to king Yudhishthira we may still have the kingdom even that would be for our good, and not O king, to suffer through folly defeat at the hands of the Pandavas.

47. Yudhishthira is merciful. At the request of Vichitraviryya's son and of Govinda, he will allow you to be the king.

48. Whatever Hrishikesha will say to the victorious king Yudhishthira and Arjuna and Bhimsena, all of them will, forsooth, obey.

49. Krishna will not, I think, be able to disobey the words of Dhritarashtra of Kuru's race, nor will the son of Pandu be able to disregard those of Krishna.

50—51. The end of hostilities with the sons of Pritha is what I consider to be for your good. I do not say this to you from any mean motives nor for saving my life. I say, O king, that whieh I think beneficial. You will recollect these words when on the verge of death if you neglect them now.— Old Kripa, the son of Saradwata, weepingly said these words. Breathing hard breaths, he was beside himself with sorrow.

CHAPTER V.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Thus addressed by the famous son of Gotama, the king Duryodhana, breathing hard, remained silent, O king.

2. Having thought for a little while, the great son of Dhritarashtra, that scorcher of foes, then said these words to Sharadwat's son Kripa :—

3. "You have said to me whatever a friend should say. You have also, whilst fighting, done everything for me, without caring for your very life.

4. People have seen you enter into the midst of the Pandava army and fight with the mighty and energetic car-warriors of the Pandavas.

5. What a friend should say has been said by you. Your words, however, do not please me like medicine that pleases not the person who is on the verge of death.

6. These beneficial and excellent words, pregnant with reason, which you, O mighty-armed one, have said, do not seem acceptable to me, O foremost of Brahmanas.

7. Deprived by us of his kingdom on a former occasion, why will the son of Pandu trust us? That great king was once defeated by us at dice. Why will we again believe my words?

8. So also, Krishna, ever engaged in the good of the Parthas, when he came to us as an emissary, was cheated by us. Our act was exceedingly unfair. Why then, will Hrishikesha trust my words?

9. The princess Krishna, while standing in the midst of the assembly, wept piteously. Krishna will never forget that act of ours, nor, the deprivation of Yudhishthira by us of his kingdom.

10. Formerly it was heard by us that the two Krishnas are of the same mind and are firmly attached to each other. Today, O lord, we have seen it with our eyes.

11. Having heard of the death of his sister's son, Keshava passes his nights in sorrow. We have offended him highly. Why will he forgive us then?

12. Arjuna also, in consequence of Abhimanyu's death, has become very miserable. Even if requested, why will he try for my good?

13. The second son of Pandu, Bhimasena, is highly powerful. He has taken a terrible vow. He will break but not bend.

14. The heroic twins, cherishing hostility against us, when clad in mail and armed with their swords, resemble a pair of Yamas.

15. Dhrishtadyumna and Shikhandin have taken up their swords against me. Why will those two, O best of Brahmanas, try for my good?

16. Clad in one piece of cloth and in her season, the princess Krishna was treated cruelly by Dushasana in the midst of the assembly and before all.

17. Those scorchers of foes, the Pandavas, who still remember the naked Draupadi greatly distressed, can never be dissuaded from battle.

18. Then again, Krishna, the daughter of Drupada, is, with great difficulty, practising the austerest of penances for my destruction and the success of her husbands, and sleeps every day on the bare ground, intending to do so till the end of the hostilities is got at.

19. Casting off honor and pride, the sister of Vasudeva, Subhadra, is always serving Draupadi like a waiting-woman.

20. Everything, therefore, is on fire. That fire can never be extinguished. Peace with them is impossible on account of the death of Abhimanyu.

21. Having reigned as the sovereign of this Earth bounded by the ocean, how shall I be able to enjoy, by the favor of the Pandavas, a kingdom in peace?

22. Having spread rays like the sun upon the heads of all the kings, how shall I walk behind Yudhishthira as a slave?

23. Having enjoyed all luxuries and shown great mercy, how shall I lead a miserable life now with wretched men as my companions?

24. I do not disapprove those mild and wholesome words you have spoken. I, however, do not think that this is the time for peace.

25. A righteous fight is, O scorcher of foes, is regarded by me to be a good policy. This is not the time for acting like a eunuch. On the other hand, this is the time for fighting.

26. I have celebrated many sacrifices.

I have given away presents to Brahmanas. I have achieved all my wishes. I have listened to the recitation of the Vedas. I have saved the heads of my foes.

27. My servants have all been well cared for by me. I have relieved people in distress. I dare not, O foremost of men, speak such humble words to the Pandavas.

28. I have conquered foreign kingdoms. I have properly governed my own kingdom. I have enjoyed various luxuries. I have pursued religion, profit and desire. I have paid off my debt to the departed manes and to Kshatriya duty.

29. Indeed, there is no happiness on this earth. What becomes of kingdom, and what of good name? Fame is all that one should acquire here. That fame can be acquired by battle, and by no other means.

30. The death a Kshatriya meets with at home is blameable. Death on one's bed at home is highly sinful.

31. The man, who casts off his body in the forest or in battle after having performed sacrifices, attains great glory.

32. He is no man who dies miserably crying in agony, afflicted by disease and decay in the midst of crying kinsmen.

33. Abandoning various objects of enjoyment, I shall now, by a righteous battle, repair to the regions of Shakra, obtaining the companionship of those that have attained to the highest end.

34. For sooth, that is the habitation of pious heroes, who never retreat from battle, who are intelligent and devoted to truth, and who celebrate sacrifices.

35. The various divisions of Apsaras, forsooth, look with joy at such heroes when engaged in battle. Forsooth, the Pitris behold them adored in the assembly of the gods and rejoicing in heaven, in the company of Apsaras.

36—37. We will now ascend the path that is trod by the celestials and by heroes who never retreat from battle, the path followed by our venerable grandfather, by the highly intelligent preceptor, by Jayadratha, by Karna, and by Dushasana.

38. Many brave kings, who tried their best for me in this battle, have been killed. Wounded with shafts and their limbs bathed in blood, they lie now on the nacked Earth.

39. Courageous and masters of weapons, those kings, who had performed sacrifices according to the scriptures, having given their lives in the discharge of their duties, have now become the inhabitants of Indra's region.

40. They have gone there. That road will once more become difficult on account of a number of heroes that will hurry along it for reaching that happy region.

41. Recollect with gratitude the deeds of those heroes that have died for me. I desire to satisfy my debt, instead of thinking of the kingdom.

42. If, having caused my friends and brothers and grandsires to be killed, I save my own life, people will undoubtedly blame me.

43. It will be useless for me to enjoy the kingdom, destitute of kinsmen and friends and well-wishers, and submitting to the son of Pandu.

44. I, who was the master of the universe, will now acquire heaven by fair fight. It will not be otherwise.

45. Thus addressed by Duryodhana, all the Kshatriyas praised that speech and cheered the king, saying,—Well, Well!

46. Without at all grieving for their defeat, and firmly bent upon displaying their prowess, all of them, prepared for fight, became enthusiastic.

47. Having given their horses to the syces, the Kauravas, delighting at the prospect of battle, lived (for the night) at a spot little less than two Yojanas in distance from the field.

48. Having reached the Saraswati of red waters on the sacred and beautiful table-land at the foot of the Himalaya, they bathed in that water and satisfied their thirst with it. Excited by your son, they halted there.

49. Once more rallying themselves, all the Kshatriyas, O king, urged by destiny waited there.

CHAPTER VI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. On that table-land at the foot of the Himavat, those heroes, O king, joyous at the prospect of battle and assembled together, passed the night.

2—3. Indeed, Shalya and Chitrasena and the powerful car warrior Shakuni and Ashwatthaman and Kripa and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, and the energetic Sushena and Arishtasena and Dhritasena and Jayatsena and all those kings passed the night there.

4. After the heroic Karna had been killed in battle, your sons, filled with fear by the Pandavas desirous of victory, did not obtain peace anywhere else than on the Himavat.

5. All of them then, O king, who were bent on fighting, duly worshipped the king and said to him, in the presence of Shalya, these words.

6. It becomes you to fight with the enemy, after having made some body the commander, protected by whom in battle we will defeat the enemies.

7. Then Duryodhana, without descending from his car, went to that foremost of car-warriors, that hero conversant with all the rules of battle, Ashwatthaman, who resembled the Destroyer himself in battle.

8—12. Having beautiful limbs, well-covered head, a neck adorned with three lines like those in a conch-shell, sweet speech, eyes resembling the petals of a full-blown lotus, and tiger-like face, the dignity of Meru, resembling the bull of Mahadeva in neck, eyes, tread, and voice, having huge, massive and well-joined arms, having broad and well-formed chest, e al unto Garuda in speed and might, e ulgent like the Sun, intelligent like Ushanas himself, beautiful like the Moon, h ing a body that seemed to be made of a number of golden lotuses, well-made joints, well-formed thighs and waist, and hips, beautiful feet, beautiful fingers, and beautiful nails, he seemed to have been made by Brahma with great care after remembering one after another all the beautiful and good attributes of creation.

13. Gifted with auspicious marks and clever in every act, he was an ocean of learning. Speedily vanquishing his enemies, he was incapable of being forcibly defeated by foes.

14. He knew, in full, the science of war consisting of four padas and ten Angas. He knew also the four Vedas with all their branches, and the Akhyanas as the fifth.

15. Possessed of great ascetic merit, Drona, himself not born of woman, having worshipped the three-eyed deity with care and penances, begat him upon a wife not born of woman.

16. Approaching him of incomparable deeds, he who is unrivalled in beauty on earth, he who has mastered all branches of learning, that ocean of qualities, the faultless Acwatthaman, your son said to him these words :—"O preceptor's son, you are today our highest refuge? Tell us, therefore, who should be the commander of my army now, placing whom at our head, all of us, united together, may defeat the Pandavas?"

19. [Thus addressed] the son of Drona replied,—"Let Shalya become the commander of our army. In birth, in prowess, in energy, in fame, in beauty, and in every other accomplishment, he is superior.

20. Out of gratitude, he has joined us, having abandoned the sons of his own sister. Having a large army of his own, that mighty-armed one is like the second celestial generalissimo.

21. Making that king the commander of our army, O best of kings, we will be able to gain victory, like the celestials after making the invincible Skanda their commander."

22. On Drona's son saying these words all the kings stood, surrounding Shalya, and cried victory to him. Determined for fighting, they felt great joy.

23. Then Duryodhana, coming down from his car, folded his hands and addressing Shalya, equal to Drona and Bhishma in battle, who was on his car, said these words.

24. "O you attached to friends, that time has arrived when intelligent men examine persons in the guise of friends as to whether they are true friends or not.

25. Brave as you are do you become our commander-in-chief. When you will go to battle, the Pandavas, with their friends, will lose heart, and the Panchalas will be depressed."

26. Shalya answered,—"I will, O king of the Kurus, do what you desire me to do. My life, my kingdom, my wealth and every thing else are at your disposal."

Duryodhana said :—

27. I wish you to accept the general-ship of my army. O maternal uncle, O foremost of warriors, protect us, even as Skanda protected the celestials in battle.

28. O foremost of kings, install yourself in the command as Pavaka's son Kartikeya was placed in the command of the celestial army. O hero, kill our foes in battle like Indra the Danavas.

CHAPTER VII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Hearing those words of the Kuru king, the brave king (Shalya), O king, said these words to him :—

2. "O mighty-armed Duryodhana, listen to me, O foremost of orators. You consider the two Krishnas, when on their car, as the foremost of car-warriors. They are not, however, jointly equal to me in the strength of arms.

3. What shall I say of the Pandavas? When enraged, I can fight, at the van of battle, with the whole world consisting of the celestials, Asuras and men.

4. I will defeat the assembled Parthas and the Somakas in battle. Forsooth, I will become the leader of your army.

5. I will form such an array that our enemies will not be able to discomfit it. Truly do I say this to you, O Duryodhana."

6. Thus addressed (by Shalya), king Duryodhana joyfully poured sanctified water, O best of the Bharatas, on the king of the Madras, in the midst of his soldiers, according to the rites ordained in the scriptures, O king.

7. After Shalya had been appointed the commander, leonine shouts arose among your soldiers and various musical instruments also, O Bharata, were struck.

8—9. The Kaurava warriors and the powerful car-warriors among the Madrakas became very cheerful. And all of them praised the royal Shalya, that ornament of battle, saying,—"Victory to you, O king! May you live long. Kill all the foes! Having obtained the strength of your arms, let the sons of Dhritarashtra, gifted with great strength, rule the wide Earth without an enemy.

10. You are capable of vanquishing in battle the three worlds consisting of the gods, the Asuras, what to speak of the Somakas and the Shrinjayas."

11. Thus eulogised the powerful king of the Madrakas was filled with great joy that is unattainable by uncultured persons.

Shalya said:—

12. To-day, O king, I will either kill all the Panchalas with the Pandavas in battle or killed by them go to heaven.

13—15. Let the world behold me to-day moving about fearlessly in the field; let all the sons of Pandu, and Vasudeva and Satyaki, and the sons of Draupadi and Dhristadyumna, Shikhandin, and all the Prabhadrakas, witness my prowess, the great power of my bow, my quickness, the energy of my weapons, and the strength of my arms in battle.

16. Let the Parthas, and all the Siddhas with the Charanas, witness to-day the strength of my arms and the precious weapons I possess.

17. Witnessing my prowess to-day let the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas, desirous of counteracting it, adopt various measures.

18. To-day I will disperse the troops of the Pandavas on all sides. Excelling Drona and Bhishma and the Suta's son, O lord, in battle, I will move about the field, O Kourava, for doing what pleases you.

Sanjaya said:—

19. 'After Shalya had been appointed to the command, O giver of honors, no one among your soldiers, O foremost of Bharata's race, any longer felt sorrow for Karna.

20. Indeed your soldiers were filled with delight. They considered the Parthas as already slain and brought under the control of the king of Madras.

21. Delighted your soldiers, O best of Bharata's race, slept that night happily and became very cheerful.

22. Hearing the war-cries of your army king Yudhisthira, addressing the Vrishni heroe, said these words, before all the Kshatriyas.

23. "The ruler of the Madras, Shalya, that great bowman who is highly respected by all the warriors, has, O Madhava, been appointed the commander of his forces by Dhritarashtra's son.

24. Knowing this, do, O Madhava, that which is beneficial. You are our leader and protector. Do what should next be done."

25. Then Vasudeva, O monarch, said to that king:—"I know Artayani, O Bharata, as truly illustrious, powerful and energetic.

26. He is accomplished, conversant with all the modes of warfare, and possesses great lightness of hand.

27. I think that the ruler of Madras is in battle equal to Bhishma or Drona or Karna or perhaps superior to them.

28. I cannot think of a warrior who may match Shalya while engaged in fight.

29. In battle, he is superior in power to Shikhandin and Arjuna and Bhima and Satyaki and Dhrishtadyumna, O Bharata.

30. The king of the Madras, O king, gifted with the prowess of a lion or an elephant, will move about fearlessly in battle, like the Destroyer himself enraged amongst creatures at the time of the universal dissolution.

31. I do not find a match for him in battle except you, O best of men, who are possessed of prowess equal to that of a tiger.

32. Except you there is no other person either in heaven or in the whole of this world, who, O best of Kurus, would be able to kill the king of the Madras while worked up with anger in battle.

33. Daily in fight, he agitates your troops. For this, kill Shalya in battle, like Maghavan slaying Shamvara.

34. Honored by Dhritarashtra's son, that hero is invincible in battle. When the king of the Madras will be killed in battle, you will surely win victory. Upon his slaughter, Dhritarashtra's huge army will be slain.

35. Hearing, O king, these words of mine now, proceed, O Partha, against that great car-warrior, the king of the Madras.

36. Kill that heroe, O you of great arms, like Vasava slaying the Asura Namuchi. There is no need of showing any compassion here, thinking that he is your maternal uncle. Observing the duties of a Kshatriya, slay the king of the Madras.

37. Having crossed the fathomless ocean represented by Bhishma and Drona and Karna, do not sink, with your followers, in a pit dug by a cow's hoop represented by Shalya.

38. Display in battle the whole of your ascetic power and Kshatriya energy. Slay that car-warrior."

39. Having said these words, Keshava, that slayer of hostile heroes, went to his tent in the evening adored by the Pandavas.

40. After Keshava had departed the righteous king Yudhisthira, sending away all his brothers and the Somakas, happily slept that night, like an elephant from whose body the darts have been plucked out.

41. All those great bowmen, viz., the Panchalas and the Pandavas, delighted at the fall of Karna, slept that night happily.

42. With their anxiety gone the army of the Pandavas, abounding with great bowmen and mighty car-warriors, having reached the shore as it were, became very happy that night on account of the victory, O sire, it had won by the destruction of Karna.

CHAPTER VIII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the termination of the night king Duryodhana addressed all your soldiers, saying,—Arm, ye mighty car-warriors!

2. Hearing the orders of the king, the warriors began to put on their armours. Some began to yoke horses to their cars quickly, others ran about hither and thither.

3. The elephants were also got ready. The infantry began to arm themselves. Thousands of attendants began to spread carpets on the cars.

4. The sound of musical instruments, O king, arose there, for exciting the war-like spirit of the soldiers.

5. Then all the troops, stationed in their proper posts, were seen, O Bharata, to stand, clad in mail and determined to die.

6. Having made the king of the Madras their leader, the great car-warriors, of the Kauravas, made detachments of their soldiers.

7—8. Then all warriors, with Kripa and Kritavarman and Drona's son and Shalya, Suvala's son and the other kings that were yet alive, met your son, and settled, that none of them would individually fight with the Pandavas.

9. And they said,—"He who will fight alone with the Pandavas, or he that will leave a comrade engaged in fight, will be visited by the five grave and all the minor sins."—And they said,—"All of us, unitedly will fight with the enemy."

10. Having made this contract those great car-warriors placed the king of the Madras at their head and speedily ran against their foes.

11. Similarly, all the Pandavas, having arranged their soldiers in that great battle, proceeded against the Kauravas, O king, fighting with them.

12. Soon, O chief of the Bharatas, that army, whose noise resembled that of the agitated ocean, and which seemed wondrous for its cars and elephants, shone like the deep with heaving billows.

Dhritarashtra said :—

13. I have heard the fall of Drona, of Bhishma, and the son of Radha. Tell me now of the fall of Shalya and of my son.

14. How, O Sanjaya, was Shalya killed by the righteous king Yudhisthira? And how was my son Duryodhana slain by the powerful Bhimasena ?

Sanjaya said :—

15. Hear, O king, patiently of the destruction of human beings, elephants and horses as I describe the battle.

16. O king, your sons became very sanguine that, after Drona and Bhishma and the Suta's son had been killed, Shalya would kill all the sons of Pritha in battle.

17. Cherishing that hope in his heart and being comforted, O Bharata, your son Duryodhana, relying in battle upon that great car-carrior, the ruler of the Madras, thought himself as having a protector.

18. When after Karna's fall the Pandavas roared a great fear, O king, possessed the hearts of your sons.

19—20. Assuring him the valiant king of the Madras, having formed, O king, a grand array, proceeded against the Parthas in battle. And the brave king of the Madras proceeded, shaking his beautiful and strong bow capable of shooting arrows with great force.

21. And that mighty car-warrior drove an excellent car having horses of the Sindhu breed yoked to it. Riding upon his car, his driver made the car resplendent.

22. Protected by that car, that hero, that brave destroyer of foes, stood, O king dissipating the fears of your sons.

23. The king of the Madras, clad in mail, proceeded at the head of the army accompanied by the brave Madrakas and the invincible sons of Karna.

24. On the left stood Kritavarman, surrounded by the Trigartas. On the right was (Kripa) with the Sakas and the Yavanas.

25. In the rear was Ashwathaman surrounded by the Kamvojas. In the centre was Duryodhana, protected by the best of Kuru warriors.

26. Surrounded by a large army of cavalry and other troops, Suvala's son, Sakuni, as also the great car-warrior Uluka, proceeded with others.

27. The great bowmen amongst the Pandavas, those chastisers of foes, dividing themselves, O king, into three divisions, rushed against your troops.

28. Dhrishtadyumna and Shikhandin and the great car-warrior Satyaki proceeded quickly against the army of Shalya.

29. Then king Yudhisthira, accompanied by his soldiers, rushed against Shalya alone, with a view to kill him, O best of Bharata's race.

30. Arjuna, the slayer of foes, rushed against that great bowman, Kritavarman, and the Samsaptakas.

31. Bhimasena and the great car-warriors among the Somakas rushed, O monarch, against Kripa, desirous of killing their enemies in battle.

32. The two sons of Madri, accompanied by their soldiers, proceeded against Sakuni and the great car-warrior Uluka at the head of their forces.

33. Similarly, thousands of warriors, of your army, armed with various weapons and filled with anger, proceeded against the Pandavas in that battle.

Dhritarashtra said :—

34—35. After the fall of the great bowmen Bhishma and Drona and the great car-warrior Karna, and after both the Kurus and the Pandavas had been lessened in numbers, and when the powerful Parthas became once more angry in battle, what, O Sanjaya, was the strength of each of the armies.

Sanjaya said :—

36. Hear, O king, how we and the enemy both stood for battle on that occasion, and what was then the relative strength of the two armies.

37—38. Eleven thousand cars, O best of Bharata's race, ten thousand and seven hundred elephants, and two hundred horse, and three millions of foot, formed our army.

39—40. Six thousand cars, six thousand elephants, ten thousand horse, and one million of foot, O Bharata, were the remnant of the Pandava force in that battle. These, O best of Bharata's race, met each other for battle.

41. Having divided our armies in this way, O king, we, worked up with wrath and filled with the desire of victory, rushed against the Pandavas, under the command of the king of the Madras.

42. Similarly, the brave Pandavas, those foremost of men, desirous of killing their enemies, encountered one another early in the morning, O king.

44. Then took place a dreadful encounter between your soldiers and the enemy, the warriors being all engaged in striking and slaughtering one another.

CHAPTER IX.

(SHALYA PARVA).—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Then took place the battle between the Kurus and the Srinjayas, O king, that was as fierce and awful as that between the celestials and the Asuras.

2. Men and cars and elephants, and elephant-warriors and horsemen by thousands and horses, all very powerful, encountered one another.

3. The loud noise of the rushing of dreadful elephants was then heard there, resembling the roars of the clouds in the sky in the rains.

4. Some car-warriors, struck by elephants, were deprived of their cars. Dispersed by those infuriate animals, other brave heroes ran away.

5. Well-trained car-warriors, O Bharata, with their arrows, killed a number of cavalry and infantry that urged and protected the elephants.

6. Well-trained horsemen, O king, surrounding great car-warriors, moved about in the field, striking and slaying the latter with spears and darts and swords.

7—8. Some bowmen, surrounding great car-warriors, killed them. Encompassing elephants and great warriors of their own class, other great car-warriors killed some mighty one amongst them that fought in the field moving about on all sides.

9. Similarly, O king, elephants, encircling individual car-warriors worked up with rage and shooting arrows, killed them.

10. Elephant-warrior rushing against elephant-warrior, and car-warrior against car-warrior, in that battle, killed each other with darts and lances and Narachas, O Bharata.

11. Cars and elephants and horses, crushing foot-soldiers in the midst of battle, made a confusion all over.

12. Adorned with yak-tails, horses rushed on all sides, looking like the swans found on the plains at the foot of Himavat. In their speed they seemed as if ready to devour the very earth.

13. The field, O king, marked with the hoofs of horses, looked beautiful like a beautiful woman bearing the marks of (her lover's) nails on her person.

14—15. With the sound caused by the trampling of horses, the wheels of cars, the shouts of foot-soldiers, the grunts of elephants, the beating of drums and other musical instruments, and the blare of conchs, the earth began to resound as if with deafening peals of thunder.

16. On account of twanging bows and flashing swords and the glittering armour of the worriors everything was so confused there that nothing could be distinctly seen.

17. Numerous arms, chopped off from human bodies, and looking like the tusks of elephants, jumped up and moved furiously about.

18. The sound, made, O monarch, by heads falling on the field of battle, resembled that made by the falling fruits of palmyra trees.

19. Covered with those lifeless heads with upturned eyes, that were exceedingly mangled the field of battle, O king, looked resplendent as if covered with full-blown lotuses.

21. With the fallen arms of the warriors smeared with sandal and adorned with rich Keyuras, the Earth looked resplendent as if strewn with the rich poles set up in Indra's honor.

22. The battle-field was covered with the thighs of kings, cut off in that battle and looking like the trunk of elephants.

23. Covered with hundreds of headless trunks and strewn with umbrellas and yak-yails, that vast army looked beautiful like a blossoming forest.

24. Then, on the field of battle, O monarch, warriors moved about fearlessly, their limbs bathed in blood and, therefore, looking like flowering Kinsukas.

25. Elephants also, wounded with arrows and lances, dropped down here and there like broken clouds dropped from the sky.

26. O king, killed by great warriors, elephant-divisions were dispersed in all directions like clouds scattered by the wind.

27. Those elephants, resembling clouds dropped on the earth like mountains clapped by a thunder, O lord, at the time of the universal dissolution.

28. Horses with their drivers lay in masses on the ground like so many mountains.

29. A river was formed on the field o. battle, flowing towards the other world. Blood formed its waters, and cars its eddies, Standards were its trees, and bones its pebbles.

30. The arms were its alligators, bows its current, elephants its large rocks, and its smaller ones. Fat and marrow constituted its mire, umbrellas its swans, and maces its rafts.

31. Abounding with armour and head-gears, banners formed its beautiful trees. Wheels formed its swarms of Chakravakas and it was covered with Trivenus and Dandas.

32. Filling the brave with joy and increasing the fears of the timid, that fierce river flowed the shores of which were filled with Kurus and Srinjayas.

33. Those brave warriors, with arms resembling bludgeons, by the aid of their cars and animals, acting as rafts and boats, crossed that dreadful river which flowed towards the region of the dead.

34. During the course of that battle, O king, in which no consideration was showed by any body for any one, and which with awful destruction of the four fold forces, resembled the battle between the celestials and the Asuras in the days of yore.

35. Some warriors, O scorcher of foes, loudly called upon their kinsmen and friends. Some, called upon by crying kinsmen, returned stricken with fear.

36. During the course of that fierce and dreadful battle, Arjuna and Bhimasena stupified their foes.

37. Your army, O king thus destroyed, swooned away on the field, like a woman under the influence of liquor.

38. Having stupified that army, Bhimasena and Dhananjaya blew their conchs and sent forth leonine roars.

39. On hearing that loud sound Dhristadyumna and Shikhandin, placing king Yudhisthira at their head, rushed against the king of the Madras.

40. Highly wonderful and terrible, O monarch, was the manner in which those heroes, in a body and separately, fought with Shalya.

41. The two energetic sons of Madri, masters of weapons, and invincible in battle, proceeded quickly against your army worked up with the desire of victory.

42. Then your army, O best of Bharata's race, wounded greatly with arrows by the Pandavas eager for victory, took to their heels in the battle.

43. Thus struck and dispersed by strong bowmen, O king, that army fled away on all sides in the presence of your sons.

44. Exclamations of Oh and Alas, O Bharata, arose from among your warriors while some illustrious Kshatriyas among the dispersed combatants, desirous of victory, cried out, saying,—stop, stop.

45. Despite it, your troops routed by the Pandavas, fled away leaving behind on the field, their dear sons and brothers and maternal uncles and sisters, and relatives by marriage and other kinsmen.

46. Driving their horses and elephants to a great speed, thousands of warriors fled away O foremost of Bharata's race, anxious to secure their personal safety only.

CHAPTER X.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Beholding the army thus scattered the brave king of the Madras addressed his driver, saying,—"Quickly urge these horses fleet as thought.

2. There stands king Yudhisthira, the son of Pandu, shining with the umbrella held over his head.

3. Reach me there quickly O driver, and witness my power. The Parthas are unable to stand before me in battle."

4. Thus addressed the driver, of the Madra king, proceeded where stood the righteous king Yudhisthira of sure aim.

5. Shalya suddenly attacked the mighty army of the Pandavas. Alone he withstood it like the continent withstanding the surging deep.

6. The huge army of the Pandavas, coming against Shalya, O sire, stood still in that battle, like the rushing deep upon being obstructed by a mountain.

7. Beholding the king of the Madras standing for battle on the field, the Kouravas returned, making death their goal.

8. After they had come back, O king, and separately taken up their positions in a well-formed array, an awful encounter took place in which blood flowed freely like water. The invincible Nakula encountered Chitrasena.

9—10. These two heroes, both excellent bowmen, approaching, covered each other with downpours of arrows in that battle, like two pouring clouds risen in the sky on the south and the north. I could mark no difference between the son of Pandu and his antagonist.

11. Both of them were masters of weapons, both very powerful and both were experienced car-warriors. Each determined upon killing the other, they carefully looked for each other's weak point.

12. Then, O king, with a broad-headed arrow, well-tempered and sharp Chitrasena cut off Nakula's bow at the handle.

13. Fearlessly then the son of Karna struck the bowless Nakula at the forehead with three gold-winged arrows whetted on stone.

14. With a few more sharp arrows he killed Nakula's horses. Next he struck down both the standard and the driver of his antagonist, each with three arows.

15. With those three arrows shot off the arms of his foe and striking his forehead, Nakula, O king, looked beautiful like a mountain of three summits.

16. Deprived of his bow and his car, the brave Nakula, taking up a sword, jumped down from his car like a lion from a mountain summit.

17. As, however, he rushed on foot, his antagonist discharged a shower of arrows upon him. The highly active Nakula received that downpour of arrows on his shield.

18. Getting at the car of Chitrasena, the mighty-armed hero, the untiring son of Pandu, conversant with all modes of warfare, appeared before the troops.

19. The son of Pandu then cut off from Chitrasena's trunk his diadem-decked head, adorned with ear-rings, and bedecked with a beautiful nose and a pair of large eyes. At this, Chitrasena, effulgent like the Sun, dropped down on the terrace of his car.

20. Beholding Chitrasena killed all the great car-warriors shouted there like lions and lauded him.

21. Meanwhile, beholding their brother slain, the two sons of Karna, viz,, Sushena and Satyasena, both of whom were great car-warriors, made a downpour of sharp arrows.

22. Those foremost of car-warriors rushed quickly against the son of Pandu like a pair of tigers, O king, in the deep forest rushing against an elephant for slaying him.

23. Both of them covered the great car-warrior Nakula with keen arrows. When they discharged arrows, they looked like two masses of clouds pouring rain in torrents.

24. Though wounded with arrows all over his body the valiant and heroic son of Pandu cheerfully took up another bow after getting upon another car, and stood in battle like the angry Destroyer himself.

25. Then those two brothers, O king, with their straight arrows, cut off Nakula's car into pieces.

26. Then Nakula, laughing, struck the four horses of Satyasena with four whetted and keen arrows in that encounter.

27. Shooting a long gold-winged shaft the son of Pandu then cut off, O king, the bow of Satyasena.

28. At this the latter, mounting on another car and taking up another bow, as also his brother Sushena, rushed against the son of Pandu.

29. The brave son of Madri fearlessly struck each of them, O monarch, with a couple of arrows.

30. Then worked up with wrath, the mighty car-warrior Sushena, cut off, in that battle, the formidable bow of Pandu's son with a razor-shaped arrow.

31. Then Nakula, beside himself with rage, took up another bow and struck Sushena with five arrows and his standard with one.

32. Without losing a moment, he then cut off the bow and the leathern fence of Satyasena also, at which all the troops there sent up a loud shout.

33. Satyasena, taking up another foe-slaying and powerful bow, covered the son of Pandu with arrows on all sides.

34. Baffling those arrows Nakula, that slayer of hostile heroes, struck each of his antagonists with a couple of arrows.

35. Each of the latter separately struck the son of Pandu in return with many straight coursing arrows. Afterwards they struck Nakula's driver also with many keen arrows.

36. The brave and light-handed Satyasena then cut off without his brother's help the shafts of Nakula's car and his bow with a couple of arrows.

37. The great car warrior Nakula, however, standing on his car, took up a golden mounted and keen dart steeped in oil and exceedingly bright.

38. It resembled, O king, a she-snake of dreadful poison, frequently darting out her tongue. Raising that weapon he hurled it at Satyasena in that battle.

39. That dart, O king, cut the heart of Satyasena in that battle into a hundred pieces and he fell down dead upon the Earth from his car.

40. Beholding his brother killed Sushen, beside himself with rage, suddenly made Nakula carless in that battle. Without losing a moment, he poured arrows over the son of Pandu fighting on foot.

41. Seeing Nakula carlees, the mighty car-warrior Sutasoma, the son of Draupadi rushed, there for rescuing his father in battle.

42. Riding then the car of Sutasoma, Nakula, that hero of Bharata's race, looked beautiful like a lion upon a mountain. Then taking up another bow, he fought with Sushena.

43. Those two great car-warriors, approaching each other, and discharging arrows, tried to kill each other.

44. Then Sushena, filled with rage, struck the son of Pandu with three arrows and Sutasoma with twenty in the arms and the chest.

45. At this the impetuous Nakula, O king, that slayer of hostile heroes, covered all the points of the compass with shafts.

46. Then taking up a sharp and powerful arrow having a semi-circular head, Nakula shot it with great force at Karna's son in that battle.

47. With that arrow, O best of kings, the son of Pandu cut off from Sushena's trunk his head before all the troops. That feat was highly wonderful.

48. Thus killed by the illustrious Nakula Karna's son dropped down like a tall tree on the bank of a river thrown down by the current of the river.

49. Seeing the destruction of Karna's son and the power of Nakula, your army, O best of Bharatas, fled away in fear.

50. Their Genernal however, the brave and valiant king of the Madars, that represser of foes, then protected, O king, those troops in battle.

51. Rallying his army, O king, Shalya stood fearlessly in battle sending forth leonine shouts and twanging his bow fiercely.

52. Then your soldiers O king, protected in battle by that firm bowman, cheerfully rushed against the enemy once more from all sides.

53. Those great warriors, encircling that great bowman, the king of the Madras, stood, O king, desirous of fighting on every side.

54—55. Then Satyaki, and Bhimasena, and those two Pandavas, the twin sons of Madri, placing that modest chastiser of foes, Yudhishthira, at their head, and surrounding him on all sides in that battle, sent up leonine roars. And those heroes also caused a loud sound of the arrows and frequently sent up war-cries.

56. Smilingly, all your warriors, enraged, quickly encompassed the king of the Madras and stood there for battle.

57. Then took place on encounter filling the coward with fear, between your soldiers and the enemy, both of whom were bent upon meeting with death.

58. The battle between fearless combatants resembled, O king, that between the gods and the Asuras in days of yore and increased the population of Yama's kingdom.

59. Then the ape-emblemed son of Pandu, O king, having killed the Samsaptakas in battle, rushed against the Kauravas.

60. Smiling, all the Pandavas, headed by Dhrishtadyumna, proceeded against the same detachment discharging keen arrows.

61. Overpowered by the Pandavas, the Kaurva army were stupified. Indeed, those divisions then could not distinguish the cardinal and the minor points of the compass.

62. Covered with keen arrows shot by the Pandavas, the Kaurva army, deprived of its foremost warriors, were routed on all sides. Indeed, O Kauravya, your army were killed by the mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas.

63. Similarly, the Pandava army, O king, were killed in hundreds and thousands in that battle by your sons on every side with their arrows.

64. While the two armies, in their excitement, were thus killing each other, they became much agitated like two streams in the rains.

65. During the onset of that dreadful fight, O king, a great fear possessed your warriors as also those of the Pandavas.

CHAPTER XI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1—6. When the troops, killed by one another, were thus agitated, when many of the heroes took to their heels and the elephants sent up loud roars, when the infantry in that dreadful battle began to shout and cry aloud, when the horse, O king, ran in various directions, when the slaughter became dreadful, when a terrible onslaught of creatures took place, when various weapons clashed with one another, when car and elephants were mixed up, when heroes were delighted and cowards became afraid,—when warriors encountered one another in order to kill them,—on that awful occasion of carnage, that increased the denizens of Yama's kingdom, the Pandavas killed your troops with keen arrows, and similarly your troops slew those of the Pandavas.

7—8. During that awe-inspiring battle, during the progress of the battle faught about the hour of sun-rise, the Pandava heroes, of good aim, protected by the high-souled Yudhishthira, fought with your forces, making death itself their goal.

9. The Kuru army, O Kuru chief, encountering the proud and powerful Pandavas skilled in striking and of sure aim, became weakened and agitated like a herd of she-deer frightened at a forest fire.

10. Seeing that army weakened and helpless like a cow sunk in mire, Shalya, desirous of rescuing it, proceeded against the Pandava army.

11. Enraged the king of the Madras, taking up an excellent bow, rushed for battle against the Pandavas.

12. The Pandavas also, O king, in that battle, filled with the desire of victory, proceeded against the king of the Madras and struck him with keen arrows.

13. The powerful king of the Madras struck that army with showers of keen arrows before the very eyes of the righteous king.

14. The Earth, with her mountains, shook, making a loud noise.

15. Meteors, keen pointed and bright like lances, dropped on Earth from the sky piercing the air.

16. Large numbers of deer and buffaloes and birds, O king, passed by the left of your army O king.

17. The planets Venus and Mars, in conjunction with Mercury, appeared at the back of the Pandavas and at the front of all the Kauravas.

18. Blazing flames came out from the points of weapons, dazzling the eyes of the warriors. Crows and owls sat upon the heads of the combatants and on the tops of their standards.

19. Then a fierce encounter took place between the Kauravas and the Pandavas assembled together in large bodies.

20. Then O king, the Kauravas, collecting all their detachments, rushed against the Pandavas.

21. Shalya, who never knew depression, then poured showers of arrows on Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, like the thousand-eyed Indra pouring rain in torrents.

22—23. He struck Bhimasena, the five sons of Draupadi, the two sons of Madri by Pandu, Dhrishtadyumna, the grand-son of Shini, Shikhandin each with ten gold-winged arrows whetted on stone.

24. Indeed, he began to discharge his arrows like Indra pouring rain at the close of the summer season.

25. Then the Prabhadrakas, O king, and the Somakas, were killed by thousands by Shalya's arrows.

26. The arrows of Shalya, as swarms of bees or flights of locusts, were seen to fall, like thunder bolts from the clouds.

27. Elephants and horses and foot-soldiers and car-warriors, assailed with Shalya's arrows, fell down or strayed away bewailing loudly.

28. Beside himself with rage the ruler of the Madras covered his foes in that battle like the Destroyer at the end of the cycle.

29. The Pandava army, thus killed by Shalya, ran towards Yudhishthira the son of Kunti.

30. Light-handed Shalya, having in that battle struck them with whetted arrows, began to assail Yudhishthira with a down-pour of arrows.

31. Beholding Shalya rushing towards him with horse and foot, king Yudhishthira, worked up with wrath, checked him with sharp arrows, even as an infuriate elephant is checked with iron-hooks.

32. Then Shalya shot a dreadful arrow at Yudhishthira that resembled a snake of dreadful venom. Piercing through the high-souled son of Kunti, that arrow quickly dropped down the Earth.

33. Then Vrikodara, enraged, pierced Shalya with seven arrows, and Sahadeva pierced him with five, and Nakula with ten.

34. The five sons of Draupadi poured upon that heroic and impetuous Artayani, showers of arrows like clouds pouring rain upon a mountain.

35. Beholding Shalya struck by the Parthas on every side, both Kritavarman and Kripa proceeded in anger there.

36. The greatly energetic Uluka, Shakuni, the son of Suvala, and the great car-warrior Ashwathaman smiling and all your sons protected Shalya every way in that battle.

37. Piercing Bhimasena with three arrows Kritavarman, discharging a mass of arrows, checked that warrior who was as if the personification of wrath.

38. Excited with anger, Kripa struck Dhrishtadyumna with numberless arrows. Shakuni rushed against the sons of Draupadi, and Ashwathaman against the twins.

39. That foremost of warriors, the energetic Duryodhana, rushed in that battle, against Keshava and Arjuna, and struck them both with many arrows.

40. Thus hundreds of dreadful encounters, O king, took place between your army and the enemy, on the various parts of the field.

41. The chief of the Bhojas then killed the brown horses of Bhimasena's car in that encounter. The son of Pandu, deprived of his horses, alighting from his car, began to fight with his mace, like the Destroyer himself with his uplifted bludgeon.

42. The king of the Madras then killed the horses of Sahadeva before his eyes, and then Sahadeva killed Shalya's son with his sword.

43. The preceptor Gautama again fought with Dhristadyumna, both trying their level best.

44. The preceptor's son Ashwathama, not excited with anger and as if smiling in that battle, struck each of the five heroic sons of Draupadi with ten arrows.

45—46. Again the horses of Bhimasena were killed in that battle. He then quickly got down from his car, took up his mace like the Destroyer his rod in anger and crushed the horses of Kritavarman's car. Jumping down from his charriot Kritavarman fled away.

47. Shalya also, excited with anger, O king, killed many Somakas and Pandavas, and once more assailed Yudhisthira with many sharp arrows.

48. Then biting his lips and beside himself with rage, the valiant Bhima took up his mace in that battle and aimed it at Shalya for killing him.

49. It resembled the very rod of Yama, in the death-night, and was destructive of the lives of elephants and horses and human beings.

50. It was coated with a cloth of gold, looked like a burning metor, furnished with a sling, was fierce as a she-snake, hard as thunder, and made entirely of iron.

51. It was smeared with sandal-paste and other unguents like a desirable lady, pasted with marrow and fat and blood and resembled the very tongue of Yama.

52. It produced sounds on account of the bells attached to it, like unto the thunder of Indra. It resembled in shape a dreadful serpent that had just cast off its slough, soaked with the temporal juice of elephants.

53. It inspired the enemies with terror and the friends with joy. It was celebrated in the world and capable of riving mountain summits.

54. With this mace, the powerful son of Kunti had, in Kailasa, challenged the enraged Lord of Alaka, the friend of Maheshwara.

55. With this weapon Bhima, though resisted by many, had in anger killed a large number of proud Guhyakas endued with powers of illusion on the mount Gandhamadana for the sake of procuring Mandara flowers for Draupadi.

56. Taking up that mace which was set with diamonds and other gems, eight-sided and celebrated as Indra's thunder,—the mighty-armed son of Pandu now rushed against Shalya.

57. With that mace of dreadful sound Bhima, skilled in battle, crushed the four quick-coursing horses of Shalya.

58. Then the heroic Shalya, worked up with wrath, in that battle, hurled a lance at the broad chest of Bhima and sent forth a loud war-cry. That lance, cutting through the coat of mail of Pandu's son, entered into his person.

59. However taking out the weapon fearless Vrikodara struck therewith the driver of Shalya on the chest.

60. Cut to the quick, the driver, vomiting blood, fell down with a trembling heart. At this the king of the Madras got down from his car and looked at Bhima in depression.

61. Beholding his own attempt thus thwarted, Shalya was struck with wonder. Of quiescent soul, the king of the Madras took up his mace and began to eye his enemy.

62. Beholding that terrible feat of his in battle, the Parthas joyfully worshipped Bhima of untiring energy.

CHAPTER XII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'Seeing his charioteer fallen, Shalya, O king, quickly took up his mace made entirely of iron and stood firm as a hill.

2—3. Bhima, however, armed with his mighty mace, rushed impetuously towards Shalya who shone like the blazing Yuga fire or the Destroyer armed with the noose ro the Kailasa mountain with its summit or Vasava with his thunder, or Mahadeva with his trident, or an infuriate elephant in the forest.

4. At that time there arose the sound of thousands of conchs and trumpets and loud leonine roars increasing the joy of horses.

5. The warriors of both armies, looking at those two foremost of heroes from every side, lauded them both, saying—well done! well done.

6. Except the ruler of the Madras or Rama, that delighter of the Yadus, there is none else that can venture to stand the impetuousity of Bhima in battle.

7. Similarly except Bhima there is no other warrior that can venture to stand the force of the mace of the illustrious king of the Madras in battle.

8. Those two warriors Vrikodara and the king of the Madras, roaring like bulls, moved about in circles, frequently leaping up in the air.

9. In that encounter between those two best of men, no difference was perceptible between them either in their movement or in the manner of their holding the mace.

10. The mace of Shalya, coated with a shining cloth of gold that looked like a sheet of fire, made the on-lookers afraid.

11. The mace of the great Bhima, as he moved about in circles, looked like lighting in the midst of the clouds.

12. Struck by the king of Madras with his mace, the mace of Bhima, O king, sent forth scintillations of fire in the sky which was as if on fire.

13. Similarly struck by Bhima with his mace, the mace of Shalya produced a shower of burning coals.

14. Like two huge elephants striking each other with their tusks, or two huge bulls striking each other with their horns, those two heroes began to strike each other with their maces, like a pair of heroes striking each other with iron clubs.

15. On being struck with each other's mace, they soon became bathed in blood and looked more beautiful like two blossoming Kinshukas.

16. Struck by the king of the Madras on both his left and right, the mighty-armed Bhimasena stood firm like a mountain.

17. Similarly, though struck again and again with Bhima's mace, Shalya, O king, moved not like a mountain struck by an elephant with his tusks.

18. The sound caused by the strokes of the maces of those two best of men was heard on all sides like peals of thunder.

19. Having stopped for a moment those two energetic warriors once more, with uplifted maces, closed each other.

20. Again an encounter took place between those two warriors of superhuman power, each having advanced towards the other by eight steps, and each striking the other with his uplifted iron club.

21. Then desiring to reach each other, they once more moved about in circles. Both the expert warriors began to display their superiority of skill.

22. Uplifting their terrible weapons, they again struck each other like mountains striking each other with their summits at the time of an earthquake.

23. Struck heavily with each other's mace, both of them dropped down simultaneously like a couple of poles set up for Indra's worship.

24. Threat the brave warriors of both armies, cried Oh and Alas. Cut to the quick, both of them had become exceedingly agitated.

25. Then the powerful Kripa, taking up Shalya, that king of the Madras, on his own car, quickly took him away from the battle field.

26. Bhimasena, rising up, however, within the twinkling of an eye, and still reeling as if drunk, challenged, with an uplifted mace, the king of the Madras.

27. Then your warriors, armed with various weapons, fought with the Pandavas, causing the blowing and beating of various musical instruments.

28. Raising up arms, taking weapons and making a loud noise, O king, your warriors, led by Duryodhana, rushed against the army of the Pandavas.

29. Beholding the Kauravas the sons of Pandu, sending up leonine shouts, rushed against those warriors led by Duryodhana.

30. Then your son, O foremost of Bharatas, aiming at Chekitana amongst them, cut him deeply with a lance in the chest.

31. Thus struck by your son, Chekitand dropped in a faint down on his car, bathea in blood.

32. Seeing Chekitana slain, the great car-warriors among the Pandavas continually showered arrows (upon the Kauravas).

33. Indeed, the Pandavas, filled with the desire of victory, O king, moved about on all sides amongst your soldiers.

34. Kripa, and Kritavarman, and the powerful son of Suvala, placing the king of the Madras before them, fought with king Yudhishthira.

35. Duryodhana, O king, fought with heroic and powerful Dhrishtadyumna, the slayer of Bharadwaja's son.

36. Three thousand cars, O king, despatched by your son and headed by Drona's son, fought with Vijaya.

37. All those warriors, O king, were bent upon winning victory even at the sacrifice of their lives. Indeed, O king, your warriors entered into the midst of the Pandava army like swans into a large lake.

38. A fierce encounter then took place between the Kurus and the Pandavas, the combatants being worked up with the desire of killing one another and deriving great pleasure from giving and receiving blows.

39. During the progress, O king, of that battle in which great heroes were killed a terrible dust was raised by the wind.

40. From only the names we heard (of the Pandava warriors) that were uttered during that battle and from those (of the Kuru warriors) that were uttered by the Pandavas, we knew the heroes that fought with one another fearlessly.

41. That dust, however, O foremost of men, was soon dispelled by the blood that was shed, and all the points of the horizon became once more clear.

42. Indeed, during that terrible and and awful battle, no one, among either your warriors or those of the foe, took to his heels.

43. Desirous of going to the regions of Brahman and longing for victory by fair fight, the warriors displayed their prowess, worked up with the hope of heaven.

44. For paying off the debt they owed to their masters on account of the maintenance received, or bent upon achieving the objects of their friends and allies, the warriors, desirous of going to heaven, fought with one another.

45. Discharging various weapons, great car-warriors roared at and struck one another.

46. Slay, seize, strike, cut off,—these were the words that were heard in that battle, uttered by your people and those of the enemy.

47. Then Shalya, O king, desirous of killing him, struck king Yudhishthira, a mighty car-warrior, with many sharp arrows.

48. Acquainted with the vital parts of the body, the son of Pritha, however, O king, struck the king of the Madras with fourteen cloth-yard shafts, aiming at the latter's vital parts.

49. Resisting the son of Pandu with his arrows the illustrious Shalya, filled with ire and desirous of killing his antagonist, struck him in that battle with innumerable Kanka-feathered arrows.

50. Again, O king, he struck Yudhishthira with a straight shaft in the very presence of all the troops.

51. King Yudhishthira, possessed of great renown and filled with rage, cut the ruler of the Madras with many keen Kanka and peacock feathered arrows.

52. That mighty car-warrior then pierced Chandrasena with seventy arrows, and Shalya's driver with nine, and Drumasena with sixty four.

53. When the two protectors of his car-wheels were (thus) killed by the great son of Pandu, Shalya, O king, slew twenty five warriors among the Chedis.

54. And he struck Satyaki with twenty five keen arrows, and Bhimasena with seven, and the two sons of Madri with a hundred, in the battle.

55. While Shalya was thus fighting in that battle, that best of kings, the son of Pritha, shot at him many arrows that resembled snakes of virulent poison.

56. With a broad-headed arrow, Yudhishththira, the son of Kunti, then cut off from his car the standard of his antagonist as the latter stood before him.

57. We saw the standard of Shalya, which was thus cut off by the son of Pandu in that great battle, drop down like a mountain summit.

58. Seeing his standard fallen and observing the son of Pandu standing before him, the king of the Madras, worked up with rage, shot a number of shafts.

59. That foremost of Kshatriyas, viz., Shalya of great energy poured over the Kshatriyas in that battle dense showers of arrows like Indra pouring torrents of rain.

60. Piercing Satyaki and Bhimasena and the twin sons of Madri by Pandu, each with five arrows, he assailed Yudhishthira greatly.

61. We then, O king, beheld a net of arrows spread before the chest of Pandu's son like a mass of risen clouds.

62. The great car-warrior Shalya, in that battle, filled with rage, covered Yudhishthira with straight shafts.

63. At this, king Yudhishthira, afflicted with those arrows, felt himself deprived of his prowess, even as the Asura Jambha had become before the killer of Vritra.

CHAPTER XIII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'When king Yudhisthira was thus assailed by the king of the Madras, Satyaki and Bhimasena and the two sons of Madri by Pandu, encircling Shalya with their cars, began to assail him in that battle.

2. Beholding the helpless Shalya thus assailed by those great car-warriors loud sounds of applause were heard, and the Siddhas became filled with delight. The ascetics, assembled together, declared it wonderful.

3 Then Bhimasena in that battle, having cut Shalya who had become irresistible with one arrow, next struck him with seven.

4. Satyaki, desirous of rescuing the son of Dharma, struck Shalya with a hundred arrows and uttered a loud leonine roar.

5. Nakula struck him with five arrows, and Sahadeva with seven; the latter then once more struck him with as many.

6—7. The heroic king of the Madras, struggling carefully in that battle, thus afflicted by those great car-warriors, drew a formidable and strong bow capable of imparting great force to the shafts shot from it, and pierced Satyaki, with twenty-five arrows and Bhima with seventy-three and Nakula with seven.

8. Then cutting off with a broad-headed arrow the bow, with shaft fixed on the string, of Sahadeva, he struck Sahadeva himself in that battle, with seventy-arrows.

9. Sahadeva then, stringing another bow, pierced his maternal uncle with five arrows that resembled snakes of virulent poison or burning fire.

10. Worked up with great ire, he then struck his antagonist's driver with a straight shaft in that battle and then Shalya himself once more with three.

11. Then Bhimasena pierced the king of the Madras with seventy arrows, and Satyaki pierced him with nine, and king Yudhishthira with sixty.

12. Thus pierced, O king, by those mighty car-warriors, blood began to flow from Shalya's body, like red streams running down the breast of a mountain of red chalk.

13. Shalya, however, quickly struck in return each of those great bowmen with five arrows, O king. Exceedingly wonderful was this feat.

14. With another broad-headed arrow, that great car-warrior then, O sire, cut off the stringed bow, of Dharma's son in that battle.

15. Taking up another bow, that great car-warrior, viz., the son of Dharma, covered Shalya, his horses, and driver, and standard, and car, with many arrows.

16. Thus covered in that battle by the son of Dharma with his arrows Shalya struck the former with ten keen arrows.

17. Then Satyaki, enraged upon beholding the son of Dharma thus assailed with arrows, obstructed the heroic king of the Madras with clouds of arrows.

18. At this, Shalya cut off with a razor-faced arrow the terrible bow of Satyaki, and cut each of the other Pandava warriors with three arrows.

19. Enraged, O king, the highly powerful Satyaki then discharged at Shalya a golden lance set with many jewels and gems.

20. Bhimasena shot at him a cloth-yard shaft that looked like a blazing snake; Nakula discharged at him a dart, Sahadeva an excellent mace, and the son of Dharma a Sataghni, all actuated by the desire of killing him.

21. The king of the Madras, however, speedily counteracted in that battle all those weapons, shot off the arms of those five warriors at him, as these proceeded towards his car.

22. With a number of broad-headed arrows Shalya cut off the lance shot by Satyaki. Endued with valour and great lightness of hand, he cut off into two pieces the gold decked arrow shot at him by Bhima.

23. He then resisted with arrows the terrible gold-handled dart, that Nakula shot at him and the mace also that Sahadeva had hurled.

24. With a couple of other arrows, O Bharata, he cut off the Satagni shot at him by the king, in the very presence of the sons of Pandu, and uttered a loud leonine roar. The grandson of Sini, however, could not bear the defeat of his weapon in that battle.

25. Beside himself with rage Satyaki took up another bow, and cut the king of the Madras with two arrows and his driver with three.

26. At this, Shalya, O king, worked up with rage, deeply struck all of them with ten arrows, like persons piercing mighty elephants with sharp pointed lances.

27. Thus thwarted in that battle by the king of the Madras, O Bharata, those slayers of foes could not stand in front of Shalya.

28. Witnessing the prowess of Shalya, king Duryodhana considered the Pandavas, the Panchalas, and the Srinjayas as already killed.

29. Then, O king, the mighty-armed Bhimasena, determined to kill him, encountered the king of the Madras.

30. Nakula and Sahadeva and the powerful Satyaki, encompassing Shalya, shot their arrows at him from all sides.

31. Though surrounded by those four great bowmen and powerful car-warriors of the Pandavas, the valiant king of the Madras still fought with them.

32. Then, O king, the son of Dharma, in that dreadful encounter, quickly cut off with a razor-headed arrow one of the guards of Shalya's car-wheels.

33. When that brave and mighty car-warrior, the protector of Shalya's car-wheel, was thus killed, Shalya enshrouded the Pandava warriors with showers of arrows.

34—35. Beholding his troops covered with arrows, O king, king Yudhishthira began to think,—"Verily, how shall those weighty words of Madhava become true. I hope, the king the Madras, worked up with ire, will not destroy my army in battle.

36. Then the Pandavas, O elder brother of Pandu, with cars and elephants and horses approached the king of the Madras and began to assail him from all sides.

37. Like the wind scattering masses of clouds, the king of the Madras, in that battle, dispersed the shower of arrows and various other weapons.

38. We then saw the downpour of gold-winged arrows shot by Shalya, passing through welkin like as warm of locusts.

39. Indeed, those arrows, discharged by the king of the Madras from the rear of the battle, were seen to fall like a flght of birds.

40. With the golden shafts shot off the bow of the Madra king, the sky, O king, was so covered that there was not an inch of empty space.

41. Then a thick darkness was caused by the arrows shot by the powerful king of the Madras in that dreadful battle.

42. And when they saw the vast host of the Pandavas agitated by that hero, the gods and the Gandharvas were stricken with great wonder.

43. Assailing vigorously all the Pandava heroes with his arrows from every side, O sire, Shalya covered king Yudhisthira and roared repeatedly like a lion.

44. Thus covered by Shalya in that battle the great car-warriors of the Pandavas could not proceed against that great hero for fighting with him.

45. Those amongst them that were led by Bhimasena and king Yudhisthira did not fly away from the brave Shalya the ornament of battle.

CHAPTER XIV.

(SHALYA PARVA) –Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. In the meantime Arjuna, in that battle, struck with many arrows by the son of Drona as also by the latter's followers the heroic and mighty car-warriors among the Trigartas, pierced Drona's son in return with three arrows and each of the others with two. Again, the mighty armed Dhananjaya covered his enemies with showers of arrows.

3. Though struck with keen shafts and though they looked like porcupines on account of those arrows sticking to their body still your soldiers, O foremast of Bharatas did not fly from Partha in that battle.

4. Led by Drona's son they surrounded that great car-warrior and fought with him discharging many arrows.

5. The gold-decked arrows, O king, shot by them, quickly filled Arjuna's car.

6. Beholding those two great bowmen, those two foremost of all warriors, viz., the two Krishnas, covered with arrows, those invincible (Kaurava) warriors filled with joy.

7. The Kuvera, the wheels, the shaft, the terraces, the yoke, and the Anukarsha of Arjuna's car, were covered with arrows.

8. Never before, O king, had been either seen or heard the like of what your warriors then did unto Partha.

9. That car shone with those keen arrows of beautiful wings like a celestial car, blazing with hundreds of torches dropped on the earth.

10. Then Arjuna, O king, covered his enemies with showers of straight arrows like a cloud pouring torrents of rain on a mountain.

11. Struck in that battle with arrows with Partha's name engraven on them those heroes regarded the battle field as full of Parthas.

12. Then the Partha-fire, having arrows for its wonderful flames and the loud twang of Gandiva for the wind that increased it, began to consume the fuel of your soldiers.

13—16. Then were seen along the tracks of Partha's car, O Bharata, number of broken wheels, yokes, quivers, banners, standards, with the cars themselves that bore them, of arrows, and Anukarshas, Trivenus, axles, traces and goads, heads of warriors decked with ear-rings and head-gears, arms, thighs in thousands, of umbrellas along with fans, and of diadems and crowns.

17—18. Along the track of the angry Partha's car, the ground, covered with muddy blood, became impassable, O chief of the Bharatas, like the sporting ground of Rudra. The spectacle filled the coward with fear and the brave with joy.

19. Having destroyed two thousand cars with their fences, that scorcher of foes, Partha, appeared like a smokeless fire with blazing flames.

20. As the illustrious Agni blazes forth for destroying the mobile and the immobile creation so, O king, the mighty car-warrior Partha looked.

21. Beholding the prowess of Pandu's son in that battle, the son of Drona, on his car adorned with many banners, tried to check him.

22. Those two foremost of men both having white horses yoked to their cars quickly encountered each other, each desirous of killing the other.

23. The arrows discharged by both became exceedingly terrible and were as thick, O best of Bharatas, as the torrents of rain poured by two masses of clouds at the close of summer.

24. Each challenging the other, those two warriors struck each other with straight arrows in that battle, like a couple of bulls tearing each other with their horns.

25. The battle between them, O king, was equally fought for a long while. The din of weapons was horrible.

26. The son of Drona then, O Bharata, struck Arjuna with a dozen of powerful goldwinged arrows and Vasudeva with ten.

27. Having shown for a short while some respect for the preceptor's son in that great battle, Vibhatsu then, smiling, drew his bow Gandiva with force.

28. Immediately the great car-warrior Savyasachin deprived his antagonist of his horses, driver and car and without the least exertion struck him with three arrows.

29. Staying on that horseless car Drona's son, smiling, discharged, at the son of Pandu a heavy mallet that looked like a dreadful mace with iron spikes.

30. Seeing that weapon, which was covered with cloth of gold, come towards him, the heroic Partha, that killer of foes, cut it off into seven pieces.

31. Seeing his mallet cut off, Drona's son, in grest anger, took up a terrible mace adorned with iron spikes and looking like a mountain crest. Accomplished in warfare, the son of Drona discharged it at Partha.

32. Seeing that mace come towards him like the Destroyer himself in anger, Pandu's son Arjuna quickly cut it off with five excellent arrows.

33. Cut off with Partha's shaft in that great battle, that weapon dropped down on earth, riving the hearts, as it were, O Bharata, of the inimical kings.

34. The son of Pandu then struck Drona's son with three other arrows. Though deeply cut by the mighty Partha, the highly powerful Drona's son, depending upon his own manliness, displayed no sign of fear or agitation.

35. That great car-warrior, the son of Drona then, O king, covered Suratha with showers of arrows before the eyes of all the Kshatriyas.

36. At this, Suratha, the great car-warrior among the Panchalas, in that battle, riding upon his car whose rattle was as deep as the muttering of the clouds, proceeded against the son of Drona.

37. Drawing his best of bows capable of standing a great strain, the Panchala hero covered Ashwatthaman with arrows resembling flames of fire or snakes of virulent poision.

38. Seeing the great car-warrior Suratha proceed towards him in anger the son of Drona was filled with rage like a scorched snake.

39. Contracting his eye brow into three lines, and licking the corners of his mouth with his tongue, he looked at Suratha in anger and then touched his bowstring and shot a keen clothyard shaft resembling the dreadful rod of Death.

40. Endued with great force, that shaft struck the heart of Suratha and coming out entered the Earth riving her through like the thunder-bolt of Indra hurled from the sky.

41. Struck with that arrow Suratha fell down on the Earth like a mountain crest given with thunder.

42. After the fall of that hero, the valiant son of Drona, that foremost of car-warriors, speedily got upon the car of his slain enemy.

43. Then, O king, that warrior, invincible in battle, the son of Drona, well equipt with armour and weapons, and helped by the Samsaptakas, fought with Arjuna.

44. At noon, that battle between one and the many, increasing the denizens of Yama's abode, became exceedingly fierce.

45. The sight was wonderful. Arjuna, alone and unsupported, fought with all his foes simultaneously.

46. The encounter was highly terrific that took place between Arjuna and his enemies, resembling that between Indra, in days of yore, and the vast army of the Asuras.

CHAPTER XV.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. 'Duryodhana, O king, and Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, fought a dreadful fight with enough arrows and darts.

2. Both of them, O king shot arrows like showers of rain poured by the clouds in the rainy season.

3. Having struck with five arrows the slayer of Drona, viz., Prishata's son the Kuru king again struck him with seven arrows.

4. The powerful and steady Dhrishtadyumna, in that battle, assailed Duryodhana with seventy arrows.

5. Seeing the king thus assailed, O foremost of Bharatas, his brothers, accompanied by a large force, surrounded the son of Prishata.

6. Surrounded by those great warriors on every side, the Panchala hero, O king, moved in the battle-field, displaying his quickness in the use of weapons.

7. Helped by the Prabhadrakas, Shikhandin fought with the two Kuru bowmen, Kritavarman and the great car-warrior Kripa.

8. Then, O king, that battle became fierce and awful because the warriors were all bent upon sacrificing their lives.

9. Discharging arrows on all sides Shalya assailed the Pandavas with Satyaki and Vrikodara amongst them.

10. O king, with patience and great strength, the king of the Madras at the same time fought with the twins Nakula and Sahadeva, each of whom was powerful like the Destroyer himself.

11. The great car-warriors among the Pandavas who were wounded in that great battle with the arrows of Shalya, could not find a protector.

12. Seeing the just king Yuddishthira greatly assailed the heroic Nakula, the son of Madri, rushed with force against his maternal uncle.

13—14. Covering Shalya in that battle Nakula, that slayer of hostile heroes, smiling struck him in the breast with ten other arrows, made entirely of iron, polished by the smith, equipt with wings of gold, whetted on stone, and discharged from his bow with great force.

15. Assailed by his illustrious nephew, Shalya struck him in return with many sraight arrows.

16. Then king Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Satyaki, and Sahadeva the son of Madri, all rushed against the king of the Madras.

17. That vanquisher of foes, the commander of the Kuru army, received in that battle all those heroes that rushed towards him vehemently filling the cardinal and the subsidary points of the compass with the rattle of their cars and causing the Earth to tremble.

18. Striking Yudhisthira with three arrows and Bhima with seven, Shalya pierced Satyaki with a hundred arrows in that battle and Sahadeva with three.

19. Then the king of the Madras, O sire, cut off, with a razor-headed arrow, the bow with arrow fixed on it of the great Nakula.

20. Taking up another bow, Madri's son quickly covered the king of the Madras with winged arrows.

21. Then Yudhishthira and Sahadeva, each struck the king of the Madras with ten arrows on the breast.

22. Rushing at the ruler of the Madras Bhimasena and Satyaki both struck him with Kanka-feathered arrows, the former with sixty, and the latter with nine.

23. Enraged at this, the ruler of the Madras struck Satyaki with nine arrows and again with seventy straight arrows.

24. Then, O king, he cut off at the handle the bow, with arrow fixed on it, of Satyaki and then killed the four horses of the latter.

25. Having made Satyaki carless, that great car-warrior, the king of the Madras, struck him with a hundred arrows from all sides.

26. He next struck the two angry sons of Madri, and Bhimasena the son of Pandu and Yudhishthira, O Kuru chief, with ten arrows each.

27. The prowess of the king of the Madras was highly wonderful, since the Parthas, even in a body, could not approach him in that battle.

28. Riding then upon another car, the mighty and powerful Satyaki, seeing the Pandavas assailed and yeilding to the king of the Madras, rushed quickly against him.

29. Shalya rushed, on his car, against the car of Satyaki, like one infuriate elephant against another.

30. The encounter between Satyaki and the heroic king of the Madras, became fierce and wonderful to look at like that which had taken place in the days of yore between the Asura Shamvara and Indra.

31. Seeing the king of the Madras stay before him in that battle, Satyaki struck him with ten arrows.

32. Deeply struck by that great warrior, the king of the Madras struck Satyaki in return with sharp arrows adorned with beautiful feathers.

33. Beholding the king of the Madras struck by Satyaki those great bowmen the Parthas, quickly rushed towards him with a view to kill him.

34—35. The encounter, between those struggling heroes marked by a great flow of blood, was highly dreadful like that which takes place between a number of roaring lions fighting for a piece of meat.

36. With the thick downpour of arrows shot by them, the Earth was entirely covered and the sky was converted into one mass of arrows.

37. Indeed, with the arrows shot by those illustrious warriors a shadow, like that of the clouds, was caused there.

38. Then, O king, with those shining and gold winged arrows shot by warriors, that resembled snakes that had just cast off their sloughs, the points of the horrizon were as if ablaze.

39. Shalya, that slayer of foes, performed a wonderful deed because that hero, alone, unaided, fought with many arrows in that battle.

40. The Earth was covered with the dreadful Kanka and peacock feathered arrows that fell from the hands of the king of the Madras.

41. Then, O king, we beheld the car of Shalya moving about in that dreadful battle like the car of Shakra in days of yore on the occasion of the destruction of the Asuras.

CHAPTER XVI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'Then, O king, your soldiers, led by Shalya, once more rushed against the Parthas in that battle with great impetuosity.

2. Although assailed still those troops, who were fierce in battle, rushing against the Parthas, very soon agitated them on account of the superiority in numbers.

3. Struck by the Kurus, the Pandava troops, in the very presence of the two Krishnas, could not stand in the field though checked by Bhimasena.

4. Worked up with anger Dhananjaya covered Kripa and his followers, as also Kritavarman, with showers of arrows.

5. Sahadeva checked Shakuni and his detachment. Nakula looked at the king of the Madras from his flanks.

6. The (five) sons of Draupadi opposed numerous kings (of the Kuru army). The Panchala prince Shikhandin checked the son of Drona.

7. Armed with his mace, Bhimasena opposed the king. Kunti's son Yudhishthira resisted Shalya at the head of his army.

8. Again an encounter took place between those pairs as they stood, among your warriors and those of the enemy, none of whom had ever retreated from fight.

9. Shalya performed a wonderful feat because alone he fought with the whole Pandava army.

10. Shalya, then, as he stood near Yudhishthira in that battle, looked like the planet Saturn near the Moon.

11. Afflicting the king with arrows that resembled venomous serpents Shalya proceeded against Bhima, covering him with showers of arrows.

12. Beholding the lightness of hand and mastery over weapons displayed by Shalya, both the armies spoke highly of him.

13. Assailed by Shalya, the Pandavas, exceedingly wounded, fled away, from the battle, disregarding orders of Yudhisthira to stop them.

14. While soldiers were thus being killed by the king of the Madras, Pandu's son king Yudhisthira was worked up with rage.

15. Relying upon his strength that powerful car-warrior began to assail the king of the Madras being determined upon either gaining victory or meeting with death.

16—17. Summoning all his brothers and also Krishna he said to them—" Bhishma and Drona and Karna, and other kings who fought for the Kauravas, have all died in battle. You all have shown valour and courage in the tasks alloted to you.

18. Only one portion about the great car-warrior Shalya remains. I desire to defeat that king of the Madras to-day in battle. I will now tell you my wishes about the accomplishment of that work.

19—20. These two heroes, viz., the two sons of Madravati will protect my wheels. They are heroes whom even Vasava himself cannot defeat. Observing the duties of a Kshatriya these two, that deserve every honor and are firm in their vows, will fight with their maternal uncle.

21. Either Shalya will kill me in battle or I will kill him. Blessed be ye. Listen to these true words, O foremost of heroes n the world.

22. Observing Kshatriya duties I will fight with my maternal uncle, determined to either win victory or be slain.

23. Let them that furnish cars quickly supply my car according to the rules of science, with all kinds of weapons and implements more than what Shalya possesses.

24. The grandson of Shini will protect my right wheel, and Dhristadyumna my left. Let Pritha's son Dhananjaya guard my rear to-day.

25. And let Bhima, the foremost of warriors, fight in my front. I shall thus be superior to Shalya in the great battle that will soon take place."

26. Thus accosted by the king, all his well-wishers did what they were asked to do.

27. Then the Pandava troops were again filled up with joy, especially the Panchalas, the Somakas, and the Matsyas.

28. Having made that vow, the king proceeded against the king of the Madras. The Panchalas then blew and beat numberless conchs and drums and sent up eonine roars.

29. Endued with great activity and worked up with ire they rushed, with loud shouts of joy, against the king of the Madras, that foremost of the Kurus.

30. And they made the earth resound with the noise of the elephant's bells and the loud sound of conchs and trumpets.

31. Then your son and the brave king of the Madras, like the rising and setting hills, received those assailants.

32. Bragging Shalya poured a shower of arrows on that chastiser of foes, king Yudhisthira like Indra pouring rain.

33. Also, having taken up his beautiful bow, the great king of the Kurus displayed various lessons received by him from Drona.

34. And beautifully, quickly, and with great skill, he made successive downpours of arrows. As he moved about in battle, none could mark anything in him.

35. The powerful Shalya and Yudhisthira wounded each other, like a couple of tigers fighting for a piece of meat.

36. Bhima fought with your son, the delighter in battle. Dhristadyumna, Satyaki and the two sons of Madri by Pandu received Shakuni and the other Kuru heroes around.

37. On account of your vile policy, O king, there again occurred a dreadful battle between your people and those of the foe, all of whom were actuated with the desire of victory.

38. Aiming at the gold-decked standard of Bhima, Duryodhana then, with a straight arrow, cut it off in that battle.

39. The beautiful standard of Bhimasena, adorned with many bells, dropped down, O giver of honors.

40. Again the king, with a sharp razor-faced arrow, cut off the beautiful bow of Bhima resembling the trunk of an elephant.

41. Gifted with great energy Bhima, who had been deprived of his bow, then displaying his prowess, struck on the chest of your son with a dart. Thereat your son sat down on the terrace of his car.

42. When Duryodhana fainted Vrikodara, with a razor-faced arrow, cut off the head of his driver from his trunk.

43. Deprived of their driver the horses, of Duryodhana's car, ran wildly on all sides, O Bharata, dragging the car after them, at which the Kurus bewailed loudly.

44. Then the great car-warrior Ashwathaman, and Kripa, and Kritavarman, followed that car, with a view to save your son.

45. Thereat the troops were exeedingly agitated. The followers of Duryodhana were terrified. At that time the wielder of Gandiva, drawing his bow, began to kill them with his arrows.

46. Then filled with rage, Yudhisthira rushed against the king of the Madras, himself driving his horses white as ivory and fleet as mind.

47. We then saw some thing wonderful in Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, for though very mild by nature he then became highly terrific.

48. With eyes opened wide and body trembling in anger the son of Kunti killed hostile warriors in hundreds and thousands with sharp arrows.

49. Many soldiers were overthrown by him, O king, like mountain summits broken with thunder.

50. Striking down cars with steeds and drivers and standards and throwing down many car-warriors, Yudhisthira, without any help, began to sport there like a powerful wind dissipating masses of clouds.

51. Filled with anger, he killed horses with riders and horses without riders and the infantry by thousands in that battle, like Rudra destroying living creatures at the time of the universal dissolution.

52. Having made the field empty by discharging his arrows on all sides, Yudhisthira proceeded against the king of the Madras and said,—Wait, Wait.

53. Beholding the feats of that hero of terrible deeds, all your warriors were filled with fear. Shalya, however, rushed against him.

54. Both of them, in anger, blew their respective conchs. Returning and challenging each other, each then met the other.

55. Then Shalya enshrouded Yudhisthira with showers of arrows. Likewise the son of Kunti covered the king of the Madras with showers of arrows.

56. Then those two heroes, Shalya and Yudhisthira, wounded in that battle with each other's arrows and bathed in blood, looked,

57. Like a blossoming Salmali and a Kinsuka. Resplendent and invincible in battle, those two illustrious warriors sent up loud war-cries.

58—59. Beholding them both, the soldiers could not decide which of them would win. Whether the son of Pritha would enjoy the Earth, having killed the king of the Madras, or, Shalya, having slain the son of Pandu, would bestow the Earth on Duryodhana, could not be decided, O Bharata, by the warriors present there. King Yudhisthira, in the course of that battle, placed his enemy to his right.

60. Then Shalya shot a century of best arrows at Yudhisthira. With another sharp arrow, he cut off the latter's bow.

61. Taking up another bow, Yudhishthira struck Shalya with three hundred arrows and cut off the latter's bow with a razor-faced arrow.

62. The son of Pandu then killed the four horses of his antagonist with some straight arrows. With two other very sharp arrows he then cut off the two Parshni drivers of Shalya.

63. Then with another shining, well-tempered, and sharp arrow, he cut off the standard of Shalya who stood before him. Then, O chastiser of foes, the army of Duryodhana were scattered.

64. The son of Drona, at this time, speedily proceeded towards the king of the Madras who had been reduced to that strait, and quickly taking him up on his own car, fled away.

65. After the two had gone for a moment, they heard Yudhisthira cry aloud. Stopping, the ruler of the Madras he then got upon another well equipt car.

66. That best of cars had a rattle deep as the muttering of the clouds. Well furnished with weapons and instruments and all kinds of utensils, that vehicle made the hairs of foes stand erect.

CHAPTER XVII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Taking up another very strong bow the king of the Madras struck Yudhisthira and roared like a lion.

2. Then that best of Kshatriyas, of great energy, poured upon all the Kshatriyas showers of arrows even like Indra pouring rain in torrents.

3. Piercing Satyaki with ten arrows and Bhima with three and Sahadeva with as many, he assailed Yudhisthira greatly.

4. And he assailed all the other great bowmen with their horses and cars and elephants with many arrows like hunters assailing elephants with burning rods.

5. That foremost of car-warriors destroyed elephants and elephant-riders, horses and horse-men, and cars and car-warriors.

6. And he cut off the arms of combatants holding weapons and the standards of cars, and filled the earth with (slain) warriors like the sacrificial altar with blades of Kuca grass.

7. Then the Pandus, the Panchalas, and the Somakas, encompassed angrily that hero who was thus killing their soldiers like all-destroying Death.

8. Bhimasena, and the grandson of Shini and those two foremost of men, the two sons of Madri surrounded that hero while he was fighting with the highly powerful (Pandava) king. And all of them challenged him to battle.

9. Then those heroes, O king, having obtained the king of the Madras, that best of warriors in battle, opposed that first of men in that encounter and began to strike him with powerful winged arrows.

10. Potected by Bhimasena, and the two sons of Madri, and Krishna the royal son of Dharma struck the king of the Madras on the chest with powerful winged arrows.

11. Then beholding the king of the Madras greatly wounded with arrows in that battle, the car-warriors and other combatants of your army, clad in mail and armed with weapons, surrounded him on all sides at Duryodhan's behest.

12. The king of the Madras at this time quickly struck Yudhisthira with seven arrows in that battle. The great son of Rritha, O king, in return, struck his foe with nine arrows in that dreadful battle.

13. Those two great car-warriors, viz., Shalya and Yudhisthira, began to cover each other with arrows bathed in oil and shot off bows drawn to their ears.

14. Those two best of kings, both gifted with great strength, both incapable of being defeated by foes and both foremost of car-warriors looking at each other's loop-holes, quickly and deeply struck each other's shafts.

15. The loud noise of their bows, bow-strings, and palms, resembled that of Indra's thunder as those great car-warriors showered upon each other innumerable arrows.

16. They moved about in the field of battle like two young tigers in the deep forest fighting for a piece of meat. Elated with the pride of prowess, they wounded each other like a couple of infuriate elephants of powerful tusks.

17. Displaying his vigor, then the illustrious king of the Madras struck the heroic Yudhishthira of terrible might in the chest with an arrow effulgent like the fire or the sun.

18. Deeply struck, O king, that best of Kurus, the illustrious Yudhishthira, then struck the king of the Madras with a well aimed arrow and was filled with joy.

19. Regaining his consiousness within a moment that foremost of kings viz., Shalya, powerful like Indra with eyes reddened in wrath, quickly struck the son of Pritha with a hundred arrows.

20. At this the illustrious son of Dharma, filled with rage, quickly struck Shalya's chest and then, without losing a moment, struck his golden mail with six arrows.

21. Filled with joy, the king of the Madras then, drawing his bow and having discharged many arrows, at last cut off, with a pair of razor-faced shafts, the bow of his royal foe.

22. The illustrious Yudhishthira then, taking a new and more powerful bow in that battle, struck Shalya with many keen pointed arrows from all sides like Indra striking the Asura Namuchi.

23. Cutting off the golden coats of mail of both Bhima and king Yudhishthira with nine arrows, the illustrious Shalya then struck the arms of both of them.

24. With another razor-faced arrow effulgent like the fire or the sun, he then cut off the bow of Yudhishthira. At this time Kripa, with six arrows, killed the king's driver who fell down in front of the car.

25. The king of the Madras then killed with four arrows the four horses of Yudhisthira. Having slain the horses of the king, the great Shalya then began to kill the soldiers of the royal son of Dharma.

26. When the (Pandava) king had been reduced to that plight, the great Bhimasena, quickly cutting off the bow of the Madra king with an arrow of great force, struck the king himself with a couple of arrows.

27. With another arrow he cut off the head of Shalya's driver from his trunk the middle of which was encased in mail. Beside himself with anger, Bhimasena next killed without a moment's delay, the four horses of his enemy.

28. That foremost of all bowmen, viz., Bhima, then covered with a hundred arrows that hero who, gifted with great energy, was moving about alone in the field. Sahadeva, the son of Madri, did the same. Beholding Shalya stupefied with those arrows, Bhima cut off his armour with other arrows.

29. His armour having been cut off by Bhimasena, the great king of the Madras, taking up a sword and a shield adorned with a thousand stars, leaped down from his car and rushed towards the son of Kunti. Cutting off the shaft of Nakula's car, the powerful Shalya rushed towards Yudhisthira.

30. Beholding him rushing with great force towards the king even like the Destroyer himself rushing in anger, Dhristadyumna and Sikhandin and the (five) sons of Draupadi and the grandson of Sini suddenly advanced towards him.

31. Then the illustrious Bhima cut off with ten arrows the matchless shield of that hero. With another broad-headed arrow he cut off the sword also of that warrior. Filled with joy at this, he cried aloud in the midst of the army.

32. Beholding that feat of Bhima, all the foremost car-warriors among the Pandavas were filled with joy. Laughing aloud, they uttered terrible roars and blew their moon-white conchs.

33. At that terrible noise the army, protected by your warriors, were depressed, covered with sweat, bathed in blood, exceedingly melancholy, and dispirited.

34. Assailed by those foremost of Pandava warriors headed by Bhimasena, the king of the Madras proceeded towards Yudhisthira, like a lion going to catch a deer.

35. Deprived of his car and horses, king Yudhisthira, looked like a blazing fire for the anger with which he was then excited. Beholding the king of the Madras before him, he rushed towards that foe with great force.

36. Recollecting the words of Govinda, he quickly set his heart on the destruction of Shalya. Indeed, king Yudhishthira, staying on his steedless and driverless car, waited to take up a dart.

37. Beholding that feat of Shalya and thinking that the person who had been alloted to him as his share was not yet killed the son of Pandu firmly made up his mind to do what Indra's yonger brother had advised him to do.

38. King Yudhishthira took up a dart whose handle was made of gold and set with gems and which was bright like gold. Rolling his wide open eyes, he looked at the king of the Madras, his heart filled with anger.

39. Thus looked at, O god among men, by that king of pure and sinless soul the king of the Madras was not reduced to ashes. This was indeed wonderful, O monarch.

40. The chief of the Kurus then hurled with great force at the king of the Madras that blazing dart of beautiful and fierce handle set with gems and corals.

41. All the Kauravas beheld that blazing dart sending forth scintillations of fire as it passed through the sky after having been dischargd with great force, like a large meteor dropping from the sky at the end of the cycle.

42. King Yudhishthira, in that battle, carefully discharged that dart which resembled the Death-night armed with the dreadful noose or the dreadful mother of Yama himself, and which like the Brahmana's curse, was of sure effect.

43. Carefully the sons of Pandu had always worshipped that weapon with scents, garland, seats and the best food and drinks. That weapon seemed to burn like the Samvartaka fire and was as dreadful as a rite performed according to the Atharvan of Angirasa.

44. Made by Tashtri the celestial architect for the use of Shiva it destroyed the vital airs and the bodies of all foes. It could destroy by its force the earth, the sky and all the reservoirs of water and animals of every description.

45. Adorned with bells, flags, gems, diamonds, lapis lazuli and equipt with a golden handle, the celestial Architect himself had made it with great care after having practised many vows. This fatal weapon was destructive of all haters of Brahma.

46. Having inspired it with many mantras, and impregnated it with terrible velocity by the exercise of great power and care, king Yudhishthira hurled it by the best path for the destruction of the king of the Madras.

47. Saying in a loud voice the words,—"you are killed, O wretch"—the king hurled it, even as Rudra had, in days of yore, shot his arrow for the destruction of the Asura Andhaka, extending his strong arm adorned with a beautiful hand, and dancing in anger.

48. Shalya cried aloud and tried to catch that excellent dart of great energy hurled by Yudhishthira with all his strength even as a fire leaps forth for catching the clarified butter poured over it.

49. Cutting through his very vitals and his fair and broad chest, that dart entered the Earth as easily as it would water without the slightest obstruction and carrying away the world-wide reputation of Shalya.

50. Covered with the blood that came out of his nostrils, eyes, ears and mouth, and that which flowed from his wound, he looked like the huge Krauncha mountain when it was pierced by Skanda.

51. His armour having been cut off by Yudhishthira the illustrious Shalya, strong as Indra's elephant, stretching his arms, dropped down on the Earth, like a mountain summit clapped by a thunder-bolt.

52. Stretching his arms, the king of the Madras fell down on the Earth, with his face directed towards king Yudhishthira like Indra's pole dropped down on the ground.

53. Like a dear wife advancing to receive her dear husband about to fall on her breast, the Earth as if, out of affection, rose a little for receiving that best of men as he fell down with wounded limbs covered with blood.

54. Having enjoyed long the Earth like a dear wife, the powerful Shalya, now to sleep on the Earth's breast, embraced her.

55. Slain by Dharma's son in a fair fight, Shalya shone like fire lying extinguished on the sacrificial altar.

56. Though deprived of his weapons and standard, and though his heart had been cut and slain still his body was not shorn of beauty.

57. Taking up his bow resplendant like Indra's bow then Yudhishthira began to destroy his foes in that battle like Garuda killing snakes. With the greatest speed he began to cut off the bodies of his enemies with the keen arrows.

58. Your troops were entirely covered with the showers of arrows that the son of Pritha then shot. Possessed with fear and with eyes shut, they began to strike one another. With their bodies bathed in blood they were deprived of their offensive and defensive arms and divested of their vital-breaths.

59. Upon the fall of Shalya, the youthful younger brother of the king of the Madras who was equal to his brother in every accomplishment, and who was a great car-warrior, proceeded against Yudhishthira.

60. Invincible in battle and desirous of satisfying the last dues of his brother, that foremost of men struck speedily the Pandava with many arrows.

61. King Yudhishthira immediately struck him with six arrows. He then cut off the bow and the standard of his antagonist with two razor-faced arrows.

62. Then with a blazing and keen arrow of great power and broad head, he cut off the head of his foe who stood before him.

63. That head adorned with ear-rings was seen to fall down from the car like a denizen of heaven falling down on the exhaustion of his virtues.

64. Beholding his headless trunk, bathed in blood, fallen down from his car, the Kaurava troops were dispersed.

65. Indeed, upon the destruction of the younger brother of the Madras clad in beautiful armour, the Kurus bewailed and fled away quickly.

66. Beholding Shalya's younger brother killed your troops, hopeless of their lives, were pursued by the fear of the Pandavas and fled, coated with dust.

67. Then Shini's grandson Satyaki, O foremost of Bharatas, shooting his arrows, proceeded against the frightened Kauvaras in the course of their flight.

68. Then Hridika's son, O king, quickly and fearlessly opposed that invincible warrior, that irresistible and powerful bowman, as he proceeded against them.

69. Those two illustrious and invincible Vrishni heroes, Hridika's son and Satyaki, encountered each other like two enraged lions.

70. Both effulgent like the sun, they covered each other with burning arrows resplendent like the rays of the sun.

71. The arrows of those two Vrishni chiefs, shot off their bows, appeared like swiftly-coursing insects in the sky.

72. Piercing Satyaki with ten arrows and his horses with three, the son of Hridika cut off his bow with a straight arrow.

73. Casting off his bow which was thus cut off, that heroe, quickly took up another that was stronger than the first.

74. Having taken up that best of bows, that first of bowmen struck the son of Hridika with ten arrows on the chest.

75. Then cutting off his car and the shaft of that car with many well-aimed arrows, Satyaki quickly killed the horses of his antagonist and his two Parshni drivers.

76. O Lord, Sharadwat, seeing Hridika's son made carless, the valiant Kripa then, the son Sharadwat of speedily carried him away, on his car.

77. The king of the Madras being slain and upon Kritavarma having been made carless, the entire army of Duryodhana fled away from the battle field.

78. At this time the army was covered with a cloud of dust. We could not percive anything. The major portion, however, of your army were killed. They, who remained alive, took to their heels from the battle-field.

79. Soon it was seen that the cloud of dust was suppressed, O foremost of men, on account of the streams of blood that flowed on all sides.

80. Then seeing his army routed Duryodhana, alone, resisted all the Parthas advancing furiously.

81. Beholding the Pandavas on their cars as also Dhrishtadyumna the son of Prishata and the invincible Satyaki, the Kuru king struck them with sharp arrows.

82. The enemy' (at that time) could not approach him, like mortals fearing to approach the Death standing before them. Meanwhile the son of Hridika, riding upon another car, advanced there.

83. The great car-warrior Yudhishthira then quickly killed the four horses of Kritavarman with four arrows, and struck the son of Gotama with six broad-headed powerful arrows.

84. Then Ashwatthaman, taking upon his car, the son of Hridika who had been deprived of his horses by the (Pandava) king, took him away from Yudhishthira's presence.

85. The son of Sharadwata struck Yudhishthira in return with eight arrows, and his horses also with eight keen arrows.

86. Thus, O king, the battle raged on all sides on account of the evil policy of yourself and your son, O Bharata.

87. After the destruction of that foremost of bow men on the field of battle by that foremost of Kuru's race, the Parthas, beholding Shalya slain, in a body filled with great joy, blew their conchs.

88. And all of them praised Yudhishthira in that battle, even as the celestials, in days of yore, had praised Indra after the destruction of Vritra. And they beat and blew various kinds of musical instruments, making the Earth resound on all sides.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the destruction of Shalya, O king, the followers of the Madra king, numbering seventeen hundred brave car-warriors, proceeded for battle with great force.

2. Duryodhana, riding upon a huge mountain-like elephant, with an umbrella held over his head, and fanned with white chowries, forbade the Madraka warriors, saying,—"Do not proceed, Do not proceed!"

3. Though repeatedly forbidden by Duryodhana, those heroes, desirous of killing Yudhishthira, entered into the Pandava army.

4. Those brave warriors, O king, loyal to Duryodhana, twanging their bows loudly fought with the Pandavas.

5—6. In the meantime hearing that Shalya had been killed and that Yudhishthira had been assailed by the mighty car-warriors of the Madrakas devoted to the well-being of the Madraka king, the great car-warrior Partha came there, stretching his bow Gandiva, and filling the Earth with the rattle of his car.

7—8. Then Arjuna, Bhima, and the two sons of Madri by Pandu, and that foremost of men, Satyaki, and the (five) sons of Draupadi, and Dhrishtadyumna, and Sikhandin, and the Panchalas and the Somakas, desirous of rescuing Yudhishthira, encircled him on all sides.

9. Having taken their positions round the king, the Pandavas, those foremost of men, began to agitate the enemy's army like Makaras agitating the ocean. Indeed, they made your army tremble like a mighty tempest shaking the trees.

10. Like the great river Ganges agitated by a hostile wind, the Pandava army, O king, once more were exceedingly agitatated.

11. Making that powerful army tremble, the illustrious and mighty car-warriors (viz., the Madrakas), all shouted loudly, saying, —"Where is that king Yudhishthira?"

12. Why are not his valiant brothers, viz., the Pandavas, to be seen here? What has become of the highly energetic as also of the great car-warrior Sikhandin? Where are Dhrishtadyumna and the grandson of Sini and those great car-warriors, viz., the (five sons of Draupadi)!

13. Thereat those great car-warriors, viz., the sons of Draupadi, began to kill the followers of the Madra king who were uttering those words and fighting vigorously.

14. In that battle, some, amongst your troops, were crushed by car-wheels and some slain by huge standards.

15. Beholding, however, the heroic Pandavas, the brave warriors of your army, O Bharata, though forbidden by your son, still proceeded against them.

16. Speaking mildly Duryodhana tried to prevent those warriors from fighting with the foe. No great car-warrior, however, amongst them carried out his order.

17—18. Then Sakuni, the eloquent son of the Gandhara king, O king, said to Duryodhana these words :—How is this that we are standing here, while the Madraka army is being killed before our eyes? When you, O Bharata, art here, it does not look well!

19. The contract was that all of us should fight in a body. Why then, O king, do you suffer our foes to kill thus our soldiers?|

Duryodhana said :—

20. Though prevented by me before, they did not carry out my order. These men, in a body, have entered into the Pandava army.

Sakuni said :—

21. When worked up with rage in battle, brave warriors do not obey the behests of their leaders. You should not be angry with those men. This is not the time to act indifferently.

22. We shall, therefore, all of us, in a body with our cars and horses and elephants, proceed, for rescuing those great bowmen, viz., the followers of the Madra king.

23. O king, we shall protect one another very carefully. Accepting Shakuni's view all the Kauravas then proceeded where the Madras were.

24. Also encircled by a large force Duryodhana proceeded against the foe, uttering leonine shouts and causing the Earth to resound with that noise.

25. Slay, cut, seize, strike, cut off—these were the words that were heard then, O king, among those tropps.

26. Meanwhile beholding in that battle the followers of the Madra king assailing them unitedly the Pandavas proceeded against them, arraying themselves in the Madhyama form.

27. Fighting hand to hand, O king, for a short time, those heroic warriors, viz., the followers of the Madra king, were killed.

28. Then, whilst we were proceeding, the active Pandavas, in a body, completed the slaughter of the Madrakas, and filled with delight, sent up joyous shouts.

29. Then headless forms were seen all around. Large meteors fell down from the solar disc. The earth was covered with cars and broken yokes and axles and slain car-warriors and lifeless horses.

31. Horses, quick-coursing like the wind, and still attached to yokes of cars, were seen to drag car-warriors, O king, hither and thither on the field of battle.

32. Some horses were seen to drag cars with broken wheels, while some ran on all sides, carrying the broken cars.

33. Here and there also were seen horses hampered by their traces. Car-warriors dropped down like denizens of heaven on the exhaustion of their virtue.

34. When the brave followers of the Madra king were killed the great car-warriors of the Parthas, beholding a body of horse advancing towards them, rushed quickly towards it with a view to win victory.

35. Shooting their arrows and making various other kinds of noise mingled with the blare of their conchs, those warriors of sure aim, shook bows, and uttered leonine shouts.

36. Seeing then that large force of the Madra king killed as also their heroic king the entire army of Duryodhana once more fled away from the field.

37. Struck, O king, by those firm bowmen of the Pandavas, the Kuru army, filled with fear, fled away on all sides.

CHAPTER XIX.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'Upon the destruction of that great king and great car-warrior, that invincible hero, (viz., Shalya) in battle, your troops and sons almost all fled away from the field.

2. Indeed, upon the slaughter of that hero by the illustrious Yudhishthira your troops were like ship-wrecked merchants on the deep main without a raft to cross it.

3. After the destruction of the Madra king, O monarch, your troops, filled with fear and wounded with arrows, were like men having none to help them and desirous of a protector or a herd of deer assailed by a lion.

4. Like bulls deprived of their horns or elephants with tusks broken, your troops, defeated by Yudhisthira having no enemies, fled away at mid-day.

5. After the fall of Shalya, O king, none amongst your troops had the mind of either rallying the army or displaying his prowess.

6. O king we expressed that grief, which had been ours upon the fall of Bhishma, of Drona, and of the Suta's son, O Bharata.

7. Giving up hopes of success upon the fall of the great car-warrior Shalya, the Kuru army, with its heroes slain and exceedingly confused, were killed with keen arrows. Upon the destruction of the Madra king, O monarch, your warriors all fled away in fear.

8. Some on horse-back, some on elephants, some on cars, great car-warriors, and foot-soldiers, all fled away in fear.

9. Two thousand elephants, looking like hills, and capable of smiting, fled away, after Shalya's fall, goaded with hooks and toes.

10. Indeed O chief of the Bharatas, your soldiers fled on all sides. Struck with arrows, they were seen to run, breathing hard.

11. Beholding them defeated the Pandavas, filled with the desire of victory, pursued them.

12. The sound of arrows and the loud leonine roars and the blare of conchs, of heroic warriors were heard there.

13. Beholding the Kauravas agitated with fear and flying away, the Panchalas and the Pandavas addressed one another, saying,

14. To day the truthful king Yudhishthira, has defeated his enemies. Today Duryodhana has been divested of his splendour and royal prosperity.

15. Today, hearing of his son's death, Dhritarashtra, that king of men, will lose consciousness, lie down on the Earth, and feel the keenest pain.

16. Let him know today that the son of Kunti is the most powerful of all bowmen. Today that sinful and wicked-hearted king will blame his own self.

17. Let him recollect today the time and wholesome words of Vidura. Let him from this day wait upon the Parthas as their slave. Let that king today feel the grief that had been experienced by the sons of Pandu.

18. Let that king know today the greatness of Krishna. Let him hear today the terrible twang of Arjuna's bow in battle, as also the force of all his weapons, and the strength of his arms in fight.

19. Today he will know the dreadful power of the great Bhima when Duryodhana will be slain in battle like the Asura Vali by Indra.

20. Except Bhima there is none else in this world that can achieve that which Bhima accomplished by killing Dushasana.

21. Hearing of the death of the ruler of the Madras who was incapable of defeat by the very celestials, that king will know the prowess of Yudhisthira.

22. After the destruction of the heroic son of Suvala and of all the Gandharas he will know the strength, in battle of the two sons of Madri by Pandu.

23—24. Why will they not be victorious who have Dhananjaya for their warrior, as also Satyaki, and Bhimasena, and Dhrishtadyumna the son of Prishata, and the five sons of Draupadi, and the two sons of Madri, and the great bowman Shikhandin, and king Yudhishthira.

25. Why will they be not victorious who have for their protector Krishna, called Janarddana, the Protector of the universe? Why will they not be victorious who are righteous?

26—27. Who else than Yudhishthira the son of Pritha, who has Hrishikesha, the refuge of justice and glory for his protector, is competent to defeat in battle Bhishma, Drona and Karna and the king of the Madras and the other kings by hundreds and thousands.

28. Saying these words and filled with joy, the Srinjayas pursued your soldiers in that battle who had been exceedingly wounded with arrows.

29. Then Dhananjaya proceeded against the car-division of the foe. The two sons of Madri and the great car-warrior Satyaki proceeded against Shakuni.

30—31. Beholding them all flying quickly in fear of Bhimasena, Duryodhana, as if smiling, addressed his driver, saying,—Partha, who is there with his bow, is going before me. Take my horses to the back of the army.

32. Like the ocean that cannot go beyond its continents, Kunti's son Dhananjaya will never dare go before me if I stand in the rear.

33. Look, O driver, at this vast army that is pursued by the Pandavas! Behold this cloud of dust that has arisen on all sides on account of the motion of the troops.

34. Hear those various leonine roars that are so awful and loud. Therefore, O driver, move slowly and wait in the rear.

35—36. If I stay in battle and fight the Pandavas, my army, O driver, will rally and fight again vigorously.—Hearing these words of your son becoming a hero and a man of honor, the driver slowly drove his horses adorned with gold trappings.

37. One and twenty thousand foot-soldiers, deprived of elephants and horses and car-warriors, and who were ready to lose their lives, still stood for battle.

38. Born in different countries and coming from different towns, those warriors maintained their ground, desirous of gaining great fame.

39. The clash of those rushing warriors elated with joy was loud and exceedingly terrible.

40. Then Bhimasena, O king, and Dhrishtadyumna, the son of Prishata, opposed them with four-fold forces.

41. Other foot-soldiers, all actuated with the desire of victory, proceeded against Bhima, uttering loud cries and slapping their armpits, by the desire of going to heaven.

42. Filled with rage and invincible in battle those heroes, belonging to your party, approached Bhimasena, and cried aloud. They then spoke not to one another. Encircling Bhima in that battle, they began to strike him from all sides.

43. Encircled by that huge body of infantry and struck by them in that battle Bhima did not stir from where he stood and remained motionless like the Mainaka mountain.

44. His antagonists meanwhile, filled with rage, O monarch, tried to assail that great car-warrior of the Pandavas and opposed other combatants (that tried to rescue him).

45. Encountered by those warriors, Bhima became furious. And quickly getting down from his car, he proceeded on foot against them.

46. Taking up his massive mace adorned with gold, he began to kill your soldiers like the destroyer himself armed with his club.

47. The mighty Bhima, with his mace, crushed those twenty one thousand foot-soldiers who were deprived of cars and horses and elephants.

48. Having killed that strong army Bhima, of great prowess, showed himself with Dhrishtadyumna in his front.

49. The foot-soldiers, of your party thus slain, lay down on the ground, bathed in blood, like Karnikaras with their flowers struck down by a storm.

50. Adorned with garlands made of various kinds of flowers, and with diverse kinds of ear-rings, those combatants of various races, who had come from various kingdoms, lay down on the field, lifeless.

51. Covered with banners and standards, that large army of foot-soldiers looked fierce and terrible and lay prostrate on the field.

52. The great car-warriors, with their followers, that fought under Yudhishthira, all pursued your illustrious son Duryodhana.

53. Beholding your troops turn away from the battle, those great bowmen proceeded against Duryodhana, but they could not overcome him even as the ocean cannot go beyond its continents.

54. The prowess of your son was highly wonderful, since all the Parthas, in a body, could not transgress his single self.

55—56. Addressing his own army which had not fled far but which, wounded with arrows, were bent upon flying, Then Duryodhana said these words:—"I do not see a place on plain or mountain, where if you fly, the Pandavas will not pursue and kill you. What is the use then of flight?

57. The army of the Pandavas had been reduced in numbers. The two Krishnas are greatly wounded. If all of us make a stand, we will surely acquire victory.

58. If you fly away, in confusion, the sinful Pandavas will pursue you and kill you. If on the other hand we make a bold stand, it will do us good.

59. Listen, all ye Kshatriyas that are here. When Death always kills heroes and cowards alike what man is there so foolish that, calling himself a Kshatriya, will not fight.

60. It will be to our interest if we stay before the angry Bhimasena. Death in battle, while fighting in pursuance of the Kshatriya practices, leads to happiness.

61--62. Gaining victory, one obtains happiness here. If killed, one reaps great fruits in the other world. Ye Kauravas, there is no better path to heaven than that of battle. Killed in battle, you will in no time obtain all those regions of blessedness." Hearing those words of his, and applauding them highly, the Kuru kings once more rushed against the Pandavas for fighting with them.

63. Seeing them advancing quickly the Parthas, arrayed in order of battle, skilled in smiting, worked up with rage, and filled with the desire of victory, proceeded against them.

64. Stretching his bow Gandiva celebrated over the three worlds, the brave Dhananjaya proceeded on his car against the foe.

65. The two sons of Madri and Satyaki rushed against Shakuni, and the other Pandava heroes smilingly proceeded against your army.

(SHALYA PARVA) –Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. 'After the (Kuru) army had been gathered Shalya, the king of the Mlechhas, filled with rage, rushed against the large army of the Pandavas, riding on a gigantic elephant, with temporal juice trickling, looking like a hill, elated with pride, resembling Airavata himself, and capable of crushing large numbers of foes.

3. Shalya's animal was of a good breed, was always adored by Dhritarashtra's sons, and was properly equipped and properly trained for battle, O king, by persons well conversant with the science of elephant training. Riding on that elephant, that foremost of kings looked like the morning sun at the close of summer.

4. Riding that best of elephants, O king, he went against the Pandavas and began to strike them on all sides with keen and dreadful arrows resembling Indra's thunder in force.

5. While he discharged his arrows in that battle and killed the hostile warriors neither the Kauravas nor the Pandavas could mark any defect in him, even as the Daityas, O king, could not notice any in Vasava, the wielder of the thunder, in the days of yore while he killed them.

6. The Pandavas, the Somakas, and the Srinjayas, saw one elephant look like a thousand elephants moving around them as the enemies of the gods had in days of yore seen the elephant of Indra in battle.

7. Agitated by that animal, the hostile army looked life-less. Unable to stand in battle, they then fled away in great fear, crushing one another.

8. Then the huge army of the Pandavas, routed by king Shalya, suddenly fled on all sides unable to stand the vigor of that elephant.

9. Seeing the Pandava army routed and flying away quickly all your leading warriors worshipped king Shalya and blew their moon-white conchs.

10. Hearing the war-cries of the Kauravas uttered in joy and the blare of their conchs, the commander of the Pandava and the Srinjaya forces, viz., the Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna could not, from wrath, bear it.

11. The illustrious Dhrishtadyumna then quickly proceeded for defeating that elephant, as the Asura Jambha had proceded aginst Airavata, the carrier of Indra, while he fought with Indra.

12. Beholding the king of the Pandavas proceed against him, Shalya, that foremost of kings, quickly urged his elephant, O king, for the destruction of Drupada's son.

13. Seeing the animal approaching the latter struck it with three best arrows, polished, keen, blazing, powerful and resembling fire itself in effulgence and force.

14. Then that illustrious hero struck the animal on the trunk with five other whetted and best arrows. Struck therewith, that prince of elephants, turning away from the battle, ran quickly away.

15. Suddenly checking that foremost of elephants which had been greatly wounded and compelled to retreat Shalya, however, caused it to turn back, and with hooks and keen lances urged it forward against the car of the Panchala king, pointing it out to the infuriate animal.

16. Beholding the animal rushing forcibly at him, the heroic Dhrishtadyumna, taking up a mace, quickly leaped down on the Earth from his car, his limbs benumbed with fear.

17. That huge elephant, meanwhile, suddenly crushing that gold-decked car with its horses and driver, raised it up in the air with his trunk and then dashed it down on the Earth.

18. Beholding the driver of Panchala king thus crushed by that best of elephants, Bhima and Shikandin and the grandson of Shini rushed with great force against that animal.

19. With their arrows they quickly restrained that animal. Thus restrained by them in battle, the elephant began to tremble.

20. Meanwhile king Shalya began to discharge arrows like the Sun shedding his rays on all sides. Struck with those arrows, the (Pandava) car-warriors began to fly away.

21. Beholding that feat of Shalya, the Panchalas, the Srinjayas and the Matsyas. O king, bewailed aloud in that battle. All those foremost of men however, surrounded the animal entirely.

22. Then, taking up his mace resembling the crest of a mountain, the brave Panchalas appeared there. Fearlessly, O king, that hero, that striker of foes, rushed quickly against the elephant.

23. The active 'prince of the Panchala, approaching, began to strike with his mace that animal which was huge as a hill and which shed temporal juice like a mass of pouring clouds.

24. Its trunk cut open, the animal cried aloud; and vomiting enough blood, the animal, huge as a hill, suddenly dropped down as a mountain falling down during an earthquake.

25. While that best of elephants was falling down, and while your son's army were bewailing at the spectacle, that best of warriors among the Shinis cut off the head of king Shalya with a sharp and broad-headed arrow.

26. His head having been sundered by the Satwata hero, Shalya dropped down on the Earth along with his best of elephants, like a mountain summit suddenly clapped by the thunder-bolt discharged by the best of the celestials.

CHAPTER XXI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. After the heroic Shalya, that flower of the court, had been killed your army were dispersed like a huge tree broken by the force of the storm.

2. Seeing the army routed, the great car-warrior, Kritavarma, opposed the hostile force in that battle.

3. Seeing the Satwata hero, O king, standing in battle like a hill though struck with arrows (by the foe), the Kuru heroes, who had fled away, rallied and came back.

4. Then, O king, an encounter took place between the Pandavas and the Kurus who were determined upon meeting with death.

5. Wonderful was that fierce encounter which took place between the Satwata hero and his foes, since alone he opposed the invincible army of the Pandavas.

6. Seeing this most difficult feat friends, filled with delight, set up leonine shouts that seemed to reach the very heavens.

7. At those sounds the Panchalas, O foremost of Bharata's race, were filled with fear. Then Satyaki, the grandson of Shini, came there.

8. Approaching the powerful king Kshemakirti, Satyaki killed him with seven keen arrows.

9. Then the intelligent son of Hridika, rushed quickly against the best of Shinis, that mighty-armed warrior, as the latter came discharging his whetted shafts.

10. Those two bowmen, those two foremost of car-warriors roared like lions and met each other, both being armed with best of weapons.

11. The Pandavas, the Panchalas, and the other warriors, witnessed that terrible encounter between the two heroes.

12. Those two Vrishni and Andhaka heroes, like two elephants filled with delight, struck each other with long arrows and arrows with calf-toothed heads.

13. Moving about in various ways the son of Hridika and that foremost of Shini's race soon covered each other with showers of arrows.

14. The arrows discharged forcibly from the bows of the two Vrishni heroes were seen by us in the sky to resemble flights of quick-coursing insects.

15. Approaching the powerful Satyaki of true prowess, the son of Hridika struck the four horses of the former with four keen arrows.

16. Enraged at this like an elephant struck with a lance, the long-armed Satyaki struck Kritavarman with eight best arrows.

17. Then Kritavarman struck Satyaki with three arrows whetted on stone and shot off his bow drawn to its fullest stretch and then cut of his bow with another arrow.

18. Casting off his broken bow, that Shini heroe quickly took up another with an arrow set on it.

19—20. Having taken up that best of bows and stringed it, that foremost of all bowmen, that warrior of great energy, intelligence and strength, unable to bear the cutting of his bow by Kritavarman, quickly and furiously rushed against the latter.

21. With ten keen arrows that Shini chief then struck the driver, the horses, and the standard of Kritavarman.

22—23. At this, O king, the great bowman and car-warrior Kritavarman, beholding his gold-decked car made driverless and horseless, was filled with rage. Taking up a pointed lance, he discharged it with all might at that best of Shini's race, desirous of killing him.

24. Striking that lance with many keen arrows, Satyaki sundered it off into pieces and caused it to fall down. Stupifying Kritavarman of Madhu's race with another broad-headed arrow he then struck Kritavarman on the chest.

25. Deprived of his horses and driver in that battle by Yuyudhana, skilled in weapons, Kritavarman came down on the Earth.

26. The heroic Kritavarman, having been deprived of his car by Satyaki in that single combat, all the (Kaurava) soldiers were possessed by a great fear.

27. A mighty fear overtook your sons, when Kritavarman was thus made steedless and driverless and carless.

28. Beholding that chastiser of foes made steedless and driverless, Kripa, O king, rushed at that best of Shini's race, desirous of killing him.

29. Taking Kritavarman upon his car before all the bowmen, the mighty-armed Kripa took him away from the battle-field.

30. After Kritavarman had been made carless and the grandson of Shini had grown powerful on the field, the entire army of Duryodhana took to their heels.

31. The enemy, however, did not see it for the Kuru army was then covered with a cloud of dust. All your warriors fled, O king, except king Duryodhana.

32. Beholding his own army thus routed he quickly rushed and assailed the victorious enemy, alone opposing them all.

33—34. Filled with rage, that invincible warrior assailed with keen arrows all the Pandus, and Dhrishtadyumna the son of Prishata, and Shikhandin, and the sons of Draupadi, and the large numbers of the Panchalas, and the Kaikeyas, and the Somakas.

35. With strong determination your powerful son stood in battle, even as a blazing and mighty fire on the sacrificial platform purified with mantras, king Duryodhana moved in the field, in that battle.

36. His enemies could not approach him then, like creatures unable to approach the Death. Then the son of Hridika came there, on another car.

CHAPTER XI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Filled with the courage of despair, that best of car-warriors, O king viz, your son, looked resplendent on his car in that battle like Rudra himself.

2. With the thousands of arrows shot by him, the Earth was completely covered. He drenched his enemies with showers of arrows like the clouds pouring rain on mountain breasts.

3. There was then not a man amongst the Pandavas in that great battle, or a horse, or an elephant, or a car, who or which was not struck with Duryodhana's arrows.

4. O king, amongst the warriors every one, O Bharata, was struck by your son with his arrows.

5. The Pandava army was then covered with the arrows of that great warrior even as a army is covered with the dust it raises while marching for battle.

6. The Earth then, O king, was as if converted into one sheet of arrows by your son Duryodhana, that bowman endued with great lightness of hand.

7. Amongst those thousands of warriors on the field, of your side or that of the enemy, it appeared as if Duryodhana was then the only man.

8. The prowess displayed by your son was highly wonderful, since the Parthas, even in a body, could not approach him who was single.

9. He struck Yudhishthira, O best of Bharata's race, with a hundred arrows, and Bhimasena with seventy, and Sahadeva with seven.

10. And he struck Nakula with sixty four, and Dhrishtadyumna with five, and the sons of Draupadi with seven, and Satyaki with three arrows. With a broad-headed arrow, he then, O king, cut off the bow of Sahadeva.

11. Casting off that broken bow, the heroic son of Madri, took up another formidable bow, and rushing against the king, viz., Duryodhana struck him with ten arrows in that battle.

12. The great and brave bowman Nakula then struck the king with nine terrible sarrows and uttered a loud war-cry.

13. Satyaki struck the king with a single straight shaft; the sons of Draupadi struck him with seventy three and king Yudhishthira struck him with five. And Bhimasena assailed the king with eighty arrows.

14. Though struck thus from all sides with numerous arrows by those illustrious warriors, Duryodhana still, O king, did not waver, in the presence of all the soldiers assembled there.

15. The quickness, the skill, and the prowess of that illustrious warrior excelled those of every man.

16. Meanwhile the Dhartarashtras, O king, who had not fled far away, beholding the king, rallied and returned there, clad in mail.

17. The noise made by them when they returned was exceedingly awful, like the roar of the surging deep during the rainy season.

18. Approaching their invinciible king in that battle, those great bowmen rushed against the Pandavas for fight.

19. The son of Drona opposed in that battle the angry Bhimasena.

20. With the arrows, O king, that were shot in that battle, all the points of the horizon were completely covered, so that the brave warriors could not distinguish the cardinal from the subsidiary points of the compass.

21. As regards Ashwatthaman and Bhimasena, O Bharata, both of them performed wonderful feats. Both of them were invincible in battle. The arms of both contained marks of bow-string for having repeatedly drawn the same. Opposing each other, they fought on, frightening the entire universe.

22. The heroic Shakuni struck Yudhishthira in that battle. Having killed the four horses of the king the powerful son of Suvala uttered a loud roar, making all the soldiers tremble with fear.

23. Meanwhile the valiant Sahadeva carried away the heroic but defeated king on his car from that battle.

24. Then riding on another car, returned king Yudhishthira and having pierced Shakuni at first with nine arrows, once more struck him with five. And that best of all bowmen then sent up a loud roar.

25. That battle presented a wonderful spectacle. It filled the spectators with delight and was praised by the Siddhas and the Charanas.

26. Heroic Uluka rushed against the mighty bowman Nakula, in that battle, discharging showers of arrows from all sides.

27. The heroic Nakula, however, in that battle opposed the son of Shakuni with a dense shower of arrows from every side.

28. Both those heroes were born in high family and both were great car-warriors. They were seen to fight with each other, each enraged with the other.

29. Similarly Kritavarman, O king, fighting with the grandson of Shini, that scorcher of foes, shone like Shakra fighting with the Asura Vala.

30. Having cut off Dhrishtadyumna's bow in that battle, Duryodhana struck his bowless antagonist with keen arrows.

31. Then, in that battle, having taken up a formidable bow, Dhrishtadyumna fought with the king before all the bowmen.

32. The encounter between those two heroes was exceedingly dreadful, O best of Bharata's race, like that between two wild and infuriate elephants with temporal juice trickling down.

33. Worked up with rage in that battle, the heroic Gautama struck the mighty sons of Draupadi with many straight arrows.

34. The encounter that took place between him and those five resembled that which takes place between a man and his five senses. It was awful and fierce and no party showed any coesideration for the other.

35. The five sons of Draupadi assailed Kripa like the senses afflicting a foolish man. He, on the other hand, fighting with them, opposed them vigorously.

36. That battle between him and them was indeed wonderful because it resembled the struggles, O king, between men and their senses.

37. Men fought with men, elephants with elephants, horses with horses, and care warriors with car-warriors. Once mor-,

O king, that encounter became general and dreadful.

38. Here an encounter was beautiful, there another was dreadful, and there another was exceedingly fierce. O lord, many dreadful encounters took place in course of that battle.

39. Belonging to both armies and encountering one another, those chastisers of foes struck and killed one another in that dreadful battle.

40. A thick cloud of dust was raised by the cars and the animals. Thick dust was also raised by the running of the horses, a dust that was carried from one place to another by the wind.

41. A dust, thick as an evening cloud, was caused in the sky by the wheels of cars and the breaths of the elephants.

42. On that dust being raised and the sun himself {hidden therewith, the Earth became shrouded, and the heroic and great car-warriors were not visible.

43. That dust disappeared and everything became clear when the Earth, O best of the Bharatas, was covered with the blood of heroes.

44—45. When that dense and awful cloud of dust was put down there were seen many single encounters, O Bharata, that the heroes fought at the noon each according to his strength and his rank. They were all exceedingly fierce. The sheen of the weapons in those encounters, O king, appeared full in view.

46. Loud noise, of the falling shafts in that battle, resembled that of a vast forest of bamboos while burning on every side.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. During the progress of that terrible and awful battle, the army of your son were routed by the Pandavas.

2. Rallying their great car-warriors, however, with vigorous exertions, your sons continued to fight with the Pandava army.

3—4. The Kuru warriors, seeking your son's welfare, suddenly came back. Upon their return, the battle once more became fearful, between your warriors and those of the foe, resembling that between the gods and the Asuras in the days of yore. Neither amongst the enemies nor amongst your people was there a single warrior who fled away from the field.

5. The warriors fought, knowing one another by the names they uttered. A great onslaught took place there.

6—7. Filled with great anger and desirous of defeating the Dhartarashtras and their king in that battle, king Yudhishthira struck the son of Sharadwata with three gold winged arrows whetted on stone and next killed with four others the four horses of Kritavarman.

8. Then Ashwatthaman carried away the celebrated son of Hridika. Sharadwat's son struck Yudhishthira in return with eight arrows.

9. Then king Duryodhana sent seven hundred cars to the place where king Yudhishthira was fighting.

10. Those cars, driven by excellent warriors and quick-coursing like the wind or thought, rushed in that battle against the car of Kunti's son.

11. Encircling Yudhishthira on all sides they made him invisible with their arrows like clouds hiding the sun from the view.

12. Then the Pondava heroes, led by Shikhandin, beholding king Yudhishthira assailed in that way by the Kauravas, were filled with rage and unable to put up with it.

13. Desirous of rescuing Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, they came there on their cars possessed of great speed and adorned with rows of bells.

14. Then took place an awful battle, in which blood flowed as water, between the Pandavas and the Kurus, that increased the denizens of Yama's region.

15. Killing those seven hundred hostile car-warriors of the Kuru army, the Pandavas and the Panchalas once more resisted (the whole Kuru army).

16. There took place a fierce encounter between your son and the Pandavas. We had never before seen or heard of its like.

17—18. During the onset of that battle in which no consideration was shown by any party for another, and while the warriors of your army and those of the foe were being killed quickly, the combatants were all shouting and blowing their conchs. The bowmen were roaring and uttering loud noises of diverse kinds.

19. The very vitals of the combatants were being struck, during that fight and the troops, O sire, desirous of victory, were rushing with speed.

20. Everything on earth was undergoing a woeful destruction, during that battle when numberless ladies of birth and beauty were being made widows.

21. During the progress of that fierce encounter in which the warriors fought without any consideration for friends and foes, evil omens appeared, presaging the destruction of everything.

22. The earth, with her mountains and forests, shook making a loud noise. Meteors, like burning brands equipt with handles, dropped from the sky, O king, on every side of the earth as if from the solar disc.

23. There blew a hurricane on all sides, carrying away hard pebbles along its lower course. The elephants shed profuse tears and trembled greatly.

24. Disregarding all those fierce and awful omens, the Kshatriyas, consulting with one another, cheerfully stood on the field of Kurukshetra, desirous of going to heaven.

25—26. Then Shakuni, the son of the Gandhara king, said,—"Fight you all in front! I, however, will kill the Pandavas from behind!"—Then the active Madraka warriors, amongst those on our side that were advancing, were filled with joy and uttered various cries. Others also did the same.

27. The invincible and sure-armed Pandavas, once more coming against us, shook their bows and enshrouded us with showers of arrows.

28. The army of the Madrakas then were killed by the foe. Beholding this, the troops of Duryodhana once more fled from the battle.

29—30. The mighty king of the Gandharas, however, once more said these words:—"Stop, ye sinful wretches, fight with the foe. What use is there of flight." At that time, O foremost of Bharata's race, the king of the Gandharas had full ten thousand horsemen capable of fighting with bright lances.

31. During the onset of that great carnage, Shakuni, aided by the force, displayed his valor and assailed the Pandava army at the rear, killing it with his keen arrows.

32. The huge force of the Pandus then, O king, were dispersed even as a mass of clouds on all sides by a powerful wind.

33—34. Then beholding his own army routed, Yudhishthira coolly urged the mighty Sahadeva, saying,—"Yonder the son of Suvala, afflicting our rear, stands clad in mail. He kills our forces. Behold that wicked man, O son of Pandu.

35. Helped by the sons of Draupadi proceed towards him and kill Shakuni, the son of Suvala. Supported by the Panchalas, O sinless one, I will meanwhile kill the car-force of the enemy.

36—38. Let all the elephants and all the horse and three thousand foot go with you. Helped by these, slay Shakuni." At this seven hundred elephants ridden by bowmen, and five thousand horse, and the valiant Sahadeva, and three thousand foot-soldiers, and the son of Draupadi, all proceeded against invincible Shakuni.

39. However, O king, overpowering the Pandavas and longing for victory, Suvala's son, of great valour, began to slay their forces from the back.

40. The horsemen, beside themselves with rage, of the Pandavas penetrated the division of Suvala's son, overpowering the latter's car-warriors.

41. Those heroic horsemen, staying in the midst of their own elephants, enshrouded the large host of Suvala's son with showers of arrows.

42. On account of your evil counsels, O king, a dreadful battle took place in which maces and lances were used and in which heroes only took part.

43. The twang of bows was no longer heard there, for all the car-warriors stood there as spectators. At that time no difference could be seen between the opposing parties.

44. Both the Kurus and the Pandavas, O foremost of Bharatas, saw the darts, shot off heroic arms, pass like meteors through the sky.

45. The entire sky, O king, covered with falling and bright swords, appeared highly beautiful.

46. The view presented, O best of the Bharatas, by the lances hurled all around, was like that of swarms of locusts in the sky.

47. Horses, with limbs covered with blood on account of wounds inflicted by horsemen themselves struck with arrows, dropped down on all sides in hundreds and thousands.

48. They all remained huddled together. Many of them were wounded and many vomitted blood. A thick darkness set in there when the troops were covered with a cloud of dust.

49. When that darkness covered everything, O king, we saw those brave heroes, horses and men move away from that spot.

50. Others dropped down on the earth vomiting blood profusely. Many warriors, entangled with one another by their locks, could not move.

51. Many powerful heroes dragged one another from the backs of their horses, and encountering one another thus, killed one another like wrestlers. Many, deprived of life, were carried away by the horses they rode.

52. Many men, elated with the pride of courage and inspired with the desire of victory, dropped down on the earth.

53. The earth was covered with hundreds and thousands of bleeding warriors, deprived of limbs, and divested of hairs.

54—55. The surface of the earth being covered with elephant-riders and horsemen and killed horses and warriors with blood-stained armours and those armed with weapons and those who had tried to kill one another with various kinds of terrible weapons, all lying in a mass in that life-destroying battle, no warrior could proceed far on his horse.

56. Having fought for a little while, Shakuni, the son of Suvala, O king, went away from that spot with the remnant of his cavalry, six thousand in number. Similarly the Pandava force, covered with blood, and its animals worn out, moved away from there with its remnant consisting of six thouasnd horse.

57—59. Horsemen, covered with blood of the Pandava army then, determined upon fighting and prepared to sacrifice their lives, said,—"It is no longer possible to fight here on cars; how much more difficult it is then to fight here on elephants. Let cars proceed against cars, and elephants against elephants.

60. Having retreated Shakuni is now staying within his own detachment. The royal son of Suvala will not again come to fight."

61. Then the sons of Draupadi and those infuriate elephants went where the Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, that great car-warrior, was.

62. Sahadeva also, when that cloud of dust set in, went alone where king Yudhishthira was.

63. After all those had departed Shakuni the son of Suvala, worked up with wrath, once more attacked Dhrishtadyumna's division and began to strike it.

64. Again a dreadful encounter took place, in which the combatants did not care for their lives, between your soldiers and those of the foe, all of whom were desirous of killing one another.

65. In that encounter of heroes, the combatants first looked at one another steadfastly, and then rushed, O king, and attacked one another in hundreds and thousands.

66. In that onslaught, heads, cut off with swords, dropped down with a noise like that of falling palmyra fruits.

67. Loud noise also arose making the very hairs stand erect, of bodies falling down on the ground, divested of armours and wounded with weapons and of falling weapons also, O king, and of arms and thighs cut off from the trunk.

68. Assailing brothers and sons and even fathers with keen weapons, the combatants fought like birds, for a piece of meat.

69. Worked up with rage, thousand of warriors attacked one another in that battle.

70. Hundreds and thousands of combatants, pressed down by slain horsemen while falling down from their horses, fell down on the field.

71—72. There arose loud noise of neighing horses of great fleetness, and of shouting men clad in mail, and of the falling darts and swords, O king, of combatants desirous of cutting one another to the very quick on account, O monarch, of your evil policy.

73. At that time, your soldiers, exhausted and worked up with rage, their animals fatigued, themselves thirsty, wounded with sharp weapons, began to turn away from the battle.

74. Maddened with the smell of blood, many became so insensible that they killed friends and foes alike, in fact, every one they could lay hold on.

75. O king, actuated with the desire of victory, large numbers of Kshatriyas were struck down with arrows, and lay prostrate on the earth.

76. Wolves, vultures and jackals began to yell hideously in joy. In the very presence of your son your army suffered a great loss.

77. The earth, O king, was covered with the bodies of men and horses, and over-flown with rivers of blood that struck terror to the timid.

78. Struck and wounded repeatedly with swords and battle-axes and lances, your warriors, as also the Pandavas, O Bharata, ceased to approach one another.

79. Striking one another accordtng to their might, and fighting to the last combatants dropped down, bleeding.

80. Headless forms were seen, catching the hair of their heads and holding swords stained in blood.

81—82. When many headless forms, O king, had thus risen up, when the smell of blood had made the warriors almost senseless, and the loud noise had somewhat subsided, Suvala's son again approached the large army of the Pandavas, with the small remnant of his cavalry.

82. Thereat actuated with the desire of victory and endued with great activity, Pandavas rushed towards Shakuni, with foot-soldiers and elephants and cavalry all with uplifted weapons.

84. Desirous of terminating the hostilities, the Pandavas, forming a wall, encircled Shakuni on all sides, and began to strike him with various kinds of weapons.

85. Beholding your soldiers assailed from every side, the Kauravas, with horse, foot, elephants, and cars, rushed towards the Pandavas.

86. Some brave foot-soldiers, destitute of weapons, attacked their foes in that battle, with feet and fists, and struck them down.

87. Car-warriors dropped down from cars, and elephant-men from elephants, like virtuous persons falling down from their celestial vehicles upon the wane of their virtue.

88. Thus the warriors fought with one another in that great battle, and killed fathers and brothers and friends and sons.

89. Thus took place that battle, O best of the Bharatas, in which no consideration was shown by any body for any one, and in which lances, swords and arrows dropped down fast on every side and presented a terrific spectacle.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'When the loud noise of battle had somewhat subsided and the Pandavas had killed large numbers of their foes Suvala's son once more came with the remnant of his cavalry, seven hundred in number.

2. Speedily approaching his own soldiers and urging them to fight, he again and again said.—" Ye chastisers of enemies, fight merrily."

3—6. And he asked the Kshatriyas assembled there, saying,—" Where is the king that great car-warrior!"—Hearing those words of Shakuni, O foremost of Bharatas, they replied saying,—" There stands the great car-warrior, viz, the Kuru king,—there the large umbrella, effulgent like the full moon, is seen,—there where those car-warriors, clad in mail, are staying—there where that loud noise, deep as the muttering of clouds, is being heard. Go quickly thither, O king, and you will see the Kuru king."—Thus spoken to by those brave warriors Suvala's son Shakuni, O king, proceeded where your son was waiting, surrounded on all sides by unretreating heroes.

7—9. Beholding Duryodhana stationed in the midst of the car-force, Shakuni, cheering up your car-warriors, O king, said these words to Duryodhana, in a manner which showed that he considered all his purposes to have been already accomplished. "Slay, O king, the car-warriors of the Pandavas. All their horse have been defeated by me. Yudhishthira is incapable of being defeated in battle unless one is prepared to sacrifice his life.

10. When that car-army, protected by the son of Pandu, will have been destroyed, we shall then kill all those elephants and foot-soldiers and others."

11. Hearing those words your warriors, actuated with the desire of victory, cheerfully proceeded against the Pandava army.

12. With quivers on their backs and bows in their hands, all of them shook their bows and sent up leonine war-cries.

13. Again O king, the fierce twang of bows and the slapping of palms and the sound of arrows shot forcibly was heard.

14—15. Beholding those Kuru heroes approach the Pandava army with uplifted bows, Kunti's son, Dhananjaya, said to the son of Devaki :—" Drive the horses fearlessly and enter this deep of troops. With my keen arrows I shall to-day terminate these hostilities.

16. Today is the eighteenth day, O Janarddana, of this great battle.

17. The numberless army of those great heroes has been almost destroyed. Mark the course of Destiny.

18. The army of Dhritarashtra's son, O Madhava, which was vast as the deep, has O Achyuta, become, after meeting ourselves, even like a pit caused by a cow's hoof.

19. If peace had been made after Bhishma's fall, O Madhava, everything would have fared well. The foolish and wicked-minded Duryodhana, however, did not make peace.

20. The words, that were given vent to by Bhishma, O Madhava, were beneficial and should have been accepted. Suyodhana however, who had lost his understanding, did not follow them.

21. After Bhishma had been struck down on the earth, I do not know why the battle was fought on.

22. I regard the sons of Dhritarashtra as foolish and of weak understanding by every means since they continued the battle even after the fall of Shantanu's son.

23. After that when Drona, that foremost of Brahmanas, as fell, as also the son of Radha, and Vikartana, the battle did not stop.

24. Even, when a residue only of the Kaurava army remained after the fall of that best of men, viz., Karna, with his sons the battle did not stop.

25. After the fall of even the heroic Shrutayush, of also Jalasandha of Puru's race, and of king Shrutayudha, the slaughter did not still cease.

26. After the death of Bhurishravas, of Shalya, O Janarddana, and of the Avanti heroes, the slaughter did not still stop.

27. After the fall of Jayadratha, of the Rakshasa Alayudha, of Valhika, and of Somadatta the killing battle did not still stop.

28. After the fall of the heroic Bhagadatta, of the Kamvoja chief Sudakshina, and of Dusshasana, the all-destroying battle did not still stop.

29. Seeing the many heroic and powerful kings, each master of extensive territories killed in battle, the all-destroying battle, O Krishna, did not still stop.

30. Beholding even a full Akshauhini of troops slain by Bhimasena in battle, the all-destroying battle did not still stop on account of either the folly or the covetousness of the sons of Dhritarashtra.

31. What king, born in a noble family especially as one like that of Kuru, except the foolish Duryodhana, would thus create useless hostilities.

32. Who is there reasonable and wise and capable of distinguishing between good and evil, that would thus make a war, knowing his foes to be superior to him in merit, strength, and bravery.

33. How could he listen to the advice of another, when, indeed, he could not make up his mind to make peace with the Pandavas following your advice.

34. What medicine can be agreeable to that man today who disobeyed Bhisma, the son of Shantanu, and Drona, and Vidura, while they urged him to make peace.

35. How can he accept good advice who out of folly, O Janarddana, insolently disobeyed his own old father as also his own good mother who spoke wholesome words to him.

36. It is evident, O Janarddana, that Duryodhana is born for rooting out his family. His conduct and his policy, at least, speak the same, O lord. He will not give us our kingdom yet. This is my opinion, O Achyuta.

37. The great Vidura, O sire, told me many a time that as long as Duryodhana would live he would never give us our share of the kingdom.

38. Vidura also told me,—"As long as Dhritarashtra will live, O giver of honors that sinful man will act sinfully towards you.

39. You will never succeed in defeating Duryodhana without battle." Thus, O Madhava, did the far-seeing Vidura often speak to me.

40. All the acts of that wicked man, I now find, to be exactly as the great Vidura had said.

41. That wicked man, who having listened to the beneficial and proper words of Jamadagni's son, disobeyed them, should certainly be regarded as standing in the face of destruction.

42. Many saints and ascetics said, as soon as Duryodhana was born, that the entire Kshatriya race would be exterminated for that wretch.

43. Those words of the sages, O Janarddana, have now borne fruits, because the Kshatriyas are undergoing almost entire extermination on account of Duryodhana's mis-deeds. I shall, O Madhava, kill all the warriors today.

44. After all the Kshatriyas will have been killed and the (Kaurava) camp made empty, Duryodhana will then wish for a battle with us for his own destruction.

45—46. That will terminate these hostilities. Exercising my reason, O Madhava, and reflecting in my own mind, O Vrishni heroe, thinking of Vidura's words, and taking into account the acts of the wicked Duryodhana himself, I have arrived at this conclusion. Enter into Kuru division, O hero, for I shall kill the wicked Duryodhana and his army today with my keen arrows.

47. Slaying this weak army in the very presence of Dhritarashtra's son, I shall today do what is for Yudhishthira's good."

48. Thus addressed by Arjuna, the Dasharha heroe, with reins in hand, fearlessly penetrated that vast hostile army for battle.

49. It was a terrible forest of bows. Darts were its prickles. Maces and bludgeons were its paths. Cars and elephants were its huge trees.

50. Cavalry and infantry were its creepers. And the illustrious Keshava, as he entered that forest on that car adorned with many banners and pennons, shone exceedingly resplendent.

51. Those white horses, O king, bearing Arjuna in battle, were seen moving about on all sides urged by the Dasharha heroe.

52. Then that scorcher of foes, viz., Savyasachin, proceeded on his car, discharging hundreds of keen arrows like a cloud pouring showers of rain. Loud noise was produced by those straight arrows as also by those combatants that were covered with them in that battle by Savyasachin. Showers of arrows, piercing through the armour of the warriors, dropped down on the Earth.

53—54. Shot off the Gandiva, arrows, whose touch resembled that of Indra's thunder, striking men and elephants and horses, O king, fell in that battle with a noise like that of winged insects.

55. Everything was covered with those shafts shot from Gandiva. In that battle, the points of the horizon could not be distinguished.

56. The entire earth was as if covered with gold-winged arrows, steeped in oil, polished by the hands of the smith, and with Partha's name engraven on it.

57. Struck with those keen arrows, and burnt therewith by Partha even as a herd of elephants is burnt with burning brands, the Kauravas were dispirited and weakened.

58. Armed with bow and arrows, Partha, resembling the burning sun, consumed the hostile heroes in that battle like a blazing fire consuming a heap of dry grass.

59—60. As increasing and blazing fire of great energy, thrown on the outskirt of a forest by its inhabitants, quickly consumes those woods abounding with trees and heaps of dry creepers, even so that active and energetic hero, endued with prowess of weapons, and having arrows for his flames, quickly consumed all the troops of your son from anger.

61. His powerful gold-winged arrows, discharged with care, could not be baffled by any armour. He had not to discharge a second arrow at a man, horse or a huge elephant.

62. Like Indra, the wielder of thunderbolt, striking down the Daityas, Arjuna, alone entering that division of great car-warriors, destroyed it with arrows of various forms.

CHAPTER XXV.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjava said :—

1. With his Gandiva, Dhananjaya baffled the purpose of those unretreating heroes struggling in battle and striking their enemies.

2. The arrows, shot by Arjuna, irresistible and endued with great force and whose touch was like that of the thunder, resembled torrents of rain poured by a cloud.

3. That army, O chief of the Bharatas' thus struck by Kiritin, fled away before the very eyes of your son.

4. Some deserted their father and brothers, and others their comrades. Some car-warriors lost their animals. Others lost their drivers. Some had their poles or yokes or wheels broken, O king.

5. The arrows of some were exhausted. Some were assailed with arrows. Some, though unwounded, fled in a body, stricken with fear.

6. Some tried to rescue their sons, having lost all their kinsmen and animals. Some loudly called their father, some their comrades and followers.

7. Some fled, leaving behind their kinsmen, O foremost of men, and brothers and other relatives.

8. Many great car-warriors, struck with Partha's arrows and deeply wounded therewith, breathed hard, deprived of their senses.

9. Others, taking them up on their own cars, and soothing them for some time, and resting them and satisfying their thirst by offering them drink, once more proceeded to battle.

10. Leaving behind the wounded, some, incapable of being easily defeated in battle, once more advanced in battle desirous of carrying out the commands of your son.

6. Some tried to rescue their sons, having lost all their kinsmen and animals. Some loudly called their father, some their comrades and followers.

7. Some fled, leaving behind their kinsmen, O foremost of men, and brothers and other relatives.

8. Many great car-warriors, struck with Partha's arrows and deeply wounded therewith, breathed hard, deprived of their senses.

9. Others, taking them up on their own cars, and soothing them for some time, and resting them and satisfying their thirst by offering them drink, once more proceeded to battle.

10. Leaving behind the wounded, some, incapable of being easily defeated in battle, once more advanced to battle, desirous of carrying out the commands of your son.

11—12. Some, having satisfied their thirst or rested their animals, and some, wearing (fresh) armours, O chief of the Bharatas, and some, having comforted their brothers and sons and father, and placed them in camp, once more came to battle.

13. Some, arranging their cars in order, O king, of superiors and inferiors, proceeded against the Pandavas once more for battle.

14. On their cars adorned with rows of bells, those heroes shone like Daityas and Danavas desirous of conquering the three worlds.

15. Some, advancing quickly on their cars decked with gold, fought with Dhrishtadyumna amid the Pandava army.

16. The Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, and the great car-warrior Shikhandin, and Shatanika the son of Nakula, fought with the car-division of the enemy.

17. Worked up with rage and supported by a large army, the Panchala prince rushed against your infuriated soldiers from desire of killing them.

18. Then your son, O king, discharged many arrows, O Bharata, at the Panchala prince thus rushing at him.

19. Then, O king, Dhrishtadyumna was quickly cut with many arrows in his arms and chest by your son fighting with his bow.

20. Deeply cut therewith like an elephant with pointed lances, that great bowman then killed with his arrows the four horses of Duryodhana. With another broad-headed arrow he sundered, from his trunk, the head of his enemy's driver.

21. Then that grinder of foes, viz., king Duryodhana, having thus lost his car, rode on horseback and retreated to a little distance.

22. Beholding his own army thus enfeebled, your son, the mighty Duryodhana, O king, proceeded where Suvala's son was.

23. When the Kaurava cars were broken, the thousand huge elephants encompassed those car-warriors, viz., the five Pandavas.

24. Encompassed by that elephant, O Bharata, the five brothers looked beautiful, O foremost of men, like the planets surrounded by the clouds.

25. Then the mighty-armed Arjuna, O king, of sure aim, having Krishna for his driver, and white horses, advanced on his car.

26. Surrounded by mountain-like elephants he began to destroy those animals with his keen and polished arrows.

27. Each killed with a single arrow, we saw those huge elephants fallen or falling down, wounded by Savyasachin.

28. The powerful Bhimasena, himself like an infuriate elephant, seeing those elephants, took up his formidable mace and rushed at them, quickly jumping down from his car, like the Destroyer armed with his club.

29. Seeing that great car-warrior of the Pandavas with uplifted mace, your soldiers were possessed by fear and passed urine and excreta. The whole army were agitated upon seeing Bhimasena armed with mace.

30. We then saw those elephants, huge as hills, running hither and thither, with their frontal globes cut open by Bhima with his mace and all their limbs covered with blood.

31. Struck with Bhima's mace, those elephants, running off from him, dropped down crying like mountains with their wings cut off.

32. Beholding those numberless elephants, with their frontal globes cut open, running hither and thither or falling down your soldiers were possessed by fear.

33. Then Yudhishthira also, worked up with anger and the two sons of Madri, began to kill those elephant-warriors with arrows having wings like those of vultures.

34. Dhrishtadyumna, after the defeat of the Kuru king in battle, and after the flight of the latter from that spot on horse-back, saw that the Pandavas had all been encircled by the Kaurava elephants.

35. Beholding this, O king, Dhrishtadyumna, the son of the Panchala king, proceeded towards those elephants to them.

36. In the meantime not seeing Duryodhana in the midst of the car-force, Ashwatthaman and Kripa, and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, asked all the Kshatriyas, saying,—"Where has Duryodhana gone."

37. Not seeing the king in the midst of that onslaught all those great car-warriors took him for dead and therefore with sorrowful faces, they enquired after him.

38. Some told them that after the destruction of his driver, he has gone to Suvala's son.

39. Others, who had been greatly wounded said,—"What necessity is there with Duryodhana. See, if he is yet alive. Do you all fight in a body, what will the king do to you."

40. Other Kshatriyas, who were greatly wounded and who had lost many of their relatives, and who were still being struck with the arrows of the enemy, said these words indistinctly.

41. "Let us kill these forces by whom we are encircled. See the Pandavas are coming here after having killed the elephants.

42—43. Hearing these words, the powerful Ashwatthaman, cutting through that irresistible force of the Panchala king, went with Kripa and Kritavarman, where Suvala's son was. Infact leaving the car-force, those heroes, those firm bowmen, went to find out Duryodhana.

44. After their departure, the Pandavas, headed by Dhrishtadyumna, advanced, O king, and began to kill their enemies.

45. Beholding those brave, heroic and powerful car-warriors rushing joyously towards them, your soldiers, whose faces grew pale, became despondent of their lives.

46—47. Beholding those soldiers of ours almost deprived of weapons and surrounded by the enemy, I myself, O king, having only two kinds of forces, and caring for life, joined the five leaders of our army, and fought with the forces of the Panchala prince, and placed our men where Sharadwata's son was.

48. We had been cut with the arrows of Arjuna and still a fierce encounter took place between us and the army of Dhrishtadyumna. At last, defeated by the latter, all of us retreated from that battle.

49. I then beheld the great car-warrior Satyaki rushing against us. With four hundred cars that hero pursued me in battle.

50. Having escaped with difficulty from Dhrishtadyumna whose horses had been exhausted, I fell among the soldiers of Madhava even as a sinner falleth into hell. There a fierce and terrible encounter took place for a short time.

51. The mighty-armed Satyaki, having cut off my armour, thought of taking me alive. He caught me while I lay down on the ground insensible

52. Then within a short time that elephant force was killed by Bhimasena with his mace and Arjuna with his arrows.

53. On account of those mighty elephants, huge as hills, falling down on every side with wounded limbs, the Pandava warriors found their way entirely blocked up.

54. Then the powerful Bhimasena, O king, dragging away those huge elephants, made a way for the Pandavas.

55. Meanwhile not seeing that chastiser of foes Duryodhana amid the car-division, Ashwatthaman and Kripa and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, tried to find out your royal son.

56. Leaving the prince of the Panchalas they proceeded where Suvala's son was, anxious to see the king during that terrible onslaught.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1—3. 'On that elephant division being destroyed, O Bharata, by the son of Pandu and while your army was being thus killed by Bhimasena in battle beholding the latter, that chastiser of foes,—moving about like the all-killing Destroyer himself in rage armed with his club, your remaining sons, O king, united together at that time, when your son Duryodhana could not be seen, rushed against Bhimasena.

4—5. They were Durmarshana, Shrutanta, Jaitra, Bhurivala, Ravi, Jayatsena Sujata, and that slayer of foes, viz., Durvishaha, and he called Durvimochana, and Dushpradharsha, and the mighty-armed Shrutarvan. All of them were experts in battle.

6. These sons of thine, in a body, rushed against Bhimasena and encircled him.

7. Then Bhima, O monarch, once more getting on his own car, began to shoot keen arrows at the vital limbs of your sons.

8. Those sons of yours, covered with arrows by Bhimasena in that dreadful encounter, began to drag that warrior like men dragging an elephant from the crossing point.

9. Worked up with anger, Bhimsena, quickly cut off the head of Durmarshana with a razor-headed arrow, and threw it on the Earth.

10. With another broad-headed arrow capable of cutting through every armour, Bhima next killed the great car-warrior, viz., your son Shrutanta.

11. Then striking Jayatsena easily with a cloth-yard shaft, that chastiser of foes, viz., the son of Pandu, struck down that scion of Kuru's race from his car. The prince, O king, dropped down and immediately died.

12. Thereat your son Shrutarvan, worked up with rage, struck Bhima with a hundred straight arrows winged with feathers of vultures.

13. Then Bhima, worked up with rage, struck Jaitra and Ravi and Bhurivala, with three arrows resembling poison or fire.

14. Those great car-warriors, thus struck, dropped down from their cars like Kinshukas blossoming in the spring.

15. Then that scorcher of foes, with another broad-headed and keen arrow, struck Durvimochana and killed him.

16. Thus struck, that best of car-warriors fell down on the ground from his car, like a tree growing on the summit of a mountain uprooted by the storm.

17. The son of Pandu next struck your other two sons leading their forces, viz., Dushpradharsha and Sujata, each with a couple of arrows in that battle. Those two best of car-warriors, struck with those arrows, fell down.

18. Beholding another son of yours viz., Durvishaha, and rushing at him, Bhima struck him with a broad-headed arrow in that battle. That prince dropped down from his car before all the bowmen.

19—20. Beholding so many of his brothers killed by Bhima alone in that battle, Shrutarvan, worked up with rage, rushed at Bhima, stretching his dreadful bow decked with gold and discharging a large number of arrows resembling poison or fire.

21. Cutting off the bow of Pandu's son in that dreadful encounter, the Kuru prince struck the bowless Bhima with twenty arrows.

22. Then Bhimasena, that great car-warrior, taking up another bow, covered your son with arrows and said to him "Wait, wait."

23. The encounter between the two was beautiful and dreadful, like that which took place in days of yore between Vasava and the Asura Jambha, O lord.

24. With the sharp arrows, resembling the dreadful rod of Yama, shot by those two warriors, the earth, the sky, and all the points of the horizon were covered.

25. Then excited with rage, Shrutarvan took up his bow and struck Bhimasena in that battle, O king, with many arrows on his arms and chest.

26. Deeply cut, O king by your son armed with the bow, Bhima grew exceedingly agitated like the ocean at the full or the new moon.

27. Excited with ire Bhima then, O sire, killed with his arrows the driver and the four horses of your son.

28. Beholding him careless and displaying the lightness of his hand the great son of Pandu covered him with winged arrows.

29. The carless Shrutarvan then, O king, took up a sword and shield. As the prince, however, moved about with his sword and shining shield effulgent like a hundred moons, the son of Pandu cut off his head with a razor-headed arrow and dropped it on the earth.

30. The trunk of that great warrior, whose head was cut off by that razor-headed arrow, fell down from his car filling the earth with a loud noise.

31. Upon the death of that hero, your soldiers, though terror-stricken, rushed in that battle against Bhimasena for fighting with him.

32. The brave Bhimasena, clad in mail, received those warriors rushing quickly at him who were not killed amongst that ocean of troops. Approaching him, those warriors, encircled that hero on all sides.

33. Thus surrounded by those warriors, Bhima began to assail them all with sharp arrows like the thousand-eyed deity assailing the Asuras.

34. Having destroyed five hundred great cars with their fences, he again killed seven hundred elephants in that battle.

35. Slaying next ten thousand infantry with his strong shafts, as also eight hundred horses, the son of Pandu shone there.

36. Indeed, having killed your sons in that battle, Bhimasena, the son of Kunti, regarded his object accomplished, O lord, and birth fruitful.

37. Your soldiers, at that time, O Bharata, dared not even look at that warrior who was fighting in that fashion and killing your men in that way.

38. Scattering all the Kurus and killing their followers, Bhima then slapped his armpits, terrifying the huge elephants with the noise.

39. Then your army, O king, which had lost a very large number of men, and consisted of a very few soldiers, became highly depressed. O king.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(SHALYA PARVA) –Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. 'Duryodhana, O king, and your son Sudarsha, the only two of your children who were not killed, were at that time in the midst of the Kauravas cavalry.

2—3. Seeing Duryodhana in the midst of the cavalry, Krishna said to Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti :—"A large number of our enemies, relations that had received our protection, have been killed. There that best of Shini's race is returning, having taken Sanjaya captive.

4. Both Nakula and Sahadeva, O Bharata, are worn out having fought with the wretched Dhartarashtras and their followers.

5. Those three, viz., Kripa and Kritavarman and the great car-warrior Ashwatthaman, have left Duryodhana's side and taken up their positions elsewhere.

6. Having killed Duryodhana's soldiers, the beautiful Panchala prince is waiting there in the midst of the Prabhadrakas.

7. There, O Partha, Duryodhana is in the midst of his cavalry, with the umbrella held over his head and looking all around.

8. Having re-arranged the remnant of his army, he waits in the midst of his forces. Killing this one with your keen arrows you may achieve all your objects.

9. As long as these troops do not fly away seeing you in their midst and witnessing also the destruction of their elephant force, do you, O chastiser of foes, try to kill Duryodhana.

10. Let somebody go to the Panchala prince and ask him to come here. The Kaurava troops are all exhausted. O sire, the sinful Duryodhana will never succeed in escaping.

11. Having killed a large number of your soldiers in battle the son of Dhritarashtra looks highly delighted as if he believes that the Pandavas have been defeated.

12—13. Seeing his own soldiers assailed and killed by the Pandavas, the Kuru king will certainly come to battle for his own destruction."—Thus addressed by Krishna, Phalguna said to him :—"almost all the sons of Dhritarashtra, O giver of honors, have been killed by Bhima. Only these two still survive; they, however, O Krishna, shall also be killed today.

14. Bhishma has been killed, Drona has been killed, Karna has been killed, Shalya, the king of the Madras, has been killed, and Jayadratha also, O Krishna, has been killed.

15. Only five hundred cavalry constitute the army of Shakuni the son of Suvala. Only two hundred still remain, of cars, O Janarddana. Of elephants the only remnant is a hundred and of foot only three thousand.

16. There remain also Ashwatthaman and Kripa and the king of the Trigartas and Uluka and Shakuni and Kritavarman of the Satwata race.

17. These, O Madhava, are the remnant of Duryodhana's army. Truly no body will escape from death.

18. Although such a great slaughter has taken place, Duryodhana is still alive. Today king Yudhishthira, however, will be shorn of all his foes. None of my enemies will escape me, today.

19. Even if they be superhuman beings, O Krishna! I shall yet kill all those warriors today if only they do not fly away from the battle-field.

20. Worked up with wrath in today's battle, I shall, by killing the prince of Gandhara with my keen arrows, remove that sleeplessness which the king has suffered from for a long time.

21. I shall regain all those valuable properties which Suvala's wicked son won from us at the gambling match.

22. Hearing of the destruction of their husbands and sons at the hands of the Pandavas in battle, all the ladies of Hastinapur will cry.

23. Today, O Krishna, our task will be finished. Today Duryodhana shall be divorced from his prosperity and life.

24. You may take the foolish son of Dhritarashtra as dead, O Vrishni heroe, if, O Krishna, he does not today fly away from the battle.

25. Those horses cannot bear the twang of my bow and the slaps of my palms. Proceed there, O Kristna, for I will kill them.

26. Thus accosted by Pandu's son of great mental strength, the Dasharha heroe urged his horses, O king, towards Duryodhana's detachment.

27. Beholding that force, three great car-warriors prepared themselves for striking it, for Bhimasena and Arjuna and Sahadeva, O sire, in a body, proceeded against it with loud leonine roars in order to kill Duryodhana.

28. Beholding those three warriors rushing quickly together with unlifted bows, Suvala's son proceeded against the Pandavas.

29. Your son Sudarshana rushed against Bnimasena. Susharman and Shakuni met with Kiritin. Your son Duryodhana on horse-back proceeded against Sahadeva.

30. Then your son, O king, with great speed and care, forcibly struck Sahadev's head with a lance.

31. Thus struck by your son, Sahadeva sat down on his car, all his limbs being covered with blood and himself breathing like a snake.

32. Regaining his consciousness then, O king, Sahadeva, in anger, covered Duryodhana with keen shafts.

33. Kunti's son Dhananjaya, otherwise called Partha, displaying his prowess, sundered the heads of many brave warriors on horse back.

34. Indeed, Partha, with many arrows, destroyed that (cavalry). Having killed all the horses, he then proceeded against the cars of the Trigartas.

35. Thereat the great car warriors of the Trigartas, in a body, covered Arjuna and Vasudeva with showers of arrows.

36. Assailing Satyakarman with a razor-headed arrow, the illustrious son of Pandu, sundered his antagonist's car-shafts.

37. With another razor-headed arrow, O lord, whetted on stone, that illustrious hero, smiling cut off his antagonist's head crown adorned with a golden ,

38. He next attacked Satyeshu before all the warriors, like a hungry lion, O king, in the forest, attacking a deer.

39. Having killed him, Partha struck Susharman with three arrows and then killed all those car-warriors bedecked with golden ornaments.

40. He then proceeded with great force against Susharman the king of Prasthhala, displaying his anger cherished for many long years.

41. Covering him first, O foremost of Bharata's race, with a hundred arrows Arjuna then killed all the horses of that bowman.

42. Fixing then a strong arrow that resembled the rod of Yama, Partha, smiling, quickly shot it at Susharman, aiming it at him.

43. Shot by that bowman chaffing with wrath, that arrow, reaching Susharman, passed through his heart in that battle.

44. O king, Susharman fell down dead on the earth, gladdening all the Pandavas and distressing all your warriors.

45. Having killed Susharman in that battle, Partha then, with his arrow, killed the five and thirty sons of that king, all of whom were great car-warriors.

46. Killing next all the followers of Susharman with his keen arrows, the great car-warrior Arjuna proceeded against the remnant of the Bharata army.

47. In that battle, filled with rage, O king, Bhima covered Sudarshana with his arrows.

48. Filled with rage, the son of Pandu, smiling, cut off his antagonist's head with a sharp razor-headed arrow. The prince fell down dead on the earth.

49. Upon the fall of that (Kuru) hero, his followers encircled Bhima in that battle, making a downpour of whetted arrows.

50. With keen arrows Vrikodara, however, whose touch resembled that of Indra's thunder, enshrouded the army around him. Within a very short time, Bhima killed them all, O foremost of Bharata's race.

51. Whilst they were being thus slain, many powerful Kaurava warriors, O Bharata, approached Bhima and began to fight with him.

52. The son of Pandu, O king, enshrouded all of them with his arrows. In the same way your warriors, O king, covered the great car-warriors of the Pandavas with arrows from all sides.

53. All the warriors then, of both sides thus fighting with one another, became exceedingly agitated.

54. Struck by one another, the warriors of both armies, O king, began to drop down, lamenting for their (deceased) relatives.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. During the course of that battle which was so destructive of men and horses and elephants, Suvala's son Shakuni, O king, proceeded against Sahadeva.

2. The valiant Sahadeva, as Shakuni rushed quickly towards him, discharged showers of quick-coursing arrows at that warrior like a swarm of insects. At that time Uluka also met Bhima and struck him with ten arrows.

3. O king, having struck Bhima with three arrows, Shakuni, meanwhile, covered Sahadeva with ninety.

4. Indeed, O king, encountering one another in that battle, those heroes, struck one another with many Kanka and peacock feathered keen arrows winged with gold, whetted on stone, and shot off the bow-string drawn to their ears.

5. Those showers of arrows discharged from their bows and arms, O monarch, covered all the points of the horizon like a thick downpour of rain poured foom the clouds.

6. Then Bhima, worked up with rage, and the brave Sahadeva, both very powerful, moved about in that battle making a great onslaught.

7. That army, O Bharata, was shrouded with hundreds of arrows by those two warriors, and the sky, on many parts of the field, was shrouded with darkness.

8. The horses: struck with arrows, dragging after them as they ran a large number of killed warriors the passage in the battle-field was entirely blocked up.

9. Covered with horses slain with their riders, with broken shields and lances, and with swords and darts and spears all around the earth appeared to have been strewn with flowers.

10. The warriors, O king, meeting one another, moved about in battle, exercised with wrath and killing one another.

11. Soon the field was covered with heads, beautiful as the filaments of the lotus, bedecked with ear-rings and having faces set with eyes upturned in wrath and lips bit in rage.

12—13. Covered also, O king, with the arms of warriors resembling the trunks of huge elephants, that were bedecked with Angada and coated in leathern fences, and that still held swords and lances and battle-axes, and with headless bodies standing on their feet and bleeding and dancing on the field, and abounding with various carnivorous animals, the earth, O king, appeared exceedingly terrific.

14. After the Bharata army had been reduced to a small number, the Pandavas, filled with delight in that dreadful battle, began to slay the Kauravas.

15. Meanwhile the heroic and brave son of Suvala forcibly struck Sahadeva in the head with a lance.

16. Greatly exercised, O king, for that blow, Sahadeva sat down on the terrace of his car.

17. Beholding Sahadeva in that condition the valiant Bhima, worked up with rage, O Bharata, obstructed the entire Kuru army.

18. With his cloth-yard shafts he struck hundreds and thousands of hostile warriors, and having struck them so, that chastiser of foes sent up a leonine roar.

19. Terrified at that roar, all the followers of Shakuni, with their horses and elephants immediately fled away in fear.

20. Seeing them routed, king Duryodhana said to them :—"Stop, ye immoral Kshatriyas ! fight ! What is the use of flight ?

21—22. That hero, who unretreatingly sacrifices his life in battle, achieves fame here and enjoyes blissful regions hereafter !" —Thus exhorted by the king, the followers of Suvala's son once more proceeded against the Pandavas, determined upon meeting with death.

23. O monarch, the noise made by those rushing warriors was terrible and resembled that of the agitated ocean. Thereat the field of battle was agitated all around.

24. Beholding those followers of Suvala's son thus proceeding to battle, the victorious Pandavas, O monarch, rushed against them.

25. Relieved a little, the invincible Sahadeva, O monarch, struck Shakuni with ten arrows and his horses with three. He, without the slighest exertion, then cut off the bow of Suvala's son with a number of other arrows.

26. Invincible in battle, Shakuni, however, took up another bow and struck Nakula with sixty arrows and then Bhimasena with seven.

27. Uluka also, O king, desirous of rescuing his father in that battle, struck Bhima with seven arrows and Sahadeva with seventy.

28. Bhimasena, in that battle, struck Uluka with many keen arrows and Shakuni with four and sixty, and each of the other warriors who fought around them, with three arrows.

29. Struck by Bhimasena with arrows steeped in oil, the Kauravas, exercised with rage in that battle, covered Sahadeva with showers of arrows like clouds accompained with lightnings pouring rain on a mountain breast.

30. The heroic and brave Sahadeva then, O king, cut off, with a broad-headed arrow, the head of Uluka as the latter proceeded against him.

31. Killed by Sahadeva, Uluka, cheering the Pandavas in that battle, dropped down on the earth from his car, covered with blood.

32. Seeing his son slain, Shakuni, O Bharata, with voice suppressed in tears and sighing heavily, recollected the words of Vidura.

33. Having thought for a moment with tearful eyes, Shakuni, breathing heavily, approached Sahadeva and struck him with three arrows.

34. Counteracting those arrows shot by Suvala's son with another downpour the brave Sahadeva, O king, sundered his antagonist's bow in that battle.

35. Seeing his bow sundered, O king, Shakuni, the son of Suvala, took up a formidable scimitar and discharged it at Sahadeva.

36. The latter, however, O king, easily cut off in twain that terrible scimitar of Suvala's son as it went towards him in that skirmish.

37. Beholding his sword cut in two parts Shakuni took up a dreadful mace and discharged it at Sahadeva. That mace also dropped down on the earth unsuccessful.

38. After this, Suvala's son, worked up with rage threw at the son of Pandu a dreadful dart resembling an imminent death-night.

39. With great facility Sahadeva, in that battle, cut off, with his golden arrows, that dart into three pieces as it went swiftly towards him.

40. Cut off into pieces that golden dart fell down on the earth like a burning thunder-bolt from the sky sending forth many flashes.

41. Seeing that dart unsuccessful and Suvala's son possessed by fear, all your soldiers fled away. Suvala's son also joined them.

42. The Pandavas then, eager for victory, sent up loud war-cries. As regards the Dhartarashtra, almost all of them fled away from the field.

43. Seeing them so dispirited the brave son of Madri, with many thousand arrows, opposed them in that battle.

44. Then Sahadeva attacked Suvala's son as the latter, who was still sanguine of success, was flying away guarded by the picked cavalry of the Gandharas.

46. Recollecting, O king, that Shakuni, who had to be slain by him, was still alive, Sahadeva, on his car adorned with gold, pursued that warrior.

45. Stringing his formidable bow and drawing it vehemently Sahadeva, in rage, pursued the son of Suvala and struck him with many arrows winged with vulturine feathers and whetted on stone, like a person striking a powerful elephant with pointed lances.

47—48. The energetic Sahadeva, having assailed his foe thus, addressed him, recollecting (his past misdeeds), in these words:—"Observing the duties of a Kshatriya, fight with me and show yourself to be a man! You, O fool, rejoiced greatly in the midst of the assembly, while gambling with dice. Receive now, O wicked man, the fruit of the act.

49. All those wicked men, that had ridiculed us then, have died. Only that vile wretch of his family viz., Duryodhana still and you his maternal uncle survive.

50—51. Today I shall kill you cutting off your head with a razor-headed arrow like a person plucking a fruit from a tree with a stick." Saying these words, O king, powerful Sahadeva, that foremost of men, filled with anger, rushed against Shakuni.

52. Approaching his enemy, the invincible Sahadeva, that best of warriors, forcibly drawing his bow and as if consuming his enemy with anger,

53. Struck Shakuni with ten arrows and his horses with four. Then cutting off his umbrella and standard and bow, he roared like a lion.

54. His standard and bow and umbrella being thus cut off by Sahadeva, Suvala's son was struck with many arrows in all his vital parts.

55. Again, O king, the brave Sahadeva discharged at Shakuni an irresistible shower of arrows.

56. Filled with anger the son of Suvala, then single-handed, rushed impetuously against Sahadeva in that encounter, desirous of killing the latter with a lance adorned with gold.

57. However with three broad-headed arrows, the son of Madri cut off at the same time without losing a moment that uplifted lance as also the two plump arms of his enemy and then sent up a loud war-cry.

58. The heroic and active Sahadeva then, with a broad-headed arrow made of hard iron, adorned with wings of gold, capable of cutting every armour, and shot with great force and care, cut off from his trunk his enemy's head.

59. Deprived of his head by the son of Pandu with that gold-decked and sharp arrow, effulgent like the Sun, Suvalas son dropped down on the earth in that battle.

60. Indeed, the son of Pandu, worked up with rage, struck off that head which was the root of the evil policy of the Kurus, with that powerful arrow winged with gold and whetted on stone.

61. Beholding Shakuni lying headless on the ground and all his limbs bathed in blood your warriors, inert with fear, fled away on all sides with weapons in their hands.

62. At that time your sons, with cars, elephants, horse, and foot, entirely routed, heard the twang of Gandiva and fled away with dried faces, possessed by fear and senseless.

63. Having thrown down Shakuni from his car, the Pandavas, were filled with joy. Rejoicing with Keshava amongst them, they blew their conchs in that battle, cheering up their troops.

64. All of them, gladly worshipped Sahadeva, and said,—"By good luck, O hero, the wicked Shakuni, that one of evil policy, has, with his son, been killed by you."

CHAPTER XXIX.

(HRADA-PRAVESHA PARVA).

Sanjaya said :—

1. After this, the followers of Suvala's son, O king, were worked up with rage. Prepared to sacrifice their lives in that dreadful encounter, they began to oppose the Pandavas.

2. Resolved to help Sahadeva in his victory, the energetic Arjuna and Bhimasena, resembling an infuriated venomous serpent, received those warriors.

3. With his Gandiva, Dhananjaya baffled the object of those warriors who, armed with darts and swords and lances, desired to kill Sahadeva.

4. Vibhatsu, with his broad-headed arrows, cut off the horses, the heads, and the arms, with weapons in grasp, of those rushing warriors.

5. The powerful horses of those great heroes, struck by Savyasachin, dropped down on the earth, dead.

6—8. Beholding that onslaught of his own soldiers, O lord, King Duryodhana was filled with rage. Collecting the residue of his cars which was still many hundreds in number, as also his elephants and horse and foot, O scorcher of foes, your son said to those warriors:—"Meeting all the Pandavas with their friends and allies, in this battle, and the Panchala prince also with his own army, and killing them speedily turn back from the field."

9. Respectfully obeying that mandate, those invincible warriors proceeded once more against the Parthas in that battle.

10. The Pandavas, however, enshrouded with their arrows resembling venomous snakes, all the remnant of the Kaurava army, that thus rushed quickly against them in that dreadful battle.

11. That army, O Bharata' chief, as it came to battle, was in no time killed by those great warriors, for it had no protector.

12. The horses running hither and thither that were all covered with the dust raised by the army, the cardinal and the subsidiary points of the horizon could not be discerned.

13. Coming out of the Pandava army, O Bharata, many warriors killed your soldiers in a moment in that battle.

14. Eleven Akshauhinis, O Bharata, of troops had been collected for your son. All those, O lord, were killed by the Pandus and the Srinjayas.

15. Amongst those thousands and thousands of great kings belonging to your party, only Duryodhana now, O king, exceedingly mangled, survives.

16—18. Looking on all sides and seeing the earth [vacant, himself deprived all his troops while the Pandavas were joyously roaring aloud for the fulfillment of all their objects, Duryodhana, O king, unable to bear the sound of arrows discharged by those great heroes, became stupified. Deprived of troops and animals, he made up his mind to fly from the field.

Dhritarashtra said :—

19. When my soldiers were killed and our camp made entirely empty, what was the strength, O Suta, of the remnant the Pandavas army? I desire to know this. Therefore, tell me O Sanjaya, for you are a skillful narrator.

20. Tell me also, O Sanjaya, that which was done by my son, the wicked Duryodhana, that king of the earth, the sole survivor of so many men, when he saw his army entirely destroyed.

Sanjaya continued :—

21—22. "Two thousand cars, seven hundred elephants, five thousand horse, and ten thousand foot-soldiers was the remnant, O king, of the mighty army of the Pandavas. Looking after this army Dhrishtadyumna waited in that battle.

23. Meanwhile, O chief of the Bharatas, king Duryodhana, that best of car-warriors, did not find a single warrior on his side.

24. Seeing his enemies roaring aloud and the destruction of his own army, that lord of earth Duryodhana, without a comrade, left off his slain horse and fled from the field with face turned eastwards.

25. That lord of eleven Akshauhinis, viz., the energetic Duryodhana, taking up his mace, fled on foot towards a lake.

26—28. Before he had proceeded far on foot, the king remembered the words of the intelligent and virtuous Vidura.—"Forsooth, this had been foreseen by the wise Vidura viz., this great destruction of Kshatriyas and of ourselves in battle." Reflecting on this, the king, with heart burning in grief at having seen the extermination of his army, desired to go into the depths of that lake.

29. The Pandavas, O king, with Dhrishtadyumna at their head, worked up with anger, rushed against the residue of your army.

30. With his Gandiva, Dhananjaya baffled the object of the Kaurava troops, who, armed with darts and swords and lances, were crying aloud.

31. Having, with his sharp arrows, killed those troops with their allies and relatives, Arjuna, as he stood on his car having white horses yoked to it, shone highly beautiful.

32. Upon the death of Suvala's son along with horse, cars, and elephants, your army looked like a large forest devasted by a storm.

33—34. In Duryodhana's army then, O monarch, which had many hundred thousands of warriors, not one single car-warrior was alive, save the heroic son of Drona, and Kritavarman, and Kripa the son of Gotama, and the lord of earth, viz., your son.

35. Seeing me, Dhrishtadyumna, laughingly addressed Satyaki, saying,—What is the use of seizing this man. We will gain nothing by keeping him alive

36. Hearing these words of Dhrishtadyumna, the grandson of Shini, that great car-warrior, raising up his sharp sword, was ready to kill me.

37. Just at the neck of time the wise Vyasa, coming there, said,—Let Sanjaya be sent away alive. On no account he should be killed.

38. Hearing these words of Vyasa, the grandson of Shini joined his hands, and then setting me free, said to me,—Peace to you, O Sanjaya, you may go away.

39. Permitted by him, myself then putting off my armour and surrendering my weapons, started in the evening for the city, my limbs covered with blood.

40. After I had come about two miles O king I beheld Duryodhana, standing alone, mace in hand, and greatly wounded.

41. His eyes were full of tears and, therefore, he could not see me. I stood depressed before him. He saw me but could not recognise me.

42. Beholding him standing alone on the field, I also, laden with grief could not speak a single word for some time.

43. Then I discribed to him everything about my own capture and my release by the favour of Vyasa.

44. Having reflected for a moment, and regained his consciousness he enquired of me after his brothers and his soldiers.

45. I had seen every thing with my eyes and therefore, told him everything viz., that his brothers had all been killed and that his entire army destroyed.

46. I told the king that we had at that time only three car-warriors left alive, for Vedavyasa told me so when I set out (from the Pandava camp).

47—48. Sighing heavily and looking repeatedly at me, your son touched me with his hand and said,—"Save you, O Sanjaya, no one else is alive, amongst those engaged in this battle. See there is no one on my side, while the Pandavas have their allies living.

49. Say, O Sanjaya, to the blind king Dhritarashtra, that his son Duryodhana has entered into a lake.

50. Shorn of friends, deprived of sons and brothers, and seeing his kingdom taken by the Pandavas, who is there like me that would desire to live.

51. Say all this to the king and tell him further that I have escaped with life from that dreadful battle, and that, alive, though exceedingly mangled, I shall live within the lake."

52. Saying this to me, O king, the king, entered that lake. By his power of illusion king Duryodhana charmed the waters of the lake, making room for him.

53. After he had entered that lake, myself, without anybody on my side, saw those three car-warriors coming together there with their tired animals.

54. They were Kripa, the son of Sharadwat, and the heroic Ashwatthaman, that best of car-warriors, and Kritavarman of Bhoja's race. Wounded with arrows, all of them came together there.

55. Seeing me, they all urged their horses to greater speed and coming up to me, said,—By good luck, O Sanjaya, you are still alive.

56. All of them then enquired after your son, saying,—"Is our king Duryodhana still alive, O Sanjaya?"

57. I then told them that the king was physically well. I also related to them everything that Duryodhana had said to me. I also pointed out to them the lake where the king had entered.

58—59. O king, having heard those words, then Ashwatthaman looked at that extensive lake and began to wail in grief, saying, "Alas, Alas, the king knew not that we are still alive! With him amongst us, we are still quite competent to fight with our enemies."

60. Having wept there for a long time, those great car-warriors fled away seeing the sons of Pandu.

61. Those three car-warriors, the remnant of our army, took me up on the well-adorned car of Kripa and then set out for the Kuru camp.

62. The sun had set a little before. Learning that all your sons had been killed the troops, forming the outposts of the camp, wept aloud.

63. Then, O king, the old men, that had been engaged to look after the ladies of the royal household, set out for the city, taking the princesses after them.

64. The attendants and ladies wept aloud when they heard of the destruction of the whole army.

65. O king, crying ceaselessly, the women caused the earth to resound with their voices like a warm of she-ospreys.

66. They tore their bodies with their nails and struck their heads with their hands, and loosened their braids, crying all the while aloud.

67. Filling the sky with exclamations of grief, and beating their breasts, they cried aloud and wept, O king.

68. Then the friends of Duryodhana, deeply afflicted and their voice suppressed by their tears, started for the city, taking the royal ladies with them.

69. The camp-guards quickly fled towards the city, taking with them many white beds covered with rich sheets.

70. Others, placing their wives on cars drawn by mules, set out for the city.

71. Those ladies, O king, who were not before seen even by the sun, were now, as they started for the city, exposed to the view of the common people.

72. Those women, O head of the Bharatas, who were very delicate, now proceeded quickly towards the city, having lost their dear ones and kinsmen.

73. The very cowherds and shepherds and common men, stricken with panic for the fear of Bhimasena, fled towards the city.

74. They were also filled with a great fear of the Parthas. Looking at one another, all of them fled towards the city.

75. During that general flight accompanied with fear, Yuyutsu, beside himself with grief, thought upon what he should do under the present circumstances.

76. Duryodhana has been defeated in battle by the powerful Pandavas. He had eleven Akshauhinis of soldiers under him. All his brothers have been killed.

77. All the Kauravas, led by Bhishma and Drona, have died. By good luck, only I have been saved.

78. All those that were in the Kuru camp have fled. Alas, dispirited and helpless they are flying on all sides.

79. Such a spectacle had never been witnessed before. Assailed with sorrow, with eyes anxious in fear, they are flying away on all directions like a herd of deer looking at one another.

80. Amongst the counsellors of Duryodhana those, that are yet alive, have fled towards the city, taking with them the royal ladies.

81. I think, O lord, that the time has appeared when I also should enter the city with them, after taking the permission of Yudhishthira and Vasudeva. For this purpose that powerful prince appeared before both those heroes.

82. King Yudhishthira, who is always kind, became highly pleased with him. The powerful Pandava embraced that child of a Vaishya mother and sent him away affectionately.

83. Getting upon his own car, he urged on his horses. He then looked after the departure of the ladies of the royal seraglio for the city.

84. The sun was setting. With those ladies, Yuyutsu entered the city of Hastinapur, with tearful eyes and with voice suppressed in grief.

85. He then saw the highly wise Vidura sitting with tearful eyes. He had come away from Dhritarashtra, his heart possessed by great sorrow.

86. Saluting Vidura, he stood before him. Truthful Vidura said to him,—"By good luck, O son, you have survived the Kurus.

87—88. Why, however have you come without king Duryodhana, in your company? Tell me in detail the cause thereof.—" Yuyutsu then said." After the destruction of Shakuni, O sire, with all his relations and friends, king Duryodhana, leaving behind his horse, fled away in fear towards the east.

89. After the king's flight, all the Kuru people, worked up with fear, fled towards the city.

90. Then the guards of the ladies, placing the wives of the king, as also those of his brothers, on vehicles, fled away in fear.

91. With the permission of king Yudhishthira and Keshava, I started for Hastinapura, for protecting the people thus flying away.

92. Hearing those words of the son of Dhritarashtra's Vaishya wife the great Vidura, conversant with practices and feelings for the hour, praised the eloquent Yuyutsu.

93. And he said,—"You have acted properly, thinking what has come about of this destruction of all the Bharatas. You have also, from pity, maintained the honor of your family.

94. By good luck we see you alive in this terrible battle in which heroes have been killed like creatures beholding the blazing sun.

95. O son, you are now the only support of the blind king shorn of foresight, afflicted with calamity, struck by Destiny, and who though repeatedly dissuaded, could not abstain from following his evil policy.

96. Take rest here for this day. To-morrow you may go to Yudhishthira."—Having said these words, Vidura, with tearful eyes,

97. Took leave of Yuyutsu and entered the palace of the king which was filled with the lamentations of woe-stricken citizens.

98. The cheerless palace was shorn of beauty, comfort and happiness. It was all empty and disorderly. Already filled with grief, Vidura's sorrow increased at that spectacle.

99. Dutiful Vidura, with a sorrowful heart, entered the palace, sighing heavily.

100. As regards Yuyutsu, he passed that night in his own house. Possessed by misery, he could find no delight at the panegyrics with which he was wellcomed. He passed the time, thinking of the terrible onslaught of the Bharatas.

CHAPTER XXX.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1—2. 'After all the Kaurava soldiers had been killed by the sons of Pandu on the field of battle, what did those survivors of my party viz., Kritavarman and Kripa and the brave son of Drona do? What also did the wicked king Duryodhana then do?'

Sanjaya said :—

3. 'After the flight of the ladies of those great Kshatriyas, and after the Kaurava camp had become entirely empty, the three car-warriors were stricken with anxiety.

4. Hearing the shouts of the victorious sons of Pandu, and beholding the camp empty in the evening, those three warriors of our side, desirous of rescuing the king and unable to stand on the field, proceeded towards the lake.

5. The virtuous Yudhishthira, with his brothers in that battle, felt great joy and wandered over the field for killing Duryodhana.

6. Filled with anger the Pandavas, desirous of victory, searched for your son. Though however, they searched carefully for him, they could not discover the Kuru king.

7. With a mace in hand, he had fled quickly from the field of battle and entered into that lake, having by his power of illusion converted the water into a solid substance.

8. When at last the animals of the Pandavas were very much tired, the latter proceeded to their camp and took rest there along with their soldiers.

9. After the Parthas had gone to their camp, Kripa and Drona's son and Kritavarman of the Satwata race slowly went towards that lake.

10—11. Approaching the lake within which was the king, they addressed that invincible king of men asleep within the water, saying,—" Arise, O king, and fight with Yudhishthira. Either obtaining victory enjoy the Earth, or killed proceed to heaven.

12. The force of the Pandavas also, O Duryodhana, have all been killed by you. The survivors have been greatly wounded.

13. They will not be able, O king, to withstand you specially when you will be protected by us. Arise therefore, O Bharata.

Duryodhana said :—

14. By good luck, I see you, O foremost of men, come back alive from this destructive battle between the Pandavas and the Kauravas.

15. After we have taken rest for a while and removed our fatigue, we shall meet the enemy and defeat him. You also are tired and I myself am greatly wounded. The army of the Pandavas is increasing in strength. And therefore I do not like to fight now.

16. It is no wonder, O heroes, that you are extolling me thus for your hearts are noble. Your devotion to me is also great. This, however, is not the proper time for displaying power.

17. Taking rest for this one night, I shall in the morning join you and fight with the enemy. There is no doubt about it.

Sanjaya continued :—

18. Thus addressed, the son of Drona replied to the king, who was invincible in battle, saying,—" Rise up, O king, may you fare well. We shall yet defeat the enemy.

19. I swear by all my holy acts, by all the gifts I have made, by truth itself, and by my meditations, O king, that I shall to-day kill the Somakas.

20. Indeed I shall not enjoy the pleasure of performing sacrifices, a pleasure which is enjoyed by all pious men, if this night passes away without my killing the Pandavas in battle.

21—22. Without killing all the Panchalas, I will not, O lord, loosen my armour, I tell you this truly. Believe me, O king." While they were thus conversing, a number of hunters arrived there. Worn out with the weight of meat they carried, they came there not deliberately but for satisfying their thirst.

23. Those hunters, O king, used, every day, to procure basket fuls of meat for Bhimsena, O king.

24. As they sat concealed on the banks of that lake, those men heard every word of that conversation that took place between Duryodhana and those warriors.

25. Finding the Kuru king reluctant to fight, those great bowmen, themselves desirous of fighting, began to urge him greatly to accept their advice.

26—27. Seeing those car-warriors of the Kaurava army, and knowing that the king, reluctant to fight, was living within the waters and hearing that conversation between those heroes and their chief living within the depth of the lake, O king, they clearly understood that it was Duryodhana who was staying within the lake and was firm in his resolutiou.

28. Sometime before, the son of Pandu, while searching for the king, had met those men and asked them the whereabouts of Duryodhana.

29—30. Recollecting the words that the son of Pandu had said those hunters, O king, wnisphered to one another,—"We will point out Duryodhana (unto the Pandavas). The son of Pandu will then give us riches. It is clear that the famous king Duryodhana is here.

31. Let us then go all of us where king Yudhishthira is, for telling him that the vindictive Duryodhana is living hidden within the waters of this lake.

32. Let us also, all of us, inform that great bowman, the intelligent Bhimasena, that the son of Dhritarashtra has hidden himself within the waters of this lake.

33—34. Pleased with us, he will give us immense riches. Why should we exhaust ourselves day after day, with procuring meat?" Having said these words, those hunters, filled with joy and longing for wealth, took up their baskets of meat and went towards the Pandava camp.

35. The Pandavas, of pure aim and expert in fighting, O monarch, not seeing in battle Duryodhana who was then concealed, were taking rest in their camp.

36. Desirous of putting an end to that sinful man's evil policy, they had sent spies in all directions on the field of battle.

37. All the soldiers, however, that had been despatched on that mission, returned to the camp together and informed the just king Yudhishthira that they could not find out the king Duryodhana.

38. Hearing those words of the messengers who had come back, O Bharata-chief, king Yudhishthira was stricken with great anxiety and began to sigh heavily.

39—40. While the Pandavas, O best of Bharata's race, were thus disapointed those hunters, O lord, came speedily from the banks of that lake, and arrived at the camp filled with joy at having found out Duryodhana. Though forbidden, they still entered the camp, before the very presence of Bhimasena.

41. Having approached that powerful son of Pandu, Bhimasena, they described everything to him about what they had seen and heard.

42. Then Vrikodara, that scorcher of foes, O king, giving them immense wealth, described everything to the righteous king Yudhishthira saying,

43. "Duryodhana, O king, has been found out by the hunters that supply me with meat. He, O king, for whom you are sorry, now lies within a lake whose waters have been turned solid by him."

44. Hearing those pleasant words of Bhimasena, O king, Yudhishthira was, with all his brothers, filled with joy.

45. Having learnt that the great bowman Duryodhana had entered into the waters of a lake, the king went there quickly with Janarddana at the head.

46. Then a tumult arose, O king, from among the Pandavas and the Panchalas all of whom were filled with joy.

47. The warriors sent forth leonine roars, O foremost of Bharata's race, and cried loudly. All the Kshatriyas, O king, went quickly towards that lake called Dwaipayana.

48. The Somakas rejoiced all around and exclaimed,—"The sinful son of Dhritarashtra has been discovered."

49. The noise made by the cars of those quickly-proceeding warriors became very loud, O king, and touched the very sky.

50. Although their animals were exhausted all of them still proceeded quickly behind king Yudhishthira who was determined upon finding out Duryodhana.

51—52. Arjuna, and Bhimasena, the two sons of Madri by Pandu, the Panchala prince Dhrishtadyumna, the invincible Shikshandin, Uttamaujas, Yudhamnyu, the great car-warrior Satyaki, the five sons of Draupadi, and those amongst the Panchalas, O king, that were yet alive, and all the Pandavas, and all their elephants, and infantry by hundreds all accompained Yudhishthira.

53. Brave and righteous king Yudhishthira, O king, reached the lake Dwaipayana within which Duryodhana then was. Wide as the ocean itself, its view was delightful and its waters were cool and transparent.

54. Making the waters solid by means of his wonderful power of illusion, your son Duryodhana, O Bharata, lived within that lake.

55. Indeed, within those waters lay, O lord, that king, armed with his mace, who, could not be defeated by any man.

56. Living within the waters of that lake, king Duryodhana heard the tumult of the Pandava army which resembled the muttering of the clouds.

57. Yudhishthira then, O king, with his brothers, went to that lake for killing Duryodhana.

58. Raising a thick dust, that son of Pandu made the earth tremble with the sounds of his car-wheels and the loud blare of his conch.

59—60. Hearing the noise made by the army of Yudhishthira, those great car-warriors, viz, Kritavarman, Kripa and the son of Drona, said to the Kuru king:—"Elated with joy and desiring for vicrory the Pandavas are coming here, you know. We will, therefore, leave this place."

61. Hearing those words of those active heroes, he answered them, saying,—"Let it be so," and remained as before within the waters, having, O lord, turned them solid by his power of illusion.

62. Those car-warriors, headed by Kripa, filled with grief, took leave of the king, and went away to a remote place.

63. Having proceeded far, they beheld a banian tree under whose shade they stopped, greatly exhausted and exceedingly anxious about the king, and thinking thus.

64. "Having solidified the waters of the lake, the powerful son of Dhritarashtra lives at the bed. The Pandavas have reached there from desire of battle.

65. How will the battle take place? What will become of the king? How will the Pandavas discover the King?"

66. Thinking of these things, O king, those heroes, viz,, Kripa and others, unyoked their horses from their cars and prepared to rest there for some time.

CHATER XXXI.

(SHALYA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. 'After those three car-warriors had left that place the Pandavas arrived at that lake within which Duryodhana was taking rest.

2. Having arrived at the banks of the Dwaipayana lake, O best of Kuru's race, they saw that reservoir of waters enchanted by your son. Then Yudhishthira said to Vasudeva.

3. "Behold, the son of Dhritarashtra has enchanted these waters by his power of illusion. Having enchanted the waters, he lives within them. He entertains no fear of injury from man.

4. Having exercised his power of illusion he is now within the waters. By an act of deception, that deceiptful man has betaken to this refuge. He shall not however escape me alive.

5. Even if the holder of the thunderbolt himself helps him in battle, people, O Madhava, shall yet see him killed today."

Vasudeva said:

6. With your own power of illusion, O Bharata, destroy this illusion of Duryodhana who is an expert in it. One conversant with illusion should be killed with illusion. This indeed is the truth, O Yudhishthira.

7. By applying your power of illusion to these waters kill, O chief of the Bharatas, this Suyodhana who is the master of illusion.

8. By his illusory power Indra himself killed the Daityas and the Danavas. Vali himself was bound by that great one, viz., Upendra, with the aid of his illusory power.

9. The great Asura Hiranyaksha, as also that one, viz., Hiranyakashipu, was killed by the same power. Forsooth, O king, Vritra also was slain by the power of illusion.

10. Similarly was the Rakshasa Ravana of Pulastya's race, with his relatives and followers, killed by Rama. Relying upon your illusory power do you also display your prowesss.

11. Those two highly energetic and ancient Daityas, viz., Taraka, and Viprachitti were, in ancient time, O king, slain by the help of illusion.

12. Likewise Vatapi and Ilwala, and Trishiras, O lord, and the Asuras Sunda and Upasunda were all killed by the aid of illusion.

13. Indra himself enjoys heaven by the power of illusion. Action is very efficacious O king, and nothing else is so, O Yudhishthira.

14. Daityas and Danavas and Rakshasas and kings have been slain by the same. Do you, therefore, act.'

Sanjaya continued:—

15. 'Thus addressed by Vasudeva, Pandu's son of rigid vows, smillingly addressed, O monarch, your powerful son who, O Bharata, was then within the waters of that lake, saying.

16. "Why, O Suyodhana, have you charmed these waters, after having caused all the Kshatriyas to die and after having, O king, brought about the extinction of your family?

17. Why have you entered into this lake today, with a view to save your own life? Arise, O king, and fight us, O Suyodhana.

18. Where, O best of men, has your sense of honor now gone, since, O king, you have enchanted these waters and are now lying within them?

19. All men describe you in assemblies as a hero. All that, however, is entirely false, I think, since you are now living concealed within these waters.

20. Arise, O king, and fight, for you are a Kshatriya born in a noble family. You are a Kauraveya. Remember your birth.

21. How do you boast of your birth in Kuru's family, when you have concealed yourself within the depths of this lake, having fled away from battle in fear?

22. This is not the duty of a Kshatriya. Flight from battle, O king, is not the practice of honorable men, nor it leads to heaven.

23—24. How is it that without having terminated this war, though you were filled with the desire of victory, you live now within this lake,; after having brought about the destruction of your sons and brothers and sires and relatives and friends and maternal uncles and kinsmen.

25. Though always vaunting of your courage, you are however, not a hero. Falsely you describe yourself, O Bharata, before all men as a hero, O wicked wight.

26. They, that are heroes, never fly away from their foes. Or tell us, O hero, about the nature of that courage by which you have fled from battle.

27—28. Arise, O prince, and fight fearlessly. Having caused all your troops and brothers to be killed O Suyodhana, you should not, if you are an honest man, think now of saving your life. A Kshatriya, O Suyodhana, like yourself, should not act in this way.

29. Relying upon Karna as also upon Shakuni the son of Suvala, you considered yourself immortal and could not understand your own self.

30. Having committed such a grievous iniquity fight now, O Bharata. How is it that you prefer flight from the field. Surely, you forget yourself.

31. Where is that manliness of yours, O sire, and where, O Suyodhana, is that your pride? Where is your prowess and energy gone?

32. Where is that your mastery in weapons? Why do you live within this lake now? Arise, O Bharata, and fight, following the duties of a Kshatriya.

33. Either govern the wide earth after defeating us, or sleep, O Bharata, on the naked earth slain by us.

34. Even this is your highest duty, as laid down by the illustrious Creator himself. Act according to the injunctions of the scriptures, and be a king, O great car-warrior.

Sanjaya continued :—

35. 'Thus addressed, O king, by the intelligent son of Dharma, your son answered him from within the waters in these words.

Duryodhana said :—

36. It is not at all surprising O king, that fear should possess the hearts of living creatures. As regards myself, however, O Bharata, I have not fled from the field of battle for the fear of life.

37. My car and quivers were destroyed and my parshni drivers were slain. I was alone, without a single follower to help me in battle. It was for this that I wanted a little rest.

38. It was not for the sake of saving my life, it was not for fear, it was not from grief, O king, that I entered this lake. It was only out of fatigue that I did so.

39. Do you, O son of Kunti, take a little rest with your followers. Rising from this lake I will surely fight all of you in battle.

Yudhishthira said :—

40. All of us have taken enough of rest. We searched you for a long while. Rise then now, O Suyodhana, and give us battle.

41. Either killing the Parthas in battle make this prosperous kingdom your own, or killed by us in battle go to the region reserved for heroes.

Duryodhana said :—

42. The Kurus, O son of Kuru's race, for whose sake I desired sovereignty, those brothers of mine, O king, all lie dead on the field.

43. I do not like to enjoy any longer the Earth that does not contain wealth and best of Kshatriyas, and that has accordingly become like a widow.

44. I, however, still hope to defeat you, O Yudhishthira, after checking the pride, O foremost of Bharata's race, of the Panchalas and the Pandus.

45. There is, however, no longer any need for battle when Drona and Karna have been killed and when our grandfather Brishma has been slain.

46. This empty Earth, O king, is now intended for you. What king would like to rule a kingdom divested of friends and allies?

47. Having caused friends such as I had and even sons and brothers and sires, to be slain and seeing my kingdom possessed by you, who is there like myself that would like to live?

48. Clad in deer-skins I would enter into woods. I have no desire for kingdom, shorn as I am of friends and allies, O Bharata.

49. Deprived entirely of friends and allies, of horses and elephants, this Earth exists for you, O king. Do you enjoy her now cheerfully.

50. As for myself, clad in deer-skins, I shall go to the forest. Friendless, as I am, I have no desire, O king, for even life.

51. Go, O king, and rule the Earth destitute of kings, warriors, wealth, and without citadels, as you like.

Sanjaya continued :—

52—53. Hearing those words of piercing anguish, the illustrious Yudhishthira said to your son Duryodhana who was still within the lake, saying,—" Do not utter such ravings of sorrow, O sire, from within the lake. I do not, like Shakuni, feel any pity for you, O king, for such words as these.

54. You may now, O Suyodhana, be willing to make a gift of the Earth to me, I, however, do not wish to rule the Earth as a gift from you.

55. I cannot sinfully accept this Earth as a gift from you. Acceptance of a gift, O king, is not the duty of a Kshatriya.

56. I do not, therefore, wish to have the Earth as a gift from you. I shall, on the other hand, enjoy the Earth after defeating you in battle.

57. You are not now the lord of the Earth. Why then do you wish to make a gift of that over which you have no right? Why, O king, did you not then give us the Earth when we, observing the rules of honesty and desirous of the welfare of our family, begged you for our portion?

58. Having first refused the request of the great Krishna, why do you now desire to give away the Earth? What is this folly of yours?

59. What king is there who, attacked by foes, would like to give away his kingdom, O son of Kuru's race. You have not the power today to give away the Earth.

60. Why then do you wish to make a gift of that over which you have no right? Defeating me in battle, rule you this Earth.

61. You did not formerly agree to give me even a portion of the Earth covered by the point of a needle.

62. How then, O king, do you make me a gift of the whole Earth? How is it that you, who couldst not formerly give up even that much of land which the point of a needle would cover, now wish to make over the entire Earth.

63. What fool would, after having got such prosperity and governed the entire Earth, think of giving over that Earth to his foes.

64. Fool as you are, you do not see the impropriety of this! Although you wish to give away the Earth, you shall not yet escape me with life.

65. Either rule the Earth after having defeated us, or go to the celestial regions after being slain by us.

66. If both of us, that is, yourself and myself, be alive, then all creatures will remain in doubt as to whom the victory belongs.

67. Your life, O indiscreet man, now depends upon me. If I like, I can allow you to live, but you are not capable of saving your own life.

68. At one time you tried to burn us to death and to take our lives by means of snakes and other kinds of poison and by sinking us in water.

69. We were also, O king, deprived by you of our kingdom. You spoke harsh words to us, and maltreated Draupadi.

70. For these reasons, O wretch, your life must be taken. Rise, rise, and fight us. That will benefit you.'

Sanjaya continued :—

71. In this way, O king, those heroes, viz., the Pandavas, elated with victory, repeatedly spoke there.'

CHATER XXXII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA.)

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Thus remonstrated with by his enemy, how, indeed, did that scorcher of enemies, my heroic and royal son, who was angry by nature, then act.

2. He had never before brooked such a chastisement. He had before been treated by all respectfully like a king.

3. He who could not formerly stand in the shade of an umbrella, thinking he had taken another's shelter,—he who could not endure the very effulgence of the Sun, on account of his pride, how could he brooke these words of his enemies?

4. You have with your own eyes, O Sanjaya, seen the whole earth, with even her Mlecchas and nomad tribes, depend upon his grace.

5—6. Chastised there by the sons of Paudu, while lying concealed in such a solitary place after having been deprived of his followers and attendants, alas, how did he answer the Pandavas upon hearing such bitter and repeated rebukes from his victorious enemies. Tell me everything, O Sanjaya, about it.'

Sanjaya continued :—

7—9. 'Thus chastised, O king, by Yudhishthira and his brothers, your royal son lying within the lake, O king of kings, heard those bitter words and became very wretched. Sighing heavily the king moved his arms again and again and making up his mind to fight, thus answered from within the lake, the royal son of Pandu.

Duryodhana said :—

10. Ye Parthas, all of you have friends cars, and animals. I, however, am alone, today without a car, and without an animal.

11. Alone as I am, and shorn of weapons, how can I dare fight on foot, against numberless foes all well-armed and possessed of cars.

12—13. Do you, however, O Yudhishthira, fight me one at a time. It is not proper that one should in battle fight with many, especially when that one is without armour, is fatigued, stricken with calamity, greatly wounded, and shorn of both animals and troops.

14—15. I do not cherish the least fear, O king, of either you or Vrikodara, the son of Pritha, or Phalguna, or Vasudeva or all the Panchalas, or the twins, or Yuyudhana, or all the warriors you have. Standing in battle alone I shall resist all of you.

16. The fame, O king, of all righteous men depends on righteousness. I say all this to you who are both righteous and illustrious.

17. Rising I shall fight all of you in battle. Like the year that one by one meets with all the seasons, I shall meet with all of you in fight.

18. Wait, ye Pandavas. Like the snn destroying by his effulgence the light of all the stars at dawn, I shall to day, though weaponless and carless, kill all of you possessed of cars and horses.

19—21. Today I shall release myself from the debt I woe to the many illustrious Kshatriyas, to Valhika and Drona and Bhishma and the great Karna, to the heroic Jayadratha and Bhagadatta, to Shalya the ruler of the Madras and Bhurishravas, to my sons, O best of Bharata's race, and Shakuni the son of Suvala, to all my friends and well-wishers and relatives.

22. Today I shall release myself from that debt by killiug you with your brothers. Having said these words, he stopped.

Yudhishthira said :—

23. By good luck, O Suyodhana, you are conversant with the duties of a Kshatriya. By good luck, O mighty-armed heroe, your heart is bent on a battle.

24. By good luck, you are a hero, O you of Kuru's race, and by good luck, you are conversant with battle, since, alone, you wish to give all of us a battle.

25. Fight any one of us taking whatever weapon you like. All of us will fight.

26. I grant you also, O hero, this other wish yours viz., that if you kill any one of us you shall then become king. Otherwise, killed by us, go to heaven.

Duryodhana said :—

27. Brave as you are, if you allow me the option of fighting only one of you, this mace, that I have in my hand, is the weapon that I select.

28. Let any of you, who thinks that he is a match for me, come forward and fight with me on foot, armed with mace.

29. Many wonderful single combats have takes place on cars. Let this one great and wonderful encounter with the mace take place today.

30. Men wish to change weapons only in a battle. Let the mode of fight be changed today, with your permission.

31. O you of great arms, I shall, with my mace, defeat you today with all your younger brothers, as also all the Panchalas and the Srinjayas and all the other troops you still possess. I do not entertain the least fear, O Yudhishthira, of even Shakra himself.

Yudhishthira said.—

32. Rise, rise, O son of Gandhari, and fight me, O Suyodhana. Alone as you are fight us, meeting one at a time, O you of great might, armed with your mace.

33. Be a man, O son of Gandhari, and fight carefully. Today you shall have to lose your life even if Indra becomes your ally.

Sanjaya continued :—

34. 'That foremost of men, your son, could not brooke those words of Yudhishthira. He sighed heavily from within the water like a huge snake from within its hole.

35. Struck repeatedly with such wordy goads, he could not bear at all like a horse of high breed that cannot bear the strokes of a whip.

36. Agitating the waters with great force that brave warrior rose like a prince of elephants from within the lake, sighing heavily in rage, and armed with his heavy and strong mace of adamant decked with gold.

37. Cutting through the solidified waters your son rose, carrying his mace made of iron at his shoulders, like the sun himself consuming everything with his rays.

38. Highly powerful your intelligent son began to handle his heavy mace made of iron and equipt with a sling.

39. Seeing him with the mace and resembling a mountain crest or the trident wielding Rudra himself casting angry looks on living beings they marked that Bharata chief to shed a lustre around like the scorching sun himself in the sky. Indeed, all creaturas then regarded that mighty-armed chastiser of foes, as he stood with his mace on his shoulders after rising from the waters, to look like the Death himself armed with his rod.

42. Indeed, all the Panchalas then saw your royal son, resembling the thunder-wielding Indra or the trident-wielding Hara.

43. Seeing him, however, rise from within the lake, all the Panchalas and the Pandavas began to rejoice and seize each other's hands.

44—46. Your son Duryodhana considered that action of the onlookers to be an insult to him. Rolling his eyes in anger, and as if consuming the Pandavas with his looks, and contracting his brow into three furrows, and repeatedly biting his nether lip, he addressed the Pandavas with Keshava in their midst, saying,—"Ye Pandavas, you shall have to bear the consequences of these insults! Killed by me today, you shall, with the Panchalas, have to go to the abode of Yama."

Sanjaya continued :—

47. Rising from the water, your son Duryodhana stood there, with his mace, and with limbs covered with blood.

48. Covered with blood and wet with water, his body resembled a mountain discharging water from within it.

49. As he stood with his mace, the Pandavas took him for the angry son of Surya himself armed with his bludgeon called Kinkara.

50. With voice deep as the mutterings of the clouds or of a bull roaring in joy, the highly powerful Duryodhana then, armed with his mace, asked the Parthas for battle.

Duryodhana said :—

51—52. Ye will have, O Yudhishthira, to meet me one at a time. It is not meet that one hero should fight with many at the same time, especially when he is divested of armour, worn out with fatigue, covered with water, greatly wounded, and without cars, animals and troops.

53. Let the celestials see me fight alone deprived of even armour, weapons and other necessary implements.

54. I shall forsooth fight all of you. You will act as a judge, as you have the necessary qualificattons for judging the propriety and impropriety of everything.

Yudhishthira said :—

55. How is it, O Duryodhana, that you had not this knowledge when many great car-warriors, in a body, killed Abhimanyu in battle.

56. The duties of a Kshatriya are highly cruel, shorn of all considerations, and feelings of pity. Otherwise, how could you kill Abhimanyu under those circumstances.

57. All of you were acquainted with the rules of fair fight. All of you were heroes. All of you were ready to sacrifice your lives in battle. The great aim for those that fight righteously is the attainment of the regions of Shakra.

58. If this be yaur duty, that one should not be killed by many, why is it then that Abhimanyu was killed by many, acting under your advice?

59. In difficulty, every one forgets considerations of virtue. They then see the portals of the other world as being closed.

60. Put on armour, O hero, and bind your locks. Take everything else, O Bharata, which you require.

61—62. O hero, I however grant you an additional, favour, namely, if you can slay him amongst the five Pandavas with whom you wish to fight, you shall then be the king Otherwise, killed by him, you will proceed to heaven. Save your life, O hero, tell us what boon we may give you.

Sanjaya continued :—

63. Then your son, O king, put on armour made of gold, and a beautiful head-gear adorned with pure gold.

64. Clad in bright armour of gold, he put on that head-gear. Indeed, O king, your son then looked resplendent like a golden summit.

65—67. Clad in armour, armed with mace, and accoutered with other equipments your son Duryodhana then, O king, standing on the field of battle, addressed all the Pandavas, saying,—"Amongst you five brothers let any one fight me, armed with mace. As regards myself, I am willing to fight either Sahadeva, or Bhima, or Nakula or Phalguna, or you today, O best of Bharata's race. If you give me battle, I will fight any one amongst yon and will surely gain the victory on the field.

68. Today I will terminate these hostilities, with the help, O foremost of men, of my mace wrapped in a cloth of gold.

69. I think there is none who can equal me in an encounter with the mace. With my mace I shall kill all of you one after another.

70. Amongst all of you there is no one who is able to fight fairly with me. It is not proper for me to vaunt thus about my own self. I shall, however, make these words of mine true before you.

71. Within this very hour, these words will either be proved or falsified. Let him amongst you take up the mace that will fight with me.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Whilst Duryodhana, O king, was repeatedly crying aloud in this way, Vasudeva, worked up with wrath, said to Yudhishthira.

2—3. What indiscreet words have you given vent to, O king, saying that killing one amongst us be you the king of Kurus. If, indeed, O Yudhishthira, Duryodhana selects you for battle, or Arjuna, or Nakula, or Sahadeva, (what will be the consequence?

4. With a view to kill Bhimasena, O king, Duryodhana has practised with the mace upon a statue of iron.

5. How then, O best of Bharata's race, will our object be accomplished? From pity, O best of kings, you have acted very indiscreetly.

6. I do not at this moment see any match for Duryodhana except Pritha's son Vrikodara. His practice again, with the mace, is not so great.

7. You have, therefore, once more given preference to a game of chance as that one formerly between yourself and Shakuni, O manarch.

8. Bhima is endued with might and prowess. King Suyodhana, however, is skillful. In a fight between might and skill, he, that is skillful, O king, always becomes successful.

9. Such an enemy, O king, you have, by your words placed in a comfortable and secure position. You have placed your ownself, however, in a difficult position. We have, for this, been placed in great peril.

10. Who is there that would relinquish sovereignty within grasp, after having defeated all his enemy and when he has only one foe to kill who even is sunk in difficulties?

11. I do not see such a man in the world today, be he a god, who is able to defeat the mace-armed Duryodhana in battle.

12. Neither you, nor Bhima, nor Nakula nor Sahadeva, nor Phalguna, is capable of defeating Duryodhana in fair fight. King Duryodhana is endued with great skill.

13. How then, O Bharata, can you address to such a foe words such as these viz., "Fight, selecting the mace as the weapon, and if you can kill one amengst us, you shall then be the king."

14. If Duryodhana meets Vrikodara amongst us wishing to fight fairly with him, even then our victory will hang in the balance. Duryodhana is highly powerful and skillful.

15. How could you say to him,—"Killing only one amongst us be you the king." Forsooth the children of Pandu and Kunti are not destined to enjoy kingdom. They have been born for passing their lives in continued exile in the forest or in mendicancy.

Bhimasena said:—

16. O killer of Madhu, do not, O delighter of the Yadus, grieve. However difficult it may be, I shall terminate these hostilities.

17. Forsooth, I shall kill Suyodhana in battle. It appears, O Krishna, that the victory of righteous Yudhishthira is certain.

18. This mace of mine is heavier by one and a half times than Duryodhana's. Do not, O Madhava, grieve.

19. I dare fight him, selecting the mace as the weapon. Let all of you, O Janarddana, witness this eccounter.

20. What do you say of Suyodhana, I would fight with the three worlds including the very celestials even if they be armed with every kind of weapon.

Sanjaya continued:—

21—22. 'After Vrikodara had said these words, Vasudeva, filled with glee, applauded him highly and said to him,—"Depending on you, O you of great arms, the righteous king Yudhishthira will, forsooth, get back his prosperity after the destruction of all his foes.

23. You have slain all the sons of Dhritarashtra in battle. At your hands many kings and princes and elephants have met with their death.

24. The Kalingas, the Magadhas, the Kauravas, the Westerners, and the Gandharvas have all been killed in dreadful battles, O son of Pandu,

25. Killing Duryodhana then, O son of Kunti, bestow the earth with her oceans upon the righteous Yudhishthira like Vishnu conferring the sovereignty of the three worlds upon the lord of Shachi.

26. Getting you for a foe in battle, the wretched son of Dhritarashtra, will forsooth meet with his death. You will certainly fulfill your promise by breaking his bones.

27. You should however, O son of Pritha, always fight with care with the son of Dhritarashtra. He is endued with both skill and strength and always finds delight in battle.

28. Then Satyaki, O king, applauded the son of Pandu.

29. The Panchalas and the Pandavas, also, headed by the righteous king Yudhishthira, all praised Bhimasena.

30—31. Then Bhima, of terrible might, addressed Yudhishthira who was standing amid the Srinjayas like the burning Sun himself, saying,—"I venture to fight with this man in battle. This wretch among men is not able to defeat me in fight.

32. Today I shall vomit that ire which has been rankling in my bosom against Suyodhana the son of Dhritarashtra like Arjuna throwing fire on the forest of Khandava.

33. I shall today pluck out the dart, O son of Pandu, that lay so long sticking to your heart. Be happy, O king, after I shall have struck down this wretch with my mace.

34. Today I shall recover, O sinless one, your garland of glory. Today Suyodhana shall renounce his life, his prosperity and his kingdom.

35. Today hearing of his son's death, king Dhritarashtra will remember all those wrongs that he did to us under Shakuni's advice."

36. Having said these words, that energetic prince, of Bharata's race, stood up for battle, like Shakra summoning Vritra to an encounter.

37. Unable to endure that call your highly energetic son, proceeded to the encounter, like one infuriate elephant proceeding to assail another.

38. The Pandavas saw your son, as he came armed with mace, as the summit of the mount Kailasa.

39. Verily beholding that powerful son of yours standing alone like a prince of elephants separated from the herd, the Pandavas were filled with joy.

40. Standing in battle like a very lion, Duryodhana had no fear, no pain, no anxiety.

41—42. Seeing him stand there with uplifted mace like the crested mountain of Kailasa, Bhimasena, O monarch, addressed him, saying,—"Remember all those wrongs that king Dhritarashtra and yourself have inflicted on us. Remember what took place at Varanavata.

Remember how Draupadi, while in her season, was maltreated in the midst of the assembly and how king Yudhishthira was defeated at dice through Shakuni's advice.

44. See now, O wicked man, the dreadful consequence of those acts as also of the other wrongs that you inflicted on the innocent Parthas.

45. It is for you that that illustrious chief of the Bharatas, the son of Ganga, the grandfather of us all, lies now on a bed of arrows.

46. Drona also has been killed. Karna has been killed. Shalya of great valour has been killed. Yonder Shakuni also, the root of these enmities, has been killed in battle.

47. Your heroic brothers and sons, with all your troops, have been killed. Other heroic kings also, who never retreated from battle, have been killed.

48. These and many other leading Kshatriyas, as also Pratikamin, that wretch who had seized the locks of Draupadi, have been killed.

49. You alone are still alive, O destroyer of your family, O wretch among men. I shall forsooth kill you today with my mace.

50. Today, O king, I shall, in battle, repress all your pride. I shall destroy also your hope of sovereignty, O king, and pay off all your misdeeds to the sons of Pandu.

Duryodhana said :—

51. What is the use of speaking too much? Fight now with me. Today O Vrikodara, I shall subdue your desire for battle.

52. Why do you not see me, O wretch, standing here for an encounter with the mace? Am I not armed with a formidable mace that looks like a summit of Himavat?

53. What enemy is there, O wretch, that would dare defeat me armed with this weapon? If it be a fair fight, Purandara, himself, amongst the celestials, is not capable of doing it.

54. For all those misdeeds of mine to which you have referred, you could not (hitherto) do me the slightest injury.

55. By my might, I caused you to live in the woods, to serve in another's house and to conceal yourselves in disguises.

56. Your friends and allies also have been killed. Our loss has been equal. If, then, I am killed in this battle, that would be highly praiseworthy. Or perhaps, time will be the cause.

57. Up to this day I have never been defeated in fair fight on the field of battle. If you defeat me deceitfully your fame will certainly last for ever. That act of yours will, forsooth, be unrighteous and infamous.

58. Do not, O son of Kunti, roar uselessly in this way like autumnal clouds shorn of water. Display all the strength you possess in battle now.

59. Hearing those words of his, the Pandavas with the Srinjayas, all filled with desire of victory, praised them highly.

60. Like men exciting an infuriate elephant with the clapping of hands, all of them then pleased king Duryodhana.

61. The elephants began to grunt and the horses to neigh repeatedly. The weapons of the Pandavas who were filled with the desire of victory shone there.'

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. 'When that fierce encounter O king, was about to take place, and when all the great Pandavas had taken their seats indeed, having heard that a battle, between those two heroes, both of whom were his disciples, was about to begin, Rama, whose banner bore the emblem of the palmyra palm, and who had the plough for his weapon, came there.

3. Seeing him, the Pandavas, with Keshava, filled with joy, advanced towards him, and receiving him adored him properly.

4. After adoring him, they then, O king said to him these words,—" Witness, O Rama, the skill in battle of your two disciples."

5—6. Looking at Krishna and the Pandavas, and also at Duryodhana of Kuru's race who was standing there armed with mace, Rama then said,—" Two and forty days have passed since I left home. I had set out under the constellation Pushya and have come back under Shravana. I am desirous, O Madhava, of witnessing this encounter with the mace between these two disciples of mine."

7. At that time the two heroes, viz., Duryodhana and Vrikodara, shone effulgent on the field, both armed with maces.

8. Embracing him who had the plough for his weapon, king Yudhishthira duly enquired about his welfare and welcomed him.

9. Those two great bowmen, viz., the illustrious Krishnas, filled with joy, cheerfully saluted the hero who had the plough for his weapon and embraced him.

10. Similarly the two sons of Madri and the five sons of Draupadi saluted Rohini's powerful son and stood at a respectful distance.

11. Bhimasena of great strength and your son, O monarch, both with uplifted maces in their arms, adored Valadeva.

12. The other kings honored him by welcoming him and then all of them said to Rama,—" Witness this encounter, O you of mighty arms."—Even thus those mighty car-warriors said to the high-souled son of Rohini.

13. The highly energetic Rama, having embraced the Pandavas and the Srinjayas, enquired after the welfare of all the other kings. Likewise all of them, approaching him, enquired after his welfare.

14—15. Having in return saluted all the great Kshatriyas, and having made courteous enquiries about each according to their age, that heroe affectionately embraeed Janarddana and Satyaki. Smelling their heads, he enquired after their welfare.

16. Those two in return, O king, duly adored him, their superior, with great pleasure, like Indra and Upendra adoring Brahma the king of the celestials.

17. Then Dharma's son, O Bharata, said to that chastiser of foes, viz., the son of Rohini,—" Witness, O Rama, this dreadful encounter between the two brothers."

18. Thus adored by those great car-warriors, the mighty-armed elder brother of Keshava, of great beauty, took his seat amongst them.

19. Clad in blue robes and possessed of a fair complexion, Rama, as he sat amidst those kings, shone like the Moon in the sky encircled by a number of stars.

20. Then that dreadful and hair-standing enoounter took place between those two sons of yours O king, for terminating the long standing feud.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA)—Cohtinued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. On the eve of the great battle (between the Kurus and the Pandus) Rama, with Keshava's permission, had left Dwaraka accompanied by many of the Vrishnis.

2. He had said to Keshava,—"I will help neither the son of Dhritarashtra nor the sons of Pandu, but will go whereever I like."

3. Having said so, Rama, that subduer of enemies, had gone away. O Brahmana, tell me everything about his return.

4. Tell me in full how Rama came there, and how he witnessed the battle. Indeed you are a skillful narrator.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. After the great Pandavas had taken up their post at Upaplavya, they sent Krishna to Dhritarashtra for the object of peace, O mighty-armed one, and for the behoof of all creatures.

6. Having gone to Hastinapura and met Dhritarashtra, Keshava spoke wholesome and sincere words.

7—8. The king, however, as I have told you before, did not pay heed to his advice. Unable to secure peace, the mighty-armed Krishna, that foremost of men, returned, O king, to Upaplavya.

9. Dismissed by Dhritarashtra's son Krishna came back, and uponthe failure of his mission, O foremost of kings, said to the Pandavas.

10. Urged by fate, the Kauravas have disregarded my words. Come, ye sons of Pandu, with me, under the constellation Pushya.

11. After this, while the troops of both parties were being collected and arrayed, the great son of Rohini, that foremost of all powerful persons, said to his brother Krishna.

12. "O mighty-armed one, O slayer of Madhu, let us help the Kurus." Krishna, however, did not pay heed to those words of his.

13. Enraged at this, that illustrious son of Yadu's race, viz., the wielder of the plough, then started on a pilgrimage o the Saraswati.

14. Accompanied by all the Yadavas, he set out under the conjunction of the asterism called Maitra, The Bhoja chief (Kritavarman), however, took the side o Duryodhana. Accompanied by Yuyudhana, Vasudeva took that of the Pandavas

15. After the heroic son of Rohini had started under the constellation Pushya, the slayer of Madhu, placing the Pandavas in his van, went against the Kurus.

16. While proceediing, Rama ordered his servants on the way, saying,—"Bring all the necessary articles of use for a pilgrimage. Bring the sacred fire that is at Dwaraka and our priests.

17. Bring gold, silver, kine, robes, horses, elephants, cars, mules, camels, and other beasts of burden.

18. Bring all these necessaries for a sojourn to the sacred waters, and proceed quickly towards the Saraswati.

19—21. Bring also some priests for the performance of a special rite, and hundreds and hundreds of best Brahmanas." Having given these orders to the servants, powerful Valadeva started on a pilgrimage at that time of great danger to the Kurus. Setting out towards the Saraswati, he visited all the sacred shrines along her course, accompanied by priests, friends, and many leading Brahmanas, as also with cars and elephants and horses and servants, O best of Bharata's race, and with many vehicles drawn by kine and mules and camels.

22. Various sorts of necessaries of life were distributed profusely in various countries amongst the weary and worn, children and the old, in response, O king, to their prayers.

23—24. Everywhere, O king, Brahmanas were sumptuously fed with whatever they wantad. At the command of Rohini's son, men, at different stages of the journey, stocked sufficient food and drink.

25. Costly garments and bedsteads and coverlets were distributed amongst the Brahmanas desirous of ease and comfort.

26. Whatever a Brahmana or Kshatriya wanted, it was given to him.

27—28. The party thus proceeded with great happiness and lived happily. Valarama's suite gave away vehicles to persons desirous of making journeys, drinks to them that were thirsty, and rich food to them that were hungry, as also raiments and ornaments, O best of Bharata's race, to many.

29. The road, O king, along which the party proceeded, looked resplendent, was ighly comfortable for all, and resembled heaven itself.

30. There were rejoicings everywhere and rich food was procurable everywhere. There were shops and stalls and various objects were kept there for sale. The entire way was thronged with human beings. And it was decorated with various kinds of trees and creatures, and various kinds of gems.

31. The great Valadeva, observing rigid vows, distributed amongst the Brahmanas profuse wealth and plentiful sacrificial presents, O king, at various sacred spots.

32—33. That chief of Yadu's race also distributed thousands of milch kine covered with excellent cloths and having their horns coated with gold, many horses born in different countries, many vehicles, and many beautiful slaves.

34. Thus did the great Rama distribute wealth in various sacred shrines on the Saraswati. In course of his travels, that noble hero of matchless power at last came to Kurukshetra.

Janamejaya said :—

35. Describe to me, O foremost of men, the characteristics, the origin, and the merits of the several tirthas on the Saraswati and the rites to be performed while going there.

36. Tell me these, in their order, O illustrious man. My curiosity is not to be satisfiid, O foremost of all persons conversant with the knowledge of Brahman.

Vaishampayana said :—

37. The account of the characteristics and origin of all these tirthas, O king, is very lengthy. I shall, however, describe them to you. Listen to that sacred account, O king.

38—39. Accompanied by his priests and friends, Valadeva first went to the tirtha called Prabhasa. There, the Lord of the asterisms (viz., Soma), who had been suffering from phthisis, was freed from his disease. Regaining energy there, O king, he now lights up the universe. And because that foremost of tirthas on Earth had formerly invested Soma again with effulgence, it is, therefore, called Prabhasa.

Janamejaya said :—

40—41. "For what was the worshipful Soma afflicted with phthisis? How also did he bathe in that tirtha? How did he, having bathed in that sacred water, regain his lost power? Describe it to me fully, O great Muni.

Vaishampayana said:—

42. Daksha had twenty seven daughters, O king. These he gave away (in marriage) unto Soma.

43. Connected with the several constellations, those wives, O king, of Soma of glorious deeds, served to help men in calculating time.

44. Endued with large eyes, all of them were peerless in beauty in the world. In beauty however, Rohini excelled them all.

45. The worshipful Soma took a great fancy for her. She was very much liked by him, and therefore, he enjoyed the pleasures of her company alone.

46. Formerly, O king, Soma lived long with Rohini exclusively. For this, those other wives of his, the constellations, became displeased with that high-souled one.

47. Going to their father Daksha, that Lord of creation, they said to him,—"Soma does not live with us. He always lives with Rohini only.

48. All of us, therefore, O Lord of creatures, shall live in your house practising austere penances."

49. Hearing those words of theirs, Daksha saw Soma and said to him,—"Treat all your wives equally. Do not commit a great sin."

50. And Daksha then said to those daughters of his,—"Go, all of ye, to Sashin. At my command, he, surnamed Chandramas, will treat you all equally."

51. Dismissed by him, they then proceeded to the house of him having cool rays. Still the worshipful Soma, O king, behaved as before, for pleased with Rohini alone, he always lived in her company.

52. His other wives then once more came to the abode of their father and said to him,—"Serving you, we will live under your protection. Soma does not live with us and does not obey your commands."

53. Hearing those words of theirs, Daksha once more said to Soma,—"Treat all your wives equally. Let me not, O Virochana, curse you."

54. Disregarding, however, the behest of Daksha, the worshipful Soma continued to live with Rohini alone. At this, his other wives became once more angry.

55. Going to their father, they bowed to him by lowering their heads, and said,—"Soma does not live with us. Give us shelter.

56. The worshipful Chandramas always lives with Rohini exclusively. He does not value your words, and does not wish to love us. Therefore, save us so that Soma may accept us all.'

57. Hearing those words, the worshipful Daksha, O king, became angry and imprecated the curse of phthisis upon Soma. Thus did that disease affect the king of stars.

58—59. Afflicted with phthisis, the moon began to waste away day by day. He tried much to get rid of that disease by celebrating various sacrifices, O king. The Moon, however, could not, free himself from that curse. On the other hand, he daily grew lean and emaciated.

60. On account, of the wasting of Soma the deciduous herbs failed to grow. Their juices dried up they became tasteless and all of them lost their virtues.

61. And on account of the absence of the deciduous herbs, living creatures also began to die. Indeed, owing to the wasting of Soma, all creatures grew emaciated.

62. Then all the celestials, approaching Soma, O king, asked him, saying,—"Why is it that your form is not so beautiful and resplendant as before? Tell us whence has originated this great calmity.

63. Hearing your answer, we shall do what is needed for removing your fear." Thus addressed, the god, having the hare for his mark, replied to them and informed them of the cause of the curse and of the phthisis with which he was attacked.

64. Having heard those words the celestials repaired to Daksha and said,—"Be pleased O worshipful one, with Soma. Withdraw your this curse.

65. The Moon is very emaciated. Only a small portion of his body is seen. On account of his wasting, O Lord of the celestials, all creatures also are wasting. Creepers and herbs of various sorts are also wasting.

66. By their waste we ourselves also are suffering emaciation. Without us, what will this universe be. Knowing this, O lord of the universe, it behoves you to be pleased with Soma."

67. Thus addressed, Daksha, that Lord of creatures, said:—'It is impossible to make my words prove otherwise.

68. By some contrivance, however, O celestials, my words may be withdrawn. Let the moon treat his wives equally.

69. Having bathed also in that foremost of tirthas on the Saraswati, the hare-emblemed god shall regain his strength. These words of mine are true.

70. For half the month Soma shall decrease every day, and for half the month following he will increase daily. These words of mine are true.

71. Proceeding to the western ocean at the spot where the Saraswati joins the ocean that vast repository of waters, let him worship that God of gods Mahadeva there. He will then regain his form and beauty."

72. Thus commanded by the Rishi Daksha, Soma then proceeded to the Saraswati. He reached the greatest of tirthas called Prabhasa belonging to the Saraswati.

73. Bathing there on the day of the new moon, that god of great energy and great effulgence regained his cool rays and began again to Illume the universe.

74. All the creatures also, O king, having gone to Prabhasa, returned with Soma amongst them to where Daksha was.

75—76. Receiving them properly that Lord of creatures then sent them away. Pleased with Soma, the worshipful Daksha once more addressed him, saying,—"Do not, O son, disregard women, and never disregard Brahmans. Go, and obey my commands."

77. Dismissed by him, Soma returned to his own abode. All creatures began to live joyously as before.

78. I have thus told you everything about how the Moon had been cursed, and how also Prabhasa became the best of all tirthas.

79. On every day of the new moon, O king, the god, having the hare for his mark, bathes in the excellent tirtha of Prabhasa ahd regains his form and beauty.

80. O lord of Earth, that tirtha is known by the name of Prabhasa, because bathing there the moon regained his great (Prabha) effulgence.

81. After this, the mighty and illustrious Valadeva proceeded to Chamasodbheda, that is to that tirtha which is called by that name.

82. Distributing many precious presents at that place, the hero, having the plough for his weapon, passed one night there and performed his abolutions duly.

83—84. The elder brother of Keshava then speedily repaired to Udapana. Although the Saraswati is not visible there, yet persons endued with ascetic success, on account of their obtaining great merits and sanctity of that spot, and also of the coolness of the herbs and of the land there, know that the river has an invisible current, O king, underneath the earth there."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Valadeva proceeded next to the tirtha Udapana in the Saraswati, that had formerly been the habitation, O king, of the illustrious ascetic Trita.

2. Having distributed profuse wealth and worshipped the Brahmanas, the hero, having the plough for his weapon, bathed there and was filled with joy.

3. The great and pious ascetic Trita had lived there. While in a hole that great man had drunk the Soma juice.

4. His two brothers, dashing him down into a pit, had returned home. That foremost of Brahmanas, viz., Trita, had thereupon cursed them both"

Janmenjaya said :—

5. "What is the origin of Udapana? How did the great ascetic Trita fall into a pit there? Why was that foremost of Brahmanas thrown into that pit by his brothers?

6. How did his brothers, after throwing him into that hole, come back to their home? How did Trita celebrate his sacrifice, and how did he drink Soma? Describe all this O Brahmana, if you think that I am worthy of listening to it.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. 'In a former cycle, O king, there were three ascetic brothers. They were called Ekata, Dwita, and Trita, and all three were effulgent like the sun.

8. They were like Lords of the creation and had children. Brahmavadins as they were they had, by their ascetic penances, acquired the privilege of attaining to the regions of Brahman after death.

9. For their penances, vows, and self-restraint, their father, the virtuous Gautama, became highly pleased with them.

10. Greatly pleased with his sons, the worshipful Gautama, after living a long life here, went at last to the rigion in the other world that was fit for him.

11. Those kings, however, O king, that were the disciples of Gautama, continued to worship Gautama's sons after his ascension to heaven.

12. Amongst them, however, Trita, by his acts and Vedic studies, O king, became the foremost, even like his father Gautama.

13. Then all the great and pious ascetics began to worship Trita as they had worshiped his father Gautama before him.

14. Once upon a time, the two brothers Etaka and Dwita thought of celebrating a sacrifice and became anxious fer wealth.

15—16. They thought that they would take Trita with them, and calling upon all their disciples and collecting the needful number of animals, they would joyfully drink the Soma juice and acquire the great merits of sacrifice. The three brothers, then O king, did as settled.

17. Calling upon all their disciples for animals, and helping them in their sacrifices and receiving a large number of animals from them as gifts for the priestly services rendered by them those high-souled and great Rishis came towards the east.

19. Trita, O king, was cheerfully walking before them. Ekata and Dwita were in his rear, conducting the animals.

20. Seeing that large herd of animals they began to think as to how they two could appropriate that property without giving a share to Trita.

21. Hear, O king, what those two sinful wretches, viz., Ekata and Dwita, said to each other.

22. They said,—"Trita is a clever priest. Trita is well read in the Vedas. Trita is capable of earning many other kine.

23. Let us two, therefore, go away, taking the kine with us. Let Trita go whereever he likes, without being in our company."

24. As they proceeded, they were benighted on the way. They then saw a wolf before them. Not far from that spot was a deep hole on the bank of the Saraswati.

25. Trita, who was going before, seeing the wolf, ran in fear and fell, into that hole.

26. That hole was deep and terrible and capable of stricking terror to all creatures. Then Trita, O king, that best of ascetics, from within that hole, began to bewail. His two brothers heard his cries.

27. Knowing that he had fallen into a pit, his brothers Ekata and Dwita, actuated by fear of the wolf as also by temptation, went on, leaving behind their brother.

28. Thus left behind by his two brothers who were tempted to appropriate those animals, the great ascetic Trita, O king, while within that lonely pit covered with dust,

29. Herbs and creepers, thought himself sunk, O best of the Bharatas, into hell like a sinful person.

30. He was afraid of dying because he had not earned the merit of drinking Soma juice. Greatly wise as he was he began to think with the help of his intelligence as to how he could succeed in drinking Soma even there.

31. While thinking thus the great ascetic, standing in that pit, beheld a creeper hanging down into it.

32. Although the pit was dry still the sage perceived the existence of water and of sacrificial fires there. Imagining himself the sacrificial priest,

33. The great ascetic took the creeper for the Soma plant. He then mentally uttered the Richs, the Yayushes and the Samans.

34. The pebbles lying there were converted into grains of sugar (in imagination) by Trita. He, then, O king, (mentally) performed his ablutions. He took the water for the clarified butter.

35. He distributed amongst the celestials their respective shares (of those sacrificial offerings). Having next mentally drunk Soma, he began to make a great noise. Those sounds, O king, first uttered by the sacrificing Rishi, entered into heaven and Trita performed that sacrifice after the manner laid down by Brahmavadins.

36. During the celebration of that sacrifice of the great Trita, the entire region of the celestials was agitated. None knew, however, the cause. Vrihaspati heard that loud noise.

37. The priest of the celestials said to them :—"Trita is performing a sacrifice. We must go there, ye celestials.

38. He is gifted with great ascetic merit; if willing, he is capable of creating other celestials."

39. Hearing those words of Vrihaspati, all the gods, in a body, repaired where the sacrifice of Trita was going on.

40. Having proceeded to that spot, the gods beheld the great ascetic engaged in the performance of his sacrifice.

41. Beholding that great beautiful ascetic the gods addressed him, saying,—'We have come for our shares (in your offerings).'

42. The Rishi said to them,—'Behold me, ye denizens of heaven, fallen into this terrible pit almost deprived of my senses.'

43. Then Trita, O monarch, duly allotted to them their shares with proper mantras. The gods took them and were greatly delighted.

44. Having duly received their respective shares, the denizens of heaven, pleased with him, granted him the boons he wanted

45. The boon, however, that he prayed for was that the gods should relieve him from his painful condition.

46. He also said.—'Let him that bathes in this well, achieve the end that is attained by persons that have drunk Soma.'

47. Thereat, O king, the Saraswati. with her waves, appeared within that well. Raised above by her, Trita came up and worshipped the celestials.

48. The gods then said to him,—'B, it as you wish' All of them then, O king, returned to their respective habitations and Trita, filled with joy, proceeded to his owe abode.

49. Meeting with those two Rishis, viz., his brothers, he became enraged with themn Endued with ascetic merit, he spoke harshly to them and cursed them, saying,

50. 'Since, actuated by covetousness, ye ran away, leaving me, therefore, ye shall become dreadful wolves with sharp teeth and range the forest cursed by me on account of that sinful act of yours.

51. Your offspring will also consist of leopards and bears and apes!' After Trita had said these words, O monarch, his two brothers were soon transformed into tigers on account of the curse of that truthful sage.

52. The highly powerful Valadeva touched the waters of Udapana. And he gave away various kinds of wealth there and worshipped many Brahmanas.

53. Beholding Udapana and praising it repeatedly, Valadeva next proceeded to Vinashana which also was on the Saraswati.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(GADAYUDDHYA PARVA) —Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Then Valadeva, O king, went to Vinashana where the Saraswati has disappeared out of view in consequence of her hatered for Shudras and Abhiras.

2. And because the Saraswati, on account of this contempt, is lost there the Rishis, O chief of the Bharatas, always name the place as Vinashana.

3. Having bathed in that tirtha of the Saraswati, the powerful Valadeva then went to Subhumika situate on the excellent bank of the same river.

4. There many fair-complexioned and beautiful-faced Apsaras are always engaged in innocent pastimes.

5. The celestials and the Gandharvas, every month, O king, go to that sacred shrine which is the resort of Brahman himself.

6. The Gandharvas and various clans of Apsaras are to be seen there, O king, passing their days happily.

7. There the celestials and departed manes in the midst of the showers of sacred and auspicious flowers sport in joy.

8. There all the creepers are covered with flowers. And because, O king, that spot is the beautiful sporting ground of those Apsaras, therefore is that shrine on the charming bank of the Saraswati is called Subhumika.

9. Valadeva of Madhu's race, having bathed in that tirtha and distributed immense riches amongst the Brahmanas, heard the sound of those celestial songs and musical instruments.

10. He also saw there many shadows of gods, Gandharvas, and Rakshasas. The son of Rohini then proceeded to the tirtha of the Gandharvas.

11. There many Gandharvas, headed by Vishwavasu and possessed of ascetic merit, pass their time in dance and singing many sweet songs.

12. Giving away various kinds of riches to the Brahmanas, as also goats and sheep and kine and mules and camels and gold and silver,

13. And feeding many Brahmanas and satisfying them with many rich gifts as desired by them, Valadeva, of Madhu's race, left that place accompanied by many Brahmanas and praised by them.

14. Leaving that tirtha the favourite haunt of the Gandharvas, that mighty-armed chastiser of foes, having but one ear-ring, then went to the famous tirtha called Gargashrota.

15.—16. There, in that sacred tirtha of the Saraswati, the illustrious and old Garga, having a soul cleaused by ascetic penances, O Janamejaya, had mastered the knowledge of time and its course, of the deviations of luminous bodies (in the sky), and of all auspicious and inauspicious portents.

17. That tirtha was called, after his name Gargashrota. There, O king, highly blessed Rishis of firm vows always waited upon Garga, O lord, for acquiring a knowledge of time.

18. Besmeared with white sandal-paste O king, Valadeva, going to that tirtha, duly distributed wealth amongst many ascetics of pure souls.

19. Having distributed also many sorts of rich food amongst the Brahmanas, that illustrious one, clad in blue robes, then went to the tirtha called Shankha.

20. There, on the bank of the Saraswati that powerful palmyra-emblemed hero beheld a gigantic tree called Mahashankha, tall as Meru, looking like the white-mountain, and resorted to by many Rishis.

21. There dwell Yakshas, and Vidyadharas, and Rakshasas of great energy, and Pishachas of incomparable might and Siddhas, in thousands.

22—23. Desisting from other kinds of food, all of them observe vows and regulations, and take at the proper time the fruits of that king of the forest for their sustenance and rove separately unseen by men, O foremost of men! That monarch of the forest, O king, is celebrated throughout the world.

24—25. That tree is the cause of this tirtha. Having given away many milch cows, vessels of copper and iron, and diverse sorts of other vessels, that foremost Yadu's race, viz., Valadeva, having the plough for his weapon, worshipped the Brahmanas and was adored by them in return. He then, O king, went to the Dwaita lake.

26. Arrived there, Vala saw various ascetics dressed diversely. Bathing in its waters, he adored the Brahmanas.

27. Having distributed profusely amongst the Brahmanas various articles of enjoyment Valadeva then, O king, went on along the southern bank of the Saraswati.

28. The mighty-armed and illustrious Rama, of pure soul and unmitigated glory, then proceeded to the tirtha called Nagadhanwana.

29. Abounding with snakes, O king, it was the abode of the highly effulgent Vasuki, the king of serpents. There four and then ten thousand Rishis also lived permanently.

30. Having come there in days of yore the celestials had, according to due rites, installed the great snake Vasuki as king of all the snakes. There is no fear of snakes in that place, O you of Kuru's race.

31. Duly distributing many valuable articles there amongst the Brahmanas, Valadeva then set out with face towards the east and reached, one after another, hundreds and thousands of celebrated tirthas situated all around.

32—34. Bathing in all those tirthas, and observing fasts and other vows as sanctioned by the Rishis, and given away immense riches, and saluting all the ascetics who lived there, Valadeva once more set out, along the way pointed out to him by those ascetics for reaching that spot where the Saraswati turns in an eastward direction, like torrents of rain bent by the velocity of the storm. The river took that course for seeing the great Rishis dwelling in the forest of Naimisha.

35. Always smeared with white sandal-paste, Vala, having the plough for his weapon, seeing that great river change her course, was O king, filled with wonder.

Janamenjaya said :—

36. "Why O Brahmana, did the Saraswati bend her course there towards the east. O best of Addharyus, you should tell me everything regarding this.

37. Why was that delighter of the Yadus filled with wonder? Why, indeed, did that best of rivers thus change her course."

Vaishampayana said :—

38. "Formerly, in the Satya yuga, O king, the ascetics living in Naimisha were engaged in a great sacrifice extending for twelve years.

39—40. Many Rishis, O king, came to that sacrifice. Passing their time according to proper rites, in the celebration of that sacrifice, those great Rishis, after the termination of that twelve years' sacrifice at Naimisha, set out in large numbers for seeing the various sacred shrines.

41. On account of the number of the Rishis, O king, the tirthas on the southern banks of the Saraswati all looked like towns and cities.

42. Those foremost of Brahmanas, O foremost of men, being anxious to enjoy the merits of tirthas, took up their abodes on the bank of the river up to Samanta-panchaka.

43. The whole region was as if filled with loud Vedic recitations of those Rishis of pure souls, all engaged in pouring libations on sacrificial fires.

44. That best of rivers shone highly beautiful with those burning homa fires all around, over which those great ascetics poured libations of clarified butter.

45—47. Valikhillyas and Ashmakuttas, Dantolukhalinas, Samprakshyanas and other ascetics, as also those living on air and those living on water, and those living on dry leaves of trees, and various others who practised diverse kinds of vows, and those that lived on bare and hard earth, all came to that spot in the vicinity of the Saraswati. And they rendered that foremost of rivers highly beautiful like the celestials beautifying with their presence the heavenly rivers called Mandakini.

48. Hundreds of Rishis, all given to the observance of sacrifices, came there. Those observers of great vows could not find sufficient accomodation on the banks of the Saraswati.

49. Measuring small plots of land with their sacred threads, they celebrated Agnihotras and other rites.

50. The river Saraswati saw, O king, those Rishis filled with despair and anxiety for want of a commodious tirtha wherein to perform their rites.

51. Accordingly that best of streams came there, having made sufficient accomodation on her bank for those Rishis, out of compassion for them, O Janamejaya.

52—53. Having thus, O king, changed her course for their sake, the Saraswati, that best of rivers, once more flowed in a westerly direction, to make the arrival of the Rishis there successful. O king, the great river accomplished there this wonderful feat.

54. Thus those reservoirs of water, O king, were formed in Naimisha. There, at Kurukshetra, O Kuru chief, do you celebrate grand sacrifices and rites. Beholding those innumerable reservoirs of water and seeing that best of rivers change her course, the high-souled Rama was filled with wonder.

55—59. Bathing in those tirthas duly and distributing wealth and various other articles of enjoyment amongst the Brahmanas, that delighter of Yadu's race also gave away various kinds of food and desirable articles to them. Adored by those Rishis, Vala, O king, left that foremost of all tirthas on the Saraswati, (viz., Sapta-Saraswat). Numerous birds also lived there. And it abounded with Vadari, Inguda, Kacmaryya, Plahsha, Ashwattha, Vibhitaka, Kakkola, Palasha, Karira, Pilu, and various other kinds of trees that grow on the banks of the Saraswati.

60. And it was adorned with forests of Karushakas, Vilwas, and Amratakas, and Atimuktas and Kashandas and Parijatas.

61—62. It abounded with forests of plaintains pleasant to view and most charming. And it was haunted by various ascetics, some living on air, some on water, some on fruits, some on leaves, some on raw rice again which they husked with the aid only of stones, and some that were called Vaneyas. And it was filled with the chauntings of the Vadas, and abounded with diverse kinds of animals.

63. And it was the favourite abode of men shorn of malice and devoted to righteousness. Valadeva, having the plough for his weapon, arrived at that tirtha, called the Sapta-Saraswat, where the great ascetic Mankanaka had his penances successfully practised.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. " Why was that tirtha called Sapta-Saraswat? Who was the ascetic Mankanaka? How was that worshipful one successful? What were his vows and observances?

2. In whose family was he born? What books did that great Rishi study? I desire to hear all this, O foremost of Rishis.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. " O king, the seven Saraswatis cover this Universe. Whereever the Saraswati was called by the energetic Rishis, there she did go.

4. These are the seven forms of the Saraswati, viz., Suprabha, Kanchanakshi, Vishala, Manorama, Oghavati, Surenu, and Vimalodaka.

5. Brahma had at one time celebrated a great sacrifice. While that sacrifice was being celebrated on the site selected, many Rishis, crowned with ascetic success, came there.

6. The spot was filled with the sound of the recitation and the chaunting of the Vedas. Seeing those sacrificial rites, even the very gods lost their temper.

7—8. There, O' king, while the grandfather was initiated in the sacrifice and was performing the grand ceremony capable of granting prosperity and wished-for objects many great Rishis, conversant with virtue and profit, were present. As soon as they thought of necessary articles, they, O king, immediately came before the Rishis.

9. The Gandharvas sang and the Apsaras danced. And they played upon many celestial instruments.

10. The provisions collected in that sacrifice satisfied the very celestials. What shall I say then of men? The very celestials were filled with wonder.

11—12. During the progress of that sacrifice at Pushkara and in the presence of Brahma, the Rishis, O king, said,—" This sacrifice is not successful, since that foremost of rivers, viz., Saraswati, is not to be seen here." Hearing these words, the divine Brahman meditated on Saraswati.

13. Summoned at Pushkara by the grandfather engaged in the celebration of a sacrifice, Saraswati, O king, came there under the name of Suprava.

14. Seeing Saraswati pay that regard to the grandfather, the ascetics regarded that sacrifice with great esteem.

15. Thus that foremost of rivers, viz., Saraswati, made her appearance at Pushkara for pleasing the grandfather and the ascetics.

16. On another ocassion, O king, many Munis assembled at Naimisha. They had many discussions amongst them, O king, on the Vedas.

17. There those ascetics, conversant with various scriptures, thought of the Saraswati.

18—19. Thus thought of, O king, by those Rishis performing a sacrifice, the highly blessed and sacred Saraswati, for helping those great Munis, made her appearance at Naimisha and was accordingly called Kanchanakshi.

20—21. Worshipped of all, that best of rivers, thus came there, O Bharata. While king Gaya was engaged in the celebration of a great sacrifice at Gaya the foremost of rivers, Saraswti, summoned at Gaya's sacrifice, came there. The Rishis of rigid vows, that were present there, named her Vishala at Gaya.

22. That quick-coursing river originates from the side of Himavat. Ouddalaka had also, O Bharata, performed a sacrifice.

23. A number of ascetics were also assembled there. It was in the sacred north Koshala, O king, that that sacrifice of the great Ouddalaka was celebrated.

24. Before Ouddalaka began his sacrifice, he had thought of the Saraswati. That foremost of rivers came there for the sake of those Rishis.

25. Worshipped of all those Munis clad in barks and deer-skins, she passed by the name of Manorama as those Rishis mentally called her.

26. While, again the great Kuru was engaged in a sacrifice at Kurukshetra, that foremost of rivers, the highly sacred Saraswati, came there.

27. Summoned, O king, by the great Vashishtha who assisted Kuru in his sacrifice, the Saraswati, of celestial water, came to Kurukshetra and passed by the name of Oghavati.

28. Daksha at one time celebrated a sacrifice at the source of Ganga. The Saraswati appeared there under the name of the quick-coursing Surenu.

29. Once again, while Brahman was engaged in a sacrifice on the sacred forest of the Himavat mountains, the worshipful Saraswati, summoned by him, came there.

30. All these seven streams then came and joined together in that tirtha where Valadeva came. And because the seven joined together at that spot, therefore is that tirtha known on earth by the name of Sapta-saraswati.

31. Thus have I described to you the seven Saraswatis, according to their names. I have also given you an account of the sacred tirtha called Sapta-saraswat.

32—33. Listen now to a great deed of Mankanaka, who had from his youth led the life of a Brahmacharin. While performing his abolutions in the river, he saw one day, O Bharata, a damsel of beautiful features and fair brows, bathing in the river with her body uncovered. At this sight, O monarch, the seminal fluid of the Rishi dropped to the Saraswati.

34. The great ascetic took it up and kept it within his earthen pot. Deposited within that pot, the fluid was divided into seven parts.

35—36. From those seven portions were born seven Rishis, from whom originated the forty nine Maruts. The seven Rishis were named Vayuvega, Vayuhan, Vayumandala, Vayujata, Vayuretas, Vayuchakra. Thus were born those progenitors of the various Maruts.

37. Hear now of a more wonderful account O king, of a highly marvellous conduct of that great Rishi which is well known in the three worlds.

38. Formerly, after Mankanaka had become successful, O king, his hand became pierced with a Kusha blade. Thereupon a vegetable juice came out of the wound and not blood.

39. Seeing that vegetable juice, the Rishi was filled with joy and danced about there. Beholding him dance, all mobile and immobile creatures, O hero, overpowered by his energy, began to dance.

40. Then the celestials with Brahma at their head, and the Rishis, having asceticism for their wealth, O king, all approached Mahadeva and informed him of the doings of the Rishi (Mankanaka). And they said to him,—Thou shouldst, O god, do that which may prevent the Rishi from dancing."

41. Then Mahadeva, seeing the Rishi filled with great joy, and desirous of doing good to the celestials addressed him, saying.

42. 'Why, O Brahmana, do you dance in this way, you who know your duties well? What must be the cause of your joy, O sage, that being an ascetic, O best of Brahmanas, and walking in the path of virtue you should behave in this way?

The Rishi said:—

43. Do you not see that a vegetable juice is flowing from this my wound? Seeing this, O lord, I am dancing in great glee.

44. Laughing at the Rishi who was overpowered by passion, the god said,—"I do not, O Brahmana, at all wonder at this. Behold me!"

45. Having said this to that best of Rishis, the highly intelligent Mahadeva struck his thumb with the end of one of his fingers.

46. Thereupon, O king, ashes, white as snow, came out of that wound. Beholding this, the Rishi became ashamed, O monarch, and fell at the feet of the God.

47. He understood the deity to be none else than Mahadeva. Filled with wonder, he said,—'I do not think that thou art any one save Rudra, that great and Supreme being.

48. O wielder of the trident, thou art the refuge of this universe consisting of gods and demons. The wise say that this universe has been created by thee.

49. At the universal dissolution, everything once more enters thee. Thou art incapable of being known by the celestials, how then canst thou be known by me?

50. All creatures of the universe are seen in thee. The gods with Brahma at their head worship thee who dost give boons, O sinless one.

51. Thou art everything. Thou art the creator of the gods. Through thy grace, the gods pass their time joyously and fearlessly." Having lauded Mahadeva in this way, the Rishi bowed to him.

52. 'Let not my ridiculous childishness, that I displayed, O god, destroy my ascetic merit. I pray to thee for this.'

53. The god cheerfuly replied,—'Let your asceticism increase a thousandfold, O Brahmana, through my grace. I shall also always live with you in this hermitage.

54. The man that will adore me in this tirtha, viz., Sapta-saraswat, will attain everything here or hereafter. Forsooth, such a one shall go to the region called Saraswat in heaven, after death.'

55. This is the history of Mankanaka. He was begotten by the god of wind upon Sukanya.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA)—Continued

Vaishampayana said :—

1. 'Having passed one night there, Rama, having the plough for his weapon, adored the dwellers of that tirtha and showed great respect for Mankanaka.

2—3. Having distributed wealth amongst the Brahmanas and passed the night there the hero, having the plough for his weapon, was adored by the ascetics. Rising up in the morning, he took leave of all the ascetics, and having touched the sacred water, O Bharata, started quickly for other tirthas.

4—5. Valadeva then went to the tirtha known by the name of Ushanas. It is also called Kapalamochana. Formerly, Rama (the son of Dasharatha) slew a Rakshasa and threw his head to a great distance. That head, O king, fell upon the thigh of a great sage named Mahodara and stuck to it. Bathing in this tirtha, the great Rishi was freed from that burthen. The great (Shukra) had practised his ascetic penances there.

6. It was there that the science of politics and morals, that passes by Shukra's name, was revealed to him. While living there, Shukra meditated upon the war of the Daityas and the Danavas.

7. Arrived at that foremost of tirthas Valadeva, O king, duly made presents to the great Brahmanas.

Janamejaya said :—

8. 'Why is it called Kapalamochana, where the great Muni became freed (from the Rakshasa's head)? Why and how did that head stick to his thigh?'

Vaishampayana said :—

9. "Formerly, O foremost of kings, the great Rama (the son of Dasharatha) lived for sometime in the forest of Dandaka, for killing the Rakshasas.

10. At Janasthana he sundered the head of a wicked Rakshasa with a highly sharp razor-headed arrow. That head dropped in the deep forest.

11. That head, coursing at will through the sky, fell upon the thigh of Mahodara while the latter was walking in the woods. Piercing his thigh, O king, it stuck to it and remained there.

12. That head thus sticking to his thigh, the greatly wise Brahmana could not (with ease), proceed to tirthas and other sacred places.

13. Feeling great pain and with putrid matter flowing from his thigh, he travelled to all the tirthas of the earth, one after another, as heard by us.

14—16. He went to all the rivers and to the ocean as well. The great ascetic spoke of his pain to many Rishis of pure souls, about his having bathed in all the sacred spots without finding any relief. That best of Brahmanas then heard from those sages, about this foremost of tirthas situate on the Saraswati, known by the name of Ushanasha, which could cleanse every sin and was an excellent place for acquiring ascetic merits.

17. Then repairing to that Ushanasa tirtha, that Brahmana bathed in its waters. Thereat the Rakshasa's head, leaving the thigh, dropped into the water.

18. Freed from that head, the Rishi felt great ease. The head however was lost in the waters.

19. Then, O king, freed from the Rakshasa's head Mahodara gladly returned, with purified soul and all his sins cleansed, to his hermitage after attaining success.

20. Thus freed, after returning to his sacred hermitage the great ascetic, spoke of what had taken place to those Rishis of pure souls.

21. Having heard his story, those Rishis conferred the name of Kapalamochana on the tirtha.

22. Repairing once more to that foremost of tirthas, the great Rishi Mahodara, drank its water and acquired great ascetic success.

23. Having distributed much wealth amongst the Brahmanas and worshipped them, Valadeva then went to the hermitage of Rushangu.

24. There, O Bharata, Arshtishena had in days of yore practised austerest of penances. There the great (Kshatriya) Muni Vishwamitra became a Brahmana.

25. That great hermitage is capable of fructifying every wish. It is always, O lord, the asylum of ascetics and Brahmanas.

26. Surrounded by Brahmanas, then the beautiful Valadeva went to that spot, O king, where Rushangu had, formerly, renounced his body.

27. Rushangu, O Bharata, was an old Brahmana always devoted to penances. Determined to renounce his body, he thought for a long while.

28. A great ascetic as he was, he then summoned all his sons and asked them to take him to a spot where there was profuse water.

29. Knowing their father had become very old, those ascetics took him to a tirtha on the Saraswati.

30—31. Brought by his sons to the sacred Saraswati containing hundreds of tirthas and on whose banks lived Rishis disassociated from the world, that intelligent ascetic, of hard penances, bathed in that tirtha duly, and conversant as that best of Rishis was with the virtues of tirthas, then cheerfully said to all his sons who were dutifully waiting upon him these words.

32. 'He, that would renounce his body on the northern bank of the Saraswati containing profuse water, reciting mentally sacred mantras, would never again be visited by death.'

33. Touching the water of that tirtha and bathing in it, the righteous Valadeva distributed wealth amongst the Brahmanas.

34—35. Possessed of great might and great prowess, Valadeva then proceeded to that tirtha where the worshipful Brahma had created the mountains called Lokaloka, and where that best of Rishis, Arshtishena, of rigid vows, had by hard penances acquired the dignity of Brahmanhood, and where the royal saint Sindhudwipa, and the great ascetic Devapi, and the worshipful and illustrious Vishwamitra of hard penances and fierce energy, had all acquired a similar dignity.

CHAPTER XL.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "Why did the worshipful Arshtishena practise the severest of penances? How also did Sindhudwipa acquire the dignity of a Brahmana?

2. How also did Devapi, O Brahmana, and how did Vishwamitra, O best of men, become Brahmanas. Tell me all this, O worshipful one! Great is my curiosity to hear of all this."

Vaishampayana said :—

3. "Formerly, in the Krita age, O king, there was a great Rishi called Arshtishena. Living in his preceptor's house, he attended to his lessons every day.

4. Although, O king, he lived long in the residence of his preceptor, he could not master any branch of learning or the Vedas, O monarch.

5. Greatly disappointed, O king, the great ascetic practised very rigid penances. By his penances he afterwards acquired the mastery of the Vedas which is best of all forms of learning.

6. Acquiring great learning and a mastery of the Vedas, that best of Rishis became highly successful in that tirtha. He then conferred three boons on that place.

7. He said,—'From this day, a person, by bathing in this tirtha of the great river Saraswati, shall reap the great fruit of a horse sacrifice.

8. From this day there will be no fear in this tirtha from serpents and wild beasts. By the slightest of endeavours, again, one shall reap great results here."

9. Having said these words, that energetic Rishi proceeded to heaven. Thus the worshipful Arshtishena became successful.

10. In that very tirtha, in the Krita age, the greatly energetic Sindhudwipa, and Devapi also, had acquired the dignity of Brahmanhood.

11. Similarly Kushika's ascetic son, having controlled his senses and practised austerities became a Brahmana.

12. There was a great Kshatriya, celebrated over the world, by the name of Gadhi. He had a son by the name of Vishwamitra of great prowess.

13—14. King Kaushika became a great ascetic. Possessed of great ascetic merit, he wished to place his son Vishwamitra on his throne, himself having made up his mind to renounce his body. His subjects, bowing unto him, said,—You should not go away, O you of great wisdom, and protect us from a great fear.'

15. Thus addressed, Gadhi replied to his subjects, saying,—'My son will be the protector of the vast universe.'

16. Having said these words and placed Vishwamitra on the throne, Gadhi, O king

,scended heaven, and Vishwamitra became king. He could not, however, protect the earth even trying his level best.

17. The king then heard of the fear of Rakshasa in his kingdom. With his four-fold forces, he went out of his capital.

18. Having proceeded far on his way, he reached the hermitage of Vashishtha. His troops, O king, caused immense mischief there.

19. The worshipful Brahmana Vashishtha, when he came to his hermitage, saw the vast forest devastated.

20. That best of Rishis, viz., Vashishtha O king, became angry with Vishwamitra. He commanded his own sacrificial cow, saying,—'Create a number of terrible Shavaras.

21. Thus addressed, the cow created a number of men of terrific visages. These fought with the army of Vishwamitra and made a great onslaught.

22. Seeing this, the troops fled away. Regarding ascetic austerities highly efficacious, Vishwamitra, the son of Gadhi, made up his mind to practise the same.

23. In this best of tirthas of the Saraswati, O king, he began to emaciate his own body by vows and fasts.

24. He lived on water, air and the fallen leaves of trees. He slept on the naked earth and practised other vows of the ascetics.

25. The celestials repeatedly attempted for obstructing the observance of his vows. He, however, did not desist from practising his promised vow.

26. Then having practised various austerities with great devotion, the son of Gadhi became effulgent like the Sun himself.

27. The boon-giving Brahmana, of great energy, resolved to grant Vishwamitra, when he had succeeded in his ascetic observances, the boon the latter wanted.

28. The boon that Vishwamitra prayed for was that he should be permitted to become a Brahmana. Brahman, the grand-father of all the worlds, said to him,—'So be it.'

29. Having by his severe penances gained the status of Brahmanhood, the illustrious Vishwamitra, after the fulfillment of his desire, travelled over the whole earth like a god.

30. Distributing various sorts of wealth in that best of tirthas, Rama also gladly gave away milch cows, vehicles, beds, ornaments, food and drink of the best kinds, O king, to many foremost of Brahmanas, after having adored them dully.

32. Then, O king, Rama proceeded to the hermitage of Vaka which was not very far from where he was, the hermitage in which, as heard by us, Dalvya-vaka had practised the hardest of penances."

CHAPTER XLI.

(GADAYUDDHYA PARVA) —Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. "That delighter of the Yadus then proceeded to the hermitage (of Vaka) resonant with the chaunting of the Vedas. There the great ascetic, O king, named Dalvya-vaka, poured the kingdom of Dhritarashtra, the son of Vichitravirya, as a libation (on the sacrificial fire). By practising hard penances he emaciated his own body. The greatly energetic and virtuous Rishi did it being worked up with great wrath.

3. Formerly the Rishis, living in the Naimisha forest, had celebrated a sacrifice extending over twelve years. In the course of that sacrifice, after a particular one called Vishwajit had been completed, the Rishis started for the country of the Panchalas.

4. Going there, they requested the king to give them twenty one strong and healthy calves to be given away as Dakshina in the sacrifice they had finished.

5. Dalvya-vaka, then said to those Rishis,—'Do you divide those animals among ye! Giving away these (to ye), I shall beg a great king (for some more).'

6. Saying it the greatly energetic Vaka, that best of Brahmanas, then went to the palace of Dhritarastra.

7—8. Going before Dhritarashtra, Dalvya begged some animals of him. Finding that some of his kine had died without any cause, the king angrily said to him,—'Wretch of a Brahmana, take, if you wish, these (dead) kine.'

9. Hearing these words, the dutiful Rishi thought,—'Alas, he has spoken cruel words to me in the assembly.'

10. Having thought thus, that best of Brahmanas, filled with rage, made up his mind for destroying king Dhritarashtra.

11—12.—Cutting the flesh from the dead animals, that best of Rishis, having lighted a sacrificial fire on the tirtha of the Saraswati, poured those pieces as libations for the destruction of king Dhritarastra's kingdom. The great ascetic Dalvya-vaka, O king, poured Dhritarashtra's kingdom as a libation on the fire.

13. Upon the commencement of that dreadfuf sacrifice with proper rites, the kingdom of Dhritarashtra, O king, began to dwindle.

14. Indeed, O lord, the kingdom of that monarch began to dwindle as a large forest gradually disappears when men cut it down with the axe. Overtaken by dangers, the kingdom began to lose its prosperity and vitality.

15. Seeing his kingdom thus afflicted the powerful king became very depressed and anxious.

16. Consulting with the Brahmanas, he began to make mighty endeavours for releasing his kingdom (from affliction). No good, however, came of his endeavours, for the kingdom continued to dwindle.

17—18. The king became very much depressed. The Brahmanas also, O sinless one, became filled with grief. When at last the king failed to save his kingdom, he consulted the ministers, O Janamejaya, (about the remedy). The ministers reminded him of the evil he had done regarding the dead kine.

19. And they said,—'The ascetic Vaka is pouring your kingdom as a libation on the fire with the help of the flesh (of those animals). Therefore is this dwindling away of your kingdom.

20. This is the fruit of ascetic rites. Thence is this great calamity! Go, O king, and propitiate that Rishi who is living on the bank of the Saraswati.'

21. Going to the bank of Saraswati, the king fell at his feet, touched them with his head, joined his hands and said,—'I propitiate you, O worshipful one, forgive me for my crime.

22. I am an insensate fool, a wretch filled with avarice. You are my refuge, and protector, you should extend to me your favour.'

23. Seeing him thus laden with grief and indulging in lamentations like these, Vaka felt compassion for him and freed his kingdom.

24. The Rishi became pleased with him, and cast off his anger. For freeing his kingdom, the sage again poured libations on the fire.

25. Havidg freed the kingdom from calamities and taken many kine as a gift he became pleased at heart and once more proceeded to the Naimisha forest.

26. The liberal and righteous king Dhritarashtra, with a cheerful heart, returned to his own prosperous capital.

27—28. In that tirtha, for the destruction of the Asuras and the prosperity of the celestials Vrihashpati also poured libations on the sacrificial fire, with the aid of flesh. Upon this, the Asuras began to waste away and were killed by the celestials, filled with desire of victory, in battle.

29—30. Having with due rites given to the Brahmanas horses and elephants and vehicles with mules yoked to them and precious jewels and immense wealth and profuse corn, the illustrious and mighty-armed Rama then proceeded, O king, to the tirtha called Yayata.

31. There, O king, at the sacrifice of the high-souled Yayati, the son of Nahusha, the Saraswati produced milk and clarified butter.

32. That foremost of men, king Yayati, having performed a sacrifice there, went to heaven and secured many blissful regions.

33. Once again, O lord, king Yayati, performed a sacrifice there. Beholding his great magnanimity of soul and his fixed devotion to herself, the river Saraswati gave to the Brahmanas present there everything they desired to have.

34. That foremost of rivers gave each of them that were invited to the sacrifice, where he was, houses and beds and food of the six different tastes and various other things.

35. The Brahmanas regarded those valuable gifts as presented by the king. Gladly they lauded the king and conferred their sacred blessings upon him.

36. The gods and the Gandharvas were all pleased with the numberless articles in that sacrifice. As regards men they were filled with wonder on seeing those articles.

37. The illustrious and righteous Valadeva, of cleansed soul, having the palmyra on his banner, and ever giving away the most valuable things, then proceeded to that tirtha of fierce current called Vashishthapavaha.

CHAPTER XLII.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "Why is the current of the tirtha known as Vashishthapavaha so rapid? For why did the foremost of rivers carry away Vashishtha?

2. What, O lord, was the cause of the quarrel between Vashishtha and Vishwamitra? Asked by me, O you of great wisdom, tell me all this. I am never satiated with hearing your account."

Vaishampayana said :—

3. A great enemity arose between Vishwamitra and Vashishtha, O Bharata, on account of their rivalry regarding ascetic penances.

4. The hermitage of Vashishtha was in the tirtha called Sthanu on the eastern bank of the Saraswati. On the opposite bank was the hermitage of the intelligent Vishwamitra.

5. There, in that tirtha, O king, Mahadeva had practised the hardest penances. Sages still speak of those penances.

6. Having performed a sacrifice there and adored the river Saraswati, Sthanu established that tirtha there. Therefore it is known by the name Sthanu-tirtha, O lord.

7. In that tirtha, the celestials had, formerly, O king, appointed Skanda, that destroyer of the enemies of the celestials, as the generalissimo of their army.

8. The great Rishi Vishwamitra, by the help of his austere penances, brought Vashishtha, to that tirtha of the Saraswati, listen to that account.

9. The two ascetics Vishwamitra and Vashishtha, O Bharata, competed keenly with each other in respect of the superiority of their penances.

10. Being jealous of the power of Vashishtha, the great Muni Vishwamitra began to think seriously.

11—12. Though devoted to the performance of his duties, O Bharata, he formed the resolution, viz., 'This Saraswati shall speedily bring, by force of her current, that foremost of ascetics, viz., Vashishtha, to my presence. After he shall have been brought hither, I shall forsooth kill that greatest of ascetics.

13. Having formed this resolution, the illustrious and great Rishi Vishwamitra, with eyes red in ire, thought of that foremost of rivers.

14. Thus remembered by the ascetic, she became exceedingly agitated. The fair lady, repaired to that energetic and wrathful Rishi.

15. Pale and trembling, Saraswati, with clasped hands, appeared before that best of sages.

16. Indeed, the lady was greatly afflicted with sorrow, even like a woman who has lost her powerful husband. And she said to that best of sages,—'Tell me what I can do for you.'

17. Filled with ire, the ascetic said to her,—Bring here Vashishtha without delay, so that I my kill him.' Hearing these words, the river became agitated.

18. With clasped hands the lotus-eyed lady began to tremble in fear, like a creeper shaken by the wind.

19. Beholding the great river in that condition, the ascetic said to her,—'Bring Vashishtha before me without any scruple.'

20—21. Hearing these words of his, and knowing the evil he meant, and acquainted also with the matchless power of Vashishtha she went to Vashishtha and informed him of what the intelligent Vishwamitra had said to her.

22. Fearing the curse of both, she trembled again and again. Indeed, she stood in fear of both.

23. Seeing her pale and anxious, the righteous Vashishtha, that foremost of men, O king, said to her.

Vashishtha said :—

24. 'O foremost of rivers, save yourself! O you of rapid current, bear me away, otherwise Vishwamitra will curse you! Do not feel the least scruple.'

25. Hearing these words of that compassionate Rishi, the river began to think, O Kuru-chief, as to what she should do.

26. The thought 'Vashishtha shows great mercy for me. It is proper for me that I should serve him.'

27—28. Seeing then that best of Rishis, viz., Vashishtha engaged in silent recitation of Mantras on her bank, and seeing Kushika's son Vishwamitra also engaged in homa, Saraswati thought, 'this is my opportunity.' Then that foremost of rivers, by her current, washed away one of her banks.

29—30. In washing away that bank, she carried away Vashishtha. While being borne away, O king, Vashishtha lauded the river saying :—'From Brahma's manasa-lake thou hast originated, O Saraswati! The entire earth is filled with thy pure waters!

31. Passing through the sky, O Goddess, thou impartest thy waters to the clouds! All the waters are thee! Through thee we exercise our thinking faculties!

32. Thou art Pushti, and Dyuti, Kiriti, and Siddhi, and Uma! Thou art Speech, and thou art Swaha! This entire universe depends on thee. Thou dwellest in all creatures, in four forms.'

33. Thus lauded by that great Rishi, Saraswati, O king, speedily bore that Brahmana towards the hermitage of Vishwamitra and repeatedly announced to the latter the arrival of the former.

34. Seeing Vashishtha thus brought before him by Saraswati, Vishwamitra, worked up with ire, began to look for a weapon wherewith to kill that Brahmana.

35. Seeing him wrathful, the river, fearing to behold a Brahmana's slaughter, quickly bore Vashishtha away to her eastern bank once more. She thus had obeyed the words of both, although she deceived Vishwamitra by her act.

36. Seeing that best of Rishis, viz., Vashishtha, borne away, the vindictive Vishwamitra becoming enraged addressed Saraswati, saying :—

37. 'Since, O best of rivers, thou hast gone away and deceived me, let thy current be changed into blood liked of Rakshasas!'

38. Thus cursed by the intelligent Vishwamitra, Saraswati flowed for a whole year, bearing blood mixed with water.

39. Beholding the Saraswati in that plights the gods, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras became filled with great sorrow.

40. For this reason, O king, the tirtha passed by the name of Vashishthapavaha on Earth. The best of rivers, however, once more regained her own proper condition.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Cursed by the intelligent Vishwamitra in anger, Saraswati, in that sacred and best of tirthas, flowed in bloody current.

2. Then, O king, many Rakshasas came and lived happily there, drinking the blood that flowed.

3. Highly pleased with that blood, cheerfully and without anxiety of any kind, they danced and laughed there like persons that have (by virtue) attained to heaven.

4. After some time had passed away, some Rishis, having asceticism for their wealth, came to the Saraswati, O king, on pilgrimage.

5. Those foremost of ascetics, havin bathed in all the tirthas and obtained great delight, became desirous of acquiring more merit. Those learned sages at last came, O king, to that tirtha where the Saraswati flowed in a bloody current. Those highly blessed Rishis, arriving at that frightful tirtha,

7. Beheld the water of the Saraswati mixed with blood and numberless Rakshasas, O king, drinking it.

8. Seeing those Rakshasas, O king, those ascetics of rigid vows tried much for rescuing the Saraswati from that condition.

9—10. Arriving there, those Rishis invoked that foremost of rivers and said to her :—'Tell us the reason, O auspicious lady, why this lake in you has been distressed with such a plight. Hearing it, we shall use our efforts to restore its pristine condition.

11—12. Thus accosted, Saraswati, trembling as she spoke, informed them of everything that had taken place. Seeing her thus woe-begone, those ascetics told her,—'We have heard the cause. We have heard of your curse, O sinless lady! All of us shall try.'

13. Having said so to that foremost of rivers, they then consulted with one another,—'All of us shall release Saraswati from her curse.'

14—16. O king, adoring Mahadeva, that Lord of the universe and protector of all creatures, with penances, vows, fasts, abstenances and painful observances, all those Brahmanas emancipated that foremost of rivers, viz., the divine Saraswati.

17. Beholding the water of Saraswati purified by those ascetics, the Rakshasas (that lived there), stricken with hunger, sought the protection of those ascetics themselves.

18—19. Stricken with hunger, the Rakshasas, with clasped hands, repeatedly said to those ascetics filled with compassion viz.,—'All of us are hungry? We have deviated from the path of virtue! That we are sinful is not of our own free will!'

20—22. 'Through the want of your grace and our own evil deeds, as also for the sexual sins of our women, our sins multiply and we have become Brahma-Rakshasas! So amongst Vaishyas and Shudras, and Kshatriyas, those that hate and injure Brahmanas became Rakshasas.'

23. 'Ye best of Brahmanas, arrange then for our relief. You are capable of saving all the worlds!'

24—25. Hearing these words of theirs, those ascetics lauded the great river. For the rescue of those Rakshasas, with concentrated minds those ascetics said,—'The food over which one will sneeze, that in which there are worms and insects, that which may be mixed with refuges of food, that which is mixed with hair, that which is trampled, that which is mixed with tears,—shall make up the food of these Rakshasas!'

26. 'Knowing all this, the learned man shall carefully avoid these kinds of food. He that shall take such food shall be considered as prataking of the food of Rakshasas.'

27. Having thus purified the tirtha, those ascetics thus prayed to that river for the relief of those Rakshasas.

28. Understanding the wishes of those great Rishis, that best of rivers caused her body, O foremost of men, to assume a new form called Aruna.

29. Bathing in that new river the Rakshasas renounced their bodies and went to heaven.

30. Ascertaining all this, the king of the celestials, viz., Indra, of a hundred sacrifices, bathed in that best of tirthas and was freed of a grievous sin."

Janamejaya said :—

31. "Why was Indra affected with the sin of Brahmanicide! How also did he become freed by bathing in that tirtha?"

Vaishampayana said :—

32. "Listen to that history, O king, listen to those events as they took place. Hear how Indra formerly broke his treaty with Namuchi.

33—34. The Asura Namuchi, from fear of Vasava, had entered into a ray of the Sun. Indra then made friends with Namuchi and made a contract with him, saying,—'O king, of Asuras, I shall not kill you, O friend, with anything that is wet or dry. I shall not kill you in the night or in the day! Forsooth I swear this to you.'

35. Having made this understanding, the lord Indra one day beheld a fog. He then, O king, sundered Namuchi's head, using the foam of water as his weapon.

36. The severed head of Namuchi thereupon pursued Indra from behind, saying repeatedly from a near place—'O killer of a friend, O wretch!'

37. Thus addressed repeatedly by that ead, Indra went to the grandfather and informed him, sorrowfully of what had taken place.

38. The supreme lord of the universe said to him,—'Performing a sacrifice, bathe duly, O king of gods, in Aruna, the tirtha which saves all from the fear of sin!

39. The water of that river, O Shakra, has been sanctified by the ascetics! Formerly the river lay there concealed.

40. The divine Saraswati, repaired to the Aruna, and overflowed it with her waters. This confluence of Saraswati and Aruna is highly sacred!

41. There, O king of gods, perform a sacrifice. Distribute enough of presents. Performing thy ablutions there, you shall be freed off of your sin.'

42. Thus addressed, Indra, at these words of Brahman, O Janamejay, performed in that abode of Saraswati various sacrifices.

43. Distributing many presents and bathing in that tirtha, he of a hundred sacrifices, the destroyer of Vala, duly performed certain sacrifices and then bathed in the Aruna.

44. He became freed from the sin caused by Brahmanicide. The king of the celestial region, then returned to heaven with a joyful heart.

46. The head of Namuchi also dropped into that stream, O Bharata, and the Asura gained many blessed regions, O best of kings, that granted every wish."

Vaishampayana said :—

46. "The great Valadeva, having bathed in that tirtha and given away many kinds of gifts, acquired great virtue. Of righteous deeds, he then proceeded to the great tirtha of Soma.

47—48. There, formerly Soma himself, O emperor, had celebrated the Rajasuya sacrifice. The great Atri, that foremost of Brahmanas, endued with great intelligence, became the sacrificial priest in that grand sacrifice. Upon the termination of that sacrifice, a great battle took place between the gods and the Danavas, the Daityas, and the Rakshasas. That fierce battle known after the name of the Asura Taraka. In that battle Skanda killed Taraka.

49. There, on the occasion, Mahasena, that destroyer of Daityas, became the generalissimo of the celestial forces. In that tirtha is a huge Ashwatha tree. Under its shade, Kartikeya, otherwise called Kumara, always lives in person."

CHAPTER XLIV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "You have described the merits of the Saraswati, O best of Brahmanas. You should, O Rishi, describe to me the investiture of Kumara by the gods.

2—3. Great is my curiosity. Tell me everything, therefore, about the time, place and manner in which the worshipful and powerful Skanda was appointed the commander-in-chief of the celestial hosts! Tell me also, O best of speakers, who invested him and who performed the actual rites, and how the celestial generalissimo killed the Daityas,"

Vaishampayana said :—

4. "Your curiosity indeed becomes a Kuru. The words that I shall speak, will, O Janamejaya, please you.

5. I shall describe to you the appointment of Kumara and the prowess of that high-souled one, since, O king, you wish to hear it.

6. In days of yore the vital seed of Maheshwara, dropped into a blazing fire. The consumer of everything, the worshipful Agni, could not burn that indestructible seed.

7. On the other hand, the carrier of sacrificial libations, for that seed, became possessed of great energy and splendour. He could not bear within himself that powerful seed.

8. At the behest of Brahma, the lord Agni, approaching the river Ganga, threw into her that divine seed effulgent like the Sun.

9. Ganga also, unable to hold it, threw it on the beautiful breast of Himavat adored of the celestials.

10. Thereupon Agni's son began to grow there, overpowering all the worlds by his energy. Meanwhile the six Krittikas saw that child of fiery splendour.

11. Seeing that powerful lord, that great son of Agni, lying on a clump of reeds, all the six Krittikas, who wanted to have a son, cried aloud, saying,—'This child is mine, this child is mine.'

12. Understanding the feelings of those six mothers, the worshipful lord Skanda sucked the breasts of all, having assumed six months.

13. Beholding that power of the child, the Krittikas, those beautiful goddesses, were stricken with wonder,

14. And because the adorable child had been thrown by the river Ganga upon the summit of Himavat, that mountain looked beautiful, having, O delighter of the Kurus, been transformed into gold.

15. With that growing child the whole Earth became beautiful, and it was therefore that mountains produced gold.

16. Possessed of great energy, the child passed by the name of Kartikeya. At first he had been called by the name of Gangeya. He was endued with high ascetic powers.

17. Possessed of self-restraint, asceticism and great energy, the child grew up, O king, into a person of highly charming features like Soma himself.

18. Highly beautiful the child lay on that excellent and golden clump of reeds, worshipped and lauded by Gandharvas and ascetics.

19. Thousands of celestial girls, of very handsome features, accomplished in celestial music and dance, lauded him and danced before him.

20. The best of all rivers, viz., Ganga, waited upon that god. The earth also, assuming great beauty, held the child on her lap.

21. The celestial priest Vrihaspati performed the usual rites consequent upon the birth, of that child. The Vedas, assuming a fourfold form, approached the child with clasped hands.

22. The science of arms, with its four divisions, and all the weapons, as also all kinds of arrows, came to him.

23. One day, the highly energetic child, saw that god of gods, viz., the lord of Uma, seated with the daughter of Himavat, amid a number of goblins.

24. Those goblins, of lean bodies, had wonderful features. They were ugly, both in person and in features, and bore on this person awkward ornaments and marks.

25. Their faces were like those of tigers and lions and bears and cats and makaras. Others had faces like those of scorpions; others had faces like those of elephant, and camels and owls. And some had faces like those of vultures and jackals.

26—27. And some had faces like those of cranes and pigeons and Kurus. And some had bodies like those of dogs and porcupines and iguanas and goats and sheep and cows. And some resembled mountains, and some, oceans, and some stood with uplifted discs and maces for their weapons. And some looked like masses of antimony, and some, like white mountains. The seven matris also were present there, O king.

28—29. The Saddhyas, the Vishwedevas, the Maruts, the Vasus, the Pitris, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Siddhas, the Danavas, the birds, the self-create and worshipful Brahman with his sons, and Vishnu, and Shakra, all went there for beholding that child of ever-increasing glory.

30—31. And many leading celestials and Gandharvas, headed by Narada, and many celestial Rishis and Siddhas headed by Vrihaspati, and the guardian deities of the universe, those foremost ones, they that are regarded as gods of the gods, and the Yamas and the Dhamas, all went there.

32. Gifted with great strength and great ascetic power, the child proceeded before that lord of the gods, viz., Mahadeva, armed with trident and Pinaka.

33—34. Seeing the child coming, the thought entered the mind of Shiva, that of Himavat's daughter and that of Ganga and of Agni, as to whom amongst the four, the child would first approach for honoring him or her. Each of them thought,—'He will come to me.'

35. Understanding the desire of each of those four, he had recourse to his Yoga powers and assumed simultaneously four different forms.

36. The worshipful and powerful lord assumed those four forms in an instant. The three forms that stood behind were Shakra and Vishakha and Naigameya.

37. Having divided his self into four forms, he went towards the four that sat expecting him. The wonderful form called Skanda proceed where Rudra was sitting.

38. Vishakha went where the divine daughter of Himavat was. The adorable Shakha, which is Kartikeya's airy form, went towards Agni. Naigameya, that child of fiery splendour, went before Ganga.

39. All those four forms, of similar appearance, were highly effulgent. The four forms went calmly to the four gods and goddesses. It was indeed wonderful.

40. The gods, the Danavas, and the Rakshasas, made a loud noise seeing that exceedingly wonderful and hair stirring incident.

41. Then Rudra and the goddess Uma and Agni, and Ganga, all bowed unto Brahma, that lord of the universe.

42—43. Having duly bowed unto him, they said these words, O king, from desire of doing god unto Kartikeya:—'O Lord of the gods, for the sake of our happiness you should give this youth some kind of sovereignty that may suit him and that he may desire.'

44. Thereat, the worshipful grandfather of all the worlds, endued with great intelligence, began to think within his mind as to what he should confer on that youth.

45—46 He had formerly given away to the gods all kinds of wealth over which the great celestials, the Gandharvas, the Rakshasas, ghosts, Yakshas, birds, and snakes now reign. Brahman, therefore, considered that youth as fully qualified to have the dominion which had been bestowed upon the gods.

47. Having thought for a moment, the grandfather, always seeking the well-being of the celestials, conferred upon him the dignity of a generalissimo among all creatures, O Bharata.

48. He further ordered all those leading gods and other formless beings to wait upon him.

49. Then the gods headed by Brahman, taking that youth with them, came in a body to Himavat.

50. The site selected by them was the bank of the sacred and divine Saraswati, that foremost of rivers, taking her rise from Himavat, which is celebrated over the three worlds by the name of Samantapanchaka.

51. There, on the sacred bank of the Saraswati, the gods and the Gandharvas took their seats with gladness on account of the gratification of all their desires."

CHAPTER XLV.

(GADAYUDDHYA PARVA). —Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. "Collecting all articles sanctioned by Shastras for the ceremony of investiture. Vrihaspati duly poured libations on the burning fire.

2. Himavat gave a seat which was set with many costly gems. Kartikeya was made a sit on that sacred and best of seats set with excellent gems.

3. The gods collected there all sorts of sacred articles, with due rites and mantras, that were necessary for the ceremony.

4—17. The various gods, viz., Indra, Vishnu, Surya, Chandramas, Dhatri, Vidhatri, Vayu, Agni, Pushan, Bhaga, Aryaman, Ansha, Vivaswat, Rudra, of great intelligence, Mitra, the eleven Rudras, the eight Vasus, the twelve Adityas, the twin Ashwins, the Vishwedevas, the Maruts, the Saddhyas, the Pitris, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Pannagas, innumerable celestial Rishis, the Vaikhanasas, the Valikhillyas, those others among Rishis that live only on air and those that live on the rays of the Sun, the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, many great Yatis, all the Vidyadharas, all those that were crowned with ascetic success, the Grandfather, Pulastya, the great ascetic Pulaha, Angiras, Kashyapa, Atri, Marichi, Bhrigu, Kratu, Hara, Prachetas, Manu, Daksha, the Seasons, the Planets, and all the luminaries, O monarch, all the rivers in their embodied forms, the eternal Vedas, the Seas, the Lakes, the various Tirthas, the Earth, the Sky, the Cardinal and Subsidiary points of the compass, all the Trees, Aditi the mother of the gods, Hri, Shri, Swaha, Saraswati, Uma, Shachi, Sinivali, Anumati, Kuhu, the Day of the new Moon, the Day of the full Moon, the wives of the celestials, Himavat, Vindhya, Meru of many summits, Airavat with all his followers, the divisions of time called Kala, Kashtha, Fortnight, the Seasons, Night, and Day, O king, Ucchaishravas the king of horses, Vasuki the king of the Serpents, Aruna, Garuda, the Trees, the deciduous herbs, and the worshipful god Dharma, all came there in a body. And there came also Kala, Yama, Mrityu, and the followers of Yama.

18. I do not mention the various other gods that came there lest the list be a heavy one. All of them came to that ceremony for investing Kartikeya with the dignity of generalissimo.

19. All the celestials, O king, brought there every thing necessary for the ceremony and every sacred article.

20—21. Gladly the celestials made that great youth, that terror of the Asuras, the generalissimo of the celestial hosts, after pouring upon his head the sacred and excellent water of the Saraswati from golden jars that contained other sacred articles necessary for the purpose.

22. The Grandfather of the worlds, viz., Brahman, and Kashyapa of great energy, and all others, all poured water upon Skanda even as, O king, the gods had poured water on the head of Varuna, the lord of waters, when placing him in his dominion.

23. The lord Brahman then, with a pleased heart, gave to Skanda four powerful companions, gifted with speed of the wind, crowned with ascetic success, and gifted with energy which they could increase at will.

24. They were named Nandisena and Lohitaksha and Ghantakarna and Kumudamalin.

25. The lord Sthanu, O king, gave to Skanda a companion possessed of great impetuosity, capable of producing a hundred illusions, and gifted with might and energy that he could increase at will. And he was the great destroyer of Asuras.

26. In the great battle between the gods and the Asuras, this companion that Sthanu gave, worked up with ire killed with his hands alone, fourteen millions of Daityas of terrible deeds.

27. The gods then made over to Skanda the celestial host, invincible containing many celestial troops, capable of destroying the enemies of the gods, and of forms like that of Vishnu.

28. The gods then, with Vasava at their head, and the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Munis, and the Pitris, all exclaimed,—'Victory to Skanda.'

29. Then Yama gave him two companions, both of whom resembled Death, viz., Unmatha and Pramatha, endued with great energy and splendour.

30. Endued with great prowess, Surya, gladly gave Kartikeya two of his followers named Subhraja and Bhaswara.

31. Soma also gave him two companions, viz., Mani and Sumani, both of whom looked like summits of the Kailasa mountain and always used white garlands and white unguents.

32. Agni gave him two heroic companions, grinders of hostile armies, who were named Jwalajihbha and Jyoti.

33. Ansha gave the intelligent Skanda five companions, Parigha, and Vata, and Bhima of great strength, and Dahati and Dahana both of whom were highly dreadful and energetic.

34. Vasava, that destroyer of hostile heroes, gave Agni's son two companions, viz., Utkrosha and Panchaka who were armed respectively with thunder-bolt and club. These had in battle killed many enemies of Indra.

35. The illustrious Vishnu gave Skanda three companions, viz., Chakra and Vikrama and Shankrama of great power.

36. The Ashwins, O foremost of Bharatas gladly, gave Skanda two companions, viz., Vardhana and Nandana, masters of all sciences.

37. The illustrious Dhatri gave that high-souled one five companions, viz., Kunda, Kushuma, Kumuda, Damvara and Adamvara.

38. Tashtri gave Skanda two companions named Chakra and Anuchakra both of whom were very powerful.

39. The lord Mitra gave the high-souled Kumara two illustrious companions named Suvrata and Satyasandha both of whom were highly learned and endued with ascetic merit, possessed of handsome features, capable of granting boons, and well known over the three worlds.

40. Vidhatri gave Kartikeya two companions, viz., the great Suprabha and Shubhakarman.

41. Pushan gave him two companions, viz., Panitraka and Kalika, both gifted with great powers of illusion.

42. Vayu gave him, O best of the Bharatas, two companions, viz., Vala and Ativala, possessed of great might and very an large mouths.

43. The truthful Varuna gave him Ghasa and Atighasa of great might and having a mouth like that of the Timi fish.

44. Himavat gave Agni's son two companions, O king, viz., Suvarchas and Ativarchas.

45. Meru, O Bharata, gave him two companions named Kanchana and Meghamalin.

46. Manu also gave Agni's son two others gifted with great strength and power, viz., Sthira and Asthira.

47. Vindhya gave Agni's son two companions named Ucchrita aud Agnishringa both of whom fought with stones.

48. Ocean gave him two powerful companions named Sangraha and Vigraha both armed with mace.

49. The beautiful Parvati gave Agni's son Unmada and Pusphadanta and Shankukarna.

50. Vashuki the king of the serpents, O king, gave the son of Agni two snakes named Jaya and Mahajaya.

51—52. Similarly the Saddhyas, the Rudras, the Vasus, the Pitris, the Seas, the Rivers, and the Mountains, gave commanders of forces, armed with lances and battle axes and adorned with various kinds of ornaments.

53. Listen now to the names of those other warriors armed with various weapons and clad in diverse kind of robes and ornaments, that Skanda got.

54—71 They were Shankukarna, Nikumbha, Padma, Kumud, Ananta, Dwadashakbhuja, Krishna, Upakrishna, Ghranashravas, Kapiskandha, Kanchanaksha, Jalandhama, Akshasantarjana, Kunadia, Tambobhrakrit, Ekaksha, Dwadashaksha, Ekajata, Sahashravahu, Vikata, Vyaghraksha, Kshitikampana, Punyanaman, Sunaman, Suvaktra, Priyadarshana, Parishruta, Kokonada, Priyamalyanulepana, Ajodara, Gajashiras, Skandhaksha, Shatalochana, Jwalajihbha, Karala, Shitakesha, Jati, Hari, Krishnakesha, Jatadhara, Chaturdanshtra, Ashtajibha, Meghanada, Prithushravas, Vidyutaksha, Dhanurvaktra, Jathara, Marutashana, Udaraksha, Rathaksha, Vajranabha, Vasuprabha, Samudravega, Shailakampin, Vrisha, Meshapravaha, Nanda, Upanandaka, Dhumra, Shweta, Kalinga, Siddhartha, Varada, Priyaka, Nanda, Gonanda, Ananda, Pramoda, Swastika, Dhruvaka, Kshemavaha, Suvaha, Siddhaptra, Goveraja, Kanakapida, Gapana, Hasana, Vana, Khadga, Vaitali, Atitali, Kathaka, Vatika, Hansaja, Pakshadigdhanga, Samudronmadana, Ranotkata, Prahasa, Shwetasiddha, Nandaka, Kalakantha, Prabhasa, Kumbhandaka, Kalakaksha, Shita, Bhutalonmathana, Yajnavaha, Pravaha, Devajaji, Somapa, Majjala, Kratha, Kratha. Tuhara, Tuhara, Shitradeva, Madhura, Suprasada, Kiritin, Vatsala, Madhuvarna, Kalasodara, Dharmada, Manmathakara, Shuchivaktra, Shwetavaktra, Suvaktra, Charuvaktra, Padura, Dandavahu, Suvahu, Rajas, Kokilaka, Achala, Kanakaksha, Valakarakshaka, Sancharaka, Kokanada, Gridhrapatra, Jambhuka, Lohajvaktra, Javana, Kumbhavaktra, Kumbhaka, Mundagriva, Krishnaujas, Hansavaktra, Chandrabha, Panikurchas, Shamvuka, Panchavaktra, Shikshaka, Chasavaktra, Jamvuka, Kharavaktra, and Kunchaka.

74. Besides these many other great and powerful companions, practising ascetic austerities and respecting Brahmanas, were given to him by the grandfather.

75. Some of them were young, some were old, and some, O Janamejaya, were green youths. Thousands and thousands of such came to Kartikeya.

76. They were possessed of various kinds of faces. Listen to me, O Janamejaya, as I describe them. Some had faces like those of tortoises, and some like those of cocks. The faces of some were very long, O Bharata.

77. Some again, had faces resembling those of dogs, and wolves, and hares, and owls, and asses, and camels, and hogs.

99. Some had very large teeth, some had very short teeth, and some had only four teeth. Thousands among them, O king, were highly terrific in appearance, looking like huge infuriate elephants.

100. Some were of symmetrical limbs, possessed of great lustre, and adorned with ornaments. Some had yellow eyes, some had ears like arrows, some had noses like gavials, O Bharata.

101. Some had broad teeth, some had broad lips, and some had green hair. Possessed of various sorts of feet and lips and teeth, they had various kinds of arms and heads.

102. Clad in various kinds of skins, they spoke different languages, O Bharata. Skilled in all provincial dialects, those powerful ones talked with one another.

103. Those powerful companions, filled with joy, moved about (around Kartikeya). Some were long-necked, some long-nailed, some long-legged. Some amongst them were large-headed and some large-armed.

104. The eyes of some were yellow, the throats of some were blue, and the ears of some were long, O Bharata. The stomachs of some were like masses of antimony.

105. The eyes of some were white, the necks of some were red, and some had eyes of a twany hue. Many were dark in color, and many, O king, were of various colors, O Bharata.

106. Many were bedecked with ornaments that looked like yak-tails. Some bore white marks on their bodies, and some bore red marks. Some were of various colors and some were gold-hued, and some looked splendid like peacocks.

107. I shall describe to you the weapons that were taken by those that came last to Kartikeya. Listen to me.

108. Some had noses on their uplifted arms. Their faces were like those of tigers and asses. Their eyes were on their backs, their throats were blue, and their arms resembled spiked clubs.

109. Some were armed with Shataghnis and discs, and some had heavy and short clubs. Some had swords and mallets and some were armed with bludgeons, O Bharata.

110. Some, huge-bodied and powerful combatants, were armed with lances and scimitars. Some were armed with maces and Bhushundis and some had spears on their hands.

111. The powerful, noble. and energetic and quick-coursing companions had various kinds of terrible weapons in their arms.

112. Beholding the investiture of Kartikeya, those mighty and energetic followers, taking delight in battle and wearing on their persons rows of tinkling bells, danced round him joyfully.

113. These and many other powerful companions, O king, came to the great and illustrious Kartikeya.

114. Some belonged to the celestial regions, some to the aerial, and some to the Earth. All of them were gifted with speed of the wind. Commanded by the gods, those brave and powerful ones became the companions of Kartikeya.

115. Thousands and thousands, millions and millions, of such beings came there at the investiture of the great Kartikeya and stood envcircling him."

CHAPTER XLVI.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Cond.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Listen now to the numbers of the mothers, those destroyer of foes, O hero, that became the companions of Kumara, as I name them.

2 Listen, O, Bharata, to the names of those illustrious mothers. The mobile and immobile universe is permeated by those auspicious ones.

3—29. They are Prabhabavati, Vishalakshi Palita, Gonasi, Shrimati, Vahula, Vahuputrika, Apsujata, Gopali, Vrihadamvalika, Jayavati, Malatika, Dhruvaratna, Bhayankari, Vasudama, Sudama, Vishoka, Nandini, Ekachuda, Mahachuda, Chakranemi, Uttejana, Jayatsena, Kamalakshi, Shobhana, Shatrunjaya, Krodhana, Shalabhi, Khari, Magadhi, Shubhavaktra, Tirthaseni, Gitipriya, Kalyani, Kodruroma, Amitashana, Meghaswana, Bhogavati, Shubhru, Kanakavati, Alatakshi, Viryavati, Viddyutjihbha, Padmabati, Sunakshatra, Kandara, Vahuyojana, Santanika, Kamala, Mahavala, Sudama, Vahudama, Suprabha, Jashaswini, Nrityapriya, Shatolukhalamekhala, Shataghantata, Shatananda, Bhagananda, Bhavini, Vapusmati, Chandrashita, Bhadrakali, Jhankarika, Nishkuntika, Vama, Chatwaravasini, Sumangala, Swastimati, Vriddhikama, Jayapriya, Ghanada, Suprsada, Bhavada, Janeswari, Edi, Bhedi, Samedi, Vetalojanani, Kanduti, Kalika, Devamitra, Tamvusi, Ketaki, Chitrasena, Achala, Kukkutika, Shankshalika, Shakunika, Kundarika, Kokilika, Kumbhika, Shatodari, Utkrathini, Jalela, Mahavega, Kankana, Manojava, Kantakini, Pradhasa, Putana, Kheshaya, Antarghati, Vama, Kroshana, Taditprabha, Mandodari, Tuhundi, Kotara, Meghavahini. 30. These and many other mothers, O foremost of Bharata's race, numbering by thousands, of diverse forms, became the followers of Kartikeya.

31. Their nails were long, their teeth were large and their lips also, O Bharata, were projecting. Of straight forms and handsome features, all of them, endowed with youth, were adorned with ornaments.

32. Of ascetic merit, they were capable of assuming forms at will. Not having fleshy limbs, they were of fair complexions and endued with the lustre of gold.

33. Some amongst them were dark and looked like clouds in hue and some were of the color of smoke, O best of Bharata's race. And some were endued with the effulgence of the morning sun and were highly blessed. Possessed of long tresses, they were clad in white dresses.

34. The braids of some were tied upwards, and the eyes of some were twany and some had long girdles. Some had long stomachs, some had long ears, and some had long breasts.

35. Some had coppery eyes and coppery appearance, and the eyes of some were green. Capable of granting boons and of walking at will, they were always cheerful.

36. Possessed of great strength, some amongst them partook of the nature of Yama, some of Rudra, some of Soma, some of Kuvera, some of Varuna, some of Indra, and some of Agni, O destroyer of foes.

37. And some were of the nature of Vayu, some of Kumara, some of Brahman, O foremost of Bharata's race, and some of Vishnu, and some of Surya, and some of Varaha.

38. Of handsome and delightful features, they were beautiful like the Apsaras. In voice they resembled the kokila, and in wealth, Kuvera.

39. In battle, their energy resembled that of Shakra. In lustre they resembled fire. In battle they always struck terror to their enemies.

40. Capable of assuming any form at will, in fleetness they resembled the very wind. Of inconceivable power and great energy, their prowess also was inconceivable.

41. They live in trees and open spots and crossings of four roads. They live also in caves and crematoriums, mountains and springs.

42. Bedecked with various kinds of ornaments, they wear various kinds of dresses and speak different languages.

43. These and many other fairs (of the mothers), all capable of terrorising the enemies, followed, the great Kartikeya, at the command of the king of gods.

44. The worshipful chastiser of Paka, O foremost of kings, conferred on Kartikeya, a dart for the destruction of the enemies of the celestials.

45. That dart produces a loud sound, and is adorned with many large bells. Possessed of great lustre, it seemed to blaze with light. And Indra also gave him a banner effulgent as the morning sun.

46. Shiva gave him a large army, highly dreadful and armed with various kinds of weapons, and endued with great energy of ascetic penances.

47. Invincible and possessing all the qualities of a good army that force was known by the name of Dhananjaya. It was protected by thirty thousand warriors each of whom was powerful like Rudra himself. That force knew not how to fly from battle.

48. Vishnu gave him a triumphal garland that increases the power of the wearer. Uma gave him two pieces of cloth, effulgent like the sun.

49. With great pleasure Ganga gave Kumara a celestial water-pot, begotten of ambrosia, and Vrihaspati gave him a sacred stick.

50. Garuda gave him his favorite son, a peacock of beautiful feathers.

51. Aruna gave him a cock of sharp talons. The royal Varuna gave him a powerful shake.

52. The lord Brahma gave him, his devout devotee, a black deer-skin. And the Creator of all the worlds also gave him Victory in all battles.

53. Having obtained the command of the celestial forces, Skanda shone like a blazing fire of bright flames.

54. Accompanied by those companions and the mothers, he set out for the destruction of the demons, cheering up all the foremost of the celestials.

55. That terrible army of celestials, furnished with standards adorned with bells, and equipt with drums, and conchs and cymbals, and armed with weapons, and decked with many banners, shone like the autumnal sky, bespangled with planets and stars.

56. Then that vast host of celestials and various other creatures began cheerfully to beat their drums and blow their conchs numbering in thousands.

57. And they also played on their Patahas and Jharjharas and Krikachas and cow-horns and Adamvaras and Gomukhas and Dindimas of loud sound.

58. All the gods, with Vasava at their head, lauded Kumara. The celestials and the Gandharvas sang, and the Apsaras danced.

59. Well pleased (with these attentions) Skanda granted a boon to all the celestials, saying,—I shall kill all your enemies, that wish to kill you.

60. Having got this boon from that best of celestials, the illustrious gods considered their enemies as already killed.

61. After Skanda had granted that boon a tremendous sound uprose from all those creatures full of joy, filling the three worlds.

62. Accompanied by that vast army, Skanda then started for the destruction of the Daityas and the protection of the celestial beings.

63. Exertion, and Victory, and Righteousness, and Success, and Prosperity, and Courage, and the Scriptures, (in their embodied forms) followed Kartikeya's army, O king.

64—65. With that awe-inspiring force, armed with lances and mallets and blazing hands and maces and heavy clubs and arrows and darts and spears, and bedecked with beautiful ornaments and armour, the divine Guha set out with leonine roars.

66. Beholding him, all the Daityas and Rakshasas and Danavas, overcome with fear, dispersed in all directions.

67. Armed with various weapons, the gods pursued them. Seeing the enemy flying away, the energetic and powerful Skanda, became swollen with anger.

68. He repeatedly hurled his terrible weapon, viz., the dart, he had received from Agni. The energy displayed by him then resembled a fire fed with libations of clarified butter.

69. While the dart was repeatedly hurled by Skanda of unfathomable energy, meteors, O king, dropped upon the Earth.

70. Thunder-bolts also, with tremendous noise, dropped upon the Earth. Everything looked terrible, O king, as on the day of the universal dissolution.

71. When that terrible dart was once hurled by the son of Agni, millions of darts came out of it, O best of Bharatas.

72. The powerful and worshipful Skanda filled with joy, at last killed Taraka, the chief of the Daityas, endued with great energy and prowess, and surrounded in that battle, by a hundred thousand heroic and powerful Daityas.

73. In that battle, he then fell down Mahisha, who was surrounded by eight Padmas of Daityas. He next killed Tripada who was surrounded by a thousand Ajutas of Daityas.

74. The powerful Skanda then overpowered Hradodara, who was encircled by ten Nikharvas of Daityas, with all his followers armed with various weapons.

75. Filling the ten points of the horizon, the followers of Kumara, O king, made a loud noise, while those Daityas were being killed, and danced and jumped and laughed in joy.

76. Thousands of Daityas, O king, were reduced to ashes by the flames that came out Skanda's arrow, while others died at the very roars of Skanda.

77. The three worlds were terrified at the yawns of Skanda's soldiers. The enemies were consumed with flames produced by Skanda. Many were killed by his roars only.

78. Some amongst the enemies of the celestials, struck with banners, were killed. Some, frightened by the sounds of bells, dropped on the face of the earth. Some wounded with weapons, fell down dead.

79. In this way the horoic and powerful Kartikeya killed numberless enemies of the gods, highly powerful that came to fight with him.

80. Then Vali's powerful son Vana, getting upon the Krauncha mountain, fought with the celestial army.

81. Highly intelligent, the great generalissimo Skanda rushed against that enemy of the gods. Fearing Kartikeya, he took shelter within the Krauncha mountain.

82. Worked up with ire, the worshipful Kartikeya then pierced that mountain with that dart given him by Agni. The mountain was called Krauncha (crane), for the sound it always produced resembled the cry of a crane.

83. That mountain was variegated with Shala trees. The monkey and elephants that lived on it were frightened. The birds that had lived there rose up and wheeled around in the sky. The serpents began to dart down its sides.

84. It resounded also with the cries of a large number of leopards and bears that ran hither and thither in fright. Other forests on it rang with the cries of hundreds of animals.

85. Sharabhas and lions suddenly run out. On account of all this, that mountain though it was reduced to a very pitiable condition still shone very beautiful.

86. Vidyadharas living on its summits soared into the air. The Kinnaras also became very anxious, bewildered by the fear caused by the fall of Skanda's arrow.

87—88. The Daityas then, by hundreds and thousands, came out of that burning mountain, all bedecked with beautiful ornaments and garlands. The followers of Kumara, overpowering them in battle, killed them all, the worshipful Skanda worked up with ire, killed the son of the Daitya chief (Vali) along with his younger brother as Indra had killed Vritra formerly.

89. That destroyer of hostile heroes, viz., Agni's son, pierced with his dart the Krauncha mountain, dividing his own-self sometimes into many and sometimes aggregating them all into one.

90. Repeatedly discharged by him, the arrow repeatedly came back to him. Indeed such was the power and glory of the worshipful son of Agni.

91. With redoubled heroism, energy, fame and success, the god pierced the mountain and killed hundreds of Daityas.

92. Having thus slain the enemies of the celestials, the worshipful god was worshipped and honored by the latter and was greatly delighted.

93. After the Krauncha mountain had been pierced and after the son of Chanda had been killed drums were beat, O king, and conchs were blown.

94. The celestial ladies showered flowers continually upon that divine lord of Yogins.

95. Auspicious winds began to blow, carrying divine perfumes. The Gandharvas and great Rishis always engaged in the performance of sacrifices, sang his praises.

96. Some spoke of him as the powerful son of the Grandsire, viz., Sanatkumara, the eldest of all the sons of Bramhan.

97. Some described him as the son of Maheshwara, and some as that of Agni. Some spoke of him as the son of Uma or of Krittakas or of Ganga,

98. Hundreds and thousands of people described that Lord of Yogins of shining form and great might, as the son of one of those, or of either of two of those, or of any one of four of those.

99. "I have thus told you, O king, everything about the installation of Kartikeya. Listen now to the history of the sanctity of that best of Tirthas, on the Saraswati.

100. That best of Tirthas, O king after the enemies of the celestials had been killed, became a second heaven.

101. The powerful son of Agni gave to each of those leading celestials various kinds of dominion and wealth and at last the sovereignty of the three worlds.

102. Thus, O king, was that adorable destroyer of the Daityas installed by the gods as their generalissimo.

103. That other Tirtha, O best of Bharatas, where in days of Yore, Varuna, the Lord of waters had been installed by the celestials, is known by the name of Taijasa.

104. Having bathed in that Tirtha and adored Skanda, Rama gave to the Brahmans gold and clothes and ornaments and many other things.

105. Passing one night there, that killer of hostile heroes, viz., Madhava, lauding that foremost of Tirthas and touching its water, became cheerful and happy.

106. I have now told you everything about which you had enquired, viz., how the divine Skanda was installed by the celestials.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Cond.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "This history, O Rishi, that I have heard from you is highly wonderful, namely this detailed description of the installation according to due rites of Skanda.

2. O you having asceticism for your wealth, I consider myself cleansed by having listened to this account. My hair stands on end and my mind has become cheerful.

3. Having heard the history of the installation of Kumara and the destruction of the Daityas, I have been greatly pleased, I feel a curiosity, however, regarding another subject,

4. How was the king of the waters installed by the celestials in that Tirtha formerly. O best of men, tell me all that, for you are highly wise and are a skilled narrator.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. "Listen, O king, to this wonderful history as it took place in a previous Kalpa. In days of Yore, in the Satya Yuga, O king, all the celestials, duly approaching Varuna, said to him these words.

6. 'As Indra the king of gods always protects us from every fear, similarly be you the Lord of all the rivers.

7. You always live, O god, in the Ocean, that home of Makaras. This Ocean, the lord of rivers, will then be under you.

8. You will then increase and decreases with Soma!'—Varuna answered them saying—'Let it be so.'

9. All the celestials then assembled together, made Varuna living in the Ocean the Lord of all the waters, according to the rites sanctioned by the Scriptures.

10. Having installed Varuna as the Lord of all acquatic animals and worshipping him duly, the celestials, returned to their respective habitations.

11. Installed by the celestials, the illustrious Varuna began to duly protect seas and lakes and rivers and others reservoirs of water as Indra protects the gods.

12. Bathing in that Tirtha also, and giving away various kinds of presents, Valadeva, the destroyer of Pralamva, endued with great wisdom, then proceeded to Agni Tirtha, where the eater of the clarified butter, disappearing from the view, became concealed within the entrails of the Shami word.

13. When the light of all the worlds thus disappeared, O sinless one, the gods then went to the Grandsire of the universe.

14. And they said,—'The worshipful Agni has disappered. We do not know the reason. Let not creation go to destruction. Create fire, O powerful Lord'?"

Janamejaya said :—

15. "For what reason did Agni, the Creator of all the worlds, disappear? How also was he found out by the celestials? Tell me all this fully."

Vaishampayana said :—

16. The highly powerful Agni became very much frightened at the curse of Bhrigu. Concealing himself within the entrails of the Shami wood, that worshipful god disappeared from the view.

17. Upon the disappearance of Agni, all the gods led by Vasava, in great affliction, searched for the missing god.

18. Finding Agni then, they saw that god lying within the entrails of the Shami wood.

19. The celestials, O foremost of kings, with Vrihaspati at their head, having found out the god, became very glad with Vasava amongst them.

20. They then returned to their respective abodes. Agni also, from Bhrighu's curse, became an eater of every thing as said by the Bramhavadin.

21. The intelligent Valarama, having bathed there, then went to Bramhayoni where the worshipful Grandsire of all the worlds had created the world.

22. Formerly the Lord Bramhan having with all the gods bathed in that Tirtha, created all the Tirthas according to due rites, for the celestials.

23. Bathing there and distributing various kinds of gifts, Valadeva then proceeded to the Tirtha called Kauvera where the powerful Ailavila, having practised severe austerities, became the king of riches.

24. While he dwelt there (practising austerities), all kinds of wealth and all the precious gems, came to him of their own accord. Valadeva, having gone to that Tirtha and bathed in its waters, distributed immeuse wealth amongst the Bramhanas with due rites.

25. Rama saw at that spot the excellent woods of Kuvera. In days of yore, the great Kuvera the king of the Yakshas, having practised the severest austerities there, obtained many boons.

26. There were the lordship of all riches, the friendship of powerful Rudra, the status of a god, the regency over a particular quarter (the north), and a son named Nalakuvara. These the king of the Yakshas speedily obtained there.

27. The Maruts, coming there, installed him duly (in his sovereignty). He also obtained for a vehicle a well-equipt celestial car, fleet as thought, as also as all the prosperity of a god.

28. Bathing in that Tirtha and giving away immense wealth, Vala using white unguents thence went speedily to another Tirtha.

29. Abounding in various creatures, that Tirtha is known by the name of Vadarapachana. There the fruits of every reason are always available and flowers and fruits of every kind are always abundant."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Cond.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Rama then proceeded to the Tirtha called Vadarapachana where dwell many ascetics and Siddhas. There the daughter of Bharadwaja peerless on Earth for beauty, named Shruvavati, practised severe austerities. She was a maiden who led the life of a Bramhacharini.

3. That beautiful damsel, observing various kinds of vows, practised the austerest of penances, moved by the desire of obtaining the Lord of the celestials for her husband.

4. Many years passed away, O chief of Kuru's race, during which that damsel continually practised those various kinds of vows exceedingly difficult for women to practise.

5. The worshipful chastiser of Paka at last became pleased with her, for her penances and reverence shown to him.

6. The powerful Lord of the celestials then came to that hermitage, having assumed the form of the great Rishi Vashishtha.

7. Seeing that best of ascetics, viz., Vashishtha, of the austerest penances, she adored him, O Bharata, according to the rites observed by ascetics.

8. Conversant with vows, the auspicious and sweet-speeched damsel addressed him, saying,—'O worshipful one, O foremost of ascetics, tell me your commands, O lord.

9. O you of excellent vows, I shall serve you, asmuch as I can. I will, however, not be able to marry you, for I seek Shakra.

10. I am propitiating Shakra, the lord of the three worlds, with vows and rigid observances and ascetic penances.'

11—12. Thus addressed by her, the illustrious god, smiling as he looked at her, and knowing her observances, addressed her sweetly, saying,—'Your practices of penances is known to me, O you of excellent vows, the object cherished in your heart, for which you have been trying your best, O auspicious one, shall, be accomplished. Everything is attained by penances. Everything depends on penances.

14. All those sacred regions, O you beautiful damsel, that belong to the gods can be obtained by penances. Penances are the root of great happiness.

15. Those men that renounce their bodies after having practised austere penances, obtain the status of gods, O auspicious one. Remember these words of mine.

16—17. Do you now, O blessed damsel, boil these five jujubes, O you of excellent vows.' Having said these words, the worshipful slayer of Vala went away, taking leave, to recite mentally certain mantras at an excellent Tirtha not far from that hermitage. That Tirtha passed in the three worlds after the name of Indra, O giver of honors.

18. Indeed, it was for testing the damsel's devotion that the king of the celestials acted in that way for obstructing the boiling of the jujubes.

19. The damsel, O king, having purified himself, began her task; restraining speech and with fixed attention, she sat to her task, without experiencing the least fatigue.

20. Thus that damsel of high vows, O best of kings, began to boil those jujubes. As she sat employed in her work, O foremost of men, day was almost gone, yet those jujubes showed no signs of softening.

21. The fuel she had there was all consumed. Seeing the fire about to extinguish owing to want of fuel, she began to burn her own limbs.

22. The beautiful maiden first dropped her feet into the fire. The innocent damsel sat still while her feet began to be consumed.

23. The beautiful girl did not at all mind her burning feet. Though it was a hard work, she did it from desire of doing good to the Rishi that had been her guest.

24. Her face did not at all change its colour under its agony, nor did she fell sorrow for it. Having thrust her limbs into the fire, she felt as much joy as if she had put them into cool water.

25. The words of the Rishi, viz.,—Cook these jujubes well,—were remembered by her, O Bharata.

26. The auspicious damsel, recollecting those words of the great Rishi, began to cook those jujubes although the latter, O king, showed no signs of softening.

27. The worshipful Agni himself consumed her feet. For this, however, the maiden did not feel the slightest pain.

28. Beholding [illegible] of hers, the lord of the three worlds, became highly pleased. He then appeared in his own proper form before the damsel.

29. The king of the celestials then addressed that maiden of very austere vows, saying,—'I am pleased with your devotion, penances, and vows.

30. Your wish, therefore, O auspicious one, shall be accomplished. Renouncing body, O blessed one, you shall in heaven live with me.

31. This hermitage, again, shall become the foremost of Tirthas in the world, capable of cleansing from every sin, O you of fair eye-brows, and shall pass by the name of Vadarapachana. It shall be celebrated in the three worlds and shall be lauded by great Rishis.

32. In this very Tirtha, O auspicious, sinless, and highly blessed one, the seven Rishis had once left Arundhati (the wife of one of them) while they went to Himavat.

33. Those regenerate ones, of very rigid vows, had gone there for collecting fruits and roots for their sustenance.

34. While they thus lived in a forest of Himavat for procuring their food, a drought took place extending for twelve years.

35. Those ascetics, having made a hermitage for themselves, continued to live there. Meanwhile Arundhati devoted herself to ascetic penances.

36. Beholding Arundhati practising the austerest of vows, the boon-giving and three-eyed deity Mahadeva, highly gratified, came there.

37. Assuming the form of a Brahmana, the illustrious Mahadeva, came to her and said,—I desire alms, O auspicious one!

38. The beautiful Arundhati said to him,—Our food has been exhausted, O Brahmana. Do thou eat jujubes.

39. Mahadeva replied,—Cook these jujubes, O you of excellent vows. After these words, she began to cook those jujubes for pleasing that Brahmana.

40. Placing those jujubes on the fire, the celebrated Arundhati listened to various excellent and sound and sacred discourses (from the lips of Mahadeva). That twelve years, drought then passed away.

41. Without food, and employed in cooking and listening to those sacred topics, that terrible period passed away as if like a single day.

42—43. Having collected fruits from the mountain, the seven Rishis returned there. The worshipful Mahadeva, highly pleased with Arundhati, [illegible] to her,—Approach, as formerly, these Rishis, O righteous one! I have been satisfied with your penances and vows.

44. The adorable Hara appeared there in his own form. Pleased, he spoke to them about the noble conduct of Arundhati (in these words.)

45. The ascetic merit, ye Rishis, that this lady has acquired, is, I think, much greater than what you have earned on the breast of Himavat!

46. The penances practised by this lady have been highly austere, for she passed twelve years in cooking, herself fasting all the time.

47. Then, addressing Arundhati, Mahadeva said, Pray for any boon, O auspicious dame, you like.

48. Then that lady of large and red eyes addressed that god in the midst of the seven Rishis, saying,—If, O divine one, you are pleased with me, then let this place be an excellent Tirtha. Let it be known by the name of Vadarapachana and let it be the favorite resort of Siddhas and celestial Rishis!

49. May he, O god of gods, who observes a fast here and lives for three nights after having purified himself, obtain the fruit of a twelve years' fast.

50. The gods answered her, saying,—Let it be so. Lauded by the seven Rishis, the god then went to heaven.

51. Indeed, the Rishis has been stricken with wonder on seeing the god and the chaste Arundhati herself as hale and hearty and capable of bearing hunger and thirst.

52. Thus the pure-souled Arundhati, formerly, obtained the highest success, like you, O highly blessed lady, for my sake, O damsel of rigid vows!

53—55. O amiable maiden, you have practised severer penances. Gratified with your vows, I shall also grant you this especial boon, O auspicious one, a boon that is superior to what was granted to Arundhati. Through the power of the great god who had granted that boon to Arundhati and through your own energy, O amiable one, I shall duly grant you another boon now, viz., that the person who will live in this Tirtha for only one night and bathe here with his mind concentrated, will, after renouncing his body, obtain many blissful regions that are difficult of acquisition.

56. Having said these words to the pure Shruvavati, the thousand-eyed Shakra then went back to heaven.

57. After the wielder of the thunder-bolt, O king, had gone, a shower of celestial flowers of sweet fragrance fell there, O Bharata's chief.

58. Celestial kettle-drums also, of loud sound, were beat there. Auspicious and perfumed breezes also blew there, O king.

59. The auspicious Shruvavati then renouncing her body, became the wife of Indra. Obtaining that dignity through austere penances, she began to pass her time, sporting with him."

Janamejaya said :—

60. "Who was the mother of Shruvavati, and how was that fair damsel brought up. I desire to hear this, O Brahmana, for great is my curiosity."

Vaishampayana said :—

61. "The vital seed of the great Rishi Bharadwaja fell upon beholding the large eyed Apsara Ghritachi as the latter was passing by at one time.

62. That foremost of ascetics thereupon held it in his hand. It was then kept in a cup made of the leaves of a tree. In that cup was born the girl Shruvavati.

63. Having performed the usual birth rites, the great ascetic Bharadwaja, gave her a name.

64. The name the pious Rishi gave her n the presence of the gods and Rishis was Shruvavati. Leaving the girl in his hermitage, Bharadwaja went to the forests of Himavat.

65. That best of the Yadus, the heroic Valadeva, of great dignity, having bathed in that Tirtha and distributed much wealth amongst the Brahmanas, then went with a concentrated mind to the Tirtha of Shakra.'

CHAPTER XLIX.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "The powerful chief of the Yadus, having gone to Indra's Tirtha, bathed there according to due rites and distributed wealth and gems amongst the Brahmanas.

2. There the chief of the celestials had performed a hundred horse-sacrifices and given immense wealth to Vrihaspati.

3. Indeed, through the assistance of Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas, Shakra performed all those sacrifices there, according to rites sanctioned by the scriptures. Those sacrifices were performed on a liberal scale. Horses of all breeds were brought there. The gifts to Brahmanas were immense.

4. Having duly completed those hundred sacrifices, O chief of the Bharatas, Shakra passed by the name of Shatakratu.

5. That auspicious and sacred Tirtha, capable of dissipating every sin, came to be called after his name as Indra-Tirtha.

6. Having duly bathed there, Valadeva worshipped the Brahmanas with excellent food and raiments. He then went to that auspicious and foremost of Tirthas called after the name of Rama.

7. The highly blessed and ascetic Rama of Bhrigu's race, repeatedly conquered the Earth and killed all the foremost of Kshatriyas.

8. Then Rama performed in that Tirtha a Vajapeya sacrifice and a hundred horse-sacrifices through the assistance of his preceptor Kashyapa. There, as sacrificial fee, Rama gave to his preceptor the whole Earth with her oceans.

9. The great Rama, having duly bathed there, made presents to the Brahmanas, O Janamejaya, and adored them.

10. Having made diverse presents consisting of various kinds of gems, kine, elephants, female slaves, sheep and goats, he then retired into the woods.

11. Having bathed in that sacred and foremost of Tirthas that was the resort of gods and Rishis, Valadeva duly adored the ascetics there, and then went to the Tirtha called Yamuna.

12. The highly effulgent and blessed son of Aditi, Vuruna, had in days of yore performed in that Tirtha the Rajasuya sacrifice, O king.

13—14. Having in battle subjugated both men and celestials and Gandharvas and Rakshasas, Varuna, O king, that slayer of hostile heroes, celebrated his grand sacrifice in that Tirtha. Upon the commencement of that foremost of sacrifices a battle took place between the gods and the Danavas, terrorising the three worlds.

15. After the termination of that foremost of sacrifices, viz., the Rajasuya (of Varuna), a terrible battle, O Janamejaya, ensued amongst the Kshatriyas.

16. Having worshipped the Rishis there, the ever liberal and powerful Valadeva, made many presents to those that desired them.

17. Filled with joy and lauded by the great Rishis, Valadeva, that hero ever decked with garlands of wild flowers and possessed of eyes like lotus leaves, then went to the Tirtha called Aditya.

18. There, O best of kings, having performed a sacrifice, the worshipful and effulgent Sun, obtained the sovereignty of all luminous bodies (in the universe) and acquired also his great energy.

19—22. There, in that Tirtha situate on the bank of that river, all the gods with Vasava at their head, the Vishwedevas, the Maruts, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Island-born Vyasa, Shuka, Krishna the slayer of Madhu, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, and the Pishachas, O king, and various others, thousands in numbers, all crowned with ascetic success, always live. Indeed, in that auspicious and sacred Tirtha of the Saraswati, Vishnu himself, having in days of yore slain the Asuras, Madhu and Kaitabha, had, O chief of the Bharatas, performed his ablutions.

23. The Island-born Vyasa also, O Bharata, having bathed in that Tirtha, acquired great Yoga powers and Siddhi.

24. Having bathed in that very Tirtha with a concentrated mind, the Rishi Asita-Deval also obtained great Yoga powers."

CHAPTER L.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "In this Tirtha lived formerly a virtuous Rishi, named Asita-Devala, leading the life of a house-holder.

2. He led a life of purity and self-restraint. Possessed of great ascetic merit, he was compassionate to all creatures and never injured any one. In word, deed, and thought, he behaved equally towards all creatures.

3. O monarch, censure and praise were equal to him who was without wrath, he was, like Yama himself, thoroughly impartial, treating all alike.

4. The great ascetic looked with an equal eye upon gold and pebbles. He daily worshipped the gods and guests, and the Brahmanas. Righteous himself he always practised the vow of Brahmacharya.

5. Once upon a time, an intelligent ascetic, O king, of the name of Jaigishavya, devoted to Yoga and rapt in meditation, and leading the life of a mendicant, came to Devala's hermitage.

6. That great ascetic ever practising Yoga, O monarch, while residing in Devala's hermitage became crowned with ascetic success.

7. Indeed, while the great Muni Jaigishavya lived there, Devala always paid him attention, never neglecting him at any time.

8. Thus, O king, they both lived long together. On one occasion, Devala lost sight of Jaigishavya, that foremost of ascetics.

9. At the hour, however, of dinner, O Janamejaya, the intelligent and righteous ascetic, leading a life of mendicancy, approached Devala for soliciting alms.

10. Seeing that great ascetic re-appear in the guise of a mendicant, Devala paid him great honors and expressed much gratification.

11. And Devala adored his guest, O Bharata, according to his might, after the rites laid down by the Rishis and with great attention for many years.

12. One day, however, O king, in the sight of that great Muni, a deep anxiety disturbed the mind of the high-souled Devala.

13—14. The latter thought within himself,—"Many years have I passed in adoring this ascetic. This idle mendicant, however, has not yet spoken to me a single word !'—Having thought thus the blessed Devala proceeded to the banks of the ocean through the sky, carrying his earthen pitcher.

15. Arrived at the coast of the Ocean, that lord of rivers, O Bharata, the righteous Devala saw Jaigishavya arrived there before him.

16. Thereat the lord Asita, became filled with wonder and thought within himself,—'How could the mendicant come to the ocean and perform his ablutions even before my arrival ?'

17. Thus thought the great Rishi Asita. Duly performing his ablutions there and purifying himself thereby, he then began to silently recite the sacred mantras.

18. Having finished his ablutions and silent prayers, the blessed Devala returned to his hermitage, O Janamejaya, taking with him his earthen pitcher filled with water.

19. As the ascetic, however, entered his own hermitage, he saw Jaigishavya seated there.

20. The great ascetic Jaigishavya never spoke a word to Devala but lived in the latter's hermitage like a log of wood.

21. Having seen that ascetic, who was an ocean of austerities, plunged in the waters of the ocean (before his own arrival there), Asita now saw him returned to his hermitage before his own return.

22. Witnessing this Yoga power, of Jaigishavya, the intelligent Asita-Devala, O king, began to think over the matter.

23. Indeed, that best of ascetics, O king, wondered much, saying,—'How could this one be seen in the ocean and again in my hermitage?'

24. While immersed in these thoughts, the ascetic Devala, conversant with mantras then soared aloft, O king, from his hermitage into the sky, for ascertaining who the mendicant Jaigishavya really was.

25. Devala saw numbers of sky-ranging Siddhas rapt in meditation, and Jaigishavya reverentially adored by them.

26. Devala became filled with wrath at the sight. He then saw Jaigishavya start for heaven.

27. He next saw him proceed to the region of the Pitris. Devala saw him then proceed to the region of Yama.

28. From Yama's region the great ascetic Jaigishavya was then seen to soar aloft and proceed to the region of Soma. He was then seen to proceed to the blessed regions of the performers of various rigid sacrifices.

29. Thence he proceeded to the regions of the Agnihotris and thence to the regions of those ascetics that perform the Darsha and the Paurnamasa sacrifices.

30. The intelligent Devala then beheld him go from those regions of persons performing sacrifices by killing animals to that pure region which is adored by the very gods.

31. Devala next saw the mendicant proceed to the place of those ascetics that perform the sacrifice called Chaturmasya and various others of the same kind. Thence he went to the region belonging to the performers of the Agnishtoma sacrifice.

32. Devala then saw his guest go to the place of those ascetics that perform the sacrifice called Agnishutta.

33. Devala next saw him in the regions of those highly wise men that perform that foremost of sacrifices, viz., Vajapeya, and the other sacrifice in which enough of gold is necessary.

34. Then he saw Jaigishavya in the region of those that perform the Rajasuya and the Pundarika.

35. He then saw him in the regions of those foremost of men that perform the horse-sacrifice and the sacrifice in which human beings are killed.

36. Indeed, Devala saw Jaigishavya in the regions also of those that celebrate the sacrifice called Sautramani and that other in which the flesh of all living animals is required.

37. Jaigishavya was then seen in the regions of those that perform the sacrifice called Dadashaha and various others of a similar nature.

38. Asita next saw his guest sojourning in the region of Mitravaruna and then in that of Adityas.

39. Asita then saw his guest go through the regions of the Rudras, the Vasus, and Vrihaspati.

40. Having soared next into the blessed region called Golaka, Jaigishavya was next seen to pass into those of the Brahmasatris.

41. Having by his energy passed through three other regions, he was seen to go to those regions that are reserved for women that are chaste and devoted to their husbands.

41. At this point, O chastiser of foes, Asita lost sight of Jaigishavya that foremost of ascetics, who, rapt in Yoga, disappeared from his view.

43. The highly blessed Devala then reflected upon the power of Jaigishavya his vows and success in Yoga.

44—45. Then the self-restrained Asita, with joined hands and in a reverential spirit, enquired of those foremost of Siddhas in the regions of the Brahmasatris, saying—'I do not see Jaigishavya! Tell me where that energetic ascetic is! I desire to hear this, for great is my curiosity!'

Siddhas said :—

46. 'Listen, O Devala of rigid vows, we speak to you the truth! Jaigishavya has gone to the eternal region of Brahman!'

Vaishampayana said :—

47. "Hearing these words of those Siddhas, living in the regions of the Brahmasatris, Asita tried to soar aloft but he soon fell down.

48. The Siddhas then, once more addressing Devala said to him,—'You, O Devala, are not competent to proceed to the region of Brahman, where Jaigishavya has gone!'

Vaishampayana said :—

49. "Hearing those words of the Siddhas, Devala came down, descending from one region to another in due succession.

50. He repaired to his own sacred hermitage very quickly, like a winged insect. As soon as he entered his abode he beheld Jaigishavya seated there.

51—52. Then beholding his Yoga power Devala, reflected upon it with his righteous understanding, and approaching that great ascetic, O king, with humility, addressed the great Jaigishavya, saying,—'I desire, O adorable one, to acquire Moksha (Emancipation) !'

53. Hearing these words of his, Jaigishavya gave him lessons. And he also initiated him in the mysteries of Yoga and taught him the all important and obligatory duties of individuals as also their reverses.

54. The holy personage of hard austerities, seeing him thus determined, performed all the sacred rites according to the injunctions laid down for that purpose.

55. Then all creatures with the Pitris, seeing Devala determined to adopt the religion of emancipation began to weep, saying,—' Alas, who will hereafter offer us food !'

56. Hearing these lamentations of all creatures that resounded through all the points of horizon, Devala thought of renouncing the religion of emancipation.

57—58. Then all sorts of sacred fruits and roots, O Bharata, and thousands of flowers and deciduous herbs, began to weep, saying, 'the wicked and mean Devala will, forsooth, once more pluck and cut us ! Alas, having once promised all creatures no injury, he sees not the wrong that he thinks of doing.

59. Thereat that foremost of ascetics began to think with the help of his understanding, saying,—' Which of the two, viz., the religion of Moksha or that of a householder, will be the better for me ?

60. Meditating on this, Devala, O king, relinquished the life of a house-holder and adopted that of Moksha.

61. Having thought thus, Devala, on account of his dertermination, acquired the highest success, O Bharata, and the highest Yoga.

62. The celestials then, led by Vrihaspati, praised Jaigishavya and the penances of that ascetic.

63. Then that best of ascetics, viz., Narada, said to the gods—' There is no penance in Jaigishavya since he filled Asita with wonder !'

64. The inhabitants of heaven then said to Narada who had communicated such dangerous words.—' Do not say so about the great ascetic Jaigishavya !

65. There is no one superior or even equal to this great one in energy, penance and Yoga !

66. Such was the power of Jaigishavya as also of Asita. Here lived those two, and this is the Tirtha of those two great persons.

67. Bathing there and distributing wealth to the Brahmanas, the great wielder of the plough, of great deeds, acquired great merit and then went to the Tirtha of Soma."

CHAPTER LI.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "There, in that Tirtha, O Bharata, where the Moon had formerly celebrated the Rajasuya sacrifice, a great battle was fought in which Taraka was the root.

2—3. Bathing in that Tirtha and distributing many presents, the virtuous Vala of pure soul went to the Tirtha of the Muni named Saraswat. There, during a drought extending over twelve years, the sage Saraswat, formerly taught the Vedas unto many best of Brahmanas.

Janamejaya said :—

4. "Why did the sage Saraswat, O you of ascetic merit, teach the Vedas to the Rishis during a twelve years' drought ?

Vaishampayana said .—

5. Formerly, O king, there was an intelligent sage of great ascetic virtue. He was celebrated by the name of Dadhicha. Having governed his senses, he led the life of a Brahmacharin.

6. On account of his excessive ascetic austerities, Shakra was possessed by fear. The sage could not be dissuaded (from the practices of his penances) by the offer of even various kinds of rewards.

7. At last, for tempting the sage, the chastiser of Paka, sent to him the highly beautiful and celestial Apsara by name Alamvusha.

8. On the banks of the Saraswati the great sage was engaged in the worship of the gods, and there the celestial nymphs, O king, arrived.

9. Seeing that beautiful damsel the seminal fluid of that ascetic came out. Having fallen into the Saraswati, the latter preserved it with care.

10. Indeed, O foremost of men, the River, seeing that seed, held it in her womb. In time the seed developed into a fœtus and the great river kept it so that it might have life and grow into a child.

11. When the time came, the best of rivers delivered that child and then went, O lord, taking it with her, to that Rishi.

12—14. Seeing that best of Rishis in a conclave, Saraswati, O king, while handing over the child, said these words :—'O Rishi, this is your son whom I held out of respect for you! That seed of yours, which fell at seeing the nymph Alamvusha, had been held by me in my womb, O Rishi, through devotion for you, and knowing well that that your seed would never be destroyed.

15. Given by me, accept this faultless child of your own!' Thus addressed by her, the Rishi accepted the child and was highly pleased.

16. That best of Brahmanas then out of affection smelt the head of his son and embraced him closely, O best of Bharata, for some time.

17. Pleased with the River, the great ascetic Dadhicha then gave a boon to her, saying,—'The Vishwedevas, the Rishis, and all the clans of the Gandharvas, and the Apsaras, will henceforth, O blessed one, derive great happiness when oblations of your water are presented to them!'

18. Having said to that great river, the sage, pleased and filled with joy, then praised her in these words. Hear them duly, O king!

19. 'Thou hast sprung, O highly blessed one, from the lake of Brahman in days of old. All ascetics know thee, O best of rivers.

20. Highly beautiful, thou hast done me great good! This thy great child, O fair river, will be known by the name of Saraswat.

21. This thy son, capable of creating new worlds, will pass after thy name! That great ascetic will be known by the name of Saraswat!

22. During a drought extending over twelve years, this Saraswat, will teach the Vedas to many best of Brahmanas.

23. O blessed Saraswati, through my grace, thou shalt always become the best of all sacred rivers!'

24. Thus was the great River lauded by the sage after the latter had granted her boons. The River then, overjoyed went away, O best of Bharata's race, taking with her that child.

25. Meanwhile, during a war between the gods and demons Shakra travelled through the three worlds in search of weapons.

26. The king of the celestials, however, failed to find such weapons as were fit to kill the enemies of the celestials.

27. Shakra then said to the gods.—'The great Asuras are incapable of being defeated by me. Save with the bones of Dadhicha, our foes cannot be killed.

28. Ye best of celestials, go, therefore, to that best of Rishis and beg of him, saying,—Grant us, O Dadhicha, your bones! With them we will kill our enemies.'

29. Begged by them for his bones, that best of Rishis, O best of Kuru's race, unhesitatingly gave up his life. Having done what was agreeable to the celestials, the sage attained to the eternally blissful region.

30. With his bones, Shakra gladly made many kinds of weapons, such as thunderbolts, disci, heavy maces, and many kinds of clubs and bludgeons.

31. Equal to the Creator himself, Dadhicha, had been begotten by the penances of great Rishi Bhrigu. Strongly built and highly energetic Dadhicha had been made the strongest of men in the world. The powerful and glorious Dadhicha, became tall like the king of mountains. The chastiser of Paka had always been in dread of his power.

33. With the thunder-bolt created by Brahma, and inspired with mantras, O Bharata, Indra made a loud noise when he hurled it, and killed ninety-nine Daityas.

34. After a dreadful long time a drought, O king, took place that extended over twelve years.

35. During that drought extending over twelve years, the great Rishis fled away, O king, on all sides to maintain themselves.

36—37. Seeing them scattered on all sides, the sage Saraswat also set his heart on flight. The river Saraswati then said to him. 'You need not, O son, go away, for I will always supply you with food even here by giving you large fishes! Remain therefore, here!'

38. Thus addressed (by the river), the sage continued to live there and offer oblations of food to the Rishis and the celestials. He got also his daily food and thus continued to support both himself and the gods.

39. After the termination of that twelve years' drought the great Rishis requested one another to deliver discourses on the Vedas.

40. While wandering hungrily the Rishis had forgotten the Vedas. There was, indeed, not even one amongst them that could interpret the Vedas.

41. It so happened that some one amongst them met Saraswat, that foremost of Rishis, while the latter was reading the Vedas with concentrated attention.

42. Returning to the assemblage of Rishis, he spoke to them of Saraswat, of his matchless effulgence and celestial appearance, and of deep concentration in the Vedas in a secluded forest.

43. Then all the great Rishis came there and in a body spoke to Saraswat, that best of ascetics, these words. :—' Teach us, O sage!' The ascetic replied, saying,—' Become my disciples duly!'

45. The host of ascetics answered,—' O son, you are too young.' Thereupon he answered the ascetics,—' I must act in such a way that my religious merit may not suffer decrease.

46. He that teaches improperly, and he that learns improperly, are both doomed to destruction and mutual hatred.

47. It is not age, or decrepitude, of wealth, or the number of kinsmen, by which the Rishis claim their merit. He only is great who is capable of reading and understanding the Vedas.'

48. Hearing these words of his, those ascetics duly became his disciples and learning again from him the Vedas began to practise their rites.

49. Sixty thousand ascetics became disciples of the great Rishi Saraswat for the sake of learning again the Vedas from him.

50. Obeying that beautiful Rishi though a boy, the ascetics each brought a handful of grass and offered it to him for his seat.

51. The powerful son of Rohini, and elder brother of Keshava, having distributed wealth in that Tirtha, then joyfully went to another where lived formerly an old virgin lady."

CHAPTER LII.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "Why, O Rishi did that maiden practise ascetic penances in days of yore. Why did she practise penances, and what was her vow?"

2. Matchless and mysterious is the topic that I have already heard from you. Describe particularly how that maid practised penances."

Vaishampayana said :—

3—4. "There was a highly illustrious and energetic Rishi, named Kuni-Garga. Having practised the austerest of penances, O king, that best of ascetics, created a fair-browed daughter by his desire. Seeing her, the celebrated ascetic Kuni-Garga was filled with joy. He renounced his body, O king, and then went to heaven.

5. Meanwhile, that faultless and amiable and fair-browed maiden, having eyes like lotus petals, continued to practise severe and very rigid penances. She adored the Pitris and the gods with fasts.

6. She passed a long time in the practice of such severe penances. Though her father had been for giving her away in marriage, yet she did not wish for it, for she saw no husband worthy of her.

7. Emaciating her body with austere penances, she began to worship the Pitris and the gods in that solitary forest.

8. Although engaged in such a hard task, O king, and although she emaciated herself by age and austerities, yet she thought herself happy.

9. At last when she became very old and physically incapable to move even a single step without being helped by any one, she made up her mind to depart to the other world.

10. Seeing her about to relinquish her body, Narada said to her,—"O sinless one, you cannot attain any blissful region since you have not cleansed yourself by the rite of marriage.

11. O you of great vows, we have heard this in heaven. Great has been your ascetic merit, but you have no claim to blissful regions.

12. Hearing these words of Narada, the old lady went to an assemblage of Rishis and said,—'I shall give him half my penances who will marry me.'

13—14. After she had said these words, the Galava's son, a Rishi known by the name of Shringavat married her on the following condition.—'On this term, O fair one, I shall marry you, viz., that you, shall live with me for only one night!' Having agreed to that term, she gave him her hand.

15. According to the rites, and having duly poured libations on the fire, Galava's son accepted her hand and married her.

16. On that night, she became a handsome young lady robed in celestial dress, decked in celestial ornaments, and smeared with celestial unguents and perfumes.

17—18. Seeing her beauty, Galava's son became very happy and passed one night in her company. In the morning she said to him,—the agreement, O Brahmana, I had made with you, has been satisfied, O best of ascetic! Blessed be you, I shall now leave you.'

19—20. After getting his permission, she once more said,—'He who will, with attention, pass one night in this Tirtha after having satisfied the celestials with oblations of water, shall obtain that merit which one, observing the vow of Brahmacharya for eight and fifty years, reaps.'

21. Having said these words, that chaste lady left for heaven. Her husband the Rishi, became very dispirited by thinking of her beauty.

22. On account of the agreement he had made, he accepted with difficulty half her penances. Casting off his body he soon followed her, O Bharata's chief, drawn by sorrow and her beauty.

23. This is the illustrious history of the old maid that I have narrated. This is the account of her Brahmacharya and her sacred departure for the celestial regions.

24. While there, Valadeva heard of the destruction of Shalya. Having made presents to the Brahmanas there, he bewailed, O destroyer of foes, for Shalya, who had been killed by the Pandavas in battle.

25. Then having come out of Samantapanchaka, Baladeva enquired of the Rishis about the results of the battle at Kurukshetra.

26. Asked by that Yadu's chief about the results of the battle at Kurukshetra, those great ones told him everything as it had taken place.

CHAPTER LIII.

The Rishis said :—

1. "O Rama, this Samantapanchaka is the eternal northern altar of Brahman the Lord of all creatures. There the celestials, the givers of great boons, performed in days of yore a great sacrifice.

2. That foremost of royal sages, viz., the great, intelligent and energetic Kuru, had cultivated this field for many years. Hence it came to be called Kurukshetra (the field of Kuru)!"

Rama said :—

3. "Why did the great Kuru cultivated this field? I desire to have this described by you, ye Rishis of great penances."

The Rishis said :—

4—7. "Formerly, O Rama, Kuru was engaged in perseveringly cultivating this field. Coming down from heaven Shakra asked him the reason, saying,—'Why, O king, art thou assiduously employed (in this task). What is your object, O royal sage, for the accomplishment of which you are tilling the soil?'—Thereupon Kuru replied, saying,—'O performer of a hundred sacrifices, they that will die upon this plain shall proceed to regions of blessedness after being freed of their sins!'—Ridiculing this, the lord Shakra, returned to heaven. Without being at all depressed, the royal sage Kuru, however, continued to till the soil.

8. Shakra repeatedly came to him and repeatedly receiving the same reply went away and ridiculed him. Kuru, however, was not at all depressed.

9. Seeing the king till the soil with great perseverance, Shakra summoned the celestials and informed them of the king's work.

10. Hearing Indra's words, the celestials said to their chief having thousand eyes,—'Stop the royal sage, O Shakra, by granting him a boon, if you can.

11—12. If only by dying there men were to come to heaven, without having performed sacrifices to us, our very existence will be imperilled'—Thus spoken to, Shakra returned to that royal saint and said,—'Do not work any more! Act according to my words!

13. Those men that will die here, having fasted with all their senses awake, and those that will die here in battle, shall, O king, come to heaven.

14—15. They shall enjoy the blessings of heaven, O king!'—Thus addressed, king Kuru! answered] Shakra, saying,—'So be it!'—Taking Kuru's leave, the slayer of Vala, viz., Shakra, then, with a glad heart speedily returned to heaven.

16. Thus, O foremost of Yadu's race, that royal sage had, formerly cultivated this plain and Shakra had promised great merit to those that would give up their lives here.

17. It was so sanctioned by all the foremost celestials headed by Brahman, and by the sacred Rishis, that on Earth there should be no more sacred place than this.

18. Those men, that practise austere penances here, would all, after renouncing their bodies, repair to Brahman's region.

19. Those meritorious men, who would give away their wealth here, would soon have their wealth doubled.

20. Those who will, in expectation of good, live constantly here, will never have to behold the region of Yama.

21. Those kings that will perform great sacrifices here will live as long in heaven as Earth herself will exist.

22—24. The chief of the celestials, viz., Shakra, had himself composed a poem here and sang it. Listen to it, O Valadeva!—The very dust of Kurukshetra, carried by the wind, shall free persons of wicked acts and take them to heaven!—The leading celestials and Brahmanas and kings of the Earth such as Nriga and others, having performed rich sacrifices here, have, after renouncing their bodies, proceeded to heaven.

25. The space between the Tarantuka and the Arantuka and the lakes of Rama and Chamachakra is known as Kurukshetra. Samantapanchaka is called the northern (sacrificial) altar of Brahman, the Lord of all creatures.

26. This place endued with all virtues is auspicious and highly sacred, and is much respected by the celestials. It is for this that Kshatriyas slain in battle here obtain sacred and blissful regions.

27. This was said by Shakra] himself about the glory of Kurukshetra. All that Shakra said was again approved and sanctioned by Brahman, Vishnu, and Maheswara.

CHAPTER LIV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Having visited Kurukshetra and distributed wealth there, the Satwata hero then proceeded, O Janamejaya, to a large and exceedingly beautiful hermitage.

2. That hermitage was overgrown with Madhuka and mango trees, and abounded with Plakshas and Nyagrodhas. And it contained many Vilwas and many excellent jack and Arjuna trees.

3. Seeing that beautiful hermitage Valadeva asked the Rishis as to whom it belonged.

4. Those great ones, O king, said Valadeva,—'Listen in full, O Rama, as to whose asylum this was formerly.

5. Here the god Vishnu formerly practised austere penances. Here he celebrated duly all the eternal sacrifices.

6. Here leading from youth the vow of Brahmacharya, a Brahmani maiden, was crowned with ascetic success. Ultimately possessed of Yoga powers, that ascetic lady went to heaven.

7. The great Shandilya, O king, had a beautiful daughter who was chaste, observant of severe vows self-restrained, and led a life of celibacy.

8. Having practised the hardest of penances such as are incapable of being performed by women, the blessed lady at last went to heaven, adored by the gods and Brahmanas. Having heard these words of the Rishis, Valadeva entered that hermitage.

9. Bidding a farewell to the Rishis, Valadeva performed all the rites and ceremonies of the evening on the side of Himavat and then began to ascend mountain.

10. The powerful Valarama having the emblem of the palmyra on his banner had not ascended far when he saw a sacred and goodly Tirtha and was stricken with wonder at the sight.

11. Seeing the glory of the Saraswati as also the Tirtha called Plakshaprasaravana, Vala next reached another excellent and foremost of Tirthas called Karavapana.

12. Having made many presents there, the powerful Valadeva; bathed in the cool, clear, sacred, and sin-cleansing water (of that Tirtha)

13. Passing one night there with the ascetics and the Brahmanas, Rama then went to the sacred hermitage of the Mitravarunas.

14. From Karavapana he proceeded to that spot on the Yamuna where formerly Indra and Agni and Aryaman had obtained great felicity.

15. Bathing there, that Yadu's chief of pious soul, obtained great happiness. The hero then sat himself down with the Rishis and the Siddhas there for listening to their excellent discourses.

16. There where Rama sat in the midst of that assemblage the adorable Rishi Narada came while rambling.

17. Wearing matted locks and shining like gold, he carried in his hands, O king, a golden staff and a waterpot.

18. Accomplished in song and dance and worshipped of gods and Brahmanas, he had with him a beautiful Vina of sweet notes, made of the tortoise-shell.

19. A creator of quarrels and ever fond of quarrel, the celestial Rishi came where the handsome Rama was resting.

20. Standing up and greatly honoring the celestial Rishi of restricted vows, Rama asked him about all that had befallen the Kurus.

21. Conversant with duty and practices, Narada then, O king, told him everything, as it had occurred, about the dreadful destruction of the Kurus.

22. The Rohini's son then, in sorrowful words, enquired of the Rishi, saying,—'What is the state of the field? How are those kings now that had assembled there?

23. I have heard everything before, O Rishi, but my curiosity is great for hearing it in detail!'

Narada said :—

24. 'Already Bhishma and Drona and the lord of the Sindhus have died! Vikartana's son Karna also has been killed, with his sons.

25—26. Bhurishravas too, O son of Rohini, and the brave chief of the Madras have died! These and many other great heroes that had assembled there, ready to sacrifice this dear life itself for the victory of Duryodhana,—have all fallen!

27. Listen now to me, O Madhava, about those that are yet alive! In the army of Dhritarashtra's son, only three yet survive.

28. They are Kripa and Kritavarman and the powerful son of Drona! These also, O Rama, have from fear fled away on all sides!

29. After Shalya's fall and the flight of Kripa and the others, Duryodhana, in great sorrow had entered the Dwaipayana lake.

30. While resting at the bottom of the lake after solidifying its waters, Duryodhana was approached by the Pandavas with Krishna and cut to the quick by their cruel words.

31. Cut with wordy darts, O Rama, from every side, the powerful and heroic Duryodhana has risen from the lake, armed with his heavy mace.

32. He has come forward for fighting Bhima for the present. Their terrible encounter, O Rama, will take place to-day!

33. If you feel any curiosity, then hasten O Madhava, without delay! Go, if you like and witness that terrible battle between your two disciples!'

Vaishampayana said :—

34. "Hearing Narada, Rama bade a respectful farewell to those great Brahmanas and sent away all those that had accompanied him (in his pilgrimage).

35. He ordered his attendants saying,—'Return ye to Dwaraka!' He then got down from that prince of mountains and that fair hermitage called Plakshaprashravana.

36. Having listened to the discourse of the sages about the great merits of Tirthas, Rama sang this verse in the midst of the Brahmanas.

37. 'Where is such happiness as is obtainable by living by the Saraswati? Where else such merits as those obtainable by living by the Saraswati? Men have departed for heaven, having approached the Saraswati! All should ever remember the Saraswati! Saraswati is the most sacred of all rivers.

38. Saraswati always confers the greates happiness on men! After approaching the Saraswati, men will not have to grieve for their sins either here or hereafter!'

39. Repeatedly looking with joy at the Saraswati, that destroyer of foes then ascended an excellent car to which were yoked beautiful horses.

40. Journeying then on that highly fleet car Valadeva, that best of Yadu's race, desirous of seeing the approaching encounter of his two disciples, arrived on the field."

CHAPTER LV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. "Thus, O Janamejaya, did that terrible battle take place. King Dhritarashtra, in great sorrow, said thus about it.

Dhritarashtra said:—

2. 'Beholding Rama approach that spot, when the mace-fight was about to take place, how, O Sanjaya, did my son fight with Bhima?'

Sanjaya said:—

3. 'Beholding the presence of Rama, your valiant son Duryodhana of mighty arms, desirous of battle, was gladdened.

4. Seeing Vala, king Yudhishthira, O Bharata, stood up and duly and gladly honored him. He gave him a seat and enquired after his welfare.

5—6. Rama then answered Yudhishthira, in these sweet and righteous words, viz.,—I have heard it said by the Rishis, O best of kings, that Kurukshetra is a highly sacred and sin-destroying spot, equal to heaven itself, worshipped of gods and Rishis and great Brahmanas.

7. Those men that renounce their bodies, while engaged in battle on this field, are sure to live in heaven with Shakra himself.

8. I shall, for this, O king, speedily proceed to Samantapanchaka. In the celestial region that spot is known as the northern (sacrificial) altar of Brahman, the Lord of all creatures.

9. He that breathes his last in battle on that eternal and most sacred of spots in the three worlds, will surely obtain heaven.

10. Saying,—So be it.—O king, Kunt 's brave son, the lord Yudhishthira, proceeded towards Samantapanchaka.

11. King Duryodhana also, taking up his gigantic mace, angrily went on foot with the Pandavas.

12. While going thus, armed with mace and clad in armour, the celestials in the sky applauded him, saying,—Excellent, Excellent! Seeing the Kuru king, the Charanas became filled with delight.

13. Surrounded by the Pandavas, your son, the Kuru king, proceeded, like an infuriate elephant.

14. All the points of the compass were filled with the blare of conchs and the sounds of drums and the leonine roars of heroes.

15. Proceeding with face westwards to the appointed spot, with your son (in their midst), they spread themselves on all sides when they reached it.

16. That was an excellent Tirtha on the southern side of the Saraswati. The ground there was not sandy, and was, therefore, selected for the battle.

17. Clad in armour, and armed with his gigantic thick mace Bhima, O king, assumed the form of the mighty Garuda.

18. With head-gear on his head, and wearing a golden armour licking the corners of his mouth, O king, with eyes reddened in wrath, and breathing hard, your son on that field, O king, shone like the golden Sumeru.

19. Taking up his mace, the highly energetic king Duryodhana, looking at Bhimasena, challenged him to the encounter like an elephant challenging a rival elephant.

20. Likewise the brave Bhima, taking up his adamantine mace, challenged the king like a lion challenging a lion.

21. Duryodhana and Bhima, with uplifted maces, shone in that battle like two mountains with tall summits.

22—23. Both of them were highly worked up with anger; both were possessed of awful prowess; in mace encounters both were disciples of Rohini's intelligent son;-both resembled each other in their feat and looked like Maya and Vasava. Ens dued with great strength, both resembled Varuna in achievements.

24. Each resembling Vasudeva, or Rama or Vishravana's son (Ravana), they appeared O king, like Madhu and Kaitabha.

25. They looked like Sunda and Upasunda or Rama and Ravana or Vali and Sugriva.

26—27. Those two scorchers of foes appeared like Kala and Mrityu. They then ran towards each other like two infuriate elephants, elated with pride and maddened with passion in the season of autumn and longing for the companionship of a she-elephant in her season. Each appeared to vomit upon the other the poison of his wrath like two fiery serpents.

28. Those two chastisers of foes looked angrily upon each other. Both were foremost of Bharata's race, endued with great prowess.

29. In mace encounters those two scorchers of foes were invincible like lion. Indeed, O Bharata's chief, inspired with desire of victory, they looked like two infuriate elephants.

30—36. Those heroes were unbearable like two tigers having teeth and claws. They were like two uncrossable and furious oceans, or like two angry Suns risen for consuming everything. Those two powerful car-warriors looked like an Eastern and a Western cloud agitated by the wind, roaring awfully and pouring torrents of rain in the rainy season. Those two great and powerful heroes, both possessed of great effulgence, looked like two Suns risen at the hour of the Universal dissolution. Looking like two enraged tigers or like two roaring masses of clouds, they became glad like two maned lions. Like two angry or two blazing fires, those two great ones appeared like two mountains with tall summits. With lips swelling with rage and looking upon each other, those two heroes, armed with maces, met each other. Both were elated with joy and each regarded the other as a worthy opponent.

37. Duryodhana and Vrikodara then resembled two good horses neighing at each other, or two elephants grunting at each other.

38—39. Those two foremost of men then shone like a couple of Daityas swelling with pride. Then Duryodhana, O king, said these haughty words unto Yudhishthira in the midst of his brothers and of the great Krishna and Rama.

40—41. Protected by the Kaikeyas and the Srinjayas and the great Panchalas, behold ye with all these leading kings, seated together, this encounter that is about to take place between me and Bhima!—Hearing these words of Duryodhana, they did as requested.

42. Then those kings sat down and shone like celestials in heaven.

43. In the midst of that assemblage the mighty-armed and beautiful elder brother of Keshava, O king, as he sat down, was all adored by all around him.

44. In the midst of those kings, Valadeva clad in blue raiment and possessed of a fair complexion shone like the full moon surrounded in the night by thousands of stars.

45. Meanwhile those two heroes, O king, both armed with maces, and both unbearable by foes, stood there, exasperating each other with fierce speeches.

46. Having addressed each other with unpleasant words, those two heroes of Kuru's race stood, looking angrily upon each other, like Shakra and Vritra in fight."

CHAPTER LVI.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "At the outset, O Janamejaya, a dreadful encounter of words took place between the two heroes. With respect to that, king Dhritarashtra, filled with grief, said this :—

2. 'Oh, fie, on man, who has such an end! My son, O sinless one, had been the master of eleven hosts of troops!

3. He had all the kings under his command and had enjoyed the sovereignty of the whole Earth! Alas, he that had been so, was now reduced to a warrior proceeding to battle, on foot, shouldering his mace.

4. My poor son, who had before been the lord of the universe, was now himself without help! Alas, he had, then, to proceed on foot, shouldering his mace! What can it be but Destiny? Alas, O Sanjaya, great was the grief that was felt by my son now! 'Having uttered these words, the king afflicted with great sorrow became silent.

Sanjaya said :—

6. Having a voice deep like a cloud, Duryodhana then roared from joy like a bull. Possessed of great energy, he challenged the son of Pritha to battle.

7. When the great king of the Kurus thus summoned Bhima to the encounter, various awful portents appeared there.

8. Fierce winds began to blow with loud noises at intervals, and a shower of dust fell. All the points of the compass were covered with a thick darkness.

9. Thunder-bolts of loud noise dropped on all sides, causing a great confusion and making the very hair to stand on end. Hundreds of meteors fell, with a loud noise from the sky.

10. Rahu devoured the Sun most untimely, O king! The Earth with her forest and trees shook violently.

11. Hot winds blew, carrying showers of hard pebbles along the ground. The summits of mountains dropped down on the Earth's surface.

12. Various Animals were seen to run in various directions. Terrible and fierce jackals, with firing mouths, yelled piteously.

13. Loud and terrific hair-stirring sounds were heard on every side, the four quarters seemed to be on fire, and many animals of ill omen became visible.

14. The water in the wells on all sides swelled up. Loud sounds came from every side without, O king, none to utter them being visible.

15. Beholding these and other evil omens Vrikodara said to his eldest brother, king Yudhishthira :—

16—17. This wicked Suyodhana is not able to defeat me in battle. I shall to-day vomit that vie, which I have been cherishing for a long time in the recesses of my heart, upon this lord of the Kurus like Arjuna throwing fire upon the forest of Khandava! To-day, O son of Pandu, I shall take out the dart that lies sticking to thy heart!

18. Killing with my mace this sinful wretch of Kuru's race, I shall to-day, place around your neck the garland of Fame!

19. Killing this sinful person with my mace on the field of battle, I shall to-day, with this very mace of mine, break his body into a hundred pieces!

20. He shall not have again to enter the city of Hastinapur!

21—23. The setting of serpents at us while we were sleeping, the giving of venom to us while we were eating, the casting of our body into the water at Pramanakoti, the attempt to burn us at the house of lac, the insult given to us at the assembly, the robbing us of all our wealth, the whole year of our living in concealment, our exile into the forest, O sinless one, of all these misfortunes, O best of Bharata's race, I shall terminate to-day, O Bharata's chief! Killing this wretch, I shall, in one single day, pay off all the debts I owe him.

24. To-day the lease of life, of this wicked son of Dhritarashtra, of impure soul, has reached its end, O Bharata's chief. After this day he shall not again look at his father and mother!

25. To-day, O king, the happiness of this wicked king of the Kurus has terminated. After this day, O king, he shall not again see a beautiful damsel!

26. To-day this disgrace of Shantanu's race shall sleep on the naked Earth, his life, his prosperity, and his kingdom gone!

27. Hearing of the fall of his son to-day, king Dhritarashtra also shall recollect all those evil acts that were the creations of Shakuni!'

28. Having said these words, O foremost of kings, the highly energetic, Vrikodara armed with mace, stood for fight, like Shakra challenging the Asura Vritra.

29—30. Seeing Duryodhana also standing with uplifted mace like mount Kailasa, Bhimasena, worked up with ire, once more addressed him, saying,—'Remember that misdeed of yourself and king Dhritarashtra that occurred at Varnavata!

31. Remember the ill-treatment of Draupadi, while in her season, in the midst of the assembly! Remember how yourself and Suvala's son deprived the king at dice.

32. Remember the great misfortune suffered by us, for you, in the forest, as also in Virata's city, as if we had once more entered the womb! I shall avenge them all to-day. By good luck, I see you to-day!

33. It is for you that foremost of car-warriors, viz., the highly powerful son of Ganga, struck down by Yajnasena's son, sleeps on a bed of arrows.

34. Drona also has been killed, and Karna, and Shalya of great prowess! Suvala's son Shakuni too, that root of all this evil has been killed!

35. The wretched Pratikamin, who had seized Draupadi by her hair, has been killed! All your brave brothers also, who fought with great valour, have been killed!

36. These and many other kings have been killed through your fault! I shall kill you to-day with my mace! There is not the least doubt about it!'

37—38. While Vrikodara, O king, was uttering these words in a loud voice, your fearless son answered him, saying,—'What is the use of braging? Fight me, O Vrikodara! O wretch, to-day I shall satiate your desire of fight!

39. Mean as you are, know that Duryodhana is not capable, like an ordinary person, of being terrified by a person like you!

40. For a long time have I cherished this desire! For a long time I have been cherishing this desire! By good fortune the gods have at last brought it about!

41—42. What is the use of long talks and idle brag, O wicked man! Carry out these words of yours into acts! Do not delay at all!—Hearing these words of his, the Somakas and the other kings that were present there, all praised them highly.

43. Lauded by all, Duryodha's hair stood erect with joy, and he made up his mind for fight.

44. The kings present once again cheered your wrathful son with claps like persons exciting a mad elephant to a fight.

45. Then uplifting his mace, the great

Vrikodara, the son of Pandu, rushed furiously at your high-souled son.

46. The elephants present there grunted aloud and the horses neighed repeatedly. The weapons of the Pandavas, who were eager for victory, shone resplendent with their own luster.

CHAPTER LVII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Seeing Bhimasena in that state, Duryodhana rushed furiously against him uttering a loud roar.

2. They met each other like two bulls encountering each other with their horns. The strokes of their maces produced loud sounds like those of thunder-bolts.

3. Each seeking victory, the battle that took place between them was terrible, making the hair stand erect, like that between Indra and Pralada.

4. All their limbs covered with blood, the two great and energetic warriors both armed with maces, looked like two Kinshukas decked with flowers.

5. During the onset of that great and awful encounter, the sky looked beautiful as if it swarmed with fire-flies.

6. After that fierce and terrible battle had lasted for some time, both of them were exhausted.

7. Having rested for sometime those two destroyers of foes, taking up their handsome maces, once again began to prevent each other's attacks.

8. Indeed, when those two highly energetic warriors, those two foremost of men, both possessed of great strength, once more met each other after having rested a little, they looked like two infuriate elephants attacking each other for obtaining an elephantess in season.

9. Seeing those two heroes, both armed with maces and equalling each other in energy, the gods and Gandharvas and men were filled with wonder.

10. Beholding Duryodhana and Vrikodara both armed with mace, all creatures became doubtful as to who amongst them would come off victorious.

11. Rushing each other and desiring to take advantage of each other's weakness, those two great cousins waited each watching the other.

12. People, O king, saw each armed with his uplifted mace, that was heavy, dreadful and killing, and that resembled the bludgeon of Yama, or the thunder-bolt of Indra.

13. While Bhimasena whirled his weapon, it produced a loud and dreadful sound.

14. Seeing his foe, the son of Pandu, thus whirling his mace, the impetuous Duryodhana was amazed.

15. Indeed, the heroic Vrikodara, O Bharata, as he moved about in various courses, shone highly beautiful.

16. Both bent upon carefully protecting themselves, as they approached, they repeatedly wounded each other like two cats, fighting for a piece of meat.

17. Bhimasena performed various kinds of evolutions. He moved about in beautiful circles, advanced, and receded.

18. He dealt blows and warded off those of his opponent, with wonderful dexterity. He took up various kinds of offensive and defensive position. He made attacks and warded off those of his opponent. He ran at his enemy now turning to the right and now to the left.

19. He advanced straight against the foe. He made various tricks for drawing his foe. He stood immoveable, bent upon attacking his enemy as soon as the latter would expose himself to attack. He went round his foe, and prevented his foe from circumambulating him. He avoided the attacks of his enemy by moving away in bent postures or jumping up.

20. Facing his enemy he struck, or dealt back-thrusts while moving away from him. Both experts in mace-fighting, Bhima and Duryodhana thus moved about and fought, and struck each other.

21. Those two leading Kuru's heroes fared thus, each avoiding the other's attacks. Indeed, those two great warriors thus moved about in circles and seemed to play with each other.

22—23. Displaying in that encounter their skill in battle, those two destroyers of foes sometimes suddenly attacked each other with their weapons, like two elephants attacking each other with their tusks. Bathed in blood, they looked very beautiful, O king, on the field.

24. Thus took place that dreadful battle before the very eyes of a large multitude, towards the close of the day, like the battle between Vritra and Vasava. Armed with maces, both began to move about in circles.

25. Duryodhana, O king, adopted the right mandala, while Bhimasena adopted the left mandala.

26. While Bhima was thus moving about in circles on the field of battle, Duryodhana, O king, suddenly struck him a fierce blow on one of his flanks.

27. Struck by your son, Bhima began to whirl his heavy mace for returning the same.

28. People, O king, saw that mace of Bhimasena look as terrible as Indra's thunder-bolt or Yama's rod.

29. Seeing Bhima whirl his mace, your son, took up his own terrible weapon, and struck him again.

30. A loud sound, O Bharata, was caused by the fall of your son's mace. So quick was that fall that it caused a flame of fire in the sky.

31. Coursing in circles, adopting each motion at the proper time, the energetic Suyodhana, once more seemed to prevail over Bhima.

32. Meanwhile the massive mace of Bhimasena, whirled with his entire force, produced a tremendous sound with valleys of smoke, and sparks and flames of fire.

33. Seeing Bhimasena whirling his mace, Suyodhana also whirled his heavy and adamantine mace, and appeared highly beautiful.

34. Marking the vehemence of the wind, caused by the whirl of Duryodhana's mace, the Pandus and the Somakas were stricken with great fear.

35—36.—Meanwhile showing on every side their skill in battle those two chastisers of foes continued to strike each other with their maces, like two elephants stricking each other with their tusks. Both of them, O king, covered with blood, shone highly beautiful.

37. Thus that dreadful battle went on before the very eyes of thousands of spectators at the close of day, like the fierce battle that took place between Vritra and Vasava.

38. Seeing Bhima firmly stationed on the field, your powerful son, moving about, rushed towards that son of Kunti.

39. Worked up with wrath Bhima struck the mace, endued with great impetuousity and adorned with gold, of the angry Duryodhana.

40. That clash of the two maces produced a loud sound with sparks of fire, which resembled the clash of two thunder-bolts from opposite directions.

41. Discharged by Bhimasena, his impetuous mace, as it dropped down, shook the very Earth.

42. The Kuru prince could not see his own mace thus baffled in that attack. He was enraged like an infuriate elephant at the sight of a rival elephant.

43. Adopting the left mandala, O king, and whirling his mace, Suyodhana, then struck the son of Kunti on the head with his terrible weapon.

44. Thus struck by your son, Bhima, the son of Pandu, did not even quake, O king, and the sight filled all present with wonder.

45. That wonderful patience, O king, of Bhimasena, who did not move an inch, though struck so violently, was praised by all the combatants present there.

46. Then Bhima hurled at Duryodhana his own heavy and shining mace adorned with gold.

47. The powerful and fearless Duryodhana prevented that blow by his activity. Seeing this the spectators were filled with great wonder.

48. That mace, hurled by Bhima, O king, produced a loud sound like that of the thunder-bolt, and shook the very Earth.

49. Adopting the manœver called Kaushika, and jumping up again and again, Duryodhana, properly marking the fall of Bhima's mace, made the latter useless.

50. Baffling Bhimasena thus, the highly powerful Kuru king, at last in anger struck the former in the chest.

51. Struck very forcibly by your son in that dreadful battle, Bhimasena was stupefied, and for a time knew not what to do.

52. At that time, O king, the Somakas and the Pandavas were greatly disappointed and dispirited.

53. Worked up with anger at that blow, Bhima then rushed at your son like an elephant rushing against an elephant.

54. With uplifted mace, Bhima rushed furiously at Duryodhana like a lion rushing against a wild elephant.

55. Approaching the Kuru king, the son of Pandu, O king, an expert in the use of the mace, began to whirl his weapon, aiming at your son.

56. Bhimasena then struck Duryodhana on one of his sides. Stupefied at that blow, the latter dropped down on the Earth, supporting himself on his knees.

57. When that Kuru's hero fell upon his knees, a loud cry arose from among the Srinjayas, O king!

58. Hearing that cry of the Srinjayas, O foremost of men, your son was worked up with rage.

59. Rising up, the mighty-armed hero began to breathe like a powerful snake, and seemed to burn Bhimasena by looking upon him.

60. That best of the line of Bharata then rushed at Bhimasena, as if he would crush the head of his opponent in that battle.

61. The great and highly powerful Duryodhana, then struck the high-souled Bhimasena on the forehead. The latter, however, stirred not an inch but stood fixed like a mountain.

62. Thus struck in that battle, the son of Pritha, O king, looked beautiful, as he bled profusely, like an elephant with temporal juice trickling down its temples.

63. Then, taking up his hero-killing mace made of iron and producing a sound loud as that of the thunder-bolt, the elder brother of Dhananjaya struck his opponent with great force.

64. Struck by Bhimasena, your son dropped down, his bodying trembling all over, like a gigantic Shala in the forest, decked with flowers, uprooted by a tempest.

65. See your son laid on the Earth, the Pandavas became highly glad and uttered loud cries.

66. Regaining his consciousness your son then rose, like an elephant from a lake.

66. That angry king and great car-warrior then, moving about with great skill, struck Bhimasena who was before him. Thereat, the son of Pandu, with weakened limbs, dropped down on the Earth.

67. Having by his power struck down Bhimasena on the ground, the Kuru prince sent up a leonine roar. By the fall of his mace, whose vehemence was like that of the thunder, he had, broken Bhima's coat-of-mail.

68. A loud uproar was then heard in the sky made by the celestials and the Apsaras. A shower of flowers of sweet fragrance, rained by the celestials, poured in.

69. Seeing Bhima prostrated on the Earth, and seeing his coat-of-mail cut open, a great fear possessed the hearts of our foes.

70. Regaining his senses in a moment, and wiping his face which had been covered with blood, and gathering patience, Vrikodara stood up, with rolling eyes."

CHAPTER LVIII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1—2. "Seeing that fight thus ranging between those two greatest heroes of Kuru's race, Arjuna said to Vasudeva,—'Who, in your opinion, is superior between these two? What is their respective merit. Tell me this, O Janarddana !'—

Vashudeva said :—

3. 'The instruction received by them has been equal. Bhima, however, is possessed of greater strength while Duryodhana is possessed of greater skill and has worked harder.

4. If he were to fight fairly, Bhimasena will never succeed in gaining victory. If, however, he fights unfairly, he will surely be able to kill Duryodhana.

5. The Asuras were defeated by the gods deceptively. We have heard this. Virochana was defeated by Shakra with the aid of deception.

6. The destroyer of Vala deprived Vritra his energy by an act of deception. Therefore, let Bhimasena put forth his prowess, by means of deception!

7. At the time of the gambling, O Dhananjaya, Bhima promised to break the thighs of Suyodhana with his mace in battle.

8. Let this destroyer of foes, therefore, fulfil his vow. Let him, deceiptively kill the Kuru king who is made of deception!

9. If depending upon his might alone, Bhima were to fight fairly, king Yudhishthira will meet with great peril.

10. I tell you again, O son of Pandu, listen to me! It is through the fault of king Yudhishthira alone that danger has once more befallen us.

11. Having performed great feats by the destruction of Bhishma and the other Kurus, the king had gained victory and glory, and had almost terminated the hostilities.

12—13. Having thus gained the victory, he placed himself once more in a doubtful and perilous situation. This has been a great mistake on the part of Yudhishthira, O Pandava, since he has made the result of the battle depend upon the victory or the defeat of only one warrior! Suyodhana is an expert, he is a hero; he is of firm determination.

14. We have all heard the old verse utered by Ushanas. Hear I recite it to you with its true sense and meaning!

15. The remnant of a hostile force routed and flying away for life that rally and come back to the fight, should always be feared, for they are of fixed determination and singleness of purpose!

16. Shakra himself, O Dhananjaya, cannot stand before them who rush in fury, giving up all hopes of life.

17. This Suyodhana has been routed and fled. All his troops had been slain. He had entered the lake. He had been defeated, and, therefore, he had wished to retire into forest, having given up all hope of retaining his kingdom. What wise man is there, that would challenge such a person to a single-combat?

18. I do not know whether Duryodhana will regain the kingdom that had already become ours! For full thirteen years he practised with the mace with great firmness. Even now, for killing Bhimasena, he jumps up and down!

19—20. If the mighty-armed Bhima do not kill him unfairly, the son of Dhritarashtra will surely retain kingdom!"—Having heard those words of the great Keshava, Dhananjaya struck his own left thigh before the gaze of Bhimasena.

21. Understanding that sign, Bhima began to move about with his uplifted mace, making many kinds of manœveres.

22. Sometimes adopting the right mandala, sometimes the left mandala, and sometimes Gomutraka, the son of Pandu began to move about, O king, stupefying his foe.

23. Likewise your son, O king, who was an adept in the mace fight, moved about beautifully and with great activity, for killing Bhimasena.

24. Whirling their terrible maces which were smeared with sandal-paste and other unguents, the two heroes, desirous of terminating their hostilities, moved about in that battle like two angry Yamas.

25. Desirous of killing each other, those two best of men, possessed of great heroism, fought like two Gaduras desirous of catching the same snake.

26. While the king and Bhima moved about in beautiful circles, their maces clashed, which created sparks of fire.

27. Those two heroic and powerful warriors struck each other equally in that battle. They then resembled, O king, two oceans agitated by the tempest.

28. Striking each other equally like two infuriate elephants, their clashing maces produced sounds like peals of thunder.

29. During the onset of that dreadful battle, both those chastisers of foes, while fighting became exhausted.

30. Having rested for a while, those two destroyers of foes, filled with rage and uplifting their maces, once more began to fight with each other.

31. When, O king, by the repeated falls of their maces, they wounded each other, the battle became exceedingly dreadful and perfectly unrestrained.

32. Rushing at each other in that fight, those two heroes, having eyes like those of bulls and gifted with great activity, struck each other fiercely like two buffaloes in the mire.

33. All their limbs wounded and bruised, and bathed in blood from head to foot, they looked like a couple of Kinshukas on the breast of Himavat.

34. During the onset of the fight, when Vrikodara seemed to give Duryodhana an opportunity, the latter, smiling a little, advanced forward.

35. Well-skilled in battle, the powerful Vrikodara, seeing his adversary come up, suddenly hurled his mace at him.

36. Seeing the mace thrown at him, your son, O king, moved away from that place at which the weapon fell down baffled

37. Having warded off that blow, your son, that foremost one of Kuru's race, quickly struck Bhimasena with his weapon.

38. A large quantity of blood being, drawn by that blow, as also owing to its violence, Bhimasena became stupefied.

39 Duryodhana, however, could not perceive that Pandu's son was so afflicted at that moment. Though deeply afflicted, Bhima kept himself, summoning all his patience.

40. Duryodhana, therefore, thought that he was all right and ready to return the blow. It was, therefore, that your son did not then strike him again.

41. Having taken rest for a little while, the brave Bhimasena rushed furiously, O king, at Duryodhana who was standing near.

42—43. Seeing the energetic Bhimasena, filled with rage and rushing towards him your high-souled son, O Bharata's chief, desiring to thwart his blow, thought of showing the manœvre called Avasthana. He, therefore, desired to jump upwards, O king, for beguiling Vrikodara.

44—45. Bhimasena fully understood the object of his opponent. Rushing at him, with a loud leonine roar, he fiercely dropped his mace at the thighs of the Kuru king, as the latter had jumped up for making the first aim useless.

46. That mace, strong like thunder and hurled by Bhima broke the two handsome thighs of Duryodhana.

47. That foremost of men, viz., your son, after his thighs had been broken by Bhimasena, fell down, resounding the Earth.

48. Fierce winds began to blow, with loud sounds. Showers of dust dropped. The Earth, with her trees and mountains, began to tremble.

49. Upon the fall of that hero who was the head of all kings, fierce and fiery winds blew with a loud noise and with thunder falling frequently. When that lord of Earth fell, large meteors dropped down from the welkin.

50. Bloody and dusty showers, fell, O Bharata! These were poured by Indra, upon the fall of your son.

51. A loud noise was heard, O Bharata's chief, in the sky, caused by the Yakshas, Rakshasas and the Pishachas.

52. At that terrible sound thousands of beasts and birds began to yell hideously on every side.

53. Those horses, elephants and men, forming the remnant of the Pandava's army, uttered loud cries when your son fell. Loud blare of conchs and the peal of drums and cymbals were heard.

54. A terrific noise seemed to come from the very bowels of the earth. Upon the fall of your son, O king, headless beings of dreadful appearance, possessed of many legs and many arms, and striking terror to all creatures, began to dance and cover the earth on all sides.

55. Warriors, O king, who stood with standards or weapons in their arms, began to tremble, O king, when your son fell.

56. Lakes and wells, O best of kings, vomited forth blood. Swift coursing rivers flowed in opposite directions.

57. Women seemed to look like men, and men like women, when your son Duryodhana fell.

58. Seeing those wonderful portents, the Panchalas and the Pandavas, O Bharata's chief, were filled with anxiety.

59. The gods and the Gandharvas went away to their wished-for regions, talking and discoursing on that wonderful battle between your sons.

60. Similarly the Siddhas and the quick-coursing Charanas went to those places from which they had come, praising these two best of men.

CHAPTER LIX.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Seeing Duryodhana struck down on Earth like a gigantic Shala uprooted by the storm, the Pandavas were filled with delight. The Somakas also saw, with their hair standing erect, the Kuru king felled upon the Earth, like an infuriate elephant felled by a lion.

3—5. Having struck Duryodhana down the brave Bhimasena, approaching the Kuru chief, addressed him, saying,—O wretch, formerly laughing at Draupadi who had no cloth in the midst of the assembly, you, O fool, called us Cows. Bear now the consequences of that insult. Saying so, he struck the head of his fallen foe, with his left foot. Indeed, he struck the head of that best of kings with his foot.

6—9. With eyes reddened in wrath, Bhimasena, that grinder of hostile armies, once more said these words. 'Listen to them, O king, we will now dance and call them Cows!—who formerly insulted us by calling us so. We have no deceipt, no fire, no match at dice, no deception! Depending upon the strength of our own arms we resist and check our foes!—Having brought those fierce hostilities to a close, Vrikodara once more slowly and laughingly said these words unto Yudhisthira and Keshava and the Shrinjayas and Dhananjaya and the two sons of Madri.

10. Let them who had dragged Draupadi, while she was in her period, into the assembly, and had made her nacked there, behold those Dhartarashtras slain in battle by the Pandavas through the ascetic penances of Yajnasena's daughter.

11—12. Those wicked sons of king Dhritarashtra who had called us Sessame seeds without kernel, have all been killed by us with their relatives and followers! It is a matter of no consequence whether we go to heaven or hell!—Once more, uplifting the mace that was on his shoulders he struck with his left, foot the head of the king who was lying on Earth, and addressing the deceitful Duryodhana said,

13. Seeing the foot of the rejoicing but mean Bhimasena placed upon the head of that foremost one of Kuru's race, many of the leading warriors among the Somaka did not a all approve of it.

14—15. After having struck down your son, while Vrikodara was thus vaunting and dancing madly, king Yudhisthira said to him,—'You have wreaked your vengeance (on Duryodhana) and gained your ends by means fair or foul! Cease now, O Bhima.

16. Do not crush his head with your foot! Do not act sinfully! Duryodhana is a king! He is, again, your kinsman! He is fallen! Your conduct, O sinless one, is not becoming.

17. Duryodhana was the lord of eleven Akshauhinis of troops. He was the king of the Kurus! Do not, O Bhima, strike a king and a kinsman with your foot!

18. His relatives are killed! His friends and counsellors are all slain! His troops have been destroyed! He has been struck down in battle! He is to be pitied in every respect! He deserves not to be insulted, for remember that he is a king!

19. He is ruined! His friends and kinsmen have been killed! His brothers have been slain! His sons too have been killed! His funeral cake has been taken away! He is our brother! Your conduct towards him is not proper!

20—22. Bhimasena is a righteous man! People used to say this before of thee! Why then, O Bhimasena, do you insult the king in this way?' Saying this to Bhimasena, Yudhishthira, with voice suppressed with tears, and afflicted with sorrow approached Duryodhana, and said to him, 'O brother, you should not give way to anger nor grieve for yourself! Forsooth, you suffer the dreadful consequences of your own former acts!

23. Forsooth, this sad and woful result had been ordained by the Creator himself, viz., that we should harm you and you should injure us, O foremost one of Kuru's race!

24. Through thy own fault, avarice and pride and folly this great calamity has befallen you, O Bharata!

25. Having brought about the death of your companions and brothers and sires and sons and grandsons and others you now meet with your own death!

26. For your folly your brothers, mighty car-warriors all, and your kinsmen, have been killed by us! I think all this is the work of irresistible Destiny!

27. You are not to be pitied! On the other hand, your death, O sinless one, is enviable! It is we that are objects of pity, O Kaurava! We shall have to carry on a miserable existence, shorn of all our dear friends and kinsmen!

28. Alas, how shall I see the widows, of my brothers and sons and grandsons, all overwhelmed with grief and stricken down with sorrow.

29. You are, O king, departing from this world! You will surely go to heaven! We are, on the other hand, creatures of hell, and shall continue to suffer the bitterest grief!

30. The wives of Dhritarashtra's sons and grandsons striken with grief will, forsooth, curse us all!'

31. Saying these words, Dharma's son Yudhishthira, deeply afflicted with grief, began to sigh heavily and bewail."

CHAPTER LX.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Seeing the (Kuru) king struck down unfairly, what, O charioteer, did the powerful Valadeva, that Madhu's chief, say.

2. "Tell me, O Sanjaya, what Rohini's son, well-skilled in mace encounters and well acquainted with all its rules did on that occasion!"

Sanjaya said :—

3. "Seeing your son struck at the thighs, the powerful Rama, that best of smiters, became highly angry.

4. Raising his arms up, the hero having the plough for his weapon, sorrowfully said in the midst of those kings,—'Oh, fie on Bhima, fie on Bhima.

5. Oh, fie, that in such a fair fight a blow has been inflicted below the navel! Never before has such an act, as has been done by Vrikodara, been seen in an encounter with the mace!

6. No limb below the navel should be struck. This is the rule laid down in treatises! This Bhima, however, is an ignorant wretch, unacquainted with the code of war! He, therefore, acteth as he likes.'

7. Uttering these words, Rama became very angry. The powerful Valadeva then, uplifting his plough, rushed towards Bhimasena.

8. The great warrior with uplifted arms appeared like the huge mountain of Kailasa variegated with various kinds of metals.

9. The powerful Keshava, however, ever bending with humility, caught the rushing Rama, with his massive and well-formed arms.

10. Those two Yadu heroes, the one dark in complexion and the other fair, shone exceedingly beautiful at that moment, like the Sun and the Moon, O king, on the evening sky.

11. For pacifying the angry Rama, Keshava addressed him, saying,—'There aresix sorts of advancement that a person may seek, viz., one's own advancement, the advancement of one's friends, the advancement of one's friends' friends, the destruction of one' enemy, the destruction of one's enemy's friends, and the destruction of one's enemy's friends' friends.

12. When misfortunes befall one's own self or one's friends, it is a sign that one's fall is near, and, therefore, one should at such times seek for the remedy.

13. The Pandavas are our natural friends. They are the children of our own father's sister! They had been greatly assailed by their enemies.

14. The fulfilment of one's promise is one's duty. Formerly Bhima had promised in the midst of the assembly that he would in great battle break with his mace the thighs of Duryodhana.

15. The great Rishi Maitreya also had formerly imprecated Duryodhana, saying, Bhima will, with his mace, break you thighs.

16. For all this, I do not see any fault in Bhima! Do not yield to anger, O slayer of Pralamva! Our relationship with the Pandavas is based on birth, blood and love.

17—18. On their advancement depends our own. Do not, therefore, give way to anger, O foremost of men!'—Hearing these words of Vasudeva the wielder of the plough, who was well read in the Ethical lore, said, 'Morality is always followed by the good. 'Morality is always followed by two motives, viz., the desire for Profit cherished by those that follow it, or the desire for Pleasure.

19. Whoever, without making distinction between Morality and Profit, or Morality and Pleasure, or Pleasure and Profit, follows all three, viz., Morality, Profit and Pleasure, always succeeds in obtaining great happiness.

20—21. It is because Bhimasena, has deviated from morality this harmony, of which I have spoken, has been disturbed, inspite, O Govinda, of all your aruments to me!' Krishna replied, saying,—'You are always described as shorn of wrath, and devoted to righteousness! Pacify yourself, therefore, and do not yield to wrath!

22. Know that the Kali age is at hand. Remember also the promise made by the son of Pandu! Let, therefore, the son of Pandu be regarded to have requited the debt he owed to his enemy and to have carried out his promise."

Sanjaya Continued :—

23—24. "Hearing this fallacious argument from Keshava, O king, Rama failed to remove his anger and become cheerful. He then said in that assembly, 'having unfairly killed the righteous king Suyodhana, the son of Pandu shall be known in the world as a wily warrior!

25. The righteous Duryodhana, on the other hand, shall acquire eternal blessedness! Dhritarashtra's royal son, who has been struck down, is a fair warrior!

26—27. Having made all possible arrangements for the Sacrifice of battle, and having performed the initiatory rites on the field, and lastly, having poured his life as a libation upon the fire of foes, Duryodhana has duly completed his Sacrifice by the final ablutions of glory!" Having said these words, the brave son of Rohini, looking like a white cloud, got upon his chariot and went towards Dwaraka.

28. The Panchalas, the Vrishnis and the Pandavas, O king, became rather dispirited after Rama had started for Dwaravati.

29. Then approaching Yudhishthira, who was exceedingly melancholy and anxious, and who hung down his head and knew not what to do in the great affliction of his heart, Vasudeva, said to him these words.

Vasudeva said :—

30—31. 'O Yudhishthira why do you allow such a wrong act, since you suffer the head of the insensible and fallen Duryodhana whose relatives and friends have all been killed to be thus struck by Bhima with his foot? Conversant as thou art with the rules of Ethics, why do you, O king, look at this act with indifference?'

Yudishthira answered :—

32. 'This act, O Krishna, of Vrikodara's angrily touching the head of the king with his foot, is not pleasant to me, nor am I glad at this extermination of my race!

33. By guile were we always imposed on by the sons of Dhritarashtra! They spoke many harsh words to us. We were again exiled into the forest by them.

34. On account of all those acts great grief exists in Bhimasena's heart! Thinking of all this, O hero of the Vrishnis's race, I looked on with indifference!

35. Having killed the covetous, foolish and passionate Dhuryodhana, let the son of Pandu satisfy his desire, be it by means fair or foul.

Sanjaya continued :—

36—37. 'After Yudhishthira had said this, Vasudeva, said with difficulty,—Let it be so! After Vasudeva had been addressed in those words by Yudhishthira, the former, who, always wished what was pleasant to, and beneficial for, Bhima, insooth, approved all those acts that Bhima had done in battle.

38. Having struck down your son in battle, the wrathful Bhimasena, his heart overflowing with joy, stood with joined hands before Yudhishthira and saluted him duly.

39—40. With eyes expanded in joy and proud of the victory he had acquired, the energetic Vrikodara, O king, said to his eldest brother, saying,—'The Earth belongs to-day to you, O king, without quarrels to disturb her and with all her thorns gone! Govern her, O king, and observe the duties of your order.

41. He, who was the root of these hostilities, and who fomented them by means of his wilyness, that wretched being, lies struck down, on the bare ground, O lord of Earth.

42. All those wretches led by Dusshasana, who used to utter cruel words, as also those other enemies of yours, viz., the son of Radha, and Shakuni, have been killed.

43. Filled with all sorts of gems, the Earth, with her forests and mountains, O king, once more approaches you who have no foes alive.'

Yudhishthira said :—

44. 'Hostilities have been closed! King Suyodhana has been struck down! The Earth has been conquered (by us), under the advice of Krishna.

45. By good luck, you had paid off your debt to your mother and to your wrath! By good luck, you have been victorious, O invincible hero, and by good luck, your enemy has been killed.'

CHAPTER LXI.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Seeing Duryodhana struck down in battle by Bhimasena, what, O Sanjaya did the Pandavas and the Sanjayas do?"

Sanjaya said :—

2—4. "Seeing Duryodhana killed by Bhimasena in battle, O king, like a wild elephant slain by a lion the Pandavas with Krishna were filled with joy upon the fall of the Kuru king. The Panchalas and the Shrinjayas also waved their upper garments (in the air) and sent up leonine roars. Even the Earth could not bear those rejoicing warriors.

5. Some stretched their bows; others drew their bowstrings. Some blew their huge conchs; others beat their drums.

6.—7. Some sported and jumped about others laughed aloud. Many heroes repeatedly said these words to Bhimasena—'Highly difficult and great has been the feat that you have performed to-day in battle, by having struck down the Kuru king, himself a great warrior, with your mace!

8. This slaughter of your enemy is considered like that of Vritra by Indra himself!

9. Who else, but you, O Vrikodara, could kill the heroic Duryodhana while moving about in various ways and performing various manœvres.

10. You have brought these hostilities, to a close which none could do! This feat of yours is incapable of being done by any other warrior!

11. By good luck, you have, O hero, like an infuriate elephant, crushed with your foot the head of Duryodhana on the field of battle!

12. By good luck, O sinless one, you have quaffed the blood of Dushasana, like a lion quaffing the blood of a buffalo!

13. By good luck, you have by your own energy, placed your foot on the head of all those that had injured the just king Yudhisthira!

14. For your having defeated the foes and having slain Duryodhana, by good luck, O Bhima, your fame has extended over the whole world.

15. Bards and eulogists praised Shakra after the fall of Vritra as we are now applauding you, O Bharata, after the fall of your foes.

16. Know O Bharata, that the joy we felt upon the fall of Duryodhana has not yet decreased the least.' The assembled eulogists on that occasion addressed to Bhimasena these words.

17—18. Whilst, viz., the Panchalas and the Pandavas, all filled with joy were thus expressing themselves, the slayer of Madhu addressed them, saying,—'Ye kings, it is not becoming to kill a slain foe with such cruel words repeatedly. This wicked man has already been slain.

19—20. This sinful, shameless, and covetous wretch, surrounded by sinful counsellors and ever malignant of the advice of wise friends, encountered his death even then when he refused, though repeatedly urged to the contrary by Vidura, Drona, Kripa and Sanjaya, to give to the sons of Pandu their paternal share in the kingdom which they had begged of him.

21. This wretch is not to be regarded either as a friend or an enemy! What use in using harsh words to him who has now become a piece of wood.

22—23. Get your cars quickly, ye kings, for we should leave this place! By good luck, this sinful wretch has been killed with his counsellors and kinsmen and friends.' Thus chastised by Krishna, king Duryodhana, O king, gave way to wrath and endeavoured to rise.

24. Sitting on his haunches and supporting himself on his two arms, he contracted his eye-brows and looked angrily at Vasudeva.

25. Duryodhana whose body was half raised, looked like a poisonous snake, O Bharata, shorn of its tail.

26—28. Forgetting his poignant and nbearable pains, Duryodhana began to assail Vasudeva with keen and bitter words.—'O son of Kansa's slave, it seems you have no shame, for you have forgotten that I have been struck down most unfairly, according to the rules of mace-fighting? It was you who unfairly caused this act by reminding Bhima about the breaking of my thighs. Do you think I did not mark it when Arjuna (under your advice hinted to it to Bhima?

29. Having caused the destruction of thousands of kings, who always fought fairly through various kinds of unfair means, do you not feel any shame or abhorence for those acts?

30. Having daily bought about a great carnage of heroic warriors, you at last caused the grandshire to be slain by placing Shikhandin to the front.

31. Having again caused an elephant of the same name of Ashwathama to be killed, O ye of vicious principle, you made the preceptor lay aside his weapons. Do you think that this is not known to me?

32. While again that brave hero was about to be killed by this cruel Dhristadyumna, you did not dissuade the latter!

33. The dart that had been begged (of Shakra as a boon) by Karna for the destruction of Arjuna, was baffled by you through Ghatotkach! Who is there that is more sinful than you?

34. Likewise powerful Bhurishravas, with one of his arms cut off and while observing the Praya vow, was caused to be slain by you through the great Satyaki.

35. Karna had done a great feat for defeating Partha. You frustrated the object of Ashwasena, the son of that prince of snakes (viz., Takshaka).

36. When again the wheel of Karna's car sank in mire and Karna was assisted with calamity and almost defeated on that account, and—when, he became anxious to free his wheel,—you caused that Karna to be then slain!

37. If he had fought me and Karna and Bhisma and Drona by fair means, victory then, forsooth, would never had been yours.

38. By adopting the most wily and unfair means you have caused the death of many kings observant of the duties of their order and of ourselves as well.'

Vasudeva said :—

39. 'You, O son of Gandhari, have been killed with your brothers, sons, kinsmen, friends, and followers, for the sinful path you followed.

40. Through your deeds those two heroes, viz., Bhishma and Drona, have been killed. Karna has been slain for having followed your conduct!

41. Requested by me, O fool, you did not, from avarice, give the Pandavas their paternal share, under the advice of Shakuni.

42. You gave poison to Bhimasena! You, O wicked man, tried to burn all the Pandavas with their mother at the palace of lac!

43. While gambling, you insulted the daughter of Yajnasena, while in her season, in the midst of the assembly! Shameless as you are, you should have been killed there and then!

44. Through Suvala's son an expert in dice, you unfairly defeated the virtuous Yudhishthira who was unskilled in gambling! For that are you killed.

45. Through the sinful Jayadratha again, Krishna was on another occasion insulted when the the Pandavas, her lords, had gone out a thunting towards the hermitage of Trinavindu!

46. Causing Abhimanyu, who was a child and alone, to be surrounded by many, you did kill that hero. For this sin, O sinful wretch, you are slain!

47. All those sinful deeds which you attribute to us have in reality been perpetrated by you in consequence of your sinful nature!

48. You had never listened to the advice of Vrihaspati and Ushanas! You had never respected the old! You had never heard the beneficial words!

49. Possessed by ungovernable covetousness and thirst of gain, you committed many unrighteous acts. Suffer now the consequences thereof.'

Duryodhana said:—

50. 'I have made various studies, made presents according to the ordinance, governed the wide Earth with her seas, and trumpted over the heads of my foes. Who is there so fortunate as myself?

51. That end again which is sought by Kshatriyas observant of the duties of their own order, viz., death in battle, I have also met with mine. Who, therefore, is so fortunate as myself?

52. I have enjoyed pleasures, such as were worthy of the very gods and such as could with difficulty, be obtained by other kings. I have attained the highest prosperity. Who then is so fortunate as myself?

53. With all my well-wishers, and my younger brothers, I am going to heaven! As regards yourselves, with your baffled purposes and racked with grief, live ye in this unhappy world.'

Sanjaya continued:—

54—56. 'After the intelligent king of the Kurus, have said these words, a thick shower of fragrant flowers dropped from the sky. The Gandharvas beat many charming musical instruments. The Apsaras in a chorus sang the glory of king Duryodhana. The Siddhas cried,—Praise to king Duryodhana! Sweet and delicious breezes mildly blew on all sides. All the quarters became clear and the firmament looked blue as the lapis lazuli.

57. Beholding these good signs, and this worship offered to Duryodhana, the Pandavas, with Vasudeva at their head, were put to shame.

53. Hearing the invisible voice that Bhishma and Drona and Karna and Bhurishravas were killed unfairly, they were afflicted with remorse and wept in grief.

59—60. Seeing the Pandavas striken with anxiety and grief, Krishna addressed them in a voice deep as that of the clouds or the drum, saying,—"All of them were great car-warriors and quick hands in weapons! If ye had displayed all your prowess, even then ye could never have killed them in battle by a fair fight.

61. King Duryodhana also could never be killed in a fair fight! The same is the case with all those powerful car-warriors led by Bhishma.

62. For doing you good, I repeatedly applied my illusory powers and caused them to be killed by various means in battle.

63. If I had not adopted such deceitfu ways in battle, you would never have been victorious, nor could have gained kingdom or wealth.

64. Those four were very great warriors and regarded as Atirathas in the world, The very Regents of the Earth could not kill them in fair fight.

65. Likewise, the son of Dhritarashtra, when armed with the mace, could not be killed in fair fight by Yama himself, armed with his bludgeon.

66. Ye should not mind that this enemy of yours has been killed deceitfully. When the number of one's enemies becomes great, then destruction should be brought about by wily ways.

67. The gods themselves, in killing the Asuras, have followed same path. The way, that was followed by the celestials, may be followed by all.

68. We have been crowned with success. It is evening. We had better retire to our tents. Let us all, ye kings, take rest, with our horses and elephants and cars!'

69. Hearing these words of Vasudeva, the Pandavas and the Panchalas filled with joy, roared like a number of lions.

70. All of them blew their conchs and Madhava himself blew his Panchajanya, seeing Duryodhana struck down in battle.'"

CHAPTER LXII.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1. "All those kings, having arms resembling spiked bludgeons, then went towards their tents, overflowing with joy and blowing ther conchs on their way.

2—3. The Pandavas also, O king, proceeded towards our tents. The great bowman Yuyutsu followed them, as also Satyaki, and Dhrishtadyumna, and Shikhandin, and the five sons of Draupadi. The other great bowmen also went towards our tents.

4. The Parthas then entered the tent of Duryodhana, shorn of its splendours and bereft of its master, and looking like a pleasure-ground deserted by spectators.

5. That pavilion looked like a city void of festivities, or a lake without its elephant. It was filled with women and eunuchs and aged counsellors.

6. Duryodhana and other heroes, dressed in yellow raiments, formerly used, O king, to wait reverentially, with joined hands, on those old counsellers.

7. Arriving at the pavilion of the Kuru king, the Pandavas, those foremost of car-warriors, O king, got down from their cars.

8—9. Ever engaged, in the good of his friend, Keshava, addressed the holder of Gandiva, saying,—'Take down your Gandiva as also the two inexhaustible quivers. I shall get down after you, O best of the Bharatas.

10. Get down, for this is for your own good, O sinless one!'—Pandu's brave son, Dhananjaya, did as he was directed.

11. Leaving the reins of the horses the intelligent Krishna then got down from the car of Dhananjaya.

12. After the great Lord of all creatures had got down from that car, the celestial Ape that was on the standard of Arjuna's car disappeared there and then.

13. That great car then, which had before been burnt by Drona and Karna with their celestial weapons, quickly caught fire, O king, without any thing being seen there.

14. Indeed, the car of Dhananjaya, with its quivers, reins, horses, yoke, and shaft, fell down, all reduced to ashes.

15—16. Seeing the vehicle thus reduced to ashes, O lord, the sons of Pandu filled with wonder, and Arjuna, O king, having saluted Krishna and bowed unto him, said these words, with joined hands, 'O Govinda, O divine one, why has this car been consumed by fire?

17. What is this highly wonderful incident that has taken place before our eyes? O you of mighty arms, if you think that I can hear it without injury then tell me everything.'

Vasudeva said :—

18. "That car, O Arjuna, had already been consumed by various sorts of weapons. It was because I had sat upon it during battle that it did not break into pieces, O destroyer of foes.

19. Previously consumed by the power of Brahma weapons, it has been reduced to ashes upon my leaving it after you had achieved your object.'

20—23. Then, with a little pride, Lord Keshava embracing king Yudhishthira, said to him, 'By good luck, you have gained the victory, O son of Kunti! By good luck, your enemies have been defeated! By good luck, the holder of Gandiva and Bhimasena the son of Pandu, and yourself, O king, and the two sons of Madri have escaped alive from this battle so destructive of heroes, after having killed all your foes! Speedily do, O Bharata, what should now be done!

24—26. After I had arrived at Upaplavya, you the holder of Gandiva, gave me honey and the customary ingredients, and said, O Lord, This Dhananjaya, O Krishna, is your brother and friend! He should, therefore, be protected by you in all dangers!—To your these words I answered saying,—So be it!—That Savyasachin has always been protected by me. You have also gained victory, O king.

27—28. With his brothers, O king of kings, that truly powerful hero, has come out alive of this dreadful battle, so destructive of heroes.'—Thus addressed by Krishna, king Yudhishthira with his hairs standing erect, O king, said to Janarddana.

Yudishthira said :—

29—30 'Who else, except you, O destroyer of foes, not even thunder-holding Purandara himself, could have withstood the Brahma weapons discharged by Drona and Karna!

30. It was through your favour that the Samsaptakas were vanquished! It was through your favour that Partha had never to turn back from even the fiercest of battles!

31—32. It was through your favour O mighty-armed one, that I myself, with my descendants, have, by performing various feats, obtained the auspicious end of prowess and energy! At Upaplavya, the Rishi Krishna-Dwaipayana told me that where there is Krishna righteousness and victory will be there."

Sanjaya continued :—

33—35. 'After this conversation, those heroes entered your son's encampment, and secured the weapons of chest, many jewels, and much wealth, and silver and gold and gems and pearls and many rich ornaments and blankets and skins, and innumerble slaves male and female, and many other things required by kings. Having secured that inexhaustible wealth belonging to you, O foremost of Bharata's race, those highly-blessed ones, whose enemies had been killed, uttered loud cries of joy.

36. Having unyoked their animals, the Pandavas and Satyaki took rest there awhile.

37—38. Then the illustrious Vasudeva said. 'We should, as the first sacred act, remain out of the camp for this night. Saying 'So be it !'—the Pandavas and Satyaki, accompanied by Vasudeva, went out of the camp for doing this auspicious act.

39—40. Arrived on the banks of the sacred stream Oghavati, O king, the Pandavas, who had no enemies took up their quarters there for that night. They then sent Keshava to Hastinapura. The highly powerful Vasudeva causing Daruka to get upon his car, proceeded very quickly to that place where the royal son of Amvica was.

41—42. While about to start on his car, having Shaivya and Sugriva yoked to it, (the Pandavas) said to him,—'Comfort the helpless Gandhari who has lost all her sons.'—Thus addressed by the Pandavas, that chief of the Satwatas then set out for Hastinapura and arrived before Gandhari who had all her sons slain."

CHAPTER LXIII.

Janamejaya said :—

1—2. "Why did that best of kings, viz., the righteous Yudhishthira, send that scorcher of foes, viz., Vasudeva, to Gandhari? Krishna had at first gone to the Kauravas for the sake of bringing about peace. He was not successful. For this the battle took place.

3—4. When all the warriors were killed and Duryodhana was struck down, when for the battle the empire of Pandu's son became perfectly safe, when all the (Kuru) camp became empty, when the son of Pandu won great glory, what was the cause for which Krishna had once again to go (to Hastinapura)?

5. It seems to me, O Brahmana, that the cause could not be an insignificant one, since it was Janarddana had himself to make the journey.

6. O foremost of all Adhyaryus, tell me in full what was the reason for undertaking such a mission."

Vaishampayana said :—

7—11. "The question you have put, O king, is, indeed, worthy of you! I will tell you everything truly as it happened. See Duryodhana, the powerful son of Dhritarashtra, struck down by Bhimasena against the rule of fair fight, and beholding the Kuru king slain unfairly, O Bharata, Yudhishthira, O monarch, was filled with great fear, thinking of the highly-blessed and ascetic Gandhari—'She has practised severe ascetic austerities and can, therefore, consume the three worlds,' this was the thought of the son of Pandu. By sending Krishna, the angry Gandhari, would be comforted before Yudhishthira's own arrival.

12. 'Hearing of the death of her son in such a way, she will, in anger, with the fire of her mind, reduce us to ashes.

13—14. How will Gandhari bear such poignant grief, after hearing of her son, who always fought fairly, being slain unfairly by us?' Having thought thus for a long while, king Yudhishthira filled with fear and grief said these words to Vasudeva.

15—16. 'Through your kindness, O Govinda, my kingdom has been freed from pests. We have gained now what we could not even imagine. O mighty-armed one, in battle, making the very hair to stand on end, thou hadst to bear violent blows before my very eyes, O delighter of the Yadavas.

17. Formerly in the battle between the gods and the Asuras, thou hadst, lent your help for the destruction of the foes of the celestials, and those enemies were killed.

18. Similarly, O mighty-armed one, you have helped us, O you of unfading glory. By agreeing to act as our charioteer, O Vrishni-hero, you have all along protected us.

19. If you had not protected Phalguna in dreadful battle, this sea of troops would not have been vanquished?

20. You have suffered many blows of the mace, and many strokes of spiked bludgeons' and dart and short arrows and lances and battle-axes.

21. For our sake, O Krishna, you also put up with many harsh words and endure the violent fall of weapons in battle.

22. On account of Duryodhana's death, all this has not been fruitless, O you of unfading glory. Act again in such a way that the fruit of all those acts may not be spoiled.

23. Although we have gained victory, O Krishna, our heart, however, is yet trembling in doubt. Know, O Madhava, that Gandhari's wrath, has been excited.

24. That highly-blessed lady is always weakening herself with the austerest of penances. Hearing of the death of her sons and grandsons, she will, forsooth, reduce us to ashes. It is time, O hero, I think, for pacifying her.

25. Save you, O foremost of men, what other person is there that can even face that lady of red and ranging eyes and greatly overwhelmed with the misfortunes of her children.

26. O Madhava, I think it is better for you to go, for pacifying Gandhari, O chastiser of foes, who is blazing with wrath. You are the Creator and the Destroyer. You are the first cause of all the worlds, yourself being eternal.

27. With reasonable words, you will quickly, O you of great wisdom, be able to pacify Gandhari.

28—29. Our grandsire, the holy Krishna-Dwaipayana, will be there. O mighty-armed one, it is your duty to remove by all means in thy power, the anger of Gandhari.' Hearing these words of king Yudhishthira, the Yadu-hero summoning Daruka, said, —'Get my car ready.'

30. Having received Keshava's command, Daruka speedily returned and represented to his great master that the car was ready.

31. That destroyer of foes and chief of Yadu's race, viz., the Lord Keshava, having got upon the car, proceeded speedily to the city of the Kurus.

32. The worshipful Madhava then, mounting his vehicle, proceeded, and arrived at Hastinapur.

33. Making the city resound with the rattle of his car-wheels as he entered it, he sent word to Dhritarashtra and then got down from his car and entered the palace of the old king.

34—35. He there saw that best of Rishis, (viz., Dwaipayana), arrived before him. Embracing the feet of both Vyasa and Dhritarashtra, Janarddana quietly saluted Gandhari also. Then the best of the Yadavas, viz., Vishnu, holding Dhritarashtra by the hand, O king, began to weep.

36—37. Having wept for a while, he washed his eyes and his face with water according to rules. He then said sweetly to Dhritarashtra,—' Nothing is unknown to you, O Bharata, about the past and the future. You are well-acquainted, O lord, with the course of time.

39. Out of respect for you the Pandavas had tried to prevent the destruction of their family and the extermination of the Kshatriyas, O Bharata.

40. Having made a compact with his brothers, the virtuous Yudhishthira had lived peacefully. He even went to exile after the unfair defeat at dice.

41. With his brothers he lived in concealment and disguise. They also suffered various miseries as if they were quite helpless.

42. On the eve of battle I myself came, and before all begged of you only five villages.

43. Out of covetousness, and as Destiny would have it, you did not grant my request. Through your folly, O king, all the Kshatriyas have been exterminated.

44. Bhisma, and Somadatta, and Valhika, and Kripa, and Drona, and his son and the wise Vidura, always begged you for peace. You did not, however, follow their advice.

45. Every one, it seems, loses sense under the influence of Destiny, O Bharata, since even you, O king, as regards this matter, did act so foolishly.

46. What else can it be but the effect of Time? Indeed, Destiny always reigns supreme! Do not, O you of great wisdom, attribute any fault to the Pandavas.

47. Judged by the standard of Ethics or reason or affection, the Pandavas have not committed the slightest offence, O scorcher of foes.

48. Knowing all this to be the fruit of you own folly, it is proper for you not to entertain any ill feeling towards the Pandavas.

49. The perpetuity of race, the offering of funeral cake, and every thing else that depends upon offspring, now depend on the Pandavas as regards both yourself and Gandhari.

50. Both you and the renowned Gandhar also, should not entertain malice towards the Pandavas.

51. Thinking of all this, and thinking also of your own sins, cherish good feelings towards the Pandavas. I bow to you, O Bharata chief.

52. You know, O mighty armed one, the devotion of king Yudhisthira and his affection towards you.

53. Having caused this destruction of foes that wronged him so, he is burning day and night in grief and does not enjoy peace of mind.

54. Grieving for you and for Gandhari, he does not enjoy any happiness.

55—57. Out of shame he does not appear before you who are burning with grief on account of your children and whose understanding and senses have been bewildered.'—Having said these words to Dhritarashtra, that foremost one of Yadu's race, O king, addressed the grief-stricken Gandhari in these words of great significance,—'O daughter of Suvala, O you of excellent vows, hear what I say. O auspicious dame, there is no lady like you in the world.

58. You remember, O queen, those just and fair words which you gave utterance to in the assembly before me, words that were beneficial to both the parties,—but which your sons, O auspicious lady, did not pay any heed to.

60—61. Duryodhana, who coveted victory was reprimanded by you. You told him then,—Listen, O fool, to these eternal words, viz., victory follows righteousness —your words, O princess, have now been fulfilled. Knowing all this, O auspicious lady, do not grieve.

62. Let not your heart be bent towards the destruction of the Pandavas. On account of the power of your penances, you are able, O highly blessed one, to consume with your eyes, burning in anger, the whole Earth with her mobile and immobile creatures.'

63. Hearing these words of Vasudeva, Gandhari said,—'O Keshava, what you say is true!

64. My heart, burning in grief, had been unfixed. After hearing what you said, however, that heart, O Janarddana, has been settled.

65. Regarding the blind old king, who had now become childless, O foremost of men, you and the sons of Pandu, are his refuge.'

66. Having said so Gandhari, burning in grief for the death of her sons, covered her face with her cloth and began to weep aloud.

67. The mighty-armed lord Keshava then solaced the grief-stricken princess with reasonable words and examples.

68. Having comforted Gandhari and Dhritarashtra, Keshava of Madhu's race, came to know the evil that was thought of by Drona's son.

69—70. Rising up quickly after worshipping the feet of Vyasa with his head, Keshava, O king, addressed Dhritarashtra, saying,—'I take your leave, O foremost of Kuru's race! Do not grieve. The son of Drona has an evil desire. It is for this that I rise so suddenly.

71—72. It seems that he has formed a plan for destroying the Pandavas during the night.'—Hearing these words, both Gandhari and Dhritarashtra said Keshava, the destroyer of Keshin, these words:—'Go quickly, O mighty-armed one, and protect the Pandavas.

73. See us again soon, O Janarddana!' —Then Keshava of unfading glory proceeded with Daruka.

74. After Vasudeva had gone, O king, Vyasa, worshipped of the whole world, began to comfort king Dhritarashtra.

75. The righteous Vasudeva departed, having gained his object successfully, from Hastinapura, for seeing the camp and the Pandavas.

76. Arrived at the camp, he went to the Pandavas, Informing them of everything he took his seat with them."

CHAPTER LXIV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. "Struck on the head, his thighs broken, laid low on the ground, exceedingly proud, what, O Sanjaya, did my son then say?

2. King Duryodhana was highly wrathful and his enmity to the sons of Pandu was deep-seated. When, therefore, this great calamity befell him, what did he next say on the field?"

Sanjaya said:—

3. "Hear me, O king, as I describe what took place. Listen, O king, to what Duryodhana said when possessed by misfortune.

4. With his thighs broken, the king, O king, covered with dust, collected his flowing locks, looking on all sides.

5. Having with difficulty gathered his locks, he began to sigh like a serpent. Filled with ire and with tears flowing quickly from his eyes, he looked at me. He struck his arms against the Earth for some time like an infuriate elephant.

6—8. Shaking his loose locks, and gnashing his teeth, he began to blame the eldest son of Pandu. Sighing heavily, he then said to me,—'Alas, I who had Shantanu's son Bhishma for my protector, and Karna, that foremost of all warriors, Gotama's son, Shakuni, Drona, Ashwatthaman, the heroic Shalya, and Kritavarman, have been reduced to this plight. It seems that Destiny is all powerful.

9. I was the master of eleven Chamus of troops and yet I have come by this plight. O mighty-armed one, no one can control Destiny.

10. Those of my side that have escaped alive from this battle should be informed how I have been struck down by Bhimasena against the rules of fair fight.

11. Many unfair and sinful acts have been perpetrated towards Bhurishravas, Bhishma, and Drona.

12. This is another very unfair act that the cruel Pandavas have perpetrated, for which, I am certain, they will incur the censure of all righteous men.

13. What pleasure can a pious man enjoy after having gained a victory by unfair acts? What wise man would approve of a person's disregarding the rules of equity?

14. What learned man would rejoice after having gained victory by such unfair means as that vile wretch, Vrikodara, the son of Pandu, is rejoicing himselt in glee.

15. What can be more surprising than this, viz., that Bhimasena in anger should with his foot touch the head of one like me while lying with my thighs broken.

16. Is that person, O Sanjaya, an honorable man who behaves thus towards a great man, endued with prosperity, living in the midst of friends?

17—18. My parents are not ignorant of the rules of warfare. As directed by me, O Sanjaya, tell them that are afflicted with grief these words:—I have celebrated sacrifices, maintained a large number of servants properly, governed the whole Earth with her seas; I stood on the heads of my living enemies.

19. I gave wealth to my kinsmen to the best of my power and I did what my friends liked. I withstood all my enemies. Who is there that is more fortunate than myself?

20. I have marched through enemy's kingdoms and commanded kings as slaves I have acted lovingly towards all I loved and liked. Who is there more fortunate than myself!

21. I honored all my relations and looked to the well-being of all my dependants. I have observed the three objects of human existence, viz., Religion, Profit, and Pleasure. Who is there more fortunate than myself?

22. I commanded great kings, and acquired honor, unattainable by others, I always drove on the back of the very best of horses. Who is there more fortunate than myself?

23. I studied the Vêdas and made gifts according to the ordinance. I have passed my life in happiness. By observing the duties of my own order, I have secured for myself many abodes of blessedness in the regions of eternity. Who is there more fortunate than myself?

24. By good luck, I have not been defeated in battle and subjected to the necessity of serving my foes as slaves. By good luck, O lord, it is only after my death that my rising Prosperity leaves me for waiting upon another!

25. I have met with that death which is desired by good Kshatriyas observant of the duties of their order. Who is there so fortunate as myself?

26—27. By good luck, I was not defeated like an ordinary person. By good luck, I have not been defeated after I had done some mean act. Like killing a person who is asleep or who is heedless, like killing one with poison, my destruction has taken place, for I have been killed unfairly against the rules of fair fight.

28—30. The highly blessed Ashwatthaman, and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, and Sharadwat's son Kripa, should be told these words of mine, viz.—You should never place any confidence upon the Pandavas, those violaters of rules who have committed many unrighteous acts.—After this, your royal and truly powerful son addressed our message-bearers in these words:—I have, in battle, been killed by Bhimasena most unfairly.

31—34. I am now like a moneyless wayfarer and shall follow suit with Drona who has already gone to heaven, with Karna and Shalya, with Vrishasena of great energy, with Shakuni the son of Suvala, with Jalasandha of great valour, with king Bhagadatta, with Somadatta's son that mighty bowman, with Jayadratha the king of the Sindhus, with all my brothers headed by Dusshasana and equal unto myself, with Dusshasana's son of great prowess, and with Lakshmana my son, and thousands of others that fought for me.

35. Alas, how shall my sister, laden with grief, live sorrowfully, after hearing of the death of her brothers and her husband.

36. Alas, what shall be the condition of the old king, my father, with Gandhari, and his daughters-in-law and grand-daughter-in-law!

37. Forsooth, the beautiful and large-eyed mother of Lakshmana, rendered sonless and husbandless, will soon die.

38. If Charvaka, the mendicant devotee, who is a master of speech, learns everything he will forsooth avenge my death.

39—40. By dying upon the sacred field of Samantapanchaka, celebrated over the three worlds, I shall, forsooth, go to the blessed abode of eternity.'—Then, having heard these lamentations of the king, O sire, thousands of men, with eyes full of tears, fled away in all directions.

41. The whole earth, with her forests and seas, with all her mobile and immobile creatures, began to shake and produce a loud noise. All the points of the horizon were covered with darkness.

42. Repairing to Drona's son, the messengers communicated to him all that had taken place regarding the conduct of the mace-fight and the fall of the king.

43. Having represented everything to Drona's son, O Bharata, all of them remained in a pensive mood for a long time and then went away, laden with grief, to the places whence they came."

CHAPTER LXV.

(GADAYUDDHA PARVA).—Concld.

Sanjaya said :—

1—5. "Having heard of Duryodhana's fall from the messengers, those powerful car-warriors, the remnant of the Kaurava army greatly wounded with keen arrows and maces and lances and darts,—those three, viz. Ashwathaman and Kripa and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, riding at breakneck pace on their swift chargers came to the field of battle. They saw there the high-souled son of Dhritarashtra lying low on the ground, like a gigantic Shala tree laid low in the forest by a storm. They saw him suffering on the mother Earth and covered with blood like a powerful elephant in the forest laid low by a hunter. They saw him suffering and bleeding profusely.

6—7. Indeed, they saw him lying on the ground like the Sun dropped on the Earth or like the Ocean dried by a mighty wind, or like the Full Moon in the sky with his disc covered with fog. Like an elephant in prowess and possessing long arms, the king lay on the Earth, covered with dust.

8. Around him were many terrible creatures and carnivorous animals, like satellites seeking wealth around a king in state.

9. His forehead was contracted into furrows of rage and his eyes were rolling in anger. They saw the king, that foremost of men, full of rage, like a tiger struck down (by hunters).

10. Seeing the king laid low on the Earth, those great bow-men, viz., Kripa and others became stupefied.

11. Getting down from their cars, they ran towards the king. Seeing Duryodhana, all of them sat on the Earth around him.

12. Then Drona's son, O king, with eyes full of tears and sighing like a snake, said these words to that chief of Bharata's race, that foremost of all the kings on Earth.

13. Forsooth, there is nothing permanent in the world of men, since you, O foremost of men, lie on the mother Earth covered with dust.

14. You were a king who had issued your commands to all the world! Why then, O foremost of kings, do you lie alone on the bare ground?

15. I do not see Dusshana by you, nor the great car-warrior Karna, nor those hundreds of your friends. What is this, O foremost of men?

16. Forsooth, it is difficult to learn the ways of Yama, since you, O lord of all the world, thus lie on the bare ground covered with dust.

17. Alas, this destroyer of foes used to trample at the head of all Kshatriyas that had their locks sprinkled with holy water at the time of coronation. Alas, he now eats the dust. Witness the reverses of fortune that time brings.

18. Where is that pure white umbrella of yours? Where is that fanning yak-tail also, O king? Where is that vast army of yours now gone, O best of kings?

19. The course of events is, forsooth, a mystery, since you, who were the master of the world, have been reduced to this state.

20. Forsooth, the prosperity of all mortals is very unstable, since you, who were equal unto Shakra himself, have now been reduced to such a miserable condition.'

21. Hearing these words of Ashwatthaman your son answered him in words that were suited to the occasion.

22—23. He wiped his eyes with his hands and shed tears of grief again. The king then addressed all those heroes headed by Kripa and said,—'Subjection to death has been ordained by the Creator himself. Death comes to all in course of Time.

24. That death has now come to me, before you all. I, who governed the whole Earth, I have now been reduced to this miserable state.

25. By good luck, I never turned back from battle, whatever misfortunes overtook me. By good luck, I have been killed by those sinful men, by the help of deceptive means.

26. By good luck, while engaged in hostilities, I always showed courage and perseverance. By good luck, I am killed in battle, along with all my relatives and friends.

27. By good luck, I see you escaped alive from this great destruction, and are safe and sound! Thfs is highly pleasing to me!

28. Do not, from love grieve for my death! If the Vedas are in any way authoritative, I have certainly acquired many eternal regions!

29. I am not ignorant of the glory of Krishna. He has not made me disregard the Kshatriya duties!

30—31. I have obtained him! No one should grieve for me. Ye have done what persons like ye should do. Ye have always tried for my success. Destiny, however, is incapable of being defeated.'—Having said all this the King, with eyes bathed in tears, became silent, O king, agitated as he was with pain.

32. Seeing the king in tear and grief, Drona's son burned in anger like the fire at the universal dissolution.

33. Beside himself with anger he squeezed his hands, and addressing the king in a voice choked with tears, he said, —'My father was killed by those wretches with a cruel contrivance. That act, however, do not pain me so keenly as this condition to which you have been reduced, O king. Listen to these words of mine which I swear by truth itself, O lord, and by all my acts of piety, all my gifts, my religon and the religious merits I have won.

36—38. I shall to-day, in the very presence of Vasudeva, despatch all the Panchalas, by all means in my power, to the abode of Yama. You should, O king, grant me permission.'—Hearing these words of Drona's son, that were highly peasant, the Kuru king addressed Kripa, saying,—'O preceptor, bring me soon a pot full of water.'—At these words of the king, that foremost of Brahmanas, soon brought a vessel full of water.

39. Your son then, O king, said to Kripa, —'Let the son of Drona, O foremost of Brahmanas, blessed be you, if you wish to do me good, be, at my command, appointed as generalissimo.

40—41. At the command of the king, even the Brahmana may fight, especially one who leads the life of Kshatriya. Those learned in the scriptures say this.'—Hearing these words of the king Kripa, the son of Sharadwat, installed Drona's son as generalissimo, at the mandate of the king.

42. After the ceremony, O King, Ashwathaman embraced that best of kings and left the place, having resounded the ten cardinal points with his war-cry.

43. That best of kings, viz., Duryodhana, bathed in blood, began to pass there that night so dreadful to all creatures,

44. Leaving quickly the a field of battle, O king, those horses, with hearts shaken by grief, began to think anxiously and earnestly.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted Narayana, and Nara the foremost of all male beings, as also the goddess of learning Saraswati, let us cry success.

Sanjaya said :—

1. "Those heroes then in a body went towards the south. At sunset they reached a spot near the (Kuru) encampment.

2. Letting loose their animals, they became very much frightened. Reaching then a forest, they secretly entered it.

3. They took up their quarters there near the encampment. Wounded with many keen weapons, they breathed and sighed heavily, thinking of the Pandavas.

4. Hearing the loud noise set up by the victorious Pandavas, they feared a pursuit and therefore fled towards the east.

5. Having gone for sometime, their animals became tired and they themselves were stricken with thirst. Beside themselves with anger and vindictiveness, those great bowmen could not bear what had taken place, burning as they did with grief at the slaughter of the king. They, however, rested for a while."

Dhritarashtra said :—

6. "The feat, O Sanjaya, that Bhima performed seems to be incredible, since my son who was struck down was endued with the strength of ten thousand elephants.

7—10. In the prime of life and having an adamantine body, he was not capable of being slain by any creature. Alas, even such a son of mine was struck down by the Pandavas in battle. Forsooth, O Sanjaya, my heart is made of adamant, because it does not break into a thousand pieces even after hearing of the death of my hundred sons. Alas, what will be the condition of myself and my wife, an old couple, deprived of all children. I dare, not dwell in the kingdom of Pandu's son.

11. Having been the father of a king and a king myself, O Sanjaya, how shall I pass my days as a slave obeying the commands of Pandu's son.

12. Having commanded once the entire Earth and having trampled over the heads of all, O Sanjaya, how shall I live now as a wretched slave.

13. How shall I be able, O Sanjaya, to endure the words of Bhima who has alone killed a full hundred sons of mine?

14. The words of the great Vidura are now realised. Alas, my son, O Sanjaya, did not listen to those words.

15. What, however, did Kritavarman and Kripa and Drona's son do after my son Duryodhana had been unfairly killed."

Sanjaya said :—

16. "They had not proceeded far, O king, when they stopped, on seeing a dense forest covered with trees and creepers.

17. Having rested for a little while, they entered that great forest, proceeding on their cars drawn by their excellent horses whose thirst had been satisfied.

18. That forest abounded with various kinds of animals, and various species of birds. And it was covered with many trees and creepers and was filled with numerous carnivorous creatures.

19. It was covered with many pools of water, adorned with various kinds of flowers, and lakes overgrown with blue lotuses.

20. Having entered that dense forest they looked about saw a gigantic banian tree with thousands of branches.

21. Repairing to the shade of that banian, those great car-warriors, O king, those foremost of men, found that to be the biggest tree in that forest.

22. Getting down from their cars, and letting loose their animals, they washed themselves and said their evening prayers.

23. The Sun then reached the setting hill, and Night, the mother of the universe, came. The sky, bespangled mith planets and stars, shone like an ornamented piece of brocade and presented a beautiful sight.

25. Creatures, ranging in the night, began to howl and utter their cries at will, while they that range in the day began to sleep.

26. The night-ranging animals set up a dreadful noise. The carnivorous creatures were full of joy, and the night, as it advanced, became awful.

27. At that time filled with grief and sorrow, Kritavarman and Kripa and Drona's son all sat down together.

28. Seated under that banian, they began to express their sorrow regarding the destruction that had taken place of both the Kurus and the Pandavas.

29. Feeling asleep they laid themselves down on the bare Earth. They had been greatly exhausted and greatly wounded with arrows.

30. The two great car-warriors, Kripa and Kritavarman, began to sleep. They ever deserving of happiness and undeserving of misery, slept on the bare ground.

31. Indeed, O King, they, who had always slept on costly beds, now slept, like helpless persons, on the bare ground, worn out with fatigue and grief.

32. Subject to warth and revenge, Drona's son, however, O Bharata, could not sleep, but continued to breathe like a snake.

33. Burning with rage he could not sleep. That mighty hero looked on all sides of that terrible forest.

34. As he surveyed that forest filled with various kinds of creatures, the great warrior beheld a large banian tree covered with crows.

35. On that banian thousands of crows roosted in the night. Each perching separately from its neighbour, those crows slept easily, O Kuru Chief.

36. As, however, those birds were sleeping in security on every side, Ashwatthaman beheld a terrible owl suddenly appeared there.

37. Of frightful cries and huge body, with green eyes and tawny plumage, its nose was very large and its talons were Gng. And its speed was like that of oaruda.

38. Crying softly that winged creature O Bharata, secretly approached the branches of that banian tree.

39. That sky-ranger, that slayer of crows, alighting on one of the branches of the banian, killed a large number of his sleeping enemies.

40. He tore the wings of some and cut off the heads of others with his sharp talons and broke the legs of many. Highly strong as he was, he killed many that fell down before his eyes.

41. With the limbs and bodies, O king, of the slain crows, the ground covered by the spreading branches of the banian, was overspread on all sides.

42. Having killed those crows, the owl became overjoyed like a slayer of foes after having dealt with his foes according to his pleasure.

43. Witnessing that deed perpetrated in the night by the owl, Drona's son began to reflect on it, desirous of guiding his own conduct after that example.

44. He said to himself,—'This owl teaches me a lesson in battle. Bent as I am upon the destruction of the enemy, the time for action is come.

45. The victorious Pandavas are incapable of being killed by me! They are possessed of power and perseverance, sure of aim, and skilled in smiting.

46. In the presence, however, of the king I have promised to destroy them. I have thus promised to perform a deed that would bring on my own destruction like an insect trying to rush into a burning fire.

47. If I were to fight fairly with them, I shall, forsooth, have to lay down my life! By deceitful act, however, I may yet get success and a great destruction may overtake my enemies.

48. People generally, as also those well-read in the scriptures, alway prefer means which are certain to those which are uncertain.

49. Censure and bad name, which soever this act may engender, ought to be incurred by a person who leads the life of a Kshatriya.

50. The sinful Pandavas have, at every step, perpetrated very ugly, censurable and deceitful acts.

51. Regarding this matter, certain ancient verses, full of truth, are heard, sung by truth-seeing and righteous persons.

52. They are :—The enemy's force, even which fatigued, or wounded, or while eating, or when retiring, or when resting within their camp, should be beaten.

53—54. They should be equally treated when sleeping at dead of night, or when reft of commanders, or when routed, or when labouring under an error.'—Having thought thus, the valiant son of Drona formed the resolution of killing during the night the sleeping Pandavas and the Panchalas.

55. Having formed this wicked resolution and and promised to execute it, he awoke both his maternal uncle and the chief of the Bhojas.

56. Awakened from sleep, those two illustrious and powerful persons, viz., Kripa and the Bhoja chief, heard Ashwatthaman's scheme. Filled with shame, both of them could not give a suitable reply.

57—58. Having reflected for a short time Ashwatthaman said with tearful eyes. —'King Duryodhana, the only hero of great might, for whose sake we were fighting with the Pandavas, has been killed. Deserted and alone though he was, the master of eleven Akshauhinis of soldiers that hero of unsullied prowess has been struck down by Bhimasena in battle.

59. Another wicked act hath been perpetrated by the mean Vrikodara for the latter has touched with his foot the head of a crowned person.

60. The Panchalas are sending up loud roars and cries and loud bursts of laughter. Overjoyed, they are blowing their conchs and beating their drums.

61. The loud sound of their instruments, mingled with the blare of conchs, is fearful to the ear, and carried by the winds, is filling all the points of the horizon.

62. Loud also is the neighing of their steeds and the grunting of their elephants and the roaring of their warriors.

63. That deafening noise made by the rejoicing warriors as they are going to their quarters, as also the clatter of their car-wheels, comes to us from the east.

64. So great has been the havoc made by the Pandavas on the Dhartarashtras that we three are the only survivors.

65. Some were gifted with the strength of a hundred elephants and some were masters of all weapons. Yet they have been killed by the son of Pandu. I consider this to be an instance of the reverses caused by Destiny.

66. Truly, this is the end to which such acts leads. Although the Pandavas have achieved such difficult feats, yet this should be the result of those feats.

67. If you have not lost your wisdom out of stupefaction, then say what is proper for us to do under these circumstances."

CHAPTER II.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Kripa said :—

1. "We have heard all that you have said, O powerful one! Listen, now, to a few words of mine, O mighty-armed one!

2. All men are subjected to, and governed by, these two forces, viz., Destiny and Manliness. There is nothing superior to these two.

3. Success is not the out come of destiny alone nor of manliness alone, O best of men! Success results from the union of the two.

4. All objects great and low, result from a union of those two. In the whole world, it is through these two that men either act or abstain.

5. No result is produced by the clouds pouring upon a mountain. But mighty results are produced by their pouring upon a cultivated field.

6. Manliness, where destiny is not auspicious, and want of manliness, where destiny is auspicious, both these are fruitless. What I have said before (about the union of the two) is all true.

7. If the rains properly moisten a well-cultivated field the seed produces great results. Such is human success.

8. Sometimes, having settled a course of events, destiny acts of itself. For all that, the wise, always take recourse to manliness.

9. All human acts, O foremost of men, are accomplished by the aid of these two together. Influenced by these two, men either act or abstain.

10. Recourse may be had to manliness. But manliness succeeds through destiny. By the influence of destiny one who sets himself to work, attains to success.

11. The exertion, however, of even a capable man, even when well-directed, is, without the help of destiny, seen to be fruitless in the world.

12. Idle and dull men in this world disapprove of manliness. This, however, is not the view of the wise.

13. Generally no act ever becomes fruitless in the world. The want of manliness again produces grave misery.

14. There is hardly seen a person who obtains something of itself without having made any exertion, as also one who does not obtain anything even after exertion.

15. One who is active is capable of supporting life. He, who is idle, is always unhappy. It is generally seen in this world that active men are always inspired by the desire of earning good.

16. If an active man succeeds in gaining his object or fails to obtain the fruit of his acts, he does not become the butt of censure in any way.

17. If, however, any one in the world luxuriously enjoys the fruits of action without exerting for the same, he generally incurs ridicule and becomes an object of hatred.

18. He, who, neglecting this rule about action, liveth otherwise, is said to injure himself. This is the opinion held by the intelligent.

19. Exertion generally becomes fruitless, because of these reasons, viz., destiny without manliness, and manliness without destiny.

20. Without manliness, no act in this world becomes successful. An active and clever man however, who, having bowed down to the celestials, seeks to achieve his object, is never lost.

21. Similarly a person is crowned with success, who duly waits upon the aged, asks of them what is for his good, and obeys their good advice.

22. One engaged in a work should seek the advice of those approved by the aged. These men are the means, and success depends on means.

23. He who exerts after listening to the words of the old, soon reaps abundant fruits.

24. He, who, without reverence and respect for persons competent to give him good advice, seeks to accomplish his object under the influence of anger, fear, and avarice, soon loses his prosperity.

25. Moved by covetousness and deprived of foresight, this Duryodhana had, without taking advice, foolishly sought the accomplishment of an ill-formed object.

26. Disregarding all his well-wishers and under the advice of only the evil-minded, he had, though dissuaded, created enmities with the Pandavas, who are his superiors in all good qualities.

27. He had, from the very commencement been very wicked. He could not check himself. He did not satisfy the wishes of friends. For all that, he is now sunk in grief and calamity.

28. Regarding ourselves, since we have followed that sinful wretch, this great calamity has, therefore befallen us.

29. This great calamity has burnt my good sense. Plunged in thought I fail to see what is for our good.

30. A man that is beside himself should seek the advice of his friends. In friends consists his understanding, his humility and his prosperity.

31. His actions should be guided by them. He should do which his intelligent friends, having settled by their understanding, should advise.

32. Let us, therefore, repair to Dhritarashtra and Gandhari and the great Vidura, and ask them as what we should do.

33. Asked by us, they will advise us regarding our good. We should do what they say, this is my resolution.

34. Those men whose acts do not succeed even after the exertion, should, forsooth, be regarded as afflicted by destiny."

CHAPTER III.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. "Hearing these auspicious, moral and profitable words of Kripa, Ashwatthaman, O king, became beside himself with sorrow and grief.

2—3. Burning with grief, as if with fire, he formed a wicked resolution and then addressed them both, saying,—'understanding is different in different men. Each man, however, is pleased with his own understanding.

4. Every man considers himself more intelligent than others. Every one respects and praises his own understanding.

5. Every one praises his own wisdom. Every one speaks ill of the wisdom of others, and well of his own, in all cases.

6. Men whose opinions agree with regard to any that is not achieved, become gratified with and praise one another.

7. Again the opinions of the same persons, overwhelmed with reverses brought on by the influence of time, become opposed to one another.

8. On account of the diversity of human intellects, judgments necessarily differ.

9—10. As a skilful physician, having duly diagnosed a disease, prescribes a medicine by his intelligence for effecting a cure, so men, for the accomplishment of their works, use their intelligence, helped by their own wisdom. What they do is not approved by others.

11. A man, in youth, has one kind of understanding. In middle age, he has not the same, and in the period of decay, a different kind of understanding prevails in him.

12—13. When fallen into terrible misfortune or when enjoying great prosperity, the understanding of a person, O chief of the Bhojas, undergoes changes. In one and the same person, want of wisdom, the understanding becomes different at different times. Understanding which at one time is good becomes quite the opposite at another time.

14. Having resolved, however, according to one's wisdom, he should try to carry out his resolution. Such resolution, therefore, should make him display his manliness.

15. All persons, O chief of the Bhojas, gladly undertake enterprises that lead to death, in the belief that those enterprises will be accomplished by them.

16. All men, relying on their own judgment and wisdom, try to accomplish various objects, knowing them to be beneficial.

17. The resolution that I have formed in my mind to-day for our great calamity and which will despell my grief, I will now disclose to both of you.

18. Having created his creatures, the Creator assigned to each his occupation. As regards the different castes he gave to each a portion of excellence.

19. To Brahmanas he assigned that foremost of all things, viz., the Veda. To the Kshatriya he gave superior energy. To the Vaishya he gave skill, and unto the Shudra he gave the duty of serving the three other castes.

20. Hence a Brahmana without self-restraint is an object of censure. A Kshatriya who has no energy is mean. A Vaishya without skill is an object of blame, as also a Shudra who is void of humility.

21. I am born in a worshipful and high family of Brahmanas. Through ill-luck, however, I am leading the life of a Kshatriya.

22. If, conversant as I am with Kshatria duties, I revert now to the order of a Brahmana and achieve a great object (by assuming self-restraint under such injuries), that course would not be compatible.

23. I hold an excellent bow and excellent weapons in battle. If I do not avenge the death of my father, how shall I be able to speak in the assembly of men?

24. Following Kshatriya duties, therefore, without hesitation, I shall to-day walk in the steps of my great father and the king.

25. The Panchalas, elated with victory, will sleep in confidence to-night, having put off their armour and in great joy at the thought of the victory they have gained, and exhausted with toil and exertion.

26. While sleeping easily during the night within their own camp, I shall make a great and terrible assault upon their camp.

27. Like Indra killing the Danavas, I shall, attacking them while dead in sleep in their camp, kill them all, by my power.

28. Like a burning fire consuming a heap of dry grass, I shall kill all of them collected in one place with their leader Dhrishtadyumna. Having killed the Panchalas, I shall obtain peace of mind, O best of men.

29. While engaged in the act of destruction, I shall move about in their midst like the holder of Pinaka, viz., the angry Rudra himself, among living creatures!

30. Having cut off and killed all the Panahalas to-day, I shall then, in joy, assail the sons of Pandu in battle!

31. Taking their lives one after another and causing the Earth to be covered with the bodies of all the Panchalas, I shall satisfy the debt I owe to my father!

32. I shall to-day make the Panchalas follow Duryodhana and Karna and Bhishma and the King of the Sindhus!

33. Displaying my power, I shall to-night grind the head, like that of any animal, of Dhrishtadyumna the king of the Panchalas.

34. I shall to-night, O son of Gotama, strike with my sharp sword, in battle, the sleeping sons of the Panchalas and the Pandavas.

35. Having rooted out the Panchala army to-night while asleep, I shall, enjoy great happiness and consider myself to have done my duty!' "

CHAPTER IV.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Kripa said :—

1. " By good luck, O you of great glory, your heart is bent to-day on vengeance ! The holder of the thunder himself will not succeed in dissuading you to-day.

2. Both of us, however, shall accompany you in the morning putting off armours and taking down your standard rest for this night. I shall, clad in mail and riding on our cars, accompany you as also Kritavarman of the Satwata race, while you will proceed against the foe.

3. United with ourselves, you will kill the enemey, viz., the Panchalas with all their followers, tomorrow in battle, displaying your prowess, O best of car-warriors.

4. If you display your energy your quite competent to achieve that feat ! Take rest, therefore, for this night. You have kept up many a night.

5. Having rested and slept, and having become quite refreshed, O giver of honors, meet the enemy in battle ! Forsooth, you will kill then the enemy.

6. No one, not even Vasava amongst the celestials, would venture to defeat you armed with best of weapons, O foremost of car-warriors.

7. Who is there that would, even if he be the king of the gods himself, fight Drona's son when the latter goes, accompanied by Kripa and protected by Kritavarman.

8. Therefore, having rested and slept this night, and removed fatigue, we shall kill the foe tomorrow morning.

9. You are a master of celestial weapons. I also am so. This hero of Satwata's race is a great bowman, always skilled in battle.

11. All of us, in a body, O son, shall succeed in killing our assembled foes in battle by displaying our powers. Great shall be our happiness then. Removing your anxiety, rest for this night and sleep happily.

12. Myself and Kritavarman, both armed with bows and capable of consuming our enemies, will, clad in mail, follow you, O best of men, while you will move on your car against the enemy.

13. Proceeding to their camp, and announcing your name in battle, you will then make a great destruction of the foe.

14. Having caused tomorrow morning, a great slaughter among them you will sport like Indra after the destruction of great Asuras.

15. You are quite competent to defeat the army of the Panchalas in battle, like the destroyer of the Danavas in defeating in anger the Danava army.

16. United with myself in battle and protected by Kritavarman, you are incapable of being defeated by the the holder of the thunder-bolt himself.

17. Neither I, O son, nor Kritavarman will ever retreat from battle without having defeated the Pandus.

18. Having killed the angry Panchalas along with the Pandavas, we shall come away, or killed by them, we shall go to heaven.

19—21. By every means in our power, we two shall help you in battle tomorrow morning. O you of mighty-arms, I tell you the truth, O innocent one."—Addressed in these wholesome words by his maternal uncle, the son of Drona, with eyes reddened in anger answered his uncle, O king, saying,—" Can a person who is afflicted, or one who is under the influence of anger, or one whose heart is always engaged in making plans for the acquisition of wealth, or one who is under the power of lust, get sleep.

22. See, all these four causes are present in my case. Any one of these, can singly spoil sleep.

23. How great is the sorrow of that person who is always thinking of the death of his father. My heart is now burning day and night ! I cannot enjoy peace.

24. The way in which my father was particularly killed by those sinful wretches has been seen by you all. The thought of that destruction is cutting me to the quick.

25. How could a person like me live for even a moment after hearing the Panchalas say that they have killed my father ?

26. I cannot bear the thought of maintaining life without having killed Dhristadyumna in battle ! For the slaughter of my father, he and those who are with him should be killed by me.

27. Who is there so hard-hearted that would not fire up after having heard the cries of the king lying with broken thighs ?

28. Who is there so merciless whose eyes would not be filled with tears after hearing such words uttered by the king with broken thighs.

29. They, whom, I sided have been defeated. The thought of this increases my sorrow as a rush of waters increases the occean,

30. Protected, as they are by Vasudeva, and Arjuna, I consider, them O uncle, as irresistible by the great Indra himself.

31. I am unable to check this rising anger in my heart. I do not see the man in this world that can suppress this wrath of mine.

32. I am informed by the messengers of the defeat of my friends and the victory of the Pandavas. That is consuming my heart.

83. Having, however, caused a destruction of my enemies during their sleep, I shall then take rest and shall then sleep without anxiety."

CHAPTER V.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Kripa said :—

1. "A person who is not intelligent and who has not controlled, his passions, cannot, even if he waits dutifully upon his superiors, understand morality. This is my opinion.

2. In the same way an intelligent person, who does not practise humility, cannot understand morality.

3. By waiting all his life upon a learned person, a brave man, void of understanding, cannot know his duties like a wooden ladle unable to taste the soup.

4. By waiting upon a learned person for even a moment, the wiseman, however, succeeds in understanding his duties like the tongue tasting the soup.

5. An intelligent person who waits upon his superiors and who has controlled his passions succeeds in understaing all the rules of morality and never disputes what is accepted by all.

6. A sinful person of ungovernable, irreverent, wicked soul, commits sin in seeking his welfare by neglecting destiny.

7. Well-wishers try to restrain a friend from committing sin. He who allows himself to be dissuaded succeeds in gaining prosperity. He, that does otherwise suffers misery.

8. As a person who has lost his brains is restrained by soothing words, so should a friend be restrained by well-wishers. He that allows himself to be so restrained, never suffers misery.

9. When a wise friend is about to commit a wicked act, wise well-wishers repeatedly, and according to the best of their power, try to restrain him. Making up your mind to do what is really beneficial, and restraining yourself by your own self, do my command, O son, so that you may not have to repent afterwards.

11. In this world the destruction of sleeping persons is not praised and sanctioned by religion. The same is the case with persons that have thrown off their arms and come down from cars and horses.

12. They should not also be killed who say—we are yours—and also they who surrender themselves, and they whose locks are dishevelled, and they whose animals have been killed under them or whose cars have been broken.

13. All the Panchalas taking of their armours will sleep to-night, O lord. When asleep, they will be like dead man.

14. That wicked man who would injure them then, would sink in deep and limitless hell without a raft to save himself.

15. In this world you are celebrated as the foremost of all persons knowing the use of weapons, you have not as yet committed even a minute sin.

16. When the sun rises next morning and light shall clear up all things, you, like a second effulgent sun will vanquish the foe in battle.

17. This culpable deed, so imposible in one like you, will appear like a red spot on a white sheet. This is my opinion."

Ashwatthaman said :—

18. "Forsooth what you say, O maternal uncle, is true. The Pandavas, however, have, before this, deviated from the path of righteousness.

19. Before all the kings, before your eyes also, my father after he had laid down his weapons, was killed by Dhrishtadyumna.

20. Karna also, that best of car-warriors after the wheel of his car had sunk and he had been assailed by great distress, was killed by the holder of Gandiva.

21. Similarly Shantanu's son Bhishma, after he had laid aside his weapons was killed by Arjuna with Shikhandin placed in his rear.

22. So also, the great bowman Bhurishravas, while observing the Praya vow on the field of battle, was killed by Yuyudhana, disregarding the voice of all the kings.

23. Having met Bhima in battle with the mace, Duryodhana too has been killed unfairly by the former in the very presence of all the kings.

24. The king was all alone in the midst of a great number of powerful car-warriors standing around him. Under such circumstances was that king killed by Bhimasena.

25. The lamentations of the king, lying prostrate on the Earth with his thighs broken, that I have heard from the messengers circulating the news, are cutting me to the quick.

26. The unrighteous and sinful Panchalas, who have trumpeted virtue, are even such. Why do you not blame them who have transgressed the law of virtue.

27. Having killed the Panchalas, those destroyers of my father in the night when they are buried in sleep, I care not if I am born as a warm or an insect in my next birth.

28. My resolution is pressing me for its accomplishment. Urged on by it, how can I enjoy sleep and happiness.

29. That man is not yet born in the world, nor will be, who will be able to frustrate this resolution of mine."

Sanjaya continued :—

30. "Having said so, O king, the brave son of Drona yoked his horses to his car at a corner and started towards the direction of his enemies.

31. Then Bhoja and Sharadwat's son, those great persons, addressed him saying, —' Why do you yoke the horses to your car? What do you want to do?

32. We are determined to accompany you tomorrow, O foremost of men! We sympathise with you in weal and woe. You should not mistrust us.'

33. Remembering the slaughter of his father, Ashwatthaman in anger told them truly about the work that he had resolved to accomplish.

34. 'When my father having killed hundreds and thousands of warriors with sharp arrows, had thrown out his weapons, he was then killed by Dhrishtadyumna.

35. I shall kill that slayer to-day under similar circumstances. I shall to-day slay the sinful son of the king of the Panchalas by a sinful act.

36. It is my determination to slay like an animal that sinful prince of the Panchalas in such a way that he may not attain to regions gained by persons killed with weapons.'

37—38. Put on your coats of mail soon and take your bows and swords, and wait for me here, O foremost of car-warriors.'. —Having said so, Ashwatthaman got upon his car and started towards the enemy. Then Kripa, O king, and Kritavarman of the Satwata race, both followed him.

39. While the three went on against the enemy, they shone like three blazing fires in a sacrifice, fed with libations of clarified butter.

40. They proceeded, O lord, towards the encampment of the Panchalas within which everybody was asleep. Having approached the gate, Drona's son, that great car-warrior, stopped."

CHAPTER VI.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Seeing Drona's son stop at the gate of the camp, what, O Sanjaya, did those two great car-warriors, viz., Kripa and Kritavarman, do? Tell me this."

Sanjaya said :—

2. "Inviting Kritavarman as also the great car-warrior Kripa, Drona's son, worked up with rage, approached the gate of the camp.

3. He there saw a being of huge frame capable of making the very hair erect and endued with the effulgence of the Sun or the Moon, guarding the entrance.

4. Round his loins was a tiger-skin covered with blood, and he had a black deer for his upper garment. He had for his sacred thread a large snake.

5. His arms were long and massive, and held many sorts of uplifted weapons. He had for his armlet a huge snake wound round his upper arm. His mouth was ablaze with flames of fire.

6. His teeth made his face terrible to look at. His mouth was open and dreadful. His face had a thousand of beautiful eyes.

7. His body and his dress were beyond description. Upon seeing him the very mountains would split into a thousand pieces.

7. Blazing flames of fire came out of his mouth and nose and ears and all those thousans of eyes.

9. From those blazing flames hundreds and thousands of Hrishikeshas came out armed with conchs and discs and maces.

9. Seeing that extraordinary being capable of striking terror to the entire world, Drona's son, without any fear covered him with showers of celestial weapons. That being, however, devoured all those arrows discharged by Drona's son.

11. Like the Vadava fire devouring the waters of the ocean, that being devoured the arrows discharged by the son of Drona.

12. Seeing his arrowy showers prove fruitless, Ashwatthaman discharged at him a long dart burning like fire.

13. That blazing dart striking against that being, broke into pieces like a huge meteor at the end of a cycle breaking and falling down from the sky after striking against the Sun.

14. Without losing a moment Ashwatthaman drew from its sheath an excellent sky-coloured scimitar having a golden hilt. The scimitar came out like a snake from its whole.

15. The intelligent son of Drona then threw that excellent scimitar at that being. Approaching that being the weapon disappeared within his body like a mungoose disappearing in its hole.

16. W[illegible] up with anger the son of [illegible] Drona th[illegible] a blazing mace huge as [illegible] a pole se[illegible]nor of Indra. That being [illegible] devoure[illegible]ce also.

17. [illegible] [illegible]en all his weapons were exhausted, [illegible]wattthaman, looking around, saw the entire sky densely crowded with images of Janarddana.

18. Seeing that wonderful spectacle Drona's son, divested of weapons, recollected the words of Kripa, and burning with grief, said,—' He who hears not the beneficial words of friends, repents being overwhelmed with calamity, as does my foolish self for having disregarded my two well-wishers.

20. That fool who, disregarding the way laid down by the scriptures, tries to kill his enemies, falls off from the path of righteousness and is lost in sin.

21. One should not use weapons against kine, Brahmans, kings, women, friends, one's own mother, one's own preceptor, a weak man, an idiot, a blind man, a sleeping man, a terrified man, one just got up from sleep, an intoxicated person, a lunatic, and one that is careless. The ancient preceptors always preached this truth to men.

23. By neglecting the eternal way pointed out by the scriptures and by trying to follow a wrong path I have, however, fallen into a dreadful distress.

24. It is described by the wise as a terrible calamity when one through fear, cannot achieve a great feat after having tried to do the same.

25. By using my skill and power, I am unable to achieve that which I have promised? Human exertion is never more powerful than destiny.

26. If any action of a man that is undertaken becomes unsuccessful through destiny, the actor becomes like one who deviating from the path of virtue is lost in the wilderness of sin.

27. The wise describe defeat as foolishness when one having undertaken a task abandons it from fear.

28. For the wickedness of my attempt, this great calamity has befallen me, otherwise Drona's son would never had been compelled to hold back from battle.

29, Again this being, who is before me, is most wonderful. He stands there like the uplifted rod of divine punishment. Thinking much even, I cannot recognise this being.

30. Forsooth, that being is the dreadful outcome of this my sinful determination which I had attempted to achieve by unfair means, He stands there for baffling my resolution.

31. It seems, therefore, that my ceasing from fight had been ordained by destiny. It is useless for me to try to accomplish my resolution unless destiny becomes favorable.

32. I shall, therefore, at this hour, seek the protection of the powerful Mahadeva. He will remove this dreadful rod of divine punishment uplifted before me.

33. I will seek refuge with that god, that source of all good, viz., the lord of Uma, otherwise called Kaparddin, adorned with a garland of human skulls, that plucker of Bhaga's eyes, called also, Rudra and Hara.

34. In ascetic practices and power, he far excells all the gods. I shall, therefore, seek refuge with Girisha armed with trident.' "

CHAPTER VII.

(SAUPITKA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said:—

1—4. "Having reflected thus, the son of Drona, O king, got down from his car and stood, bending his head to that supreme god, and said,—' I seek the protection of fierce, Sthanu, Shiva, Rudra, Sarva, Ishana, Ishwara, Girisha, of that boon-giving god who is the Creator and lord of the universe; of the blue-throated deity, who is without birth, who is called Shakra, who destroyed the sacrifice of Daksha, and who is called Hara; of Him whose form is the universe, who has three eyes, who has many forms, and who is the lord of Uma; of Him who lives in crematoriums, who is energetic, who is the master of ghosts and who is endued with undecaying prosperity and power; of Him who holds a club having a skull on the top, who is called Rudra, who bears matted locks on his head, and who is a Brahmacharin.

5. Purifying my soul, and possessing small energy, I adore the Destroyer of the three cities, and offer myself as the victim.

6. I sing thy glory. Thy purposes are never baffled. Thou art clad in skin; thou hast red hair on thy head; thou art blue-throated; thou art unbearable; thou art irresistible.

7—11. Thou art pure; thou art the Creator of Brahman; thou art Bramah; thou art a Brahmacharin; thou art an observer of vows; thou art given to ascetic austerities; thou art infinite; thou art the refuge of all hermits; thou hast many forms; thou art the master of ghosts; thou art three-eyed; thou art fond of thy companions; thou art always seen by Kuvera; thou art dear to Gauri's heart; thou art the father of Kumara; thou art twany; thou hast a bull for thy carrier; thou art clad in a subtile dress; thou are most dreadful; thou art eager to adorn Uma; thou art higher than all that is high; thou art higher than everything; there is nothing higher than thou; thou art the holder of weapons; thou art immeasurable, and thou art the protector of all quarters; thou art clad in golden armour; thou art divine; thou hast the moon as an ornament on thy brow. With fixed attention, I seek refuge with thee, O god!

12. In order that I may successfully tide over this calamity, I sacrifice unto thee, the purest of the pure, offering for thy acceptance the five elements of which my body is made.'

13. Knowing this to be his resolution for accomplishing his object, a golden altar appeared before the great son of Drona.

14. Upon the altar, O king, appeared a blazing fire, filling all the points of the horizon, cardinal and subsidiary, with its effulgence.

15—16. Many powerful beings also, of burning mouths and eyes, of many feet, heads, and arms, adorned with arm-lets set with gems, and with uplifted arms, and looking like elephants and mountains, appeared there. Their faces resembled those of hares, boars, camels, horses, jackals, cows, bears, cats, tigers, pards, crows, apes and parrots.

18—20. And the faces of some were like those of snakes, and others had faces like those of ducks. And all of them were highly effulgent. And the faces of some were like those of wood-peckers, and jays; of tortoises, alligators, porpoises, huge sharks, and whales; of lions, cranes, pigeons, elephants, and shags.

21. Some had faces like those of ravens and hawks; some had ears on their hands; some had thousand eyes; some had huge stomachs; and some had no flesh.

22. And some, O king, had no heads, and some had faces like those of bears. The eyes of some were like fire, and some had fiery features.

23. The hair on the heads and bodies of some were burning, and some had four arms, and some, O king, had faces like those of sheep and goats.

24. The color of some was like that of conchs, and some had faces like conchs, and the ears of some were like [illegible]i some wore garlands made of as also the the voices of some resembled 's son, wor- conchs. d the gate

25. Some had matted lo[illegible] on their heads, and some had five tufts of hair or the head, and some had bald heads. Some had lean stomachs; some had four teeth, some had four tongues, some had ears straight like arrows, and some had diadems on their brows.

26. Some had strings of grass on their bodies, O king, and some had cruly locks. Some had head-gears made of cloth, some had coronets, some had beautiful faces, and some were bedecked with ornaments.

27. Some had ornaments made of lotuses, and some were adorned with flowers. They were hundreds and thousands in number.

28. Some were armed with Sataghnis, some with thunder, and some had mushalas in their hands. Some had Bhushundis, some had nooses, and some had maces in their hands.

29. Some had quivers containing best arrows on their backs, and all were dreadful in battle. Some had standard containing banners and bells, and some were armed with battle-axes.

30. Some had large nooses in their hands, and some had clubs and bludgeons. Some had strong posts in their hands, some had scimitars, and some had snakes with raised hood for their crowns.

31. Some had huge snakes for armlets, and some had beautiful ornaments on their body. Some were covered with dust, some with mire, and all were clad in white robes and garment. Some had blue limbs while others had tawny limbs. And some were beardless.

32. Those beings, called companions, having golden complexions, and filled with joy, played upon drums, horns, cymbals, Jharjharas, Anakas and Gomukhas.

33. And some sang and some danced about crying hideously, and some leapt forward and cut capers and jumped sideways.

34. Quick in their motions, they ran about most dreadfully, the hair on their heads waving in the air, like huge infuriate elephants and frequently sending up loud roars.

35. Terrible, and armed with lances and battle-axes, they were clad in robes of various colors and decked with beautiful garlands and unguents.

36. Adorned with Angadas set with gems, and [illegible]ith uplifted arms, they were po[illegible] great courage. Capable of k[illegible]s by force, they were irres[illegible]ess.

37. [illegible]ks of blood and fat and other animal matter, they lived on the flesh and entrails of animals. Some had their locks tied up above their heads. Some had single tufts on their heads; some had rings on their ears; and some had stomachs resembling earthen cooking vessels.

38. Some were of very short statures, and some were very high. Some were tall and very dreadful. Some had grim features, some had long lips, and some had long gential organs.

39. Some had rich and various kinds of crowns upon their heads; and some had bald heads, and the heads of others were covered with matted locks. They could bring down the sky with the sun, moon, and stars, on Earth, and exterminating the four orders of created things.

40. They know not fear, and are capable of enduring the frowns of Hara.

41. They always act as they like and are the masters of the lord of the three worlds. Always playing merrily they are perfect masters of speech and are entirely shorn of pride.

42. Having got the eight sorts of divine attributes, they are never elated with pride. The divine Hara always wonders at their feats.

43. They are devout worshippers of Mahadeva. Worshipped by them in thought, speech, and deed, the great god protects those worshippers of his, regarding them, in thought, speech, and deed, as his own children.

44. Worked up with rage, they always drink the blood and fat of all haters of Brahma. They always drink also the Soma juice having four kind of taste.

45. Having worshipped the trident-handed deity with Vedic recitations, with Brahmacharya, with ascetic austerities, and with self-restraint, they have secured the companionship of Bhava.

46. The divine Maheshwara, that lord of the past, the present, and the future, as also Parvati, eat with those various clans of powerful beings that partake of their own nature.

47. Causing the universe resound with the sound of various kinds of instruments, with noise of laughter, with loud sounds and cries and leonine roars, they approached Ashwatthaman.

48—49. Landing Mahadeva and spreading an effulgence all around, desirous of increasing the honor of Ashwatthaman and the glory of the great Hara, and wishing to ascertain the extent of Ashwatthaman's power, and desirous also of witnessing the destruction during the hour of sleep, armed with terrible and fierce bludgeons and fiery wheels and battle-axes, that host of strange beings, having terrible forms, came from all sides.

50. They were capable of striking terror to the three worlds by their sight. Beholding them, the, powerful Ashwatthaman however, felt no fear.

51. Armed with bow, and fingers cased in fences made of iguana skins, Drona's son himself offered up his own self as a victim to Mahadeva.

52. Bows were the fuel, and sharp arrows were the ladles, and his own great soul was the libation, in that act of sacrifice.

53. The brave and angry son of Drona then, with mantras offered up his own soul as the victim.

54. Having with dreadful rites worshipped Rudra, of dreadful deeds, Ashwatthaman, with joined hands said to that high-souled deity,—

Ashwattaman said:—

55. 'Born in Angira's family I am about to pour my soul, O god, as a libation on this fire. Accept, O lord, this victim.

56. In this hour of distress, O Soul of the universe, I offer up my own self as the victim, from devotion to thee and with heart fixed in meditation.

57. All creatures exist in thee and thou dost exist in all creatures. Thou art a combination of all high attributes.

58. O lord, O thou that art the refuge of all creatures, I wait as a libation for thee, since I am unable to defeat my enemies. Accept me, O god.'

59. Having said so, Drona's son, ascending that sacrificial altar on which a fire was burning, offered himself up as the victim and entered that burning fire.

60—62. Seeing him stand fixed and with uplifted hands and as an offering unto himself, the divine Mahadeva appeared personally and smilingly said—'With truth, purity, sincerity, resignation, ascetic practices, vows, forgiveness, devotion, patience, thought and word, I have been duly worshipped by Krishna of pure deeds. For this there is none dearer to me than Krishna.

63. For honoring him and at his request I have protected the Panchalas and displayed various sorts of illusion.

64. By protecting the Panchalas I have honored him. They have, however, been assailed by Time. The lease of their lives is over.'

65. Having said so to the great Ashwatthaman, the divine Mahadeva entered Ashwatthaman's body after giving him an excellent and polished sword.

66. Possessed by that divine being, Drona's son was worked up with energy. On account of that energy derived from god-head, he became all powerful in battle.

67. Many invisible beings and Rakshasas went along his right and his left as he started like the lord Mahadeva himself, for entering the camp of his enemies,"

CHAPTER VIII.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "While Drona's son, that great car-warrior, thus proceeded towards the enemy's camp, did Kripa and Bhoja stop from fear.

2. I hope those two great car-warriors, stopped by mean guards, did not fly away secretly, considering their opponents irresistible.

3. Or, have they, after despoiling the camp, the Somakas, and the Pandavas, followed, while still fighting, the highly illustrious path in which Duryodhana has gone.

4. Are those heroes, killed by the Panchalas, sleeping on the naked Earth? Did they perform any feat? Tell me all this, O Sanjaya."

Sanjaya said :—

5. "When the great son of Drona proceeded towards the camp, Kripa and Kritavarman waited at the gate.

6. Seeing them ready to work Ashwatthaman was over-joyed, and addressing them whisperingly, O king, said,—'If you two exert, you can exterminate all the Kshariyas.

7. What should I say, therefore, of this remnant of the (Pandava) army, particularly when it is asleep.

8. I shall enter the camp and move about like Yama. I am sure that you two will act in such a way that no man may escape alive.'

9. Having said so, the sos also the entered the extensive camp of s son, wor-. Shorn of fear, he entered into d the gate where there was no door.

10. Having entered the camp the great hero proceeded, guided by signs, very softly towards Dhrishtadyumna's quarters.

11. Having displayed great feats the Panchalas had been much exhausted in battle. They were sleeping confidently collected together, and by the side of one another.

12. Entering into Dhrishtadyumna's apartment, O Bharata, Drona's son saw the prince of the Panchalas sleeping before him on his bed.

13. He lay on a beautiful sheet of silk upon a rich and excellent bed. Excellent wreaths of flowers were scattered upon that bed and it was perfumed with the powder of incense.

14. Having received a kick from Ashwatthaman the high-souled prince who was sleeping trustfully and fearlessly on his bed, awoke.

15. Feeling that kick, the great prince, irresistible in battle, got up and recognised Drona's son standing before him.

16. As he was rising from his bed, the great Ashwatthaman caught him by the hair of his head and began to press him down on the Earth with his hands.

17. Thus pressed] by Ashwatthaman with great force the prince, from fear as also from sleepiness, was not able to exert his might at that time.

18. Striking him with his foot, O king, on both his throat and breast while his victim roared, Drona's son tried to kill him as if he were an animal.

19. The Panchala prince tore Ashwatthaman with his nails and at last slowly said,—' O preceptor's son, kill me with a weapon, do not delay, O best of men, let me, through you go to the blessed regions.'

20. Having said this much, that slayer of foes, viz., the son of the Panchala king, assailed by that great hero, became silent.

21. Hearing those indistinct sounds of his, Drona's son said,—'O wretch of your race, there is no region for those that kill their preceptor. For this, O wicked man, you do not deserve to be killed with any weapon.'

22. While saying so, Ashwatthaman, worked up with rage, began to strike the vital parts of his victim with his heels, and killed his f[illegible] like a lion killing an infuriate e[illegible]

27. I[illegible]

[illegible]ing of [illegible]e cries of that hero, while he w[illegible]aving,—[illegible]ain, his wives and guards that were in [illegible] ent all got up, O king.

24. Seeing some body crushing the prince with superhuman force, they took the assailant for a supernatural being, and, therefore, made no noise from fear.

26. Having sent him to Yama's abode by such means the greatly energetic Ashwatthaman went out and getting upon his beautiful car waited there.

26. Indeed, coming out of Dhrishtadyumna's camp, O king, Ashwatthman made all the points of the horizon resound with his roars, and then proceeded on his car to other parts of the camp for killing his enemies.

27. After Drona's son, that great car-warrior, had gone away, the women and all the guards began to bewail.

28. Seeing their king killed, all the wives of Dhrishtadyumna, cried aloud sorrowfully.

29. Hearing their lamentations many powerful, Kshatriyas, awaking, put on their armour and came there for enquiring after the cause of their lamentations.

30. Terrified at seeing Ashwatthaman, those ladies in piteous tones asked the men to follow him without delay.

31. They said, we know not whether he is a Rakshasa or a human being. Having killed the Panchala king he waits there.

32. Thereat those foremost of warriors suddenly surrounded Drona's son. The latter killed them all by means of the Rudra weapon.

33. Having killed Dhrishtadyumna and all those followers of his, he saw Uttamaujas sleeping on his bed.

34. Attacking him with his foot on the throat and chest, Drona's son killed that great hero also while the latter suffered greatly.

35. Coming up and taking his comrade for being slain by a Rakshasa, Yudhamanyu speedily struck Drona's son in the chest with a mace.

36. Rushing towards him, Ashwatthaman seized him and brought him down to the ground and killed him like an animal while the latter cried aloud.

37. Having killed Yudhamanyu thus, that hero went against the other car-warriors of the king, who were all asleep.

38. He killed those trembling heroes like animals in a sacrifice. Taking up his sword then, he killed many others.

39. Proceeding along the various roads of the camp one after another, Ashwatthaman, an expert in the use of the sword, saw various Gulmas and killed in no time the unarmed and tired warriors sleeping within them.

40. With that excellent sword he cut off combatants and horses and elephants. Bathed in blood, he appeared like death himself commissioned by Time.

41. Making his foes to tremble by the repeated blows of his sword, Ashwatthaman was covered with blood.

42. Covered as he was with blood, and holding a blazing sword, his form, as he moved about in battle, became exceedingly terrible and superhuman.

43. Those who got up from sleep, O Kuru-hero, became stupefied with the loud noise they heard. Seeing Drona's son, they looked at each other's faces and trembled with fear.

44. Seeing the form of that crusher of foes, those Kshatriyas took him to be a Rakshasa and shut up their eyes.

45. Of terrible form, he moved about in the camp like Yama himself, and at last saw the sons of Draupadi and the residue of the Somakas.

46. Terrified by the noise, and learning that Dhrishtadyumna had been killed those great car-warriors, viz., the sons of Draupadi, armed with bows, shot arrows on Drona's son.

47. Aroused by their noise the Prabhadrakas with Shikhandin at their head, began to strike the son of Drona with their arrows.

48. Seeing them cast their arrows on him, Drona's son uttered a loud roar and became desirous of killing those great car-warriors.

49. Remembering the death of his father, Ashwatthaman became furious with rage, getting down from his car, he made a desperate rush against his enemies.

50. Taking up his bright shield decked with a thousand moons and his massive and celestial sword decked with gold, the great Ashwatthaman rushed against the sons of Draupadi.

51. Then that foremost of men, in that dreadful battle, struck Prativindhya in the abdomen at which the latter, O king, fell down lifeless on the Earth.

52. Having pierced the son of Drona with a lance, the brave Sutasoma rushed at him with his uplifted sword.

53. Ashwatthaman, however, cut off Sutasoma's hand holding the sword, and once more struck him on the back. Thereat Sutasoma dropped down dead.

54. Taking up a car-wheel with his two hands, the brave Shatanika, the son of Nakula, violently struck Ashwatthaman on the breast.

55. The great Ashwatthaman violently assailed Shatanika after he had discharged that car-wheel. Exceedingly agitated, Nakula's son dropped down upon the earth, upon which Drona's son severed his head from his body.

56. Then taking up a spiked bludgeon, Shrutakarman attacked Ashwatthaman. Furiously rushing at Drona's son, he struck him violently on the left part of his forehead.

57. Ashwatthaman struck Shrutakarman with his excellent sword on the face. Senseless and his face disfigured, he dropped down dead on the Earth.

58. At this noise, the heroic Shrutakirti, that great car-warrior, coming up, made a downpour of arrows on Ashwatthaman.

59. Counteracting those arrowy showers with his shield, Ashwatthaman sundered from his enemy's trunk his beautiful head bedecked with ear-rings.

60. Then the destroyer of Bhishma, viz., the great Shikhandin, with all the Prabhadrakas, assailed the hero from every side with various sorts of weapons. Shikhandin struck Ashwatthaman with an arrow in the midst of his two eye-brows.

61. Worked up with anger at this, the powerful son of Drona, approached Shikhandin and cut him in two parts with his sword.

62. Having killed Shikhandin, Ashwatthaman, filled with rage, rushed furiously against the other Prabhadrakas. He proceeded also against the residue of Virata's force.

63. Gifted with great strength, Drona's son killed the sons, the grandsons, and the followers of Drupada, taking them out one after another.

64. An expert in the use of the sword, Ashwatthaman then, rushing against other warriors, cut them down with his sword.

65—66. The warriors in the Pandava camp saw that embodiment as representing Death-night, of black visage, and having bloody mouth and bloody eyes, wearing crimson garlands and smeared with crimson unguents, clad in a single piece of red cloth, with a noose in h[illegible] and resembling an elderly lady, [illegible]s also the dreadful song, and standing er[illegible]s son, wor[illegible] their eyes, and about to lead a[illegible] the gate and horses and elephants all b[illegible] a strong rope.

67. She appeared to take away various kinds of spirits, with dishevelled hair and bound together in a chord, as also, O king, many powerful car-warriors divested of their weapons.

68. On previous days, O sire the leading warriors, of the Pandava camp used to see in their dreams that figure carrying away the sleeping warriors and Drona's son striking them behind.

69. The Pandava soldiers dreamt that lady and Drona's son every night from the day when the battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas first began.

70. Assailed before by Destiny, they were now struck by Drona's son who terrified them all with the dreadful cries.

71. Assailed by Destiny, and remembering the spectacle they had dreamt, the brave warriors of the Pandava camp, identified it with what they now saw.

72. At the noise made, hundreds and thousands of Pandava bowmen in the camp awoke from their sleep.

73. Ashwatthaman cut off the legs of some, and the hips of others, and cut some in their back, moving about like the Destroyer himself let loose by Time.

74. The Earth, O lord, was soon strewn with human beings that were disfigured or trampled down by elephants and horses.

75. Many of them loudly cried—What is this?—Who is this one?—What is this noise?—Who is doing what?—While crying thus Drona's son killed them.

76. That best of strikers, viz., the son of Drona, sent to the abode of Yama all those Pandus and Srinjayas who were deprived of armour and weapons.

77. Terrified at that noise many got up from sleep. Stricken with fear, and beside themselves with sleep, those warriors seemed to disappear before the fury of Ashwatthaman.

78. The thighs of many were paralysed and some were so stupefied that they lost their energy. Crying and stricken with fear, they began to kill one another.

79. Drona's son once more mounted his car, and taking up his bow sent many with his arrows to Yama's abode.

80. Other brave warriors and foremost of men that got up from sleep, as they [illegible]ds Ashwatthaman, were killed [illegible] could approach him and were [illegible]s victims to that Death-night.

81. [illegible]hing many with that best of cars, he moved through the encampment, and enshrouded his foes with repeated showers of arrows.

82. Again with that beautiful shield of his, bedecked with a hundred moons, and with that sky-colored sword of his, he moved about amidst his enemies.

83. Like an elephant agitating a large lake, Drona's son, who cannot be checked in battle, agitated the camp of the Pandavas.

84. Awaked by the noise, O king, many warriors, still possessed by sleep and fear ran hither and thither.

85. Many cried and many uttered unmeaning jargon. Many could not secure their weapons and armour.

86. The hairs of many were dishevelled, and many could not recognise one another. Having got up from sleep, many fell down, fatigued; some walked purposely here and there.

87. Breaking their chords, elephants and horses passed excreta and urine.

88. Many, huddled together, set up a great confusion, some stricken with fear, prostrated themselves on the Earth. The animals of the camp crushed them there.

89. While the camp was in this state of confusion, Rakshasas, O king, cried aloud in joy, O Bharata-chief.

90. That loud noise, O king, of the ghostly beings, filled all the points of the horizon and the sky.

91. Hearing the piteous cries of elephants, horses, breaking their chords, rushed hither and thither, crushing the warriors in the camp.

92. As those animals rushed here and there, the dust raised by them made the night doubly dark.

93. When that thick darkness set in, the warriors in the camp became perfectly bewildered; fathers recognised not their sons, brothers recognised not their brothers.

94. Elephants, striking riderless elephants, and horses, striking riderless horses, assailed and broke and crushed the people that stood in their way.

95. Confused combatants rushed and killed one another, and felling those that stood in their way crushed them into pieces.

96. Senseless and overcome with sleep, and covered with darkness, men, urged on by fate, killed their own comrades.

97. The guards, living the gates iu their charge, and those at duty at the outposts leaving their posts, fled away for their lives, senseless, and not knowing where they proceeded.

98. They killed one another, the slayers, O lord, not recognising the killed. Assailed by fate, they cried after their fathers and sons.

99. While they fled, leaving behind their friends and relatives, they called upon one another, mentioning their families and names.

100. Uttering cries of lamentation others dropped down on the Earth. In the thick of the batle Drona's son, recognising them, killed them all.

101. While being killed, other Kshatriyas lost their senses, and, striken with fear, tried to fly away from the camps.

102. Those men that tried to fly away from the camp for saving their lives were killed by Kritavarman and Kripa at the gate.

103. Having no weapons, instruments and armour, and with dishevelled hair, they clasped their hands. Trembling with fear, they stood on the ground, The two Kuru-warriors. however, (who were on their cars) gave none an opportunity.

104. None amongst those that escaped from the camp was allowed to go by those two wicked persons, viz., Kripa and Kritavarman.

105. Then again for pleasing Drona's son, those two set fire to the Pandava camp in three places.

106. When the camp was lighted, Ashwatthaman, O king, moved about sword in hand, and crushing his foes with great skill.

107. Some of his brave enemies rushed furiously towards him and some ran here and there. That foremost of men, with his sword, deprived all of them of their lives.

108. Filled with rage the brave son of Drona, struck down some of the warriors, cutting them in two with his sword like sessame stalks.

109. The Earth, O Chief of Bharata was covered with the bodies of foremost of men, and horses and elephants huddled together and bewailing.

110. When thousands of men had fallen down lifeless, numberless headless trunks stood up and fell down.

111. Ashwatthaman, O Bharata, cut off arms, adorned with armlets and holding weapons, and heads, and things resembling trunks of elephants, and hands, and feet.

112. The great son of Drona wounded the backs of some, cut off the heads of some, and caused some to retreat from the fight.

113. He cut off some at the middle, and cut off the ears of others, and struck others on the shoulders, and pressed down the heads of some into their trunks.

114. As Ashwatthaman moved about in this way killing thousands of men, the deep night became more dreadful for the darkness that set in.

115. The Earth became terrible to look at, covered with thousads of human beings, dead and dying, and numberless horses and elephants.

116. Severed by the angry son of Drona, his enemies dropped down on the Earth that was then covered with Yakshas and Rakshasas and rendered frightful with (broken) cars and killed horses and elephants.

117. Some called upon their brothers, and some upon their fathers and some upon their sons. And some said—'The son of Dhritarastra in anger could never perform such acts in battle as these which wicked Rakshasas have done during the hour of our sleep! It is only for the absence of the Parthas that this great destruction is going on!

119. That son of Kunti who had Janarddana for his protector, is incapable of being defeated even by celestials, Asuras, Gandharvas, Yakshas, and Rakshasas.

120. Devoted to Brahma, truthful in speech, self-controlled, and kind to all creatures, that son of Pritha, called Dhananjaya never kills one who is asleep, or one who is careless, or one who has thrown off his weapons, or one who joins his hands for protection, or one who is retreating, or one whose hairs have been dishevelled.

121. Alas, they are wicked Rakshasas, who are perpetrating such terrible acts upon ourselves!'—Saying so, many laid themselves down.

122. The loud sound caused by the cries and groans of men stopped, within a short time.

123. The earth being drenched with blood, O king, that thick and dreadful dust soon disappeared.

124. Thousands of men who were writhing in agnoy, stricken with anxiety, and filled with despair, were killed by Ashwatthaman like Rudra k[illegible] animals.

125. Many who laid them[illegible] on the ground clasping one a[illegible], and many who tried to fly away, and many who tried to hide themselves, and many who fought, were all killed by the son of Drona.

126. Burnt by fire and killed by Ashwatthaman, the men, beside themselves, killed one another.

127. Before half the night was over, the son of Drona, O king, killed the large army of the Pandavas.

128. That night, so terrible and destructive of men and elephants and horses filled with joy all creatures that range in darkness.

129. Many Rakshasas and Pishachas were seen there, eating human flesh and drinking the blood.

130. They were dreadful, tawny-colored, terrible, of admantine teeth, and covered with blood. With matted locks on their heads, their thighs were long and massive; they had five feet, their stomachs were huge.

131. Their fingers were set backwards. They had harsh temper and ugly features, and their voice was loud and terrible. They had rows of tinkling bells tied to their persons. They had blue throats, they looked very frightful.

132, High cruel and incapable of being looked at, without fear, and hating nothing, they came there with their children and wives. Rakshasas of various forms that came there.

133. Drinking the blood that flowed in streams, they were filled with joy and began to dance in separate parties.—"This is excellent!—This is pure!—This is very sweet!"—these were the words they gave expression to.

134. Having lived upon fat, marrow, bones and blood, others carnivorous creatures, began to eat the delicate parts of corpses.

135—136. Others, drinking the fat that ran in streams, ran about naked over the field. Tens of thousands and millions of other carnivorous beings having different faces of great ferocity, and living upon dead flesh, came there. Grim and gigantic Rakshasas came there in numerous bands.

137. Other ghostly creatures overjoyed with eating enough also came there in that dreadful carnage.

138. When morning came, Ashwatthaman wanted to leave the camp.

[illegible] 27. I was then covered with human [illegible]ing of K[illegible]he held the sword so firmly that [illegible]aving,—[illegible]d sword, O king, became one.

140. Having walked in the path of wicked warriors, Ashwatthaman, after that destruction, looked like the blazing fire at the end of the cycle, reducing all creatures to ashes.

141. Having perpetrated that massacre according to his promise, and having troddenn that untrodden way, Drona's son, O king, forgot his sorrow for the death of his father.

142. The Pandava camp, was perfectly calm when Drona's son had entered it in the night, because all the inmates were asleep. After the slaughter of the night, when all became once more quiet, Ashwatthaman came out from it.

143. Having come out of the encampment, the brave Ashwatthaman met his two companions and, filled with joy, communicated to them his achievment gladdening them, O king, by the news.

144. Those two, in return, who always sought his good, gave him the pleasant news of how they also had killed thousands of Panchalas and Srinjayas at the gates.

145. Thus did that night bring on the destruction of the Somakas who were carelessly sunk in sleep.

146. The course of time, forsooth, is irresistible. Those who had rooted us out were themselves exterminated now."

Dhritarashtra said :—

147. "Why is it that that great car-warrior, viz., the son of Drona, did not perform such an act before, although he had tried his best for conferring victory upon Duryodhana?

48. Why did that great bowman do this after the death of the wretched Duryodhana? You should tell me all this!"

Sanjaya said :—

149. "Through fear of the Parthas, O descendant of Kuru, Ashwatthaman could not perform such a feat then! It was for the absence of the Partha and the intelligent Keshava as also of Satyaki, that Drona's son could achieve it.

150. Who is there, not even excluding the lord Indra, that can kill them before these heroes? Besides, O king, Ashwatthaman could achieve this only because the men were all asleep.

151—153. Having caused that great destruction of the Pandava forces, those three great car-warriors, viz., Ashwatthaman and Kripa and Kritavarman, meeting together, said,—'Good luck.'—His two companions congratulated Ashwatthaman, and embraced him. Joyfully the latter said :—'All the Panchalas, as also all the sons of Draupadi, have been killed. All the Somakas and the remnant of the Matsyas, have been killed by me.

154. Crowned with success, let us soon go there where the king is! If the king be still alive, we will communicate to him this joyful news.'"

CHAPTER IX.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Sanjaya said :—

1. "Having killed all the Panchalas and the sons of Draupadi, the three Kuru heroes together came where Duryodhana was lying, struck down by the enemy.

2. Arrived there, they found that life had not been wholly extinct in the king. Getting down from their cars, they encircled your son.

3. The Kuru king, O Sire, was lying there with broken thighs. Almost senseless, his life was about to pass away. He was vomiting blood at times, stretching downwards.

4. He was then encircled by a large number of carnivorous animals of dreadful forms, and by wolves and hyenas, that stood near for feeding upon his body.

5. With great difficulty the king was keeping off those beasts of prey that waited there for feasting upon his body. He was suffering great pain.

6. Seeing him thus lying on the Earth, covered with blood, the three heroes who were the only remnant of his army, viz, Ashwatthaman, Kripa and Kritavarman, were possessed with grief and sat surrounding him.

7. Encircled by those three great car-warriors who were covered with blood and who sighed heavily, the Kuru king looked like a sacrificial altar surrounded by the three heroes weeping in sorrow.

9. Wiping the blood from off his face with their hands, they bewailed piteously in the hearing of the king lying prostate on the field of battle.

Kripa said :—

10. 'There is nothing difficult which Destiny cannot bring about, since even this king Duryodhana who was the master of eleven Akshauhinis of troops, sleeps on the naked ground, struck down by the foe and bathed in blood.

11. See, fond as he was of the mace, that mace made of pure gold is still by the side of the king whose lustre still resembles that of pure gold.

12. In no battle did that mace leave this hero! Even now, when he is about to go to heaven, that weapon abandons not this illustrious hero.

13. See that weapon, made of pure gold, is still by the side of this hero like a loving wife by the side of her husband stretched on his bed in his chamber of sleep.

14. Witness the misfortunes brought about by Time! This destroyer of enemies who used to walk at the head of all crowned kings, is now covered with the dust.

15. He who had formerly struck down many enemies and caused them lie on the naked earth that king of the Kurus, lies to-day on the bare ground, struck down by enemies.

16. He to whom hundreds of kings used to bow down in fear, lies to-day on the battle-field, encircled by beasts of prey!

17. The Brahmanas formerly used to wait upon this lord for money. Alas, beasts of prey wait upon him to-day for feasting upon his body.'

Sanjaya said :—

18. Seeing that Kuru's Chief lying on the earth Aswatthaman, O best of the Bharatas, bewailed thus piteously.—'O foremost of kings, all people recognised you as the best of all bowmen! People also said that in mace fight you, a disciple of Shankarshana, were like Kuvera himself.

20. How then, O sinless one, could Bhima find any defect in you. You were ever powerful and skilful. He on the other hand, O king, is a wicked man.

21. Forsooth, O king, time in this world is more powerful than every thing else, for we see even you struck down by Bhimasena in battle.

22. Alas, how could the wretched and mean Vrikodara unfairly strike you down, righteous as you always were in all your action. Forsooth! Time is irresistible.

23. Alas, having invited you to a fair fight, Bhimasena, displaying his power broke your thighs.

24. Fie on that wretched [illegible]ira also the [illegible] who allowed the head of one son, wor[illegible] unfairly in battle to be touch[illegible] the gat[illegible] foot.

25. In all battles warriors will certainly censure Vrikodara as long as the world will exist. Forsooth, you have been struck down unrighteously.

26. The valiant Rama of Yadu's family, O king, always used to see that there is no one equal to Duryodhana.

27. The Vrishni hero in mace fight, O Bharata, used to boast of you, O lord, in every assembly. Saying, Duryodhana, of the race of Kuru, is a worthy disciple of mine.

28. You have achieved that end which Rishis consider to be the mete of a Kshatriya killed in battle facing the foe.

29. I do not, O foremost of men, grieve for you, O Duryodhana! I grieve only for your mother Gandhari and your father, childless as they now are.

30. Stricken with grief, they will have to travel over the Earth, begging their food! Fie on the Vrishni hero Krishna, and on wicked Arjuna.

31. They consider themselves as moral, yet both of them were indifferent while you were killed! How will the other Pandavas, shameless as they are, O king, speak of the manner in which they have brought about your death?

32. You are highly fortunate, O son of Gandhari, since you have been killed on he field of battle, O foremost of men, while fighting fairly with the enemy.

33. Alas, what will be the condition of Gandhari who is now childless, and who had lost all her kinsmen and relatives what also will be the condition of the blind king.

34. Fie on Kritavarma, on myself, as also on the powerful car-warrior Kripa, since we have not yet gone to heaven with your royal self.

35. Fie on us, mean as we are, since we do not follow you—the grantor of all wishes, the protector of all men, and the benefactor of all your subjects.

36. Through you the houses of Kripa, of myself, and of my father, as well as those of our dependants, are full of riches.

37. Through your grace, ourselves with our friends and relatives have celebrated many leading sacrifices with profuse presents to Brahmanas.

38. Where shall such sinful persons as ourselves now go, since you have gone to hea[illegible]ng with you all the kings of the E[illegible] 27. I [illegible]ing of Kuse we three, O king, do not to[illegible]ving,—who are about to achieve the highest end (of life), we are bewailing thus.

40. Deprived of your company, of wealth, alas, what will be our lot since we do not follow you.

41. Forsooth, O Kuru king, we shall have to rove in sorrow on the Earth! Deprived of you, O king, where can we enjoy peace and where can we have happiness.

42. Going from this world, O king, and meeting with those powerful car-warriors gone before you, show your respect to them, at my request, according to their rank and age.

43. Having adored your preceptor, that foremost of bowmen, tell him, O king, that Dhrishtadyumna has been killed by me.

44—45. Embrace king Valhika, that great car-warrior, as also the king of the Sindhus, and Somadatta, and Bhurishravas, and the other foremost of kings gone before you to heaven. At my request, embrace all of them and enquire after their well-being.

Sanjaya continued:—

46—47. Having addressed thus the senseless king, and who was lying with broken thighs, Ashwatthaman once more looked at him and said:—' If, O Duryodhana, you have any vitality in you still, listen to these agreeable words. On the side of the Pandavas, only seven are alive, and among the Dhartarashtras, only we three survive.

48. The seven on their side are the five brothers and Vasudeva and Satyaki; on our side, we three are myself and Kripa and Kritavarman.

49. All the sons of Draupadi as also all the children of Dhrishtadyumna have been killed. All the Panchalas too, as also the remnant of the Matsyas, O Bharata, have been killed.

50. Mark the vengeance taken for their offence. The Pandavas are now childless. While asleep, the men and animals in their camp have all been killed.

51. Entering into their camp in the night, O king, I have killed the sinful Dhrishtadyumna, as one kills an animal.'

52—53. Having heard these words that were so agreeable to his heart, Duryodhana regained his consciousness and replied:— ' That which neither Ganga's son, nor Karna, nor your father, could accomplish, you have done to-day, accompanied by Kripa and Bhoja.

54. You have killed that mean wretch, viz., Dhrishtadyumna, who was the Commander of the Pandava forces, as also Shikhandin. For this I regard myself equal to Indra himself.

55. Good be to you all. May you prosper. All of us will again meet together in heaven.'—Having said this the great king of the Kurus became silent.

56. Casting off his sorrow for all his killed kinsmen, he then breathed his last. His soul went to holy heaven, while his body only remained on Earth.

57. Thus, O king, your son Duryodhana died. Having caused the battle first, he was killed by his enemies.

58. The three heroes repeatedly embraced the king and looked steadfastly at him. They then got upon their cars.

59. Having heard the piteous cries of Drona's son, I came away early in the morning towards the city.

60. Thus the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas have been killed. Great and terrible has been that destruction, O king, brought on by your evil policy.

61. After your son's death, I was striken with grief and the spiritual insight which the Rishi gave, has been lost by me."

Vaishampayana said :—

62. "Hearing of his son's death, the king, sighed heavily and was stricken with great anxiety."

CHAPTER X.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "After the termination of the night, the driver of Dhrishtadyumna's car communicated to king Yudhishthira the great slaughter that had been caused during the hour of sleep.

The Driver said :—

2. 'The sons of Draupadi, O king, have been killed, with all the children of Drupada himself, while they were carelessly and trustfully asleep in their own camp.

3. During the night, O king, your camp has been exterminated by the cruel Kritavarman, and Kripa the son of Gotama, and the sinful Ashwatthaman.

4. Killing thousands of men and elephants and horses with lances and darts and battle-axes, those men have rooted out your army.

5. While your army was being killed like a forest hewn down with axes, a loud cry of lamentation was heard rising from your camp.

6. I am the sole survivor, O king, of that vast host. I have escaped with difficulty from Kritavarman at a time when he was careless.

7. Hearing this evil news, Kunti's son Yudhishthira, however endued with fortitude, dropped down on the Earth, stricken with grief at the loss of his sons.

8. Going forward, Satyaki clasped the king. Bhimasena and Arjuna and the two sons of Madri also stretched out their arms.

9. Having regained his senses, the son of Kunti bewailed in grief. 'Alas, having defeated the enemy, we have ourselves been defeated in the end.

10. The course of events cannot even be ascertained even by persons possessing spiritual insight. The enemies who were defeated have become victorious. Ourselves, again, while victorious are defeated.

11. Having killed brothers and friends, fathers, sons, well-wishers, kinsmen, counsellors, and having defeated them all, we ourselves are defeated at last.

12. Misery appears like prosperity, and prosperity looks like misery. This our victory is twined into defeat. Our victory therefore, has terminated in defeat.

13. Having gained the victory, I am obliged to grieve as an afflicted wretch. How, can I consider it as a victory? In sooth, I have been doubly defeated by the enemy.

14. They for whose sake we gained the sinful victory by killing our kinsmen and friends, after acquiring victory, have been defeated by vanquished foes that were heedful.

15—16. Alas, through carelessness have they been killed who had escaped from even Karna, that warrior who had barbed arrows and nalikas for his teeth, the sword for his tongue, the bow for his mouth, and the twang of the bow, and the sound of palms for his roars,—that angry Karna who never took to heels from battle, and who was foremost of men.

17—18. Alas, those princes who succeeded in crossing, by boats made by their own excellent weapons, the great D[illegible] lso the [illegible] having cars for its deep lakes, [illegible]n, wor[illegible] its waves, the ornaments of war [illegible]e gat[illegible] gems, car-horses for its animals, [illegible] and swords for its fishes, elephants for its alligators, bows for its whirlpools, powerful weapons for its foam, and the sign of battle for its moonrise causing it to swell with energy, and the twang of the bow and the sound of palms for its roar,—alas, even those princes have been killed from carelessness.

19. There is, in this world, no greater cause of death, for men, than carelessness. Prosperity leaves off a careless man from every side, and every kind of misery befalls him.

20—21. The tall standard with beautiful top that stood on his car was the wreath of smoke that certainly indicated the Bhishma-fire. Arrows formed its flames, and anger was the wind that fanned it. The twang of his terrible bow and the sound of his palms formed the roar of that fire. Armour and various kinds of weapons were the homa libations that were poured into it. The huge hostile army was the heap of dry grass that was consumed by that fire. Alas, even they who had borne that fierce fire whose terrible power was represented by the mighty weapons in Bhishma's hands, have at last fallen through carelessness.

22. A careless person can never gain knowledge, asceticism, prosperity, or fame. See, Indra has acquired great felicity after killing all his enemies carefully.

23. See, the few survivors among our enemies have, through our carelessness, killed so many sons and grandsons of kings each of whom resembled Indra himself. Alas, they have died like merchants with rich good, dying through carelessness in a shallow river after having crossed the great deep.

24. They whose bodies are now lying on the naked ground, killed by those vindictive wretches, have, forsooth, gone to heaven. I lament for the princess Krishna. Alas, she will be drowned to-day in a sea of sorrow.

25. Hearing of the destruction of her brothers and sons and her revered father, the king of the Panchalas, forsooth, she will drop down senseless on the Earth. She will not rise again with her body emaciated by grief.

26. Unable to bear such affliction, and ever worthy of happiness, alas, what will be her condition. Pained greatly by the destruction of her sons and brothers, she will be like one scorched by fire.

27. Bewailing thus with sorrow, that king of Kuru's race, then addressed Nakula, saying,—'Go and bring the hapless princess Draupadi here with all her maternal relations.'

28. Following that mandate of the king who was righteous like Yama himself, Nakula speedily proceeded on his car to the palace of Draupapi where that princess lived with all the wives of the Panchala king.

29. Having sent the son of Madri, Yudhishthira, moved by grief, proceeded, with tearful eyes and accompanied by his friends to the field on which his sons had fought and which was filled with various kinds of creatures.

30. Having entered that cursed field, containing many dreadful sights, the king saw his sons, well-wishers, and friends, all lying on the ground, bathed in blood, their bodies wounded, and heads severed from their trunks.

31. Seeing them in that condition, Yudhishthira, that best of pious men, became deeply afflicted. That Kuru chief then began to weep aloud and dropped down on the Earth, senseless, along with all his followers."

CHAPTER XI.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Seeing his sons, grandsons, and friends, all killed in battle, the king was filled with great grief, O Janamejaya.

2. Recollecting those sons and grandsons and brothers and allies, the king was stricken with a deep sorrow.

3. Senseless and trembling, his eyes were full of tears. His friends then, began anxiously to comfort him.

4. At that time, Nakula, a skilful messenger, arrived there on his car effulgent like the sun, accompanied by the princess Krishna in great affliction.

5. She had been living at Upaplavya. Having heard that heart-rending news about the destruction of all her sons, she became exceedingly moved.

6. Trembling like a plantain tree shaken by the wind, the princess Krishna, arrived before Yudhishthira, and fell down afflicted with sorrow.

7. Her face, having eyes like full-blown lotuses, seemed to be darkened by sorrow like the Sun himself when covered with darkness.

8. Seeing her prostrate on the Earth, the wrathful Vrikodara, advancing hastily, raised her up and clasped her with his arms.

9—10. The beautiful lady, comforted by Bhimasena, began to weep, and addressing Yudhishthira with his brothers, said,—'By good luck, O king, having obtained the whole Earth, you will enjoy her after the death of your brave sons while observing the Kshatriya duties.

11. By good luck, O son of Pritha, you are happy to think that you have obtained the whole Earth. By good luck, your thoughts do not dwell on Subhadra's son whose movement was like that of an infuriate elephant.

12. By good luck, you do not, like myself while living at Upaplavya, recollect your heroic sons killed while following Kshatriya duties.

13. O son of Pritha, hearing of the slaughter of those sleeping heroes by Drona's sinful son, grief burns me as if I were in the midst of fire.

14—15. If Drona's son is not compelled to reap the fruit of his sinful deed,—if, displaying your prowess in battle, you do not kill that sinful wretch, along with his followers,—then, listen to me, ye Pandavas, I shall sit here in Praya.'

16. Saying so, the helpless Krishna, the daughter of Yajnasena, sat by the side of king Yudhishthira the just.

17—18. Seeing his dear queen sit in Praya, the royal and pious sage Yudhishthira addressed her, saying,—'O auspicious lady, you do not follow the code of morality, your sons and brothers have met with a noble death. You should not grieve for them.

19. Regarding Drona's son, he has gone to a distant forest, O beautiful princess. How can you then, O lady, bring about his fall in battle.'

Draupadi answered :—

20. 'I have heard that Drona's son has a gem on his head, born with him. I shall see that gem brought to me after his death in battle. Placing that gem on your head, O king, I shall live. This is my resolution.'

21—22. Having said these words to the royal son of Pandu, the beautiful Krishna approached Bhimasena and said these important words to him :—'Remembering the duties of a Kshatriya, O Bhima, you should help me. Kill that sinful wretch like Magavat slaying Shamvara.

23—24. There is no one in this world equal to you in prowess. It is known throughout the world how during a great calamity you became at the town of Varanavata the refuge of all the Parthas. When again we were seen by Hidimva, it was you who rescued us.

25. Like Indra rescuing his wife, the daughter of Puloma, you saved me in Virata's city, from a great danger.

26—27. Like those great deeds, O Partha, performed by you formerly, kill now, O slayer of foes, the son of Drona and be happy.'—Hearing these and other piteous cries of the princess, Kunti's son the powerful Bhima, could not bear them.

28. He got upon his great golden car, and took his beautiful bow with its arrow fixed on the string.

29. Making Nakula his charioteer, and determined upon killing the son of Drona, he began to draw his bow and made his horses to be urged without delay.

30. Those horses, fleet as the wind, urged, run at a furious speed.

31. Brave and energetic as he was, Bhima started from the Pandava camp and proceeded quickly along the track of Ashwatthaman's car.'

CHAPTER XII.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. "After the brave Bhimasena had started, that Yadu hero, having eyes like lotus petals, addressed Kuru's son, Yudhishthira, saying,—O son of Pandu, beside himself with grief at the death of his sons, this brother of yours, goes alone to battle for killing the son of Drona,

3. O Bharata chief, of all your brothers, Bhima is dearest. Seeing him in a great danger, why do you not stir yourself.

4. The weapon called Brahmashira, which Drona, gave his son, is capable of consuming the whole world.

5. Pleased with Dhananjaya, the illustrious preceptor, that foremost of all wielders of bows, had given him that very weapon.

6. His only son also then begged it of him. Unwillingly he communicated the knowledge of that weapon to Ashwatthaman.

7—8. The illustrious Drona knew very well the restlessness of his son, and accordingly commanded him, saying,—Even when overtaken by the greatest calamity, O child, in the midst of battle, you should never use this weapon, specially against men.

9. Thus the preceptor Drona spoke to his son. Some time after he again spoke, saying,—O foremost of men, it seems, you will not, follow the path of the righteous.

10. Hearing those bitter words of his father the wicked Ashwatthaman, giving up all hopes of prosperity, began to wander sorrowfully over the Earth.

11. Then, O Kuru chief, while you were living in the forest, he came to Dwaraka and lived there, adored of the Vrishnis.

12—14. One day, after he had settled in Dwaraka, he came to me, alone when I myself was also alone on the sea-coast, and there smilingly said,—O Krishna, that weapon, called Brahmashira adored of gods and Gandharvas, which my father the preceptor of the Bharatas, having prowess incapable of being baffled, had obtained from Agastya after practising the severest penances, is now with me, as it is with my father.

15. O foremost one of Yadu, in exchange for that celestial weapon, give me your discus which is capable of killing all enemies in battle.

16—17. While with joined hands he thus begged of me my discus, myself, for pleasing him, told him these words,—Gods, Danavas, Gandharvas, men, birds and snakes, assembled together, cannot equal even a hundredth part of my energy.

18. I have this bow, this arrow, this discus, and this mace! I will give you whichever amongst them you wish to have from me.

19. Without giving me the weapon you wish to give, take from among these weapons of mine that which you will be able to wield and use in battle.

20. Thus addressed, the illustrious son of Drona, as if challenging me, wanted my discus of excellent nave and hard as thunder, having a thousand spokes, and made of iron.

21. I said to him take it. Thus spoken to, he rose all on a sudden and seized the discus with his left hand.

22. He could not, however, even move the weapon from the spot where it lay. He then tried to catch it with his right-hand.

23—24. Having caught it then very firmly and displaying all his strength, he still failed to either wield or move it. At this, Drona's son became sorry. Being worn out with the exertions he stopped.

25—29 When he ceased cherishing that desire I addressed the anxious and senseless Ashwatthaman and said,—He who is always known as the best of all men that holder of Gandiva, that warrior having white horses yoked to his car, that hero having the emblem of a monkey on his standard, that hero who, desirous of defeating in a wrestling encounter the god of gods, viz., the blue-throated lord of Uma, pleased the great Shankara himself, that Phalguna than whom I have no dearer friend on Earth, that friend to whom there is nothing that I cannot give including my very wives and children, that dear friend Partha of pure deeds, never said unto me, O Brahmana, such words as these which you have said.

30—32. That son whom I got by practising ascetic penances and observing the austere Brahmacharya for twelve years on the Himavat where I had gone for the purpose, that son of mine, viz., the energetic Pradyumna a portion of Sanatkumara himself, begotten by me upon my wife Rukmini who had practised vows as austere as mine, that hero even never wanted this best of objects, viz., this peerless discus, which you foolish, as you are, have wanted.

33. The highly powerful Rama never said such words to me! Neither Gada nor Shamva, have ever asked for this.

34. None among the other great car-warriors of the Vrishni and the Andhaka race living in Dwaraka has ever asked this of me.

35. You are the son of the preceptor of the Bharatas, you are esteemed by all the Yadavas! Let me ask you, O best of car-warriors, with whom do you wish to fight with this weapon?'

36. Thus addressed by me, Drona's son replied, saying,—'After adoring you O Krishna, it was my desire to fight with you, you of unfading glory.

37. It was for this, O Krishna, that I prayed for your discus which is worshipped by gods and Danavas! Had I got it I would then have become invincible in the world.

38. Having failed, O Keshava, to my almost unattainable desire, I wish to leave you, O Govinda! Address me plainly now.

39. This terrible weapon is with you, who are the foremost of all terrible persons! You are unrivalled for this weapon. There is none else in this world capable of having it.'

40. Having said so the son of Drona taking many horses and much wealth and various kinds of gems, left Dwaraka.

41. He is wrathful, wicked, restless, and very cruel. He knows the use of the weapon called Brahmashira. Vrikodara should be saved."

CHAPTER XIII.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Having said so that foremost of all wielders of weapons, viz., that delighter of all the Yadavas, got on his excellent car, well furnished with all sorts of powerful weapons.

2. Two pairs of best horses of the Kamvoja breed were yoked to that car and they were adorned with garlands of gold. The Dhur of that best of cars was of the colour of the morning sun.

3. On the right was yoked the horse known as Shaivya; on the left was placed Sugriva; the Parshni was drawn by two others called Meghapushpa and Valahaka.

4. There was on that car a celestial standard adorned with gems and gold and made by the celestial Architect, and standing high like the Maya of Vishnu.

5. Upon that standard was Vinata's son, Garuda, that enemy of snakes perched on the standard-top of Keshava who is the embodiment of truth.

6. Then Hrishikesha, that foremost of all bowmen, got upon that car. After him Arjuna of irresistible deeds and Yudhishthira the king of the Kurus, got upon the same car.

7. Seated on that car, by the side of that Dasharha's hero, who held the bow called Sharnga, the two sons of Pandu shone highly beautiful, like the two Ashwins seated by the side of Vasava.

8. Making them got on that car of his which was adored by all the world, the Dasharha hero urged those best of fleet horses.

9. Those horses then suddenly ran taking after them that excellent vehicle ridden by the two sons of Pandu and by that foremost of Yadu's race.

10. Greatly quick-coursing, as those animals were, bore away the wielder of Sharnga, a loud noise was caused by their motion, like that of birds passing through the air.

11. Running very quickly, they soon met, O foremost of Bharata's race, the mighty bowman Bhimasena in whose wake they had followed.

12. Although those great car-warriors met Bhima, they could not stop that son of Kunti, for filled with anger, he proceeded fiercely towards the enemy.

13. Before the very presence of those illustrious and firm bowmen, Bhima, by means of his very quick-coursing horses, proceeded towards the bank of the river Bhagirathi.

14. He saw the great and illustrious and dark-complexioned and island-born Vyasa sitting near the edge of the water encircled by many Rishis.

15. And he also saw Drona's wicked son sitting by them, covered with dust, clad in a piece of cloth made of Kusha grass, and smeared all over with clarified butter.

16. Taking up his bow with arrows on it, the mighty-armed Bhimasena, the son of Kunti, rushed towards Ashwatthaman, and said,—'Wait, wait!'

17. Seeing that terrible bowman coming towards him bow in hand, and his two brothers on Janarddana's car, Drona's son became exceedingly anxious and thought his end was nigh. Never to be depressed, he thought of that high weapon which he had obtained from his father.

19. He then took up a blade of grass with his left hand. Overcome with misfortune, he inspired that blade of grass with proper mantras and converted it into that powerful celestial weapon.

20. Unable to bear the arrows of the Pandavas and the presence of those wielders of celestial weapons, he cried in anger saying,—' For the destruction of the Pandavas.'

21. Having said these words, O foremost of kings, the brave son of Drona discharged that weapon for stupefying all the worlds.

22. A fire then was begotten of that blade of grass, which appeared capable of destroying the three worlds like the all-destroying Yama at the end of the cycle."

CHAPTER XIV.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. "In the very beginning the powerful hero of Dasharha's, race understood from signs the intention of Drona's son. He said to Arjuna, O son of Pandu, the time is come for the use of that celestial weapon, the use of which you remember and the knowledge of which was given to you by Drona.

3. For protecting yourself as also your brothers, O Bharata, discharge in this battle that weapon which is capable of counteracting all other weapons.

4. Thus addressed by Keshava, Arjuna that destroyer of hostile heroes, quickly got down from the car, taking with him his bow with arrow fixed on the string.

5—6. Wishing good to the preceptor's son to himself, and to all his brothers, that destroyer of foes then bowed to all the gods and all his superiors and discharged his weapon, thinking of the well-being of all the worlds and saying,—'Let this weapon neutralise Ashwatthaman's weapon.'

7. Quickly discharged by the wielder of Gandiva, that weapon blazed up with fierce flames like the all-destroying fire that appears at the end of a cycle.

8. Likewise, the weapon that had been discharged by Drona's energetic son, blazed up with dreadful flames within a huge sphere of fire.

9. Peals of thunder were heard; thousands of meteors, dropped down and all living creatures were filled with great fear.

10. The entire sky was filled with noise and put on a terrible appearance with those flames of fire. The entire earth shook with her mountains, rivers and trees.

11—12. Seeing those two weapons consuming the three worlds, the two great Rishis, viz., Narada who is the soul of every creature, and Vyasa, the grandfather of all the Bharata princes, came there. The two Rishis tried to pacify the two heroes, Ashwatthaman and Dhananjaya.

13. Cognizant of all duties and desirous of the well-being of all creatures, the two energetic sages, stood in the midst of those two blazing weapons.

14. Incapable of being moved by any force, those two great Rishis, placing themselves between the two weapons, stood like two burning fires.

15. Incapable of being checked by any living creature, and worshipped of gods and Danavas, they two acted in this way, counteracting the power of the two weapons and doing good to all the world.

The two Rishis said :—

16. 'Those great car-warriors who have died in this battle were masters of diverse kinds of weapons. They, however, never shot such a weapon upon men. What rash act is this, O heroes, that you have done.' "

CHAPTER XV.

(SAUPITKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "O foremost of men, seeing those two Rishis effulgent like fire, Dhananjaya quickly resolved to withdraw his celestial arrows.

2. Joining his hands, he said to those Rishis,—'I discharged this weapon, saying, —Let it neutralise the enemy's weapon.

3. If I withdraw this great weapon, Drona's sinful son will then, forsooth, consume us all with the power of his weapon.

4—5. You two are like gods. You should find out some means by which our well-being, as also that of the three worlds may be secured.'—Saying so Dhananjaya withdrew his weapon. The withdrawl of that weapon can with difficulty be made by the gods themselves in battle.

6. Not excepting the great Indra himself, there was none save the son of Pandu, who could withdraw that high weapon after it had once been discharged.

7. That weapon was begotten of Brahma energy. No person of impure soul can withdraw it after it is once discharged. Only one who leads the life of a Brahmacharin can do it.

8. If one who has not practised the vow of Brahmacharya tries to withdraw it after having shot it, it strikes off his own head and kills him with all his equipments.

9. Arjuna was a Brahmacharin and an observer of vows. Having secured that almost unattainable weapon, he had never used it even when put into the greatest of difficulties.

10. Truthful, heroic, and leading the life of a Brahmacharin, the son of Pandu was ever obedient to all his superiors. It was for this that he could withdraw his weapon.

11. Seeing those two Rishis standing before him, Drona's son could not by his energy withdraw his own dreadful weapon.

12. Unable to withdraw the great weapon in battle, Drona's son, O king, with a depressed heart, said to the Rishi, Vyasa.

13. In fear of a great calamity, and desirous of saving my life, I discharged this weapon, through fear of Bhimasena, O Sage.

14. This Bhimasena acted sinfully, and dishonestly while killing the son of Dhritarashtra in battle.

15. It is for this, O Rishi, I discharged this weapon ! I dare not, however, withdraw it now.

16. Having put into this irresistible and celestial weapon the energy of fire, I discharged it for the destruction of the Pandavas.

17. Discharged for the destruction of the Pandavas, this weapon, therefore, will take away the lives of all the sons of Pandu.

18. O Rishi, I have, under the influence of anger, done this sinful deed ! I invoked this weapon in battle for the destruction of the Pandavas !'

Vyasa said :—

19. ' Pritha's son Dhananjaya, O child, knew the use of the weapon called Brahmashira. Neither from anger, nor for your destruction in battle, did he discharge that weapon.

20. Arjuna, on the other hand, let it off for baffling your weapon. He has again withdrawn it.

21. Having obtained even the Brahma weapon through your father's instructions the powerful Dhananjaya did not deviate from a Kshatriya's duties.

22. Arjuna is endued with such patience, and honesty. He is, besides, a master of every weapon. Why do you try to bring about the destruction of such a man with all his brothers.

23. The region where the weapon Brahmashira is counteracted by another high weapon, suffers from a drought for twelve years, for the clouds do not pour a drop of water there.

24. Therefore the mighty-armed son of Pandu, although he had the power, would not still, for doing good to living creatures, baffle your weapon with his.

25. The Pandavas should be protected; your self should be protected; the kingdom also should be protected. Therefore, withdraw this your celestial weapon.

26. Drive away from your heart, and let the Pandavas be safe! The royal sage Yudhishthira never wishes to gain victory by perpetrating any sinful act.

27. Give them that gem which is on your head. Taking that, the Pandavas will grant in return your life.'

Drona's son said :—

28. 'This my gem is more valuable than all the wealth that has ever been acquired by the Pandavas and the Kauravas.

29. Whenever this gem is used, the wearer entertains no fear from weapons or disease or hunger. He ceases to have any fear of celestials and Danavas and Nagas.

30. He does not fear the Rakshasas and the robbers, these are the virtues of my gem.

31—33. I cannot, by any means, part with it. Whatever, O holy one, you command me, should be done by me. Here is this gem! Here is myself! This blade of grass, converted into a dreadful weapon, will, however, fall into the wombs of the Pandava women, for this weapon is high and powerful, and cannot be baffled. O Rishi, I am unable to withdraw it, having once discharged it. I will now throw this weapon into the wombs of the Pandava women. As regards your other commands, O Rishi, I will obey them.'

Vyasa said :—

34. 'Do then this. Do not, however, cherish any other purpose. O sinless one. Stop throwing this weapon into the wombs of the Pandava women.'

Vaishampayana said :—

35. Having heard these words of Dwaipayana Vyasa, the son of Drona threw that uplifted weapon into the wombs of the Pandava women.

CHAPTER XVI.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said .—

1—3. "Knowing that that weapon was thrown into the wombs of the Pandava women by Drona's sinful son, Hrishikesha, with a cheerful heart, said these words to him :—'Seeing Virata's daughter who is now daughter-in-law to Arjuna, while she was at Upaplavya, a certain pious Brahmana said, while the Kuru line will become extinct, a son will be born to you. This your son, for that reason, will be called by the name of Parikshit.

4. The words of that pious man shall be fulfilled. The Pandavas shall have a son called Parikshit.'

5—6. While Govinda, that foremost one of the Satwata race, saying these words, Drona's son, filled with anger, replied, saying,—'This, O Keshava, which you say from your partiality for the Pandavas, shall never take place. O you having eyes like lotus petals, my words cannot but be fulfilled.

7. Taken up by me, this weapon of mine shall fall on the fœtus that is in the womb of Virata's daughter,—which, O Krishna, you are so desirous of protecting.'

Krishna said :—

8. 'The fall of this mighty weapon will not be useless. The fœtus will die. But being dead, it will revive and have a long life.

9. As regards yourself, all wise men know you as a coward and a sinful wretch. Always engaged in sinful deeds, you are the slayer of children. Therefore, you must have to bear the fruit of your sinful deeds.

10. For three thousand years you shall have to wander over this earth, without a companion and without being able to talk with any one.

11. Alone, and without any one with you, you shall wander through various countries, O wretch, you shall have to live outside the pale of human society.

12. The stench of puss and blood shall come out from your body, and you shall live in dense forest and dreary moors!

Thou shall wander over the earth, O sinful wight, suffering from all diseases.

13. Coming of age and acquiring a knowledge of the Vedas, the heroic Parikshit, shall obtain all weapons from the son of Sharadwat.

14. Having acquired a knowledge of all high weapons and observing all Kshatriya duties, that righteous king shall rule the earth for sixty years.

15. Moreover, that boy shall become the powerful king of the Kurus, known by the name of Parikshit, before your very eyes, O wicked man.

16. Though burnt by the energy of your weapon's fire, I shall revive him. O lowest of men, witness the power of my austerities and my truth.'

Vyasa said :—

17—18. 'Since, obeying us, you have committed this highly cruel act, and since your conduct is such, although you are a good Brahmana by birth, therefore, those excellent words that Devaki's son has said, will, forsooth, be fulfilled regarding you, because you are living the life of a Kshatriya.'

Ashwatthaman said :—

19. 'With yourself among all men, O Rishi, I shall reside. Let the words of this illustrious and foremost of men prove true.'

Vaishampayana continued :—

20. "Having made over his gem to the great Pandavas, Drona's son cheerlessly proceeded, in their presence, to the forest.

21—22. The Pandavas, who had killed all their foes, put Govinda and the Krishna-Dwaipayana and the great ascetic Narada at their head, and taking the gem that was born with Ashwatthaman, quickly returned to the intelligent Draupadi who was observing the Praya vow."

Vaishampayana said :—

23. "Those foremost of men, borne by their excellent horses, quick-coursing like the wind, came back with Dasharha hero, to their encampment.

24. Quickly getting down from their cars, those great car-warriors, themselves much more afflicted, saw Drupada's daugter Krishna stricken with misery.

25. Approaching the cheerless princess laden with sorrow and grief, the Pandavas with Keshava, sat round her.

26—27. Then the powerful Bhimasena, desired by the king, gave that celestial gem to her and said these words :—'This gem, O amiable lady, is yours. The slayer of your sons has been defeated. Rise, shake off your sorrow, and recollect the duties of a Kshatriya lady.

28. O you of black eyes, when Vasudeva was about to start [from Upaplavya] on his mission of peace, you had said these words to the slayer of Madhu.

29. I have no husbands. I have no sons, nor brothers. Nor are you alive, O Govinda, since the king seeks peace.

30. Those bitter words were addressed by you to Krishna, that foremost of persons. You should recollect these words that were so consistent with Kshatriya usages.

31. The wretched Duryodhana, that thorn in the way of our sovereignty, has been killed. I have quaffed the blood of the living Dusshasana.

32. We have satisfied the debt we owed to our enemy! People, will not able to blame us any longer! Having defeated Drona's son, we have released him for his being a Brahmana and for the respect that should be shown to our deceased preceptor.

33. His fame has been spoiled, O goddess, only his body remains! He has been divested of his gem and on Earth he has been deprived of his weapons."

Draupadi said :—

34. 'I desired only to satisfy our debt for the injury we have suffered. The preceptor's son deserves my respect as the preceptor himself.

35. Let the king put this gem on his head, O Bharata!'—The king then, taking that gem, placed it on his head, as desired by Draupadi and taking it as a gift from the preceptor.

36. Holding on his head that excellent and celestial gem, the powerful king shone like a mountain with the moon above it.

37. Though laden with grief for the death of her sons, the princess Draupadi, possessed of great mental strength, gave up her vow. Then king Yudhishthira enquired of the powerful Krishna, saying the followingwords."

CHAPTER XVII.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—3. "After all the soldiers had been killed during the hour of sleep by those three car-warriors, king Yudhishthira sorrowfully said to Krishna :—'How, O Krishna, could my sons, all of whom were great car-warriors, be killed by the sinful and wretched Ashwatthman who is not an expert in battle?

3. How also could Drona's son kill the children of Drupada, all of whom were masters of weapons, powerful and capable of fighting with hundreds of thousands of enemies?

4. How could he kill that best of car-warriors, viz., Dhrishtadyumna, before whom the great bowman Drona himself could not appear?

5. What act was done by the preceptors' son, O foremost of men, for which he succeeded in killing, single-handed, all our men in battle?'

Krishna said :—

6. 'Drona's son had sought the help of that highest of all the gods, the eternal Mahadeva! For this he could kill single-handed, so large a number of warriors.

7. If Mahadeva is pleased he can grant even immortality! Girisha can give such courage as will succeed in checking Indra himself.

8. I know Mahadeva truly, O foremost of Bharata's race! I know also his various former deeds.

9. He, is the beginning, the middle, and the end of all creatures! This universe acts and moves through his power.

10—11. The powerful Grandfather, desirous of creating living animals saw Rudra; and the Grandfather asked him, saying,—Create living creatures immediately.—Thus addressed the twany haired Rudra said,—So be it!—and plunged himself into the water and practised austerities for a long time, because he was sensible of the defects of living creatures.

12. Having waited for Rudra for a very long time, the Grandfather by his will-power called into being another living being for the purpose of propagating his species.

13. Seeing Girisha plunged into the waters, this (second) being, said to his father,—If there be no other being born before me, then I shall multiply my self.

14. His father replied, saying,—There is no other born before you! Shiva has plunged himself into the water! Go and create living creatures, without any fear.

15. He then created many living creatures, having Daksha for their first, who created all these four-fold creatures.

16. As soon, as they were born, they ran, O king, towards their father, stricken with hunger and desirous of eating him up.

17. The second being whom Brahman had created, thereupon ran towards him, seeking protection from his own offspring. And he said to the Grandfather,—O illustrious one, save me from these, and let these creatures have their food.

18. Then the Grandfather gave herbs and plants and other vegetables as their food, and assigned for the strong the weaker creatures as their food.

19. Their means of sustenance having been thus settled, the newly created creatures all went away where they liked, and cheerfully multiplied their respective species.

20. After the creatures had multiplied and Brahma had become well gratified, the first-born rose from water and saw the living creation.

21—23. He saw that various kinds of creatures had been created and that they had multiplied themselves. Seeing it, Rudra became angry and made his generative organ disappear in the bowels of the Earth. Then soothing him by soft words, Brahman said to him,—O Sarva, what were you doing so long within the water? Why have you made your generetive organ disappear in the bowels of the Earth?

24. Thus accosted, that lord of the universe angrily answered the lord Brahman,—Somebody else has created all these creatures. What purpose then would be fulfilled by this organ of mine.

25. I have, by my active penances, O Grandfather, created food for all these creatures. These herbs and plants also will multiply like those that will live upon them.

26. Saying so, Bhava went away, dispirited and angry, to the foot of the Munjavat mountains for practising austere penances."

CHAPTER XVIII.

(SAUPTIKA PARVA).—Concluded.

The holy one said :—

1. "After the Satya yuga had passed away, the gods, desirous of celebrating a sacrifice, made preparations according to the Vedic prescription.

2. They collected clarified butter and the other necessary articles. And they not only collected the requisites of their sacrifice, but also determined those amongst themselves that should partake of the sacrificial offerings.

3. Not knowing Rudra truly, the gods, O king, reserved no share for the divine Sthanu.

4. Seeing that the celestials reserved no share for him in the sacrificial offerings, Sthanu, clad in deer skins, desired to destroy that Sacrifice and with that object made a bow.

5. There are four sorts of Sacrifices, viz., the Loka-Sacrifice, the Sacrifice of especial rites, the eternal domestic Sacrifice, and the Sacrifice consisting in the gratification of man from his enjoyment of the five elemental substances and their compounds. From these four sorts of Sacrifice that the universe has emanated.

6. Kaparddin made that bow out of the materials of the first and the fourth kinds of Sacrifices. The length of that bow was five cubits.

7. The sacred (mantra) Vashat, O Bharata, was made its string. The four parts, of which a Sacrifice consists, became the ornaments of that bow.

8. Then Mahadeva, worked up with rage, and taking up that bow proceeded to that spot where the celestials were celebrating the Sacrifice.

9. Seeing the illustrious Rudra arrive there dressed as a Brahmacharin and armed with that bow, the goddess Earth shrank with fear and the mountains began to shake.

10. The wind ceased to move, and fire itself, though fed, did not burn. The stars in the sky, in fear, moved irregularly.

11. The Sun's effulgence decreased. The disc of the Moon lost its beauty. The entire sky was covered with a thick darkness.

12. The celestials did not know what to do. Their Sacrifice ceased to blaze forth. The gods were all terrified.

13. Rudra then cut the embodiment of Sacrifice with a dreadful arrow in the heart. Assuming the shape of a deer, the embodied form of Sacrifice, fled away with the god god of fire.

14. Approaching heaven in that form, he shone in beauty. Rudra, however, O Yudhishthira, pursued him through the sky.

15. After Sacrifice had fled away, the gods lost their beauty. Having lost their senses, the gods were bewildered.

16. Then the three-eyed Mahadeva, with his bow, broke in anger the arms of Savitri, and plucked out the eyes of Bhaga and the teeth of pushna.

17. The gods and the several parts of Sacrifice fled away. Some amongst them reeling dropped down senseless.

18. Having agitated them thus the blue-throated Rudra, laughed aloud and whirling his bow, paralysed them.

19. The celestials then cried aloud. At their command, the string of the bow broke. The string having broken, the bow became straight as a line.

20. The gods then came to the god of gods, and, with the embodied form of Sacrifice, sought the protection of the powerful Mahadeva and tried to please him.

21. Pleased, the great god threw his anger into the water. O king, assuming the form of fire, that wrath is always busy with consuming water.

22. He then gave to Savitri his arms, Bhaga his eyes, and Pushna his teeth. And he also restored the Sacrifices themselves, O Pandava.

23. The world was once more saved. The gods assigned to Mahadeva all the libations of clarified butter as his share of sacrificial offerings.

24. O monarch, when Mahadeva had become angry, the whole world was thus agitated, and, when he became gratified, everything was safe. Highly powerful, the god Mahadeva was pleased with Ashwatthaman.

25. Therefore your sons, those great car-warriors, could be killed by that warrior. And therefore also many other heroes, viz., the Panchala's, with all their followers, could be killed by him.

26. You should not think of it. It was not Drona's son that performed that act. It was done through the power of Mahadeva. Do now what should be done next,"

STREE PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA.)

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana) and the highest of all male beings (Nara) and also the goddess of learning (Saraswati) let us cry success.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "After Duryodhana, and all the warriors had fallen, what, O sage, did king Dhritarashtra do after hearing of it.

2. What also did the great Kuru king Yudhishthira the son of Dharma do? What did the three survivors (of the Kuru army, viz.,) Kripa and the others do?

3. I have heard everything about the deeds of Ashwatthaman. Tell me what took place after that mutual denunciation of curses. Tell me all that Sanjaya said to the blind old king!"

Vaishampayana said :—

4. "After he had lost his hundred sons, king Dhritarashtra, stricken with grief on that account, dejected, and looking like a tree shorn of its branches, became stupefied with anxiety and lost his power of speech.

5. Possessed of great wisdom, approaching the king the greatly wise Sanjaya, addressed him, saying,—Why do you grieve, O monarch? Grief is absolutely useless.

6. Eight and ten Akshauhinis of warriors, O king, have been killed. The Earth has become desolate, and is almost empty now.

7. Kings of various countries, united with your son, and have all been killed.

8. Let now the obsequial rites of your fathers, sons, grandsons, kinsmen and friends and preceptors be performed duly.

Vaishampayana continued :—

9. Deprived of sons, counsellors and all his friends, the energetic king Dhritarashtra suddenly dropped down on the Earth like a tree uprooted by the wind.

Dhritarashtra said :—

10. Deprived as I am of sons, counsellors and all my friends, I shall, forsooth, have to rove about sorrowfully over the Earth.

11. What necessity have I now of life itself, deprived as I am of relatives and friends. I am like a bird shorn of its wings and afflicted with decrepitude?

12. Deprived of kingdom, deprived of relatives, and shorn of eyes, I cannot, O you of great wisdom, shine any longer on Earth like a luminary divested of its splendour.

13. I did not follow the advice of friends, of Jamadagni's son, of the celestial Rishi Narada, and of Krishna-Dwaipayana.

14. In the midst of the assembly, Krishna told me what was for my good, saying,—Do away with hostilities, O king! Let your son take the entire kingdom. I did not foolishly follow that advice, and I am now obliged to repent.

15—16. I did not listen to the good counsels of Bhishma. Alas, having heard of the destruction of Duryodhana whose roars were as deep as those of a bull, of the death of Dusshasana and the extinction of Karna and the setting of the Drona-sun, my heart is not sundered into pieces.

17. I do not, O Sanjaya, remember any evil act committed by me in my pristine birth, consequences of which fool as I am, I am now suffering.

18. Forsooth, I committed great sins in my previous lives, for which the great God has made me suffer such a grief.

19. This destruction of all my relatives, well-wishers and friends, at this old age has been brought about by Destiny. Who is there on Earth more afflicted than my wretched self.

20. Therefore, let the Pandavas come and see me this very day determined upon following the long way that leads to the regions of Brahman."

Vaishampayana continued :—

21. "While king Dhritarashtra was thus bewailing, Sanjaya addressed him in the following words for driving away his grief.

22. 'Cast off your grief, O king! You have heard the teachings of the Vedas and various scriptures, from the lips of the old, O king! You have heard those words which the sages said to Srinjaya while the latter was stricken with grief on account of the death of his son.

23. When your son, O king, grew elated with pride, you did not accept the advice offered to you by your well-wisher. You did not, through covetousness, do what was really for your good.

24. Your own intelligence, like a sharp sword, has cut you. You only sought the company of wicked men.

25. Your son had Dusshasana, the wicked son of Radha, the equally wicked Shakuni, Chritrasena and Shalya for his counseller. Your son made the entire world his enemy.

26. Your son, O Bharata, did not follow the words of Bhishma the reverend chief of the Kurus, of Gandhari and Vidura, of Drona, O king, of Kripa the son of Sharadwat, of the mighty-armed Krishna, of the intelligent Narada, of many other Rishis, and of Vyasa himself.

28. Though powerful your son was of little intelligence, proud, always anxious to fight, wicked, ungovernable, and discontented.

29. You are learned, intelligent, and always truthful. Righteous and intelligent persons like yourself, are never stupefied by grief.

30. For this the Kshatriya order has been exterminated, because they did not care for virtue, and always talked of battle, and the fame of your foes enhanced.

31. You had occupied the position of an umpire, but you did not utter a word of wholesome advice. Unfitted as you were for the work, you did not hold the scales evenly.

32. Every one should, at the beginning follow such a line of action that he may not have, in the end, to repent for something already done by him.

33. Out of affection for your son, O king, you did what was agreeable to Duryodhana. You are obliged to repent for that now. You should not, however, grieve.

34. The man who always looks at the honey without seeing the fall, meets with destruction through his covetousness for honey. Such a man is obliged to repent like yourself.

35. The man who indulges in grief never acquires wealth. By grieving one loses the fruits he seeks for. Grief again stands in the way of the acquision of objects dear to us. The man who grieves loses even his salvation.

36. The man who keeps a burning coal within the folds of his cloth and is burnt by the fire thereof is surely called a fool if he grieves for his injuries.

37. You and your son, had with your words fanned the Partha-fire, and with your covetousness as clarified butter made that fire blaze forth into burning flames.

38. Your sons fell into that burning fire like insects. You should not, however, grieve for them now that they have all been burnt in the fire of the enemy's arrows.

39. The shedding of tears, O king, is not approved by the scriptures or praised by the wise.

40. These tears, like sparks of fire, consume the dead for whom they are shed. Drive away your grief with your intelligence, and cheer yourself up with your mental strength.

41. Thus was the king consoled by the great Sanjaya. Vidura then, O scorcher of foes, once again addressed the king, showing great intelligence."

CHAPTER II.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Listen, O Janamejaya, to the nectarlike words that Vidura said to the son of Vichitravirya and by which he pleased that foremost of men.

Vidura said :—

2. 'Rise, O king! Why are you lying on the Earth. Cheer yourself up. O king, this is the final end of all living creatures.

3. Everything is liable to destruction; everything that is high is sure to fall down. Union is sure to end in separation; life is sure to end in death.

4. The Destroyer, O Bharata, takes both the hero and the coward. Why then, O foremost of Kshatriyas, should not Kshatriyas engage themselves in battle.

5. He, who never fights has been seen to die, while he who engages himself in battle has been seen to escape alive.

6. As regards living creatures, they did not exist at first. They exist in the intervening period. In the end they once more become non-existent. Why should then one grieve for the same?

7. The man who grieves does not succeed in meeting with the dead. By grieving one does not himself die. While such is the course of the world, why do you indulge in grief.

8. Death drags all creatures, even the gods. There is none dear or hateful to death, O Kuru chief.

9. As the wind tears off all the blades of grass, even so, O foremost of Bharata's race, Death rules over all creatures.

10. All creatures are like members of a caravan bound for the same country. When death will overtake all, it is immaterial whom he meets first.

11. O king, you should not grieve for those who have been killed in battle. If the scriptures are authoritative all of them must have obtained the highest end.

12. All of them were well read in the Vedas; all of them had practised vows. All of them have met with death after fighting with the enemy. What is there to be sorry in this.

13. They had been invisible before birth. Having come from that unknown region, they have again become invisible. They are not yours, nor are you theirs. Why should you grieve then for such disappearance?

14. If killed, one acquires heaven. By killing, fame is acquired. Both of these, produce great merit. Battle, therefore, is not unproductive of good.

15. Forsooth, Indra will give them regions capable of granting every wish. These, O foremost of men, become the guests of Indra.

16. By celebrating sacrifices with profuse gifts, by ascetic penances and by learning, men cannot, go so quickly to heaven as heroes killed in battle.

17. On the bodies of hostile heroes who were like the sacrificial fire, they poured libations of arrows. Highly energetic, they had in return to bear the arrowy libations poured upon them by their foes.

18. I tell you, O king, that for a Kshatriya in this world there is not a better way to heaven than battle.

19. They were all great Kshatriyas; brave as they were, they were ornaments of assemblies. They have attained highest of blessed regions. They are not persons for whom we should be sorry.

20. Solacing yourself, by your own self, cease to grieve, O best of men. You should not allow yourself to be overwhelmed with sorrow and to give up all action.

21. There are thousands of mothers and fathers and sons and wives in this world. Whose are they, and whose are we?

22. Thousands of causes spring up daily for sorrow and thousands for fear. These, howevor, affect the ignorant and not the wise.

23. There is none dear or hateful to Time, O Kuru chief. Time is indifferent to none. All are equally dragged by time.

24. Time makes all creatures grow, and it is Time that destroys all. When all else is asleep, Time is awake. Time is irresistible.

25. Youth, beauty, life, wealth, health, and friends, are all unstable. The wise will never seek any of these.

26. You should not grieve for what is universal. By indulging in grief a person may himself die, but grief itself by being indulged in, never becomes light.

27. If you feel any grief heavily, it should be overcome by not indulging in it. This is the only remedy for grief, viz, that one should not indulge in it.

28. By indulging in it, one cannot lesson it. On the other hand, it increases when being indulged in. When any evil or when bereavement of some dear one, comes on, only they that are of little intelligence allow their minds to be laden with grief.

29. This is neither Profit, nor Religion, nor Happiness, of which you are thinking.

30—31. The indulgence of grief is the sure means of one's losing one's objects. Through it, one deviates from the three great ends of life. They, who are not contented are stupefied by the vicissitudes of fortune. The wise, are, on the other hand, unaffected by such changes. One should destroy mental grief by wisdom, as physical grief should be destroyed by medicine. Wisdom has this power. They, however, that are foolish, can never acquire equanimity of mind.

32. Pristine actions closely follow a man, so much so that they lie by him when he lies down, stand by him when he stands, and run with him when he runs.

33. As a man acts well or ill, so he enjoys or suffers the fruit thereof.

34. In physical actions also one enjoys or suffers the fruits according to his acts.

35. One's own self is one's own friend, again one's own self is one's own enemy. One's own self is the witness of one's good and evil acts.

36. Good acts beget a state of happiness, and sinful deeds bring on woe. One always reaps the fruit of one's acts. One never enjoys or suffers happiness or misery that is not the outcome of one's own acts.

37. Intelligent persons like you, O king, never commit sinful deeds, that are disapproved by knowledge and that strike at the very root of virtue and happiness."

CHAPTER III.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "O you of great wisdom, my grief has been removed by your excellent words. I wish you, however, to speak again.

2. How, indeed, do the wise free themselves from mental grief begotten by evil deeds and the bereavement of dear objects."

Vidura said :—

3. 'He that is wise enjoys peace by subduing both grief and joy by means by which one may escape from grief and joy.

4. Every thing we are anxious for, O foremost of men, is ephemeral. The world is like a weak plantain tree.

5—6. Since the wise and the ignorant the rich and the poor, all, shorn of their anxieties, sleep on the crematorium, with bodies devoid of flesh and full of naked bones, and sinews, whom amongst them will the survivors regard as possessed of distinguishing marks by which the attributes of birth and beauty may be determined? Since every thing is equal in death why should men, whose understandings are always deceived covet one another's rank and position.

7. The learned say that the bodies of men are like houses, which are destroyed in time. There is one being, however, that is eternal.

8. As a person casting off an old cloth puts on a fresh one, so is the case with the bodies of all embodied beings.

9. O son of Vichitravirja, creatures reap happiness or misery, as the fruit of their own acts.

10. By their acts they secure heaven, O Bharata, or happiness, or misery. Whether competent or otherwise, they have to bear their burdens which are the result of their own acts.

11—13. As amongst earthen pots some break while still on the potter's wheel, some while partially shaped, some as soon as shaped, some after removal from the wheel, some while in course of being removed, some after removal, some while wet, some while dry, some while being burnt, some while being removed from the kiln, some after removal therefrom, and some while being used, so is the case with the bodies of embodied creatures.

14—15. Some are destroyed while in embryo, some after coming out of the womb, some on the day after, some after a fortnight or a month, some on after a year or two, some in youth, some in middle age, and some when old.

16. Creatures are born or destroyed according to their pristine acts. When such is the course of the world, why do you grieve?

17—18. As men, while swimming, sometimes dive and sometimes emerge, so, O king, creatures sink and emerge in life's stream. They that are of limited understanding suffer or meet with death as the result of their own acts.

19. They, however, that are wise, virtuous and desirous of doing good to all living creatures, who are acquainted with the real nature of beings in this world, attain at last to the highest end."

CHAPTER IV.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "O best of speakers, how may the wilderness of this world be known? I wish to hear this. Accosted by me, tell me this."

Vidura said :—

2. "I will describe to you all the acts of creatures from the very beginning. In the beginning it lives in the mixture of blood and semen. Then it grows little by little. Then on the expiration of the fifth month it puts on a shape.

3. It next becomes a fœtus with all its limbs made up, and lives in a dirty place, covered with flesh and blood.

4. Then, by the action of the wind, its lower limbs are turned upwards and the head comes downwards. Getting by this posture at the mouth of the uterus, it suffers manifold miseries.

5. On account of the contraction of the uterus, the creature then comes out of it, bearing the results of all his pristine acts. He then meets in this world with other evils that beset him. Misfortunes go to him like dogs drawn by the scent of meat.

6. Next various diseases assail him while he is enchained by his pristine acts.

7. Bound by the fetters of lust and women and wealth and other sweets of life, various evil practises also approach him then, O king!

8. Caught by these, he never enjoys happiness. At that time he does not obtain the fruit of his acts, right or wrong. They, however, fix their minds on reflection, succeed in protecting their souls.

9. The person overcome by his senses does not know that death has come at his door. At last, dragged by the messengers of the Destroyer, he meets with death at the appointed time.

10. Overcome by his senses, he does good and evil at the very commencement. Having enjoyed or suffered the fruits of these, he again becomes indifferent to his acts of self-destruction.

11. Alas, the world is deceived, and covetousness subdues it. Deprived of sense by covetousness, anger, and fear, one knows not one's own self!

12. Proud of his high birth, one is seen to speak ill of those that are not high-born. Elated with pride of wealth, one is seen to hate the poor.

13. One considers others as ignorant fools, but seldom gauges his own self. One attributes faults to others, but never wishes to punish his own self.

14—16. Since the wise and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, the high-born and the low-born, the honored and the dishonored, all go to the place of the dead and sleep there shorn of anxiety, with bodies divested of flesh and full only of bones and dried up tendons, whom amongst them would the survivors regard as standing superior to others and by what marks would they determine the attributes of birth and beauty?

17. When all shall sleep likewise on the bare ground, why then should men, foolishly, desire to deceive one another.

18. He who, looking at this scriptural injunction with his own eyes or hearing it from others, practises virtue in this unstable world of life and sticks to it from early age, attains to the highest end.

19. Learning all this, he that sticks to Truth, O king, gets over all paths."

CHAPTER V.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Describe fully to me the ways of that intelligence by which this wilderness of duties may be safely crossed.

Vidura said :—

2. "Having saluted the Self-create, I will obey your command by telling you how the great sages speak of the wilderness of life.

3. A certain Brahmana, living in the great world, found himself on one occasion in a large inaccessible forest abounding with beasts of prey.

4. It was full of lions and tigers and other animals looking like elephants, all of which were roaring aloud. Such was the view of that forest that Yama himself would be frightened.

5. Seeing the forest, the heart of the Brahmana was greatly agitated. His hairs stood erect, and other signs of fear manifested themselves, O destroyer of enemies.

6. Entering it, he began to run hither and thither, looking every side for finding out somebody whose shelter he might seek.

7. Wishing to avoid those terrible creatures, he ran about in fear. He could not go far away from them or free himself from their presence.

8. He then saw that that terrible forest was surrounded with a net, and that a dreadful woman stood there, stretching her arms.

9. That large forest was also beset with many five-headed snakes of dreadful forms, tall as mountain summits touching the very sky.

10. Within it was a pit whose mouth was covered with many hard and strong creepers and herbs.

11—12. While wandering the Brahmana dropped into that invisible pit. He was entangled in those creepers that were interwoven with one another, like the large fruit of a jack tree hanging by its stalk. He remained there hanging with feet upwards and head downwards.

13. While in that state, he was visited by various other calamities. He saw a large and mighty snake within the pit. He also saw a gigantic elephant near its mouth.

14. That elephant, was dark coloured and had six faces and twelve feet. And the animal gradually approached that pit overgrown with creepers and trees.

15. About the twigs of the tree which was at the mouth of the pit, moved about many bees of dreadful forms, engaged from before in drinking the honey gathered in their comb.

16. They repeatedly desired, O foremost of Bharata's race, to taste that honey which though sweet to all creatures could, however, attract children only.

17. The honey (in the comb) fell in many jets below. The person who was hanging in the pit continually drank those jets.

18. Drinking that honey in such a pitiable condition, his thirst, however, was not appeased. Unsatiated with repeatedly drinking the same the person desired for more.

19. Even then, O king, he could not give up hopes of life. Still, the man expected to live. A number of black and white rats were eating away the roots of that tree.

20—21. There was fear from the beasts of prey, from that dreadful woman on the outskirts of that forest, from that snake at the bottom of the well, from that elephant near its top, from the fall of the tree brought about by the rats, and lastly from those bees flying about for drinking the honey.

22. He lived in that condition, deprived of his senses, in that forest, never losing at any time the hope of continuing his life."

CHAPTER VI.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Alas great was the misery of that person and very painful his life. Tell me, O best of speakers, whence his attachment to life and whence his happiness was.

2. Where is that region, so inimical to the practice of virtue, where that person lives. Oh, tell me how that man will be freed from all those great dangers?

3. Tell me all this. We shall then try our best for him. I am stricken with pity on account of the difficulties that lie in the way of his release."

Vidura said :—

4. O king, they that are conversant with the religion of Moksha cite this as a simile. Understanding this properly, a person may attain to blissful regions hereafter.

5. That which is described as the forest is the great world. The inaccessible forest within it is the limited sphere of a man's life.

6—7. Those described as beasts of prey are the diseases. The huge woman living in the forest, is identified by the wise with Decrepitude which destroys complexion and beauty. The pit is the body of embodied creatures.

8. The huge snake living in the bottom of that pit is Time, the destroyer of all embodied beings. It is, indeed, the universal destroyer.

9. The cluster of creepers growing in that pit and by whose spreading stems the man hangs down is the desire for life which every creature entertains.

10. The six-faced elephant, O king, which runs towards the tree standing at the mouth of the pit is the year. Its six faces are the seasons and its twelve feet are the twelve months.

11. The rats and the snakes that are eating up the tree are the days and nights that are continually lessening the periods of life of all creatures. The bees are our desires.

12. The numerous jets that are pouring honey are the pleasures derived from the gratification of our desires and to which men are strongly addicted.

13. The wise know life's course to be such. Through that knowledge they succeed in snapping its fetters."

CHAPTER VII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. "Excellent is this parable which you have described. Indeed, you are acquainted with Truth. Having listened to your nectar-like speech, I desire to hear more.'

Vidura said :—

2. "Listen to me, O king, I shall once more fully describe the means an acquaintance with which enables the wise to free themselves from the fetters of the world.

3—4. As a person, O king, who has to travel a long distance, is sometimes obliged to halt for being fatigued so, O Bharata, they that are of little understanding travelling along the long way of life, have to make frequent halts in the shape of repeated births. The wise are, however, freed from that obligation.

6. Men well read in scriptures, describe for this life's course as a long way. The wise also describe life's way with all its difficulties as a forest.

6. Creatures, O Bharata-chief, whether mobile or immobile, have to repeatedly return to the world. The wise alone escape.

7. The diseases, mental and physical, to which mortals are subject, whether visible or invisible, are described as beasts of prey by the wise.

8. Men are always assailed by them, O Bharata. Again, those dreadful beasts of prey, which are their own acts in life, never cause any anxiety to the foolish.

9. If any person, O king, somehow escapes from diseases, Decrepitude, that destroyer of beauty, assails him afterwards.

10. Plunged in a slough by the objects of senses, viz., sound, form, taste, touch and scent, man remains there without anything to save him from there.

11. Meanwhile, the years, the seasons, the months, the fortnights, the days and the nights, coming one after another, gradually deprive him of beauty and lessen the period of life.

12. These all are harbingers of death. The foolish do not regard them as such. The wise say that all creatures are ruled by the Ordainer through their acts.

13. The body of a creature is called the car. The vital principle is the driver of that car. The senses are the horses. Our acts and the understanding are the traces.

14. He who follows after those running horses, has to come repeatedly by re-births.

15. He, however, who, being self-restrained, restrains them by his understanding, has not to return.

16. They, however, who are not stupefied while following this wheel of life that is revolving like a real wheel, do not come by re-births.

17. He that is wise should certainly prevent the coming of re-birth. One should not neglect it, for indifference may subject us to it repeatedly.

18. The Man, O king, who has controlled his senses and subdued anger and covetousness, who is contented, and truthful in speech, obtains peace.

19. This body is called the car of Yama. The foolish are stupefied by it. Such a person, O king, would obtain that which you have obtained.

20. The loss of kingdom of friends, and of children, O Bharata, and such other things, visit him who is still under the influence of desire.

21. The wise should apply the medicine of intelligence to all great sorrows. Securing the medicine of wisdom, which is truly very efficacious and is almost unattainable) the self-controlled man would kill that serious disease called sorrow.

22. Neither power, nor riches, nor friends, nor well-wishers, can cure a man of his grief so successfully as the control of self. Therefore not injuring others and cherishing friendship for all creatures, be of pious behaviour, O Bharata!

23. Self-restraint, renunciation, and carefulness, are the three horses of Brahman. He who rides on the car of his soul, to which are yoked these horses with the help of traces furnished by good conduct, and drives it, shaking off all fear of death, goes, O king, to the regions of Brahma.

24. That person, O king, who gives to all creatures promise of his harmlessness, goes to the best of regions, viz., the blessed one of Vishnu.

25. The fruit that one reaps by giving an assurance unto all creatures of his harmlessness cannot be obtained by celebrating a thousand sacrifices or by daily fasts.

26. Of all things there is certainly nothing dearer than self. Death is, forsooth, disliked by all creatures, O Bharata. Therefore, pity should certainly be shown to all.

27. Possessed by various kinds of mistakes, entangled by the net of their own intelligence, they that are wicked and are of good vision, visit repeatedly this Earth. The wise secure a union with Brahma."

CHAPTER VIII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "After hearing the words of Vidura, the chief of the Kurus, stricken with grief on account of the death of his sons, dropped down senseless on the Earth.

2—3. Seeing him fall down in that state, his friends as also the island-born Vyasa, Vidura, Sanjaya, and other well-wishers, and the trustworthy attendants who used to wait at the gates, sprinkled cool water over his body, and fanned him with palm leaves, and gently rubbed him with their hands. For a long while they solaced the king while in that state.

4. Regaining his senses, after a long time the monarch, wept for a long time, overwhelmed with grief on account of the death of his sons.

5. He said:—'Fie on the humanity. Fie on the human body. The miseries that we suffer in this life frequently originate from the very state of humanity.

6. Alas, O lord, great is the grief, like poison or fire, that one suffers at the loss of sons, of riches, of kinsmen, and relatives.

7. That grief consumes our limbs, and wisdom. Stricken with that grief, a person welcomes death.

8. This calamity that has befallen me through ill-luck is like that. It will, I see, terminate with life itself. O best of sages, I shall, therefore, put an end to my life this very day.'

9. Saying so to his great sire, that foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma, Dhritarashtra, laden with grief, became stupefied. The king, O monarch, thinking of his miseries, became silent.

10. Hearing these words of his, the powerful Vyasa thus spoke to his son stricken with grief on account of the death of his children.

Vyasa said :—

11. "O mighty-armed Dhritarashtra, hear what I say. You are learned, intelligent, and yuo, O powerful one, are skilled in understanding duties.

12. Everything is known to you, O scorcher of foes. Forsooth, you know the instability of all things doomed to death.

13. When this life is fickle, when this world itself is not eternal, when life is sure to end in death, why then, O Bharata, do you grieve?

14. Before your very eyes, O king, Time, making your son the cause, created this enmity.

15. This destruction of the Kurus, O king, was inevitable. Why then do you grieve for those heroes that have achieved the highest end?

16. The high-souled Vidura knew every thing. He had tried his best, O king, to bring about peace.

17. I think the course marked by Destiny cannot be controlled by any one, even if one struggles for ever.

18. The course that was settled by the celestials was known to me direct. I will recite it to you, so that you may enjoy peace of mind.

19. Once before, I went very quickly to the court of Indra. There I saw all the inhabitants of heaven assembled together.

20. There were, O sinless one, all the celestial Rishis also, headed by Narada. There, O king, I saw also the Earth in her embodied form.

21—22. The latter had gone to the gods for the accomplishment of a particular mission. Approaching the gods, she said, —While you were in Brahman's abode you you promised to do all for me. Let that be accomplished soon.

23—24. Hearing these words of hers, Vishnu, adored of all the worlds, smilingly addressed her in the midst of the celestials, saying,—The eldest of the hundred sons of Dhritarashtra, viz., Duryodhana, will accomplish your work. Through that king your object will be achieved.

25. For his sake, many kings will assemble together on the field of Kuru, They will cause one another to be killed through hard weapons.

26. It is evident, O goddess, that your burden will then be lightened in battle. Go quickly to your own station and continue to bear the weight of creatures, O beautiful damsel.

27. From this you should know, O king, that your son Duryodhana, born in Gandhari's womb, was a portion of Kali, born for bringing about a universal slaughter.

28. He was vindictive, restless, wrathful, and difficult of being pleased. Through the influence of Destiny his brothers also took after him.

29. Shakuni became his maternal uncle, and Karna his great friend. Many other kings were born on Earth for helping him in the work of destruction.

30. As the king is, so are his subjects.

If the king becomes pious, even unrighteousness becomes incarnate in his kingdom.

31. Servants, forsooth, are affected by the merits and demerits of their masters. O king, having obtained a bad king, your other sons have all been destroyed.

32. Conversant with truth, Narada knew all this. Through their own faults, your sons have been destroyed, O king! Do not grieve for them, O king. There is no cause for grief.

33. The Pandavas are not to be blamed, O Bharata, in the least, for what has taken place. Your sons were all wicked. It is they that caused this destruction on Earth.

34—35. Narada had truly spoken out to Yudhishthira, all this in his court at the time of the Rajasuya sacrifice, saying,—'The Pandavas and the Kauravas, meeting with each other, will be destroyed. Do that, O son of Kunti, which you should.

36. Hearing these words of Narada, the Pandavas were filled with grief. I have thus communicated to you, an eternal secret of the celestials.

37. This will dispell your sorrow and restore to you a love of life, and make you love the Pandavas, for all that has taken place has been due to what had been preordained by the gods.

38. O you, of mighty-arms, I had learnt all this sometime before. I also spoke of it to king Yudhishthira the just at the time of the Rajasuya sacrifice.

39. When I secretly informed him of all this, Dharma's son, tried his best for preserving peace with the Kauravas. That, however, which is ordained by the gods proved too strong for him to defeat.

40. The determination, O king, of the Destroyer, cannot be baffled any how by mobile and immobile creatures.

41. You are virtuous and highly intelligent, O Bharata! You know also that which all creatures should do and that which they should not do.

42. If king Yudhishthira learns that you are overwhelmed with grief and losing your senses frequently, he will put an end to his life.

43. He is always compassionate and wise. His kindness is displayed even towards all the inferior creatures. How is it possible, O king, that he will not show compassion to you, O king.

44. At my behest, and knowing that that which is ordained is inevitable, as also out of love for the Pandavas, live, O Bharata!

45. If you live thus, your fame will travel all over the world. You will then acquire a knowledge of all duties and find many years for acquiring ascetic merit.

46. This grief consequent on the death of your sons that has arisen in your heart, like a blazing fire, should always be extinguished, O king, by the water of wisdom."

Vaishampayana said :—

47—48. "Hearing these words of the energetic Vyasa and reflecting upon them for a little while, Dhritarashtra said,—'O best of Rishis, I am greatly stricken with grief. I am repeatedly losing consciousness and I am unable to bear up my own self,

49. Hearing, however, these your words about what had been ordained by the gods, I shall not think of putting an end to my life and shall live and act without indulging in grief.'

50. Hearing these words of Dhritarashtra, O king, Satyavati's son Vyasa, disappeared then and there."

CHAPTER IX.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Janamejaya said :—

1. "After the holy Vyasa had gone away, what, O Rishi, did king Dhritarashtra do? You should tell me this.

2. What also did the Kuru king, the great son of Dharma, do? And what did those three, viz., Kripa and others do?

3. I have heard of the wonderful deeds of Ashwatthaman and the exchange of curses. Tell me what took place next, and what Sanjaya next said to the old king."

Vaishampayana said :—

4. "After Duryodhana and all his soldiers had been killed, Sanjaya, deprived of spiritual sight, returned to Dhritarashtra.

Sanjaya said :—

5. 'The kings of various races, that came from various kingdoms, have all, O king, gone to the abode of Death along with your sons.

6. Your son, O king, who had constantly been requested (for peace) but who always desired to terminate his hostility after killing the Pandavas has caused the Earth to be exterminated.

7. Do you, O king, cause the obsequia rites of your sons and grandsons and fathers to be duly performed."

Vaishampayana said :—

8. "Hearing these dreadful words of Sanjaya, the king dropped down on the Earth and lay unconscious like one deprived of life.

9—10. Approaching the king, who was lying prostrate on the Earth, Vidura, conversant with all forms of duty, said :—'Rise, O king, why do you lie down thus? Do not grieve, O foremost of Bharata's! This O king, is the final end of all creatures.

11. In the beginning creatures are non-existent. In the middle, O Bharata, they become existent. At the end, they once more become non-existent. What is there to be sorry for in all this.

12. By grieving one cannot get back the dead. By indulging in grief, one cannot die himself. When such is the course of the world, why do you grieve?

13. One may die without fighting in battle. One also escapes alive after having engaged in battle. When one's appointed Time comes, O king, he cannot escape.

14. Time drags all creatures. There is none dear or loathsome to Time, O Kuru's chief.

15. As the wind tears off the ends of all blades of grass, so all creatures, O Bharata chief, are subjected by Time under its influence.

16. All creatures are like members of the same caravan bound for one destination. What is there to be sorry for if Time meets with one a little earlier than with another.

17. Those again, O king, that have fallen in battle and for whom you bewail, are not really objects of your grief, since all those illustrious persons have gone to heaven.

18. By celebrating sacrifices with enough presents, by practising ascetic austerities, and by knowledge, people cannot so easily go to heaven as heroes by displaying courage in battle.

19. All those heroes were conversant with the Vedas; all of them were observant of vows: all of them have died, fighting the foe in battle. What is there to be sorry for then.

20. They poured their libations of arrows upon the bodies of their brave enemies as upon a fire. Great as they were, they bore in return the libations of arrows poured upon themselves.

21. I tell you, O king, that there is no superior way to heaven for a Kshatriya to one through battle.

22. All of them were great Kshatriyas, all of them were heroes and ornaments of assemblies. They have attained to a highly blessed state. One should not grieve for them.

23. Do you comfort your ownself. Do not grieve, O foremost of men. You should not allow yourself to be overwhelmed with sorrow and give up all work."

CHAPTER X.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. "Hearing these words of Vidura, that foremost of Bharata's race, viz., Dhritarashtra, ordered for his car. The king once more said,—'Bring Gandhari here forthwith, and all the Bharata ladies. Bring here Kunti also, as well as all the other ladies with her.'

3. Having said these words to Vidura conversant with every duty, the pious Dhritarashtra, deprived of his senses by sorrow got on his car.

4. Then Gandhari, stricken with grief consequent on the death of his sons, accompanied by Kunti and the other ladies of the royal household, came, as ordered by her lord, where the latter was waiting for her.

5. Stricken with great grief, they came together to the king. As they met, they addressed each other and cried aloud.

6. Then Vidura, who had become more afflicted than those ladies, began to solace them. Placing those weeping ladies on the cars that stood ready for them, he left the city.

7. At that time a loud cry of sorrow arose from every Kuru house. The whole city, including the very children, were stricken with grief.

8. Those ladies who had not before this been seen by the very celestails were now helpless as they were in the absence of their lords, seen by the common people.

9. With their beautiful but dishevelled hairs, and their ornaments thrown off, those ladies, each clad in a single piece of cloth, proceeded most sorrowfully.

10. Indeed, they came out of their houses looking like white mountains, like a herd of deer from their mountain caves after the fall of their leader.

11. Those bevies of fair damsels, O king, came out filled with sorrow, and ran here and there like a herd of fillies on a circus yard.

12. Seizing each other's hands, they began to bewail aloud after their sons, brothers, and fathers. They presented a spectacle that takes place on the occasion of the universal destruction at the end of a cycle.

13. Weeping and crying and running here and there, and deprived of their senses by sorrow, they knew not what to do.

14. Those ladies who formerly felt abashed even in the presence of companions of their own sex, now felt no shame, though scantily clad, in coming out before their mothers-in-law.

15. Formerly they used to console each other while stricken with even slightest grief, Stupefied by grief, they, O king, could not look upon each other.

16. Surrounded by those thousands of wailing ladies, the king issued out of the city in great depression and proceeded quickly towards the battle-field.

17. Issuing out of the city, artizans and traders and Vaishyas and, all kinds of mechanics, followed the king.

18. As those ladies, afflicted by the entire destruction of the Kurus, cried in sorrow, a loud wail arose from among them that pierced all the worlds.

19. All creatures that heard that cry thought that the hour of universal destruction was near at hand when all things would be devoured by the fire that arises at the end of the cycle.

20. The citizens also of Hastinapura devoted to the Kurus, with hearts filled with anxiety at the destruction of their rulers, O king, cried aloud like those ladies."

CHAPTER XI.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd

Vaishampayana said:—

1. "Within two miles after his departure Dhritarashtra, met with those three great car-warriors, viz., Sharadwat's son Kripa, Drona's son (Ashwatthaman), and Kritavarman.

2—3. As soon as the latter saw the blind king, possessed of great power, the three heroes sighed in grief and with voices choked in tears weepingly said,—'Your royal son, O king, having performed the most difficult feats, has, with all his followers, gone to the region of Indra.

4. We are the only three car-warriors of Duryodhana's army that are yet alive. All the others, O foremost of Bharata's race, have died.'

5—6. Having said these words to the king, Sharadwat's son Kripa, addressing the grief-stricken Gandhari, said to her,—'Your sons have fallen, performing heroic and wonderful deeds, in the battle-field.

7. Forsooth having, obtained those bright worlds that are attainable only by the use of weapons, they are playing there like celestials, having assumed shinning forms.

8. Amongst those heroes there was no one that fled from battle-field. Every one of them has fallen at the end of weapons. None of them joined his hands, and prayed for mercy.

9. Death in battle by weapons has been described by the ancients as the best that a Kshatriya can obtain. You should not, therefore, grieve for any of them.

10. Their enemies, O queen, viz., the Pandavas, too, have not been more fortunate. Hear, what we, headed by Ashwatthaman, have done to them.

11. Learning that your son had been killed unrighteously by Bhima, we massacred the Pandavas when asleep after entering these camp.

12. All the Panchalas have heen killed. Indeed, all the sons of Drupada, as also all the sons of Draupadi, have been massacred.

13. Having caused this massacre of the sons of our foes, we are flying away because we three cannot fight with them.

14. Our enemies, the Pandavas, are all heroes and great bowmen. They will soon attack us, filled with rage, for taking vengeance on us.

15. Informed of the massacre of their sons, those foremost of men, infuriate with rage,—those heroes,—O illustrious lady, will soon pursue us.

16. Having caused this massacre we dare not stay. Grant us premission, O queen. You should not grieve.

17. Grant us your permission also, O king! Summon fortitude, and observe the duties of a Kshatriya in their highest form.'

18—19. Having said so to the king, and going round him, Kripa and Kritavar-t man and Drona's son, O Bharata, withou being able to take away their eyes from the wise king Dhritarashtra, urged their horses towards the banks of the Ganges.

20. Leaving that place, O king, those great car-warriors, with hearts stricken with anxiety, took one another's leave and separated from one another.

21. Sharadwat's son Kripa went to Hastinapura; Hridika's son went to his own kingdom; while the son of Drona started for the hermitage of Vyasa.

22. Thus those heroes, who had offended the great sons of Pandu, respectively proceeded to the places they selected, assailed with fear and casting their eyes on one another.

23. Having met the king thus, those heroes, went away before the sunrise, O king, to the places they selected.

24. It was after this, O king, that the sons of Pandu, those great car-warriors, met the son of Drona, and displaying their prowess, defeated him, O king."

CHAPTER XII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "After all the warriors had been massacred, king Yudhishthira heard that his uncle Dhritarashtra had left the city of Hastinapura.

2. Afflicted with grief consequent on the death of his sons, Yudhishthira, O king, accompanied by his brothers, set out for meeting his uncle who was filled with sorrow for the death of his (hundred) sons.

3. The son of Kunti was followed by the great and heroic Krishna of Dasharha's race, by Yuyudhana, as also by Yuyutsu.

4. The princess Draupadi also, laden with grief, and accompanied by those Panchala ladies that were with her, sorrowfully followed her husband.

5. Yudhishthira saw near the banks of the Ganges, O king, the crowd of Bharata ladies afflicted with sorrow and crying like a flight of she-ospreys.

6—7. The king was soon surrounded by those thousands of ladies who with arms raised up in grief, were bewailing aloud and uttering all sorts of words, agreeable and disagreeable.

7. 'Where, indeed, is that righteousness of the king, where his truth and pity, since he has killed sires and brothers and preceptors and sons and friends.

8. How, O mighty-armed one, has your heart become tranquil after killing Drona, and your grandsire Bhishma, and Jayadratha.

9. What is the use of sovereignty to you, after having seen your sires and brothers, O Bharata, and the irresistible Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi, thus killed.

10. Leaving those ladies crying like a flight of she-ospreys, the mighty-armed king Yudhishthira the just bowed to the feet of his eldest uncle.

11. Having saluted their sire duly, those slayer of foes, viz., the Pandavas, announced themselves to him, each uttering his own name.

12. Greatly stricken with grief for the slaughter of his sons, Dhritarashtra unwillingly embraced the eldest son of Pandu, who was the cause of that slaughter.

13. Having embraced Yudhishthira and spoken a few solacing words to him, O Bharata, the wicked Dhritarashtra sought for Bhima, like a burning fire ready to burn everything that would approach it.

14. Indeed, the fire of his anger, fanned by the wind of his grief, seemed then to be ready to consume the Bhima-forest.

15. Understanding the wicked intentions towards Bhima, Krishna, dragging away the real Bhima, presented an iron statue of the second son of Pandu to the old king.

16. The highly intelligent, Krishna had, in the very beginning understood the object of Dhritarashtra, and had, therefore, kept such a contrivance ready for baffling them.

17. Holding with his two arms that iron Bhima, the powerful king Dhritarashtra, endued with great stength, broke it into pieces, taking it for the real Bhima.

18. Possessed of the strength of ten thousands elephants, the king broke that statue into pieces. His own breast, however, was considerably bruised and he began to vomit blood.

19. Covered with blood the king dropped down on the ground like a blossoming Parijata tree.

20. His learned charioteer, Sanjaya the son of Gavalgana raised the king and soothing and comforting him, said—'Do not act so.'

21. Having cast off his wrath and regained his true nature the king then became filled with grief and began to weep aloud, saying,—'Alas, Oh Bhima, Alas, Oh Bhima!'

22—23. Knowing that he was no longer under the influence of anger, and that he was truly sorry for having (as he believed) slain Bhima, Vasudeva, that foremost of men, said,—'Do not grieve, O Dhritarashtra, for you have not killed Bhimasena. That is an iron statue, O king, which has been broken by you.

24. Knowing that you were filled with anger, O foremost of Bharata's race, I dragged Bhima away from within the jaws of Death.

25. O best of kings, there is none equal to you in physical strength. Who is there, O mighty-armed one, that would bear the pressure of your arms.

26. As no one can escape alive from a struggle with Death himself, so no body can come out safe from within your embrace.

27. Therefore that iron statue of Bhima, which had been made by your son, had been kept ready for you.

28. On account of the sorrow for the death of your sons, your mind has been filled with spite. Therefore, O great king, you seek to kill Bhimasena.

29. The destruction of Bhima, however, O king, would do you no good. Your sons, O king, would not be revived by it.

30. Therefore, approve of what we have done to secure peace, and do not grieve any longer."

CHAPTER XIII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. "Thereupon a few maid-servants came to the king for washing him. After he had been properly washed, Krishna again addressed him, saying. 'You are, O king, well read in the Vedas and various scriptures. You have heard all old histories, and everything relating to the duties of kings.

3. You are learned, wise and can understand strength and weakness. Why are you then angry when all that has befallen you is the outcome of your own folly.

4. I spoke this to you before the battle. Both Bhishma and Drona, O Bharata, did the same, as also Vidura and Sanjaya. You did not, however, then care to follow our advice.

5. Although requested by us, you did not act according to the advice we offered, knowing that the Pandavas were superior to you and yours, O Kuru chief in strength and bravery!

6. The king who sees his own shortcomings and knows the distinctions of place and time, enjoys great prosperity.

7. That man, however, who, though advised by his well-wishers, does not follow their words, suffers miseries and is obliged to grieve for his evil policy.

8. Follow a different course of life now, O Bharata! You did not control your self but suffered yourself to be ruled by Duryodhana.

9. That which has befallen you is due to your own fault. Why then do you seek to kill Bhima? Remembering your own folly govern your anger now.

10. That mean wretch who had, from haughtiness caused the princess of Panchala to be brought into the court, has been justly killed by Bhimasena.

11. Look at your own evil deeds as also at those of your wicked-souled son. The sons of Pandu are perfectly innocent. Yet they have been treated most ruthlessly by you and him.' "

Vaishampayana continued :—

12. "After he had thus been told the truth by Krishna, O king, Dhritarashtra replied to Devaki's son, saying. 'It is just so, O you of mighty arms! What you say, O Madhava, is perfectly true! It is father's affection that made me deviate from the path of righteousness.

14. By good luck, that foremost of men, the mighty Bhima of true prowess, protected by you, came not within my embrace.

15. Now, I am free from wrath and fever. I wish eagerly, O Madhava to embrace that hero.

16. When all the kings have been killed when my children are no more, my well-being and happiness depend upon the sons of Pandu,

17. Having said so, the old king then embraced those beautiful princes, viz., Bhima and Dhananjaya and those two foremost of men, viz., the two sons of Madri, and wept, and comforted and blessed them."

CHAPTER XIV.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Ordered by Dhritarashtra, those foremost of Kuru's race, viz., the Pandava brothers, accompanied by Keshava, then went to see Gandhari.

2. The innocent Gandhari, stricken with grief on account of the death of her hundred sons, thought that king Yudhishthira the just had killed all his enemies, and wished to curse him.

3. Knowing her evil intentions towards the Pandavas, the Vyasa made himself ready for counteracting them at the very beginning.

4. Having cleansed himself by the sacred and fresh water of the Ganges, the great Rishi, capable of going everywhere at will as quickly as the mind, came there.

5. Capable of seeing the heart of every one with his spiritual vision and desirous of doing the same, the sage came there.

6. Endued with great ascetic merit and ever intent on saying what was for the good of creatures, the Rishi said to his daughter-in-law at the proper moment. 'Do not at this time imprecate a curse! Rather make a good use of this hour for showing your forgiveness.

7. Thou should not be angry with the Pandavas, O Gandhari! Set your heart on peace! Restrain the words that are about to drop from your lips! Listen to my advice.

8—10. Your son, seeking victory had requested you every day for the eighteen days of the battle, saying,—'O mother bless me who am fighting with my foes!' Solicited thus every day by your son desirous of victory, you always answered him saying, —'victory is there where righteousness is.' I do not, O Gandhari, remember that your words, have ever been falsified! Those words, therefore, which you, requested by Duryodhana, said to him, could not be false. You are always engaged in the well-being of all creatures.

11. Having undoubtedly reached the other shore in that dreadful battle of Kshatriyas, the sons of Pandu have certainly gained the victory and greater a righteousness.

12. You formerly observed the virtue of forgiveness. Why would you not observe it now? Restrain unrighteousness, O you who are ever righteousness. There is victory where righteousness is.

13—14. Remembering your own righteousness and the words spoken by your self, check your wrath, O Gandhari! Do not act otherwise, O beautiful speeched lady!' Hearing these words, Gandhari said,—'O holy one, I do not entertain any ill feelings towards the Pandavas, nor do I wish that they should die. Out of grief for the death of my sons, my heart is greatly shaken.

15. I know that I should protect the Pandavas with as much care as Kunti does, and that Dhritarashtra also should protect them as I should.

16. For the folly of Duryodhana and of Shakuni the son of Suvala, and through the action of Karna and Dushasana, this extinction of the Kurus has taken place.

17. In this matter Vibhatsu or Pritha's son Vrikodara, or Nakula or Sahadeva, or Yudhishthira himself is not to blame in the least.

18. While engaged in battle, the Kauravas, puffed up with arrogance and pride have perished with many others who helped them. I am not grieved at this.

19. But there has been one act done by Bhima in the very presence of Vasudeva that excites my anger. Having challenged Duryodhana to a dreadful mace encounter, and having come to know that my son, while making diverse kinds of motion in the battle, was superior to him in skill, the great Vrikodara struck the latter below the navel.

21. It is this that excites my anger. Why should heroes, for the sake of their lives, forget their duties that have been determined by great persons conversant with every duty?'

CHAPTER XV.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. "Hearing these words of Gandhari, Bhimasena, in fear said these words for solacing her. 'The deed may be fair or unfair, I did it through fear and for the object of protecting my own self! you should, therefore, forgive me now!

3. Your powerful son was incapable of being killed by anybody in a fair and righteous battle. And therefore I did what was unfair.

4. Duryodhana himself had formerly defeated Yudhishthira unfairly. He always acted treacherously towards us. It was therefore that I had recourse to an unfair act.

5. Your son was then the only unslain warrior of his party. In order that that brave prince might not kill me in the mace-encounter and once more deprive us of our kingdom, I acted in that way.

6. You know what your son had said to the princess of Panchala while the latter, in her seasons, was clad in a single piece of cloth.

7. Without having killed Suyodhana it was impossible for us to rule peacefully the whole Earth with seas. And therefore I acted in that way.

8. Your son wronged us in many ways. In the court he had shown his left thigh to Draupadi.

9. For that wicked conduct of his your son deserved to be killed by us even then. However, commanded by king Yudhishthira the just, we allowed ourselves to be restrained by the agreement that had been made.

10. By this means, O queen, your son excited deadly hostilities with us. We suffered great miseries in the forest. Remembering all this, I acted in that way!

11. Having killed Duryodhana in battle, we have terminated our hostilities. Yudhishthira has regained his kingdom, and we also have been freed from anger!'

12. Hearing these words of Bhima, Gandhari said,—'As you praise my son thus he did not deserve such a death! He, however, did all that you describe!

13. When Vrishasena, however, had deprived Nakula of his horses, O Bharata, you drank in battle the blood from Dusshasana's body!

14. Such an act is cruel and is spoken ill of by the good. It becomes a most disrespectable person. It was a wicked act, O Vrikodara, which you then perpetrated. You should not have done it.'

15. Bhima replied,—'It is improper to drink the blood of even a stranger, what then need be said about quaffing the blood of one's own self. One's brother, again, is like his own self. There is no difference between them.

16. The blood, however, did not, O mother, pass down my lips aud teeth. Karna knew this well. My hands only were covered with Dusshasana's blood.

17. Seeing Nakula deprived of his horses by Vrishasena in battle, I caused the rejoicing Kaurava brothers to be filled with fear.

18. When after the gambling match the hairs of Draupadi were seized, I gave vent to certain words in anger. I do still remember those words.

19. I would for all years to come, have been regarded to have neglected the duties of a Kshatriya if I had left that promise unfulfilled. It was for this, O queen, that I did that act.

20. You should not, O Gandhari, attribute any fault to me. Without having checked your sons formerly, should you attribute any fault to our innocent selves.

Gandhari said:—

21. "Unvanquished by any one, you have killed a hundred sons of this old man! Oh, why did you not spare, O child, even one son of this old couple deprived of kingdom. Who had not committed a greater offence?

22. Why did you not leave even one crutch for this blind couple?

23. O child, although you live unscathed, having killed all my sons, yet I would not have been sorry, if you had followed the path of righteousness in killing them.'"

Vaishampayana continued:—

24. "Having said so, Gandhari, filled with anger at the slaughter of all her sons and grandsons enquired after Yudhishthira, saying,—'Where is the king?'

25—26. After she had said these words, king Yudhishthira, trembling and with joined hands, approached her and said, 'Here is Yudhishthira, O goddess, that cruel destroyer of your sons! I deserve your curses, for I am the root of this universal destruction! Oh curse me!

27. I do not care for life, for kingdom, for wealth! Having brought about the destruction of such friends, I have proved myself to be a great fool and a hater of friend.

28. Gandhari, sighing heavily, said nothing to Yudhisthira—who spoke such words, who was overcome with fear, and who stood in her presence.

29—30. Conversant with the rules of righteousness, the Kuru queen, possessed of great foresight, turned her eyes from within the folds of the cloth that covered them, to the tip of Yudhisthira's toe, as the prince with body bent forwards, was about to fall down at her feet. At this, the king, whose nails had before this been all very beautiful, got a sore nail on his toe.

31. Seeing this, Arjuna went behind Vasudeva, and the other sons of Pandu became restless and moved about from one place to another.

32. Gandhari then, having shaken off her anger, comforted the Pandavas as a mother should. With her permission those broad-chested heroes then proceeded together to present themselves to their mother.

33. Having seen her sons after a long time, Kunti who had been filled with anxiety for them, covered her face with her cloth and began to weep.

34. Having wept for sometime with her children, Pritha saw the wounds and scars of many weapons on their bodies.

35. She then repeatedly embraced and patted each of her sons, and stricken with grief wept with Draupadi who had lost all her children and whom she saw lying on the naked Earth, piteously bewailing.

Draupadi said :—

36. 'O Venerable lady, where have all your grandsons, with Abhimanyu among them, gone? Seeing you in such distress why are they delaying in coming before you. Deprived as I am of my children, what need have I of kingdom.'

37. Raising the grief-stricken princess of Panchala who was weeping thus, Pritha began to solace that lady having of large eyes.

38. Then Kunti, accompanied by the princess of Panchala, and followed by her sons proceeded towards the grief-afflicted Gandhari, though she herself was also in great sorrow.

39. Seeing that illustrious lady with her daughter-in-law, Gandhari said,—' Do not, O daughter, grieve so. See, I too am much afflicted with sorrow as you.

40. I think, this universal destruction has been caused by the irresistible course of Time. This dreadful slaughter was inevitable, since it has not been brought about by human agency!

41. What Vidura of great wisdom foretold, after Krishna's sueing in vain for peace, has now come to pass!

42. Do not, therefore, grieve in a matter that was inevitable, especially when it has taken place! Having been dead in battle they should not be grieved for!

43. I am in the same situation as you are! (If you act thus) who then will comfort us? Through my fault, this foremost of races has been ruined.' "

CHAPTER XVI.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. " Having said so, Gandhari, though standing on that spot which was distant from the field of battle, saw with her spiritual eye, the slaughter of the Kurus.

2. Devoted to her lord, that highly blessed lady always practised high vows. Practising the severest penances, she was always truthful in her speech.

3. By virtue of the gift of the boon by the great Rishi Vyasa of pure deeds, she came by spiritual knowledge and power. The lady then piteously bewailed.

4. The highly intelligent Kuru dame saw, from a distance, but as if from a near point, that field of battle, terrible to look at and full of wonderful sights, of those foremost of warriors.

5. Strewn with bones and hair, and covered with streams of blood, that field was filled with thousands upon thousands of dead bodies on every side.

6. Covered with the blood of elephants and horses and car-warriors and various warriors, it was filled with headless trunks and trunkless heads.

7. And it resounded with the cries of elephants and horses and men and women, and abounded with jackals and cranes and ravens and Kankas and crows.

8. And it was the sporting ground of Rakshasas living on human flesh. And it was filled with ospreys and vultures and resounded with the inauspicious yells of jackals.

9—10. Then at the command of Vyasa king Dhritarashtra and all the sons of Pandu led by Yudhishthira, with Vasudeva and all the Kuru ladies, went to the battle-field.

11—12. Having reached Kurukshetra, those widowed ladies beheld their killed brothers and sons and sires and husbands lying on earth, as their bodies were being devoured by beasts of prey and wolves and ravens and crows and ghosts and Pishchas and Rakshasas and various other night-rangers.

13. Seeing that onslaught which resembled the spectacles seen on the sporting ground of Rudra, the ladies cried and quickly got down from their costly cars.

14. Witnessing sights the like of which they had never before seen, the Bharata ladies felt their limbs to be deprived of strength and dropped down on the ground.

15. Others became so stupefied that they lost their consciousness. Indeed, the Panchala and the Kuru ladies were plunged into indescribable distress.

16—18. Seeing that dreadful field of battle filled on all sides with the cries of those grief-stricken ladies, the daughter of Suvala, acquainted with all forms of duty, addressed the lotus-eyed Keshava that foremost of all men. Beholding that universal destruction of the Kurus and filled with grief at the sight, she said,—'Look, O lotus-eyed Madhava, at these daughters-in-law of mine! Deprived of their husbands they are with dishevelled hair, crying piteously like a flight of she-ospreys.

19. Seeing those dead bodies, they are remembering the great Bharata chiefs! They are running here and those in a body towards their sons and brothers and sires and husbands.

20. See, O mighty-armed one, the field is covered with mothers of heroes, all of whom, however, have been deprived of children! There, that part is covered with wives of heroes, who have, however, been bereaved of their husbands.

21. See the field of battle is adorned with those foremost of men, viz., Bhishma and Karna and Abhimanyu and Drona and Drupada and Shalya.

22. See it is adorned also with the golden coats of mail, and with the precious gems, of high-souled warriors, and with their Angadas and Keyuras and garlands.

23. Behold, it is covered with darts and spikes discharged by heroic hands, and swords and various kinds of keen arrows and bows.

24. Beasts of prey, in a body, are standing or sporting or lying down according to their pleasure.

25. Behold, O powerful hero, the field of battle in this state! At this sight, O Janarddana, I am burning with grief.

26. With the destruction of the Panchalas and the Kurus, O slayer of Madhu, I think, the five elements have been destroyed.

27. Dreadful vultures and thousands of other birds, are dragging those bodies stained with blood and seizing them by their armour, are devouring them.

28. Who is there that could even imagine the death of such heroes as Jayadratha, Karna, Drona, Bhishma and Abhimanyu.

29. Alas, though incapable of being killed they have yet been killed, O slayer of Madhu! Behold, vultures, Kankas, ravens hawks, dogs and jackals are feasting upon them.

30. There, those foremost of men, who fought on Duryodhana's side, and went to the field in anger are now lying like extinguished fires.

31. All of them deserve sleeping on soft and clean beds. But alas, in a distressful condition they are sleeping to-day on the naked ground.

32. Recounting their praises poets used to please them before at proper times. They are now listening to the fierce and inauspicious yells of jackals.

33. Those great heroes who used formerly to sleep on rich beds with their limbs smeared with sandal-paste and powdered alone, are now sleeping on the dust.

34. These vultures, wolves and ravens are now their ornaments. Uttering again and again inauspicious and fierce cries, those creatures are now dragging their bodies.

35. Those heroes, look even cheerful, now, and have still beside them their keen arrows, well-tempered swords, and bright maces, as if life has not yet left them!

36. Many leading heroes, possessed of beauty and fair complexions and bedecked with garlands of gold, are sleeping on the ground! Look beasts of prey are dragging and tearing them.

37. Some with massive arms, are sleeping with maces under them as if those were beloved wives.

38. Others with armour on, are holding in their hands their effulgent weapons. Beasts of prey are not tearing them, O Janarddana, thinking them to be still alive.

39. The beautiful golden garlands on the necks of other illustrious heroes, as the latter are being dragged by carnivorous creatures, are scattered about on all sides.

40. There, thousands of fierce wolves, are draging the golden chains round the necks of many illustrious but dead heroes.

41—42. Many, whom clever bards formerly used with their hymns and panegyris, to delight every morning, are now surrounded by fair ladies stricken with grief and weeping and crying around them in distress, O foremost of Vrishni's race.

43. The faces of those beautiful ladies, O Keshava, though pale, still shine like red lotuses.

44. Those Kuru ladies have ceased weeping with their followers and companions. They are all filled with anxiety. Bewildered with sorrow, they are running here and there.

45. The faces of those fair ladies have, with weeping and ire, become effulgent as the morning sun, or gold, or burnished copper.

46. Hearing each other's unmeaning lamentations those ladies, on account of the loud cries of woe coming from every side, are unable to understand each other's meaning.

47. Some amongst them, heavily sighing and repeatedly bewailing, are stupefied by grief and are giving up their lives.

48. Many of them, seeing the bodies [of their sons, husbands, or sires,] are weeping and lamenting. Others are striking their heads with their own soft hands.

49. The Earth, filled with heaps of heads and hands and other limbs, the sights of destruction, looks resplendent.

50. Seeing many headless trunks of great beauty, and many heads without trunks, those fair ladies are lying unconscious on the ground for a long while.

51. Joining particular heads with particular trunks, those ladies, beside themselves with grief, are again discovering their mistakes, and saying,—This is not this one's,—and are weeping more bitterly.

52. Others, uniting arms and thighs and feet, cut off with arrows, are grieving and losing their consciousness repeatedly.

53. Some amongst the Bharata ladies, beholding the bodies of their husbands, mangled by animals and birds and shorn of heads,—are not recognising them.

54. Others, seeing their brothers, sires, sons, and husbands killed by enemies, are, O slayer of Madhu, striking their heads with their own hands.

55. Covered with flesh and blood, the Earth has become impassable with arms still holding swords and with heads adorned with ear-rings.

56. Seeing the field covered with the dead bodies of their brothers and sires, and sons, those faultless ladies, who had never before experiened the least distress, are now plunged into indescribable misery.

57. Look, O Janarddana, at those Dhritarashtra's daughters-in-law, resembling a number of beautiful fillies adorned with excellent manes.

58. O Keshava, is there a more sorrowful sight for me to see than that presented by those ladies of fair forms who are put into such a miserable plight? I must, forsooth, have perpetrated great sins in my previous existence, since I am beholding, O Keshava, my sons and grandsons and brothers all killed by foes.' While thus bewailing Gandhari saw the dead body of her son Duryodhana."

CHAPTER XVII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. "Seeing Duryodhana, Gandhari, deprived of her senses by grief, suddenly dropped down on the Earth like an uprooted plantain tree.

2. Having regained her consciousness soon, she began to weep and lament seeing her son lying on the bare ground, bathed in blood.

3. Embracing her son, Gandhari bewailed piteously. Stricken with grief, and growing unconscious, the Kuru queen exclaimed,—'Alas, O son!' 'Alas, O son.'

4—6. Burning with grief, the queen wetted with her tears the body of her son, possessed of massive and broad shoulders, and adorned with garlands and collar. Addressing Hrishikesha, who stood by her, she said,—'On the eve of this battle, O powerful one, that has exterminated this race, this foremost of kings, O Vrishny-hero, said to me,—In this civil battle, O mother, wish me success!—When he said these words, myself, knowing that a great calamity had befallen us, told him, O foremost of men, Victory is there where righteousness is.

7. And since, O son, you are bent upon fighting a batttle, you will, forsooth, obtain those regions that can be gained by weapons and sport there like a celestial.

8. These were the words that I then said to him. I did not then grieve for my son. I am, however, sorry for the helpless Dhritarashtra deprived of friends and kinsmen.

9. Look, O Madhava, at my son, that best of warriors, wrathful, expert in weapons, and irresistible in battle, sleeping on the bed of heroes.

10. See the reverses brought about by Time. This subduer of enemies that used formerly to walk at the head of all kings now sleeps on the dust.

11. Forsooth, the heroic Duryodhana, when he sleeps on that bed of the heroes, has attained to the best end.

12. Inauspicious jackals are now pleasing that prince sleeping on the heroe's bed, who was formerly counted by the fairest of ladies sitting round him.

13. He who was formerly encircled by kings who competed with one another to give him pleasure, alas, is now slain and lying on the ground, encircled by vultures.

14. He who was formerly fanned with beautiful fans by fair damsels, is now fanned by [carnivorous] birds with flaps of their wings.

15. Endued with great strength and true prowess, this mighty-armed prince, killed by Bhimasena in battle, sleeps like an elephant killed by a lion.

16. Look at Duryodhana, O Krishna, lying on the naked Earth, bathed in blood, killed by Bhimasena with his mace.

17. That mighty-armed one who had in battle collected together eleven Akshauhinis of soldiers, O Keshava, has on account of his own evil policy, been now killed.

18. Alas, there that great bowman and powerful car-warrior sleeps, killed by Bhimasena, like a tiger killed by a lion.

19. Having disobeyed Vidura, and his own father, this reckless, foolish, and wicked prince has met with death, on account of his disregard of the old.

20. He who had unrivalled sway over the Earth, for thirteen years, alas, that prince, that son of mine, sleeps to-day on the naked Earth, killed by his foes.

21. Not long before, O Krishna, I saw the Earth, full of elephants and kine and horses, ruled by Duryodhana.

22. To-day, O you of mighty-arms, I see her governed by another, and destitute of elephants and kine and horses. What need have I, O Madhava, of life?

23. Again, look at this sight, of these fair ladies weeping by the side of the killed heroes, that is more painful than the death of my son.

24. Behold, O Krishna, the mother of Lakshmana, that lady having large hips, with her hairs dishevelled, that dear wife of Duryodhana, resembling a golden sacrificial altar.

25. While her mighty-armed husband was formerly alive, this highly intelligent damsel used to sport within the embrace of her lord's beautiful arms.

26. Why, indeed, does not my heart break into a hundred pieces seeing my son and grandson killed in battle.

27. Alas, that innocent lady now smells her son covered with blood. Again, that lady having beautiful thighs is gently rubbing Duryodhana's body with her fair hand.

28. At one time she is grieving for her husband, and again for her son. At one time she looks on her lord, and again on her son.

29. See, O Madhava, striking her head with her hands, she falls upon the breast of her heroic husband, the king of the Kurus.

30. Having a complexion like that of the filaments of the lotus, she looks beautiful like a lotus. The hapless princess, now rubs the face of her son, and again that of her husband.

31. If the scriptures and the Shrutis be true, forsooth, this king has obtained the blessed region that one may acquire by the use of weapons'."

CHAPTER XVIII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Gandhari said :—

1. "See, O Madhava, my hundred sons, who never knew fatigue in battle, have all been killed by Bhimasena with his mace in battle.

2. That which pains me more to-day is that these my young daughters-in-law, deprived of sons and with dishevelled hairs, are wandering on the field to-day.

3. Alas, they who formerly walked only on the terraces of magnificent edifices with feet decorated with many ornaments, are now, in great misery, obliged to touch with those feet of theirs this hard Earth, covered with blood.

4. Reeling in sorrow, they are moving about like drunk persons, driving away with difficulty vultures and jackals and crows.

4. Behold, seeing this terrible destruction, that lady of beautiful limbs, and slender waist, falls down, laden with grief.

6. Beholding this princess, this mother of Lakshmana, O you of mighty-arms, my heart is torn with sorrow.

7. Some seeing their brothers, some their husbands, and some their sons, lying down dead on the naked earth, these beautiful ladies of fair arms, are themselves falling down, catching the arms of the killed.

8. Hear, O unvanquished one, the loud lamentations of those elderly ladies and those others of middle age on witnessing this terrible destruction.

9. See, O you of great might, thos dames, exhausted with fatigue, are taking rest, supporting themselves against broken boxes of cars and the bodies of slain elephants and steeds.

10. See, O Krishna, taking up some relative's severed head adorned with beautiful nose and ear-rings, some one amongst them, is standing sorrowfully.

11—12. I think, O sinless one, they and myself of little understanding must have perpetrated great iniquities in our previous lives, since, O Janarddana, all our relatives and kinsmen have thus been killed by king Yudhishthira. Our acts, fair or unfair, must bear fruits, O you of Vrishni's race.

13—14. See, O Madhava, those young ladies having beautiful breasts and abdomen, born in respectable families, of great modesty, having black eye-lashes and tressess of the same color on their heads, having voice sweet and dear like that of swans, are falling down, unconscious from great grief and crying piteously like flights of cranes.

15. See, O lotus-eyed hero, their beautiful faces resembling full-blown lotuses, are scorched by the sun.

16. Alas, O Vasudeva, the wives of my proud children who were powerful like infuriate elephants, are now being looked at by common people.

17—18. See, O Govinda, the shields decked with hundred moons, the sunny standards, the golden coats of mail, and the golen collars and cuirasses, and the head-gears, of my sons, scattered on the Earth, are shining like sacrificial fires over which have been poured libations of clarified butter.

19. There, Dusshasana sleeps, killed by Bhima, having the blood of all his limbs drunk by that heroic slayer of foes.

20. Look at that other son of mine, O Madhava, killed by Bhima with his mace, actuated by Draupadi and the memory of his woes at the time of the match at dice.

21—22. Addressing the princess of Panchala, in the midst of the assembly, who had been won by dice, this Dusshasana, desirous of pleasing his [elder] brother and Karna, O Janarddana, had said,—You are now the wife of a slave! With Sahadeva and Nakula and Arjuna, O lady, enter our household now.

23. At that time, O Krishna, I said to king Duryodhana,—O son, discard the wrathful Shakuni.

24. Know your maternal uncle to be very wicked and greatly fond of quarrel. Discard him forthwith and make peace with the Pandavas, O son.

25. O fool, do you not think of Bhimasena filled with anger. You are cutting him with your wordy arrows like a person striking an elephant with burning brands.

26. Alas, neglecting my words, he vomitted his poison of words at them, who had already been cut with wordy arrows, like a snake vomiting his poison at a bull.

27. There that Dusshasana sleeps stretching his two massive arms, killed by Bhimasena like a powerful elephant by a lion.

28. The very angry Bhimasena perpetrated a most dreadful deed by drinking in battle the blood of his foe."

CHAPTER XIX.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Gandhari said :—

1. "There, O Madhava, my son Vikarna, praised by the wise, lies on the naked earth, killed by Bhima and wounded horribly.

2. O destroyer of Madhu, Vikarna lies there dead in the midst of [slain] elephants like the moon in the autumnal sky surrounded by blue clouds.

3. His broad palm, covered with leathern fence, and scarred by constant holding of the bow, is pierced with difficulty by vultures desirous of eating it up.

4. His helpless young wife, O Madhava, is continually but unsuccessfully trying to drive away those vultures desirous of feeding on carrion.

5. The youthful, brave and beautiful Vikarna, O foremost of men, reared in luxury and worthy of every kind of happiness, now sleeps on dust, O Madhava.

6. Though all his vital parts have been cut with cloth-yard and bearded arrows and nalikas, yet the natural beauty of his body has not left this best of the Bharatas.

7. There, my son Durmuksha, that destroyer of a great number of enemies, sleeps facing the enemy, slain by the heroic Bhimasena in satisfaction of his promise.

8. His face, O Krishna, half eaten away by beasts of prey, looks more beautiful like the moon on the seventh day of the light fortnight.

9. Look, O Krishna, at the face of that heroic son of mine. How could that son of mine be killed by enemies and thus made to eat the dust.

10. O amiable one, how could that Durmukha, before whom no enemy could stand be killed, by foes.

11. Look, O slayer of Madhu, at that other son of Dhritarashtra, viz., Chitrasena, the best of all bowmen, slain and lying on the ground.

12. Those young ladies, stricken with grief and crying piteously are now sitting, with beasts of prey, around his beautiful body bedecked with wreaths and garlands.

13. The piteous lamentations of women, and these cries and roars of beasts of prey, appear highly wonderful to me, O Krishna.

14. Young and beautiful, and always waited upon and served by the most handsome ladies, my son Vivinshati, O Madhava, sleeps there, covered with dust.

15. His armour has been cut with arrows. Killed in the general destruction, the heroic Vivingshati is now encircled and waited upon by vultures.

16. Having in battle penetrated the ranks of the Pandava army, that hero now sleeps on the bed of a most exalted and heroic Kshatriya.

17. Look, O Krishna, at his very beautiful and smiling face, having excellent nose and beautiful eyebrows, and resembling the shining Moon himself.

18. Formerly a body of the most beautiful ladies used to wait upon him, like thousands of celestial girls upon a sporting Gandharva.

19. Who again could stand before my son Dussaha, that destroyer of heroic enemies, that hero, that ornament of assemblies, that irresistible warrior, that resister of foes.

20. The body of Dussaha, covered with shafts, shines like a mountain overgrown with blossoming Karnikaras.

21. With his golden garland and his bright armour, Dussaha, though dead, shines yet, like a white mountain or fire."

CHAPTER XX.

Gandhari said :—

1—2. "He whose power and bravery were regarded, O Keshava, as a one and half times superior to those of his father and you, he who took after a dreadful and proud lion, he who alone pierced the impenetrable army of my son, he who killed many, alas, he now sleeps there, himself dead.

3. I see, O Krishna, the splendour of that son of Arjuna, of that great hero, viz., Abhimanyu, has not diminished even in death.

4. There, the daughter of Virata, the daughter-in-law of Arjuna, that girl of faultless beauty, stricken with grief on seeing her heroic husband, is bewailing.

5. Approaching her husband, that young wife, viz., the daughter of Virata, is gently rubbing him, O Krishna, with her hand.

6—7. Formerly, that highly intelligent and beautiful girl, inebriate with honied wines, used bashfully to embrace her lord, and kiss the face of Subhadra's son, resembling a fullblown lotus and supported on a neck bearing three lines like those of a conch-shell.

8. Taking off her husband's golden armour, O hero, that damsel is now looking on the body of her husband covered with blood.

9. Beholding her lord, O Krishna, that girl addresses you saying :—'O lotus-eyed one, this hero whose eyes resembled yours, has been killed.

10. In power, energy, and prowess, he was your equal, O sinless one! He resembled you very much in beauty. Yet he sleeps on the ground, killed by the enemy.'

11. Addressing her own husband, she says again,—'You were reared up in every luxury. You used to sleep on soft skins of the Ranku deer. Alas, does not your body feel pain to-day by lying thus on this naked Earth.

12—13. Stretching your massive arms decorated with golden Angadas, resembling a couple of elephant's trunks, and coated with skin hardened by constant use of the bow, sleep you, O lord, peacefully, as if worn out with the fatigue of too much exercise. Alas, why do you not speak to me that am weeping so?

14. I do not remember to have ever offended you. Why do you not speak to me then? Formerly, you used to address me even when you would see me at a distance.

15. Where will you go, leaving behind you the much-respected Subhadra, these your sires who take after the very celestials, and my own wretched self distracted with grief.

16—17. See, O Krishna, collecting with her hands the blood-dyed hairs of her husband and placing his head on her lap, the beautiful lady is addressing him as if he were alive,—How could those great car-warriors kill you in the midst of battle,— you who are the sister's son of Vasudeva and the son of the holder of Gandiva?

18. Alas, fie on those wicked warriors, Kripa, Karna, Jayadratha, Drona and Drona's son, by whom you were killed!

19. What did those great car-warriors think at that time when they surrounded you, a warrior of tender years, and killed you to my grief?

20. How could you, O hero, who had so many protectors, be killed so helplessly before the very eyes of the Pandavas and the Panchalas?

21. Seeing thee, O hero, killed in battle by many warriors in a body, how is that foremost of men, that son of Pandu, viz., your father, able to bear the burden of life?

22. Neither the acquisition of a vast territory, nor the discomfiture of their foes, gives joy to the Parthas bereft of you, O lotus-eyed one.

23. By the practice of virtue and self-restraint, I shall very soon go to those blissful regions which you have acquired by the use of weapons. Protect me, O hero, when I go there.

24. Untill the appointed time comes, one cannot die, since, wretched that I am, I am still alive after seeing you killed in battle.

25. Having gone to the region of the departed manes, whom else, like me, do you address now, O foremost of men, in sweet and smiling words.

26. Forsooth, you will agitate the hearts of the Apsaras in heaven, with your great beauty and soft and smiling words.

27. Having attained the regions reserved for pious persons, you are now united, O son of Subhadra, with the Apsaras. While playing with them, recollect now and then my good acts towards you.

28. Your union with me in this world had, it seems, been ordained for only six months, for on the seventh, O hero, you lost your life.

29. O Krishna, the ladies of the royal house of Matsya are dragging away the sorrowful Uttara, disappointed, and even lamenting in this way.

30. Dragging away the sorrow-stricken Uttara, those ladies, themselves still more aggrieved than that girl, are weeping and bewailing aloud at sight of the slain Virata.

31. Wounded with the weapons and arrows of Drona, lying down on earth, and bathed in blood, Virata is encompassed by screaming vultures and yelling jackals and crowing ravens.

32. Those black-eyed ladies, approaching the dead body of the Matsya king over which carnivorous birds are uttering cries of joy, are trying to turn the body. Weakened by grief, they are unable to do what they wish.

33. Scorched by the Sun, and exhausted with fatigue and toil, their faces have become colourless and pale.

34. See also, O Madhava, those other children, besides Abhimanyu, viz., Uttara, Sudakshina the prince of the Kamvojas, and the beautiful Lakshmana, all lying on the field of battle.' "

CHAPTER XXI.

Gandhari said :—

1. "There the powerful Karna, that great bowman, lies prostrate on the earth. In battle he was like a burning fire. That fire, however, has now been put out by the power of Partha.

2. See, Vikartana's son Karna, after having killed many Atirathas, has been prostrated on the naked Earth and is covered with blood.

3. Wrathful and energetic, he was a great bowman and a powerful car-warrior. Killed in battle by the holder of Gandiva, that hero now sleeps on the ground.

4. My sons, those powerful car-warriors, from fear of the Pandavas, fought, led by Karna, like a herd of elephants with its leader standing first.

5. Alas, like a tiger killed by a lion, or an elephant by an infuriate elephant, that warrior has been killed in battle by Savyasachin.

6. Collected together, O foremost of men, the wives of that warrior, with dishevelled hairs and loud cries of grief, are sitting around that fallen hero.

7. Anxious about that warrior, king Yudhishthira the just could not sleep for thirteen years.

8. Incapable of being restrained by foes in battle like Indra himself who is invincible by enemies, Karna was like the all-destroying fire of dreadful flames at the end of a cycle, and immoveable like Himavat himself.

9. That hero became the protector of Dhritarashtra's son, O Madhava! Alas, killed, he now lies on the bare ground, like a tree struck down by the wind.

10. Behold, the wife of Karna and mother of Vrishasena, is bewailing piteously and crying and weeping and falling upon the ground.

11. Even now she exclaims,—Forsooth your preceptor's curse has followed you. When the wheel of your car was sunk in the Earth, the cruel Dhananjaya cut off your head with a shaft.

12. That lady, the mother of Sushena, greatly stricken with woe and uttering cries of woe, is falling down, unconscious at the sight of the mighty-armed and brave Karna prostrated on the Earth, with his waist still encircled with a golden belt.

13. Feasting on the body of that illustrious hero, carnivorous animals, have reduced it greatly. This spectacle is indeed pitiable, like that of the moon on the fourteenth night of the dark dark-fortnight.

14. Falling down on the ground, the cheerless lady is rising up again. Filled with grief for the death of her son also, she comes and smelleth the face of her husband."

CHAPTER XXII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Gandhari said :—

1. "See, killed by Bhimasena, the king of Avanti lies there. Vultures and jackals and crows are feasting upon that hero. Though possessed of many friends, he lies now perfectly helpless.

2. See, O slayer of Madhu, having made a great onslaught of enemies, that warrior is now lying on the bed of a hero, bathed in blood.

3. Jackals, and Kankas, and other carnivorous animals of various kinds, are dragging him now. Mark the reverses caused by Time.

4. His wives, all are crying in grief, and sitting around that hero who while alive was a terrible slayer of enemies but who now lies on the bed of a hero.

5. See, Pratipa's son Valhika, that powerful and highly energetic bowman, slain with a broad-headed shaft, is now lying on the ground like a sleeping tiger.

6. Though dead, the color of his face is still highly bright, like that of the full moon, risen on the fifteenth day of the light fortnight.

7. Burning with grief on account of the death of his son, and desirous of fulfilling his vow, Indra's son Arjuna has killed there that son of Vriddhakshatra.

8. Behold that Jayadratha, who was protected by the illustrious Drona, killed by Partha bent on making good his promise, after penetrating through eleven Akshauhinis of soldiers.

9. Inauspicious vultures, O Janarddana, are feasting upon Jayadratha, the proud and energetic lord of the Sindhu-Sauviras.

10. See, O Achyuta, carnivorous creatures are dragging his body away to a neighbouring jungle, though his devoted wives are trying to protect it.

11. The Kamvoja and Yavana wives of that powerful king of the Sindhus and the Sauviras are waiting upon him for protecting his body.

12. At that time, O Janarddana, when Jayadratha, assisted by the Kekayas, tried to ravish Draupadi, he should have been killed by the Pandavas.

13. Out of respect, for Dusshala, they liberated him on that occasion. Why, O Krishna, did they not show some respect for that Dusshala once more.

14. That young daughter of mine, is now crying sorrowfully. She is striking her body with her own hands and blaming the Pandavas.

15. What, O Krishna, can be a greater grief to me than that my young daughter should be a widow and all my daughters-in-law should equally be so.

16. Alas, alas, see, my daughter Dusshala having cast off her grief and fears, is running about in search of the head of her husband.

17. After killing a vast army, he who had restrained all the Pandavas desirous of rescuing their son, at last himself yeilded to death.

18. Alas, those wives of his, with faces as beautiful as the moon, are crying, sitting around that irresistible hero who took after an infuriate elephant."

CHAPTER XXIII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Gandhari said :—

1. "There lies Shalya, the maternal uncle himself of Nakula, killed in battle, by the pious and virtuous Yudhishthira.

2. He used everywhere, O foremost of men, to boast of his equality with you. That powerful car-warrior, viz., the king of the Madras, now lies dead.

3. When he accepted the drivership of Karna's car in battle, he tried to depress Karna for securing victory for the sons of Pandu.

4. Alas, alas, look at the smooth face of Shalya, beautiful as the moon, and having eyes resembling lotus petals, eaten away by crows.

5. There, the tongue of that king, beautiful like molten gold, lolling out of his mouth, is, O Krishna, being devoured by carnivorous birds.

6. The ladies of the royal house of Madra, crying aloud, are sitting around the body of that king, that ornament of assemblies, killed by Yudhishthira.

7—8. Those ladies are sitting around that fallen hero like a herd of she-elephants in their season around their leader sunk in mud.

9. Look at the brave Shalya, the great protector and the foremost of car-warriors, stretched on the bed of heroes, his body wounded with arrows.

10. There the highly powerful king Bhagadatta, the king of a mountainous kingdom, the foremost of all holders of good, lies dead on the Earth.

11. Look at the golden and shining garland that he still wears on his head. Though the body is being devoroured by beasts of prey, that garland still adorns the beautiful hairs on his head.

12. Dreadful was the battle that took place between this king and Partha, making the hairs stand erect, like that between Shakra and the Asura Vritra.

13. Having fought Dhananjaya the son of Pritha, and brought him to a perilous condition, this mighty-armed one, was at last killed by his antagonist.

14. He who had no equal on Earth in heroism and energy, that achiever of dreadful feasts in battle, viz., Bhishma, lies there dead.

15. Behold the son of Shantanu, O Krishna, that hero effulgent like the sun, stretched on the Earth, like the Sun himself dropped off the sky at the end of the Yuga.

16. Having scorched his enemies with the fire of his weapons in battle, that brave warrior, that Sun among men, O Keshava, has set like the real Sun at evening.

17. Look at that hero, O Krishna, who in knowledge of duty was equal to Devapi himself, now lying on a bed of arrows, worthy of heroes.

18. Having spread his bed of barbed and unbarbed arrows, that hero lieth on it like Skanda on a clump of reeds.

19. Indeed, the son of Ganga lies there, resting his head on that excellent pillow, consisting of three arrows,—given him by Arjuna.

20. For obeying the mandate of his father, this illustrious one drew up his vital seed. Peerless in battle, that son of Shantanu lies there, O Madhava.

21. Pious and acquainted with all forms of duty, by the help of his knowledge of both the worlds, that hero, though mortal, is still alive like an immortal.

22. When Shantanu's son lies to-day, struck down with arrows, it seems that no other person alive on Earth who is learned and powerful and who is competent to perform great feats in battle.

23. Solicited by the Pandavas, this truthful, righteous, and virtuous hero, communicate to them the means of his own death.

24. Alas, he who had revived the extinct line of Kuru, that illustrious and highly intelligent person, has left the world with all the Kurus in his company.

25. From whom, O Madhava, will the Kurus recieve instructions on religion and duty after that foremost of men, viz., Devavrata, who resembles a god, shall have gone to heaven?

26. See Drona, that best of Brahmanas, that preceptor of Arjuna, of Satyaki, and of the Kurus, is lying on the ground.

27. The highly energetic Drona, O Madhava, was as a master of the four kinds of arms like Shukra of Vrigu's race.

28. Through his favour, Vibhatsu the son of Pandu has achieved the most difficult feats. He now lies dead on the ground. Weapons refused to come at last at his command.

29. Placing him at their head, the Kauravas had challenged the Pandavas. That foremost of all warriors was in the end wounded with weapons.

30. As he moved about in battle, scorching his enemies in every direction, his movement resembled that of a blazing fire. Alas, he now lies dead on the ground, like an extinguished fire.

31. The handle of the bow is yet in his grasp. The leathern fences, O Madhava, are still on his fingers. Though killed, he still looks as if alive.

32. The four Vedas, and all kinds, of weapons, O Keshava, did not leave that hero even as they do not the Lord Prajapati.

33. His auspicious feet, worthy of adoration and adored before by bards and eulogists, and worshipped by disciples, are now being dragged by jackals.

34. Senseless with sorrow, Kripi sorrowfully attends, O destroyer of Madhu, on that Drona who has been killed by Drupada's son.

35. Look at that sorrow-stricken lady, fallen upon the Earth, with dishevelled hair and face hanging down. Alas, she serves sorrowfully her lifeless husband, that best of all holders of weapons, lying on the ground.

36. Many Brahmana saints, with matted locks on their head, are serving the body of Drona that is cased in armour cut asunder, O Keshava, with the arrows of Dhrishtadyumna.

37. The illustrious and delicate Kripi, depressed and sorrow-stricken, is trying to perform the last rites on the body of her husband killed in battle.

38. There, having placed the body of Drona on the funeral pyre and having put fire with due rites those reciters of Samans are singing the three verses.

39. Those Brahmana saints, with matted locks on their head, have made the funeral pyre of that Brahmana with bows and arrows and car-boxes, O Madhava.

40. Having collected various other sorts of arrows, that highly energetic hero is being consumed by them. Having placed his body on the pyre, they are singing and weeping.

41—42. Others are reciting the three well-known Saman verses that are used on such occasions. Burning the dead body of Drona on that fire, like fire in fire, those those saintly disciples of his, are proceeding towards the banks of Ganga, along the left side of the pyre and having placed Kripi at their head."

CHAPTER XXIV.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Gandhari said :—

1. "See the son of Somadatta, who was killed by Yuyudhana, is being cut by a large number of birds.

2. Burning with sorrow at the death of his son, Somadatta, O Janarddana, seems to blame the great bowman Yuyudhana.

3—4. There the mother of Bhurishravas that faultless lady, beside herself with grief, is addressing her lord Somadatta, saying, —By good luck, O king, you do not witness this terrible destruction of the Bharatas, this extermination of the Kurus, this sight resembling the spectacles occurring at the end of a cycle.

5. By good luck, you do not see your heroic son, who bore the device of the sacrificial stake on his banner and who celebrated numberless sacrifices with profuse presents to all, killed on the field of battle.

6. By good luck, you do not hear those dreadful wails of woe uttered amidst this destruction by your daughters-in-law like the screams of a flight of cranes on the sea.

7. Your daughters-in-law, deprived of both husbands and sons, are running about, each clad in a single piece of cloth and each with her black hairs all dishevelled.

8. By good luck, you do not see your son, that foremost of men, deprived of one of his arms, killed by Arjuna, and now being devoured by beasts of prey.

9. By good luck, you do not see to-day your son Shala killed in battle, and Bhurishravas deprived of life, and your widowed daughters-in-law plunged into grief.

10. By good luck, you do not see the golden umbrella of that illustrious hero who had the sacrificial stake as his emblem on his banner, torn and broken on the terrace of his car.

11. There the black-eyed wives of Bhurishravas are bewailing piteously surrounding their lord killed by Satyaki.

12. Stricken with sorrow on account of the slaughter of their husband, those ladies bewailing piteously, are falling down on the Earth with their faces towards the ground, and slowly approaching you, O Keshava!

13. Alas, why did Arjuna of pure deeds commit such a heinous crime, since he cut off the arm of a heedless warrior who was brave and used to perform sacrifices.

14. Alas, Satyaki perpetrated a still more sinful act, for he killed a person of restrained soul while sitting in the observance of the praya vow.

15. Alas, O righteous one, you are lying on the ground, killed unfairly by two foes. —Thus, O Madhava, those wives of Bhurishravas are crying aloud in sorrow.

16—17. There, those wives of that warrior, all having slender waists, are placing upon their laps the cut off arm of their husband and weeping bitterly.—Here is that arm which used to attack the girdles, grind the deep bosoms and touch the navel, the thighs, and the hips, of fair ladies, and loosen the ties of the drawers worn by them.

18. Here is that arm which killed enemies and dispelled the fears of friends, which gave thousands of kine and rooted out the Kshatriyas in battle.

19. In the presence of Vasudeva himself, Arjuna of pure deeds cut it off while you were heedless and engaged with another in battle.

20—21. How wilt you, O Janarddana, describe this great fear of Arjuna while speaking of it in the midst of assemblies. What also will the diadem-decked Arjuna himself say of it?—Censuring you in this way, that best of ladies has stopped at last. The co-wives of that lady are lamenting piteously with her as if she were their daughter-in-law.

23. "There the powerful Shakuni, the king of the Gandharas, having irresistible prowess, has been killed by Sahadeva, the maternal uncle by the sister's son.

23. Formerly, he used to be fanned with a two gold-handed fans. Alas, now, this boy lounging on the ground is being fanned by birds with their wings.

24. He used to assume hundreds and thousands of forms. All the illusions, however, of that man possessed of great illusory powers, have been burnt by the energy of the son of Pandu.

25. Highly wily, he had defeated Yudhishthira in the assembly by his power of deception and won from him his vast kingdom. The son of Pandu, however, has now conquered Shakuni's life-breaths.

26. Look, O Krishna, a number of birds is now sitting around Shakuni. An expert in dice, alas, he had also mastered the means for the destruction of my sons.

27. This fire of hostility with the Pandavas had been lighted by Shakuni, for the destruction of my children as also of himself and his followers and relatives.

28. Like those gained by my sons, O powerful one, by the use of arms, this man too, however wicked-souled, has obtained many blissful regions by the use of weapons.

29. My fear, O destroyer of Madhu, is that that wily man may not create dissensions even there between my children, all of whom are simple and confiding.

CHAPTER XXV.

Gandhari said :—

1. "Behold that irresistible king of the Kamvojas, that bull-necked hero, lying in the dust, O Madhava, though worthy of sleeping comfortably on Kamvoja blankets.

2. Stricken with great sorrow, his wife is weeping bitterly at sight of his arms covered with blood, which, however, formerly used to be smeared with sandal-paste.

3. Indeed, the beautiful lady exclaims, —Even now adorned with beautiful palms and fingers, these two arms of yours resemble a couple of spiked maces, entering into whose clasp joy never left me for a moment.

4. How shall I fare, O king, when I am deprived of you.—Possessing a ... voice, the Kamvoja queen is weeping ...lessly and trembling with emotion.

5. Look at that bevy of fair ladies. Although tired with toil and worn out ... heat, yet beauty does not leave them ... the beauty of the garlands worn by celestials although exposed to the Sun.

6. Behold, O destroyer of Madhu, the heroic king of the Kalingas lying there on the ground, with his mighty arms bedecked with a couple of Angadas.

7. Behold, O Janarddana, those Magadha ladies crying and standing around Jayatsena the king of the Magadhas.

8. The charming and sweet cries of those large-eyed and sweet-voiced damsels, O Krishna, are stupefying my heart greatly.

9. Having all their ornaments displaced, crying, and stricken with sorrow, alas, those ladies of Magadha, worthy of sleeping on costly beds, are now lying down on the naked earth.

10. Surrounding their lord, the king of the Koshalas, viz., prince Vrihadvala, those other ladies are crying aloud.

11. Engaged in taking out from his person the arrows with which it was pierced by Abhimanyu with the full force of his arms, those ladies are again and again losing their consciousness.

12. The faces of those beautiful damsels, O Madhava, exhausted with toil and scorched by the rays of the Sun, are appearing like faded lotuses.

13. ... sons of Dhrishtadyumna, young in age, and bedecked with garlands of gold and beautiful Angadas, are lying, killed by Drona.

14. Like insects on a burning fire, they have all been consumed by falling upon Drona whose car was the chamber of fire, having the bow for its flames and arrows and darts and maces for its fuel.

15. Likewise, the five brave Kekaya brothers, adorned with beautiful Angadas, are lying on earth killed by Drona and with their faces turned towards that hero.

16. Their coats of mail, shining like molten gold, and their tall standards and cars and garlands all made of gold, are shedding a bright lustre on the Earth like so many burning fires.

17. Look, O Madhava, at king Drupada overthrown in battle by Drona, like a mighty elephant in the forest killed by a huge lion.

18. The bright and white umbrella, of the king of the Panchalas, shines, O lotus-eyed one, like the moon in the autumnal sky.

19. Having burnt his body on the funeral pyre, the daughters-in-law and the wives of the old king, stricken with sorrow, are proceeding, keeping the pyre to their right.

20. There, those ladies, beside themselves with sorrow, are removing the brave and great bowman, viz., Dhrishtaketu, that foremost of the Chedis, killed by Drona.

21. Having counteracted many weapons of Drona, this destroyer of foes, O slayer of Madhu, this great bowman lies there, dead, like a tree uprooted by the wind.

22. After having slain thousands of enemies, that brave king of the Chedis, that mighty car-warrior, viz., Dhrishtaketu ..., himself deprived of life.

23. There, O Hrishikesha, the wives of ... king of the Chedis are sitting around ... body still decked with beautiful hairs ... ear-rings, though torn by carnivorous ...rds.

24. Placing upon their laps the prostrate ...rm of the heroic Dhrishtaketu of Dashar... race, those foremost of ladies, are crying in sorrow.

... Behold, O Hrishikesh, the son of Dhrishtaketu, having fair locks and ...lent ear-rings, cut in battle by Drona ... his arrows.

26. He never deserted his father while ...e latter fought with his enemies. Mark, O destroyer of Madhu, he does not, even in death, leave the side of that heroic father.

27. Thus also, my grandson, that slayer of hostile heroes, viz., the mighty-armed Lakshmana, has followed his father Duryodhana.

28. Look, O Keshava, at the two brothers of Avanti, viz., Vinda and Anuvinda, lying there on the field, like two blossoming Shala trees in the spring uprooted by the wind.

29. Clad in golden armour and bedecked with golden Angadas, they are still armed with swords and bows. Having eyes like those of a bull, and decked with shining garlands, both of them are lying on the field.

30—31. The Pandavas, O Krishna, as well as yourself, are surely unslayable, since they and you have escaped from Drona, Bhishma, Karna the son of Vikartana, Kripa, Duryodhana, the son of Drona, the mighty car-warrior Jayadratha, Somadatta, Vikarna, and from the brave Kritavarman.

32. Mark the reverses created by Time. Those leading warriors who could slay the very celestials by force of their arms have themselves been killed.

33. Forsooth, O Madhava, there is nothing difficult for destiny to bring about, since these leading men, these heroes, have been killed by Kshatriya warriors!

34. I considered my energetic sons as slain even then, O Krishna, when you came back unsuccessful to Upaplavya!

35. Shantanu's son and the wise Vidura told me then,—withdraw your love for your children.

36. The interviews of those persons could never be useless. Soon, O Janarddana, have my sons been reduced to ashes!' "

Vaishampayana said :—

37. "Having said so, Gandhari, beside herself with grief, dropped down on the Earth. Losing her fortitude, she became overwhelmed with grief.

38. Filled with anger and sorrow at the death of her sons, Gandhari, with agitated heart, attributed every fault to Keshava."

Gandhari said :—

39. "The Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras, O Krishna, have both been consumed. Whilst they were thus being rooted out, O Janarddana, why were you indifferent to them.

40. You could prevent the slaughter, for you have a large following and a vast army. You had eloquence, and you had the power of making peace.

41. Since deliberately, O slayer of Madhu, you were indifferent to this universal destruction, therefore, O mighty-armed one, you should feel the consequences of this act.

42. By the little merit I have acquired by serving dutifully my husband, by that merit so difficult to attain, I shall curse you, O holder of the discus and the mace.

43. Since you were indifferent to the Kurus and the Pandavas whilst they killed each other, therefore, O Govinda, you will be the destroyer of your own kinsmen.

44. On the thirty-sixth year from this, O destroyer of Madhu, you will, after bringing about the death of your kinsmen and friends and sons, perish by disgustful means within the forest.

45. The ladies of your family, deprived of sons, kinsmen, and friends, shall weep and cry even as these ladies of the Bharata family."

Vaishampayana continued :—

46—47. "Hearing these words, the great Krishna, addressing the worshipful Gandhari, said to her these words, smilingly,—'There is none in the world, save myself, who can exterminate the Vrishnis. I know this well. I am trying to bring it about. In imprecating this curse, O you of excellent vows, you have helped me in the accomplishment of that work.

48. The Vrishnis are incapable of being killed by others, whether human beings or gods or Danavas. The Yadavas, therefore, shall be killed by one another.

49. After the Dasharha hero had said so, the Pandavas became stupefied. Stricken, with anxiety, all of them became hopeless of life."

CHAPTER XXVI.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Krishna said :—

1. "Arise, arise, O Gandhari, do not grieve. Through your fault, this huge destruction has taken place.

2. Your son Duryodhana, was wicked, envious, and exceedingly arrogant. Praising his wicked acts, you thought them to be good.

3. Highly ruthless, he was the embodiment of hostilities and disobedient to the commands of the old. Why do you then attribute your own faults to me?

4. Dead or lost, the person who grieves for what has already taken place, and suffers greater grief. By grieving one increases it twofold.

5. A saintly woman bears children for the practice of austerities; the cow brings forth offspring for bearing burden; the mare brings forth her young for acquiring speed of motion; the Shudra woman bears a child for increasing the number of servitors; the Vaishaya woman for increasing the number of keepers of cattle. A princess, however, like you, brings forth sons for being killed."

Vaishampayana said :—

6. "Hearing these words of Vasudeva that were unpleasant to her, Gandhari, with heart stricken greatly with grief, remained silent.

7—8. Restraining the grief that originates from folly, the royal sage Dhritarashtra, enquired of Yudhishthira the just, saying,—'If, O son of Pandu, you know it, tell me the number of those that have been killed in this battle, as also of those that have escaped alive.'

Yudhishthira answered :—

9. 'One billion six hundred and sixty millions and tewenty thousand men have been killed in this battle.

10. The number is twenty-four thousand one hundred and sixty five heroes that have escaped.'

Dhritarashtra said :—

11. 'Tell me, O mighty-armed one, for you know everything, what ends those foremost of men have attained to.'

Yudhishthira said :—

12. 'Those truly powerful warriors that have cheerfully met with death in fierce battle, have all attained to regions like those of Indra.

13. Knowing death to be certain, they that have met it cheerlessly, have attained to the region of the Gandharvas.

14. Those warriors that have been killed by weapons, while turning away from the field or begging for quarter, have reached the region of the Guhyakas.

15—16. Those great warriors who, observing the duties of Kshatriyas and regarding flight from battle to be disgraceful, have fallen, wounded with keen weapons, while rushing fearlessly against their foes, have all assumed bright forms and reached the regions of Brahman!

17. The remaining warriors, that have anyhow been killed on the field of battle, have attained to the region of the Uttara-Kurus.'

Dhritarashtra said :—

18. 'By what knowledge, O son, you see these things like one crowned with ascetic success? Tell me this, O mighty-armed one, if you think that I can listen to it properly!'

Yudhishthira said .—

19. 'While at your behest I wandered in the forest, I obtained this boon at the time of sojourning to the sacred places!

20. I met with the celestial Rishi Lomasha and acquired from him the boon of spiritual vision. Again on another occasion I obtained second sight through the power of knowledge!

Dhritarashtra said :—

21. 'Is it necessary that our people should burn duly the dead bodies of both who have friends and who have not?

22. What shall we do with those that have none to look after them and that have no sacred fires? We have many duties to perform. Who are those whose (funeral) rites we should perform?

23. O Yudhishthira, will they obtain blissful regions by the merit of their deeds, they whose bodies are now being torn and dragged by vultures and other birds?'"

Vaishampayana said :—

24—26. "Thus addressed, Kunti's son the highly wise Yudhishthira commanded Sudharman (the priest of the Kauravas), Dhaumya, Sanjaya of the Suta order, Vidura of great wisdom, and Yuyutsu of Kuru's race, and all his servants headed by Indrasena, and all the other Sutas that were with him, saying,—' Cause the funeral rites of the killed, numbering by thousands, to be duly performed, so that no body may die for want of men to take care of them!

27—30. Thus commanded by king Yudhishthira the just, Vidura, Sanjaya, Sudharman, Dhaumya and Indrasena and others, procuring sandal and other kinds of wood used on such occasions, as also clarified butter and oil and perfumes and rich silken robes and other kinds of cloth, and large heaps of dry wood, and broken cars and various kinds of weapons, caused funeral pyres to be duly made and lighted and then without delay burnt duly, the dead bodies of [illegible]

31—38. They properly burnt upon those fires burning with libations of clarified butter poured in torrents over them, the bodies of Duryodhana and his hundred brothers, of Shalya, and Shala, and king Bhurishravas; of king Jayadratha and Abhimanyu, O Bharata; of Dusshasana's son and Lakshmana and king Dhrishtaketu; of Vrihanta and Somadatta and the hundreds of Srinjayas; of king Khemadhanwan and Virata and Drupada; of Shikhandin the prince of the Panchalas, and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race; of the valiant Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas; of the ruler of the Koshalas, the sons of Draupadi, and Shakuni the son of Suvala; of Achala and Vrishaka, and king Bhagadatta; of Karna and his son of great wrath; of those great bowmen, viz., the Kekaya princes, and those mighty car-warriors, viz., the Trigartas; of Ghatotkacha the prince of Rakshasas, and the brother of Vaka; of Alamvusha, that best of Rakshasas, and king Jalasandha; and of hundreds and thousands of other kings.

39. The Pitri-medha rites in honor of some of the great persons who were dead were performed there, while some sang Samans, and some cried for the dead.

40. With the loud sound of Samans and Richs, and the cries of the women, all creatures became stupefied that night.

41. The funeral fires, smokeless and burning brightly looked like shining planets in the sky enveloped by clouds.

42—43. Those among the dead that had hailed from various kingdoms and had no friends, were collected together in thousands of heaps and, at the command of Yudhishthira, were caused to be burnt by Vidura with the help a large number of persons acting coolly out of good-will and affection, on pyres made of dry wood.

44. Having performed their last rites, the Kuru king Yudhishthira, placing Dhritarashtra at his head, proceeded towards the river Ganga."

CHAPTER XXVII.

(JALAPRADANIKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—3. Arrived at the holy Ganga full of sacred water, containing many lakes, adorned with high banks and broad shores, and having a vast bed, they threw off their ornaments, upper garments, and belts and girdles. The Kuru ladies, crying and stricken with great sorrow offered oblations of water to their fathers and grandsons and brothers and kinsmen and sons and seniors and husbands. Conversant with duties, they also performed the water-rite for their friends.

4. While those wives of heroes were performing this rite in honour of their heroic husband, the access to the stream became easy, although the paths [carved out by feet] disappeared afterwards.

5. The shores of the river though crowded with those wives of heroes, looked as broad as the ocean and presented a sorrow of sorrow and cheerlessness.

6. Then Kunti, O king, laden with grief, weepingly addressed her sons in these soft words.

7—12. That hero and great bowman, that chief of many car-divisions, that heroic warrior who has been killed by Arjuna in battle, that warrior whom, ye sons of Pandu, you knew as the son of the charioteer Radha, that hero who shone in the midst of his army like the Sun himself, who fought with all of you and your followers, who shone as he commanded the vast army of Duryodhana, who had no equal on Earth in energy, that hero who preferred glory to life, that brave warrior firm in truth and never fatigued with exertion, was your eldest brother! Offer oblations of water to that eldest brother of yours who was born of me by the Sun! That hero was born with a pair of ear-rings and clad in armour, and took after the Sun-God himself in effulgence.

13. Hearing these painful words of their mother, the Pandavas began to grieve for Karna. Indeed, they became more afflicted than ever.

14—16. Then that foremost of men, viz, the heroic Yudhisthira, sighing like a snake asked his mother,—'Were you the mother of that Karna who was like a sea having arrows for his billows, his tall standard for his vortex, his own mighty arms for a couple of huge alligators, his large car for his deep lake, and the sound of his palms for his tempestous roar, and whose force none could withstand except Dhananjaya? How was that son, resembling a very god born of you in former days?

17. The power of his arms scorched all of us! How, O mother, could you conceal him like a person concealing a fire within the folds of his cloth?

18. His might of arms was always adored by the Dhartarashtras even as we always worship the might of the wielder of Gandiva.

19. How was that foremost of powerful men, that first of car-warriors, who fought the united force of all the kings in battle, how was he a son of yours?

20. Was that foremost of all holders of weapons our eldest brother? How did you give birth to that child of wonderful prowess?

21. Alas, for your concealing this fact we have been undone! By the death of Karna, ourselves with all our friends have been greatly sorry.

22—23. The grief I feel at Karna's death is a hundred times greater than that felt for the death of Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi, and the destruction of the Panchalas and the Kurus! Thinking of Karna, I am burning with grief, like a person thrown into a burning fire.

24. Nothing could have been unattainable by us, not excepting things belonging to the celestial region. Alas, this terrible carnage, so destructive of the Kurus, would not have taken place.

25. Thus bewailing, king Yudhishthira the just uttered loud wails of woe. The powerful king then offered oblations of water to his deceased elder brother.

26. Then all the ladies that crowded the shores of the river suddenly cried aloud.

27. The intelligent king of the Kurus, viz, Yudhishthira, had the wives and members of Karna's family brought before him.

28. The righteous-souled king performed, with them, the water-rite in honor of his eldest brother. Having finished the ceremony, the king, with his mind greatly agitated, rose from the waters of Ganga."

FINISH STREE PARVA.

17. The remaining warriors, that have anyhow been killed on the field of battle, have attained to the region of the Uttara-Kurus.'

Dhritarashtra said :—

Yudhishthira said :—

13. Hearing these painful words of their mother, the Pandavas began to grieve for Karna. Indeed, they became more afflicted than ever.

14—16. Then that foremost of men, viz, the heroic Yudhisthira, sighing like a snake asked his mother,—'Were you the mother of that Karna who was like a sea having arrows for his billows, his tall standard for his vortex, his own mighty arms for a couple of huge alligators, his large car for his deep lake, and the sound of his palms for his tempestous roar, and whose force none could withstand except Dhananjaya? How was that son, resembling a very go born of you in former days?

17. The power of his arms scorched all of us! How, O mother, could you conceal him like a person concealing a fire within the folds of his cloth?

18. His might of arms was always adored by the Dhartarashtras even as we always worship the might of the wielder of Gandiva.

19. How was that foremost of powerful men, that first of car-warriors, who fought the united force of all the kings in battle, how was he a son of yours?

20. Was that foremost of all holders of weapons our eldest brother? How did you give birth to that child of wonderful prowess?

21. Alas, for your concealing this fact we have been undone! By the death of Karna, ourselves with all our friends have been greatly sorry.

22—23. The grief I feel at Karna's death is a hundred times greater than that felt for the death of Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi, and the destruction of the Panchalas and the Kurus! Thinking of Karna, I am burning with grief, like a person thrown into a burning fire.

24. Nothing could have been unattainable by us, not excepting things belonging to the celestial region. Alas, this terrible carnage, so destructive of the Kurus, would not have taken place.

25. Thus bewailing, king Yudhishthira the just uttered loud wails of woe. The powerful king then offered oblations of water to his deceased elder brother.

26. Then all the ladies that crowded the shores of the river suddenly cried aloud.

27. The intelligent king of the Kurus, viz, Yudhishthira, had the wives and members of Karna's family brought before him.

28. The righteous-souled king performed, with them, the water-rite in honor of his eldest brother. Having finished the ceremony, the king, with his mind greatly agitated, rose from the waters of Ganga."

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the night passed away loud was the noise made by the kings by their all shouting "Array, array".

2—3. O descendant of Bharata, the blowings of conchs, the sounds of drums, the neighing of horses, the clatter of car-wheels, the roarings of rushing elephants, and the shouts of heroes, clapping of arm-pits and the cries of the warriors made everywhere a tremendous noise.

4. O king, rising at sunrise, the large armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas made all their arrangements complete.

5—6. When the sun rose, the fearful weapons of offence and deffence and the armours of your sons and those of the sons of Pandu became fully visible.

(JAMVUKHANDA VINIRMANA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1—2. O Sanjaya, O Suta, tell me in detail the length of life, the strength, the good and bad things, the past, present and future of the dwellers of the Bharata Varsa and of the Haimavat Varsa and also of Harivarsa.

Sanjaya said :—

45. Skilled in every weapon, possessing himself gentleness, and great energy with passions under complete control, hearing that such son of Shantanu (Bhisma) is killed, I consider the rest of my army as already slain.

46. In my opinion, impiety has now become stronger than piety, for the Pandavas desire sovereignty even killing their venerable Guru.

47. In the days of yore, Rama, the son of Jamadagni, skilled in every weapon and whom none excelled, was vanquished by Bhisma in battle when fighting on behalf of Amva.

..., in which the balls have been made by the men, elephants and horses, in which arrows and javelins and swords and darts have formed the dice, who were those clutched gamblers that gamble, by taking their very lives who won, who lost, who cast the dice with success and who else have been killed besides the son of Shantanu, Bhisma. Tell me all, O Sanjaya, for hearing that Devavrata (of his men) that father of mine, that hero of fearful deeds, that ornament of battle, Bhisma is killed, peace cannot come to me. Thinking that all my sons would be killed, I am affected with the greatest anguish.

75—76. O Sanjaya, you make my that grief blaze forth as fire with Ghee. Seeing Bhisma, celebrated in all the worlds, who undertook a great task, killed, I am sure, my sons are lamenting. I desire to hear their sorrows that have been produced by Duryodhana's act.

77. Therefore, O Sanjaya, tell me all that had happened in the battle, the result of my wicked son's folly.

78—79. O Sanjaya, ill or well, tell me every thing. Tell me all in full and in detail,—all that was achieved in the battle by Bhisma ever desirous of victory,—by that great warrior skilled in all weapons. How did the battle take place between the of horses and elephants ... powerful kings, all that which ... by the help of Yoga power. Do not grieve. All this was pre-ordained.

7—10. Bowing down my head to your father (Vyasa) that wise son of Parasara, through whose grace I have acquired excellent and celestial vision, the power of seeing and hearing from a great distance, and knowing other peoples' hearts and also the past and the future,—the delightful power of going through the sky, also the knowledge of all the persons that violate the ordinances and also the power of not being cut by weapons in battle, I shall narrate to you the romantic and the highly wonderful and hair-stirring battle that was fought amongst the Bharatas,—now listen to me.

11. When the troops were arrayed according to the rule, when they were all ready for battle, O king, Duryodhana thus spoke to Dushasana.

12. "O Dushasana, let cars be immediately ordered for the protection of Bhisma. Speedily urge all our troops to advance.

13. What I have been thinking for many years has now come to me;—namely the meeting of the Pandavas and the Kurus at the head of their respective armies.
